We pointed out at the outset that the report does not consider that all these facts which constitute difficulties for the access to raw material of countries not possessing them are insuperable. But a glance at all these obstacles is sufficient to show their extent. Naturally, if they are considered individually, the conclusion may be reached that a particular obstacle can be removed without great difficulty. But unfortunately each one of these obstacles is in some way bound up with others, and it cannot be expected that international trade will be released in the near future from the fetters of the present compulsory system. If it were possible to reduce these obstacles, the League of Nations in which 61 nations of the world are represented, would have no doubt reached practical results in the interest of its own prestige. But it is a long way from theoretical considerations to practical results. In theory there have frequently been signs of clear understanding since the War. But the unreasonable connection of all international problems and troubles with the "Peace Treaties" of 1919 has shown disastrously hitherto, in spite of the clear understanding of many experts, that the senselessness, the destructiveness and the danger in all matters has relentlessly brought the nations closer to the edge of chaos. If international reason and the wisdom of the experts had placed their seal on the decisions in the practical negotiations of the nations, especially in the economic sphere, we should not have experienced the failure of the London World Economic Conference and the fact that, immediately after that failure, certain colonial Powers developed their preferential systems to a greater extent than ever before.

5. The Policy of the Open Door and Colonial Equality of Rights.

The raw material question of today is not new, but it is the raw material question of yesterday. In the last two decades it has not been possible to clear up definitely the economic troubles caused by the War. In the present-day discussion of the raw material problem, it is so easily forgotten that the main claimant of raw materials in the world, Germany, has claims which, at the end of last century, were settled to some extent by the acquisition of colonies after prolonged international discussions. At that time England and France were sensible enough to reach a practical solution of the raw material problem by dividing up the raw material territories, and the treaty details of the Congo Act testify to a far-sighted international economic policy and the international feeling of responsibility towards the natives which was at that time advanced particularly by Germany. If one considers Germany's industrial development since that time and the increase in the German population, and if on the other hand one considers the loss of the sources of raw material that Germany possessed before the War due to the seizure of the colonies and the loss of territory by the mother country, the present German claim to the possession of raw materials appears with an urgency and a moral justification which cannot be denied. The German foreign investments before the War, amounting to about 25,000 million Marks brought in 1,000 million Marks in interest every year. German services, in particular shipping and the insurance enterprises, gave considerable profits. It was possible to use these receipts for the payment of raw materials and colonial products. The Versailles Treaty deprived Germany of the major portion of her foreign investments. Such a position cannot be met by inadequate desires, recommendations and methods put forward with the intention of preventing a redistribution of raw material territories and limiting the scope of the raw material problem as if it were to be settled by international treaties and the good will of the main owners of raw materials. The first part of the report by the Raw Material Commission of the League of Nations merely shows up to the present that peaceful and reasonable economic relations do not exist in the world and that there are a number of obstacles which give little hope of improvement for the countries that are poor in raw materials. The League experts are well aware that the raw material problem is an export problem for the countries lacking in raw materials, even if their recommendation were followed. But export business is only possible at present by sacrificing prices. If concessions were made to the desire to export, for instance on the part of Germany, resulting possibly in an increase in German exports by means of a reduction of prices thus enabling foreign exchange to be procured for the purchase of raw materials, such a procedure would undoubtedly sooner or later be nullified by a similar policy on the part of foreign countries. Such a procedure would also bring about no change in the fact that the great Colonial Powers would continue to reserve their own industrial products for their exports to their colonies. They would defend with all the means in their power the world markets which they had secured by treaty provisions. A reduction in German export prices would, however, only have an ultimate possibility of success if there still remained open doors in the world, but it would have no success in a world economy that is independent of price laws and is governed by State treaties, customs duties and quotas. There is therefore no guarantee that German export can be increased in this way and that the supply of raw materials can be thus improved.

In this connection we must deal with an argument that has recently been put forward by a certain neutral press, namely that the return of the German colonies would necessarily lead to changes in the economic structure of the international market in raw materials which would ultimately further restrict German exports and result in an unfavourable balance for Germany.

It is astonishing to find theoretical considerations in which the authors are on the one hand compelled to belittle the present value of the former German colonies in order to be able to state that their return to Germany would be of no avail, and on the other hand to draw the conclusion that a return of these colonies would have an alarming effect on the international raw material market. We are accustomed to these unstable arguments on the part of the opponents of the German colonial claim and it is possible to overlook them. But some criticism is necessary in cases where the simpleminded reader himself begins to believe that the former German colonies are apparently of importance, a belief that is confirmed by official and reliable figures. These reliable figures are, however, then twisted in a most unobjective manner. It is, for instance, pointed out that the German imports of the most important raw materials amounted to so much each, while the production of the same materials in the former German colonies only covered a small percentage of these imports and would therefore only facilitate the supply of the Third Reich to a very small extent. It is entirely overlooked that the direct connection between the raw material production and the processing industry, i.e. the direct use derived by German national economy from German overseas production, would improve the German position in respect of raw materials because Germany would be enabled, by increasing her economic wealth, to purchase more on the international raw material market. In this process of circulation it is clear to all who regard matters from the economic and not from the political point of view that even a small percentage of certain raw materials represent an improvement of the German balance of payments on account of the work bestowed upon them in order to convert them into finished products, even if the export remains the same in the shape of released capital which had formerly to be used for these raw materials.

For the economic importance of the former German colonies does not lie merely in the supply of raw materials as such. One need only glance at the trade figures of the present mandates in order to realise the direct and indirect advantages with their innumerable ramifications for the mother country.

"Any country that takes the responsibility and bears the expense of administering colonies, or mandates, will inevitably hope to secure the larger share of the trade of these territories, particularly the import trade. And if there are valuable resources to be exploited it is natural that the nationals of the governing State should be the first to be informed of them. If railroads or bridges are to be built, harbours constructed and public buildings erected, the more lucrative contracts are not likely to go to the nationals of other countries." This paragraph is to be found in the authoritative book by the American Mr. Gerig "The Open Door and the Mandates System", to which a member of the Mandates Commission, the Geneva Professor Rappard, wrote the preface. In one chapter, "The Open Door in Practice", Mr. Gerig openly and justly opposed the view taken by a part of public opinion that the mandates had only troubles and burdens and no other interests than those of the native population.

Germany's claim to colonies of her own has also been interpreted as an intention on her part to cut herself off from the world market. Colonies in the possession of Germany, it is said, would be nothing more than an advance contribution to a striving after economic autarchy which would make reasonable commercial relations still more difficult.

This charge may be met by referring to the report of the Raw Material Committee with which we have dealt above and in particular by putting the question: Why are these strivings of colonial empires not in the first place generally established, and why are they not at the same time stated to be a tendency observable in almost all countries? In point of fact, however, such a charge does not hold water in the case of Germany. In so far as the German aspirations are symptoms of economic independence, they relate at the present time exclusively to the safeguarding of the food of the German people; the guiding principles aim solely and unequivocally at the best possible utilisation of German soil, while it is recognised that Germany, even with colonial possessions, would as an industrial country still require large quantities of raw materials for which she would be dependent to a large extent on foreign supplies. Even at the time of the worst boycott and under present international economic conditions, the low level of which, as the Raw Material Committee pointed out, has been caused by a great number of obstacles, Germany has been and is one of the best consumers of raw materials in the world. It would be only just and equitable to testify that this good customer has in practice promoted the resumption of international economic relations in its own interest to the extent of its power. The allegation that there is any danger of Germany cutting herself off in future, if her former colonies are restored, is a malicious statement which should not be used in discussion especially by those who in the same breath advance the original argument that the former German colonies could not cover Germany's requirements of raw materials.

The same people who express such fears on the other hand, as mentioned above, speak of the "vast changes in the structure" of the international raw material market on the return of the former German colonies. They overlook the entire practical development of such a case. In particular, they forget that these "changes in structure" are not the result of a war. They will in any case not have such catastrophic effects on the present owners as occurred in Germany in 1919 when an international policy aimed at the economic downfall of Germany and that downfall was to be brought about not least by the seizure of colonies which had been legally acquired.

Germany, on the other hand, has a good historical right to make the statement that in her future colonial possessions she will put the principle of the open door into practice to the same extent as others. In our opinion this provides the best assurance that a return of the colonies to Germany would not involve any revolutionary change in the structure of the international raw material market. Germany was a protagonist of the practical application of the principle of the "open door". As one of the greatest consumers of raw materials in the world, Germany will also in future recognise this principle to the same extent as it is followed by other colonial Powers. But there are no grounds in history to question Germany's feeling of responsibility in respect of a just settlement of international economic relations. In the book by Mr. Gerig quoted above, detailed information is given regarding pre-War practice and the practice of the present mandatory Powers, and the German colonial policy of the "open door" is recognised to the full. He writes on page 72/73:

"Germany was the one Great Power which did not win her colonial empire by conquest. The Open Door policy was adopted by Germany at a time when she was protesting against the closed doors of other territories and when she was taking the initiative in promoting the Conference of Berlin for equality of treatment in the Congo. Germany took a new departure in Open Door methods by negotiating with England bilateral reciprocal and unlimited Open Door treaties for their respective territories in Middle Africa and in the Pacific. There is no evidence from trade statistics, tariff schedules, and informed authorities which leads to the conclusion that the Open Door was not practised. The equal economic opportunity for other countries practised by the German colonial administration from 1885 to 1914 stands as a record of which the German nation may well be proud."

From this quotation it is possible to judge on the one hand of the injustice which madly destroyed international economic relations in 1919. But on the other hand it becomes constantly clearer that the same problems formerly came up for discussion, with the sole difference that they were solved without unnecessary hypocrisy on the basis of equal rights. In the solution of the raw material problem, however, the condition of equal rights forms a basis of discussion which has not yet been recognised, as is only too clearly shown by the report of the Raw Material Committee.

6. Payment for raw materials.

The question of the payment for raw materials shows the insufficiency of the proposals put forward in the League report, and the report itself states that the difficulties encountered are much greater than those connected with the supply of raw materials. Moreover, the examination of the complaints and difficulties with regard to the acquisition of and payment for raw materials, described in the report gives views which only require to be emphasised.

But here again it must unfortunately be pointed out that the scope of this question is reduced by the fact that in the first place the hard lot of the countries producing raw materials is described in detail and on the other hand the increase in the demand for raw materials is attributed to the armaments policy of the countries. The report goes into the various conditions affecting the balance of payments of various countries—a position which, after the depression which started in 1929, some countries endeavoured to meet by means of clearing agreements. In most cases, it says, this led to a situation in which foreign exchange transactions became entirely dependent on the clearing system. The report observes :

“Some of the countries concerned may, however, plead that they were forced to adopt exchange control and clearings in consequence of restrictions imposed by other countries on imports ; some have found that, despite the devaluation of their currencies, they were unable to abolish their exchange restrictions.”

It goes on to state :

“Further, though it must be recognised that the United Kingdom tariff has not prevented a very substantial increase in imports to the British market, the abandonment by the United Kingdom of the system of free trade and the introduction of protection have undoubtedly influenced unfavourably the balance of payments of the European countries which in the past depended largely on free entry into that market.

In this connection, it should be mentioned that the great colonial empires and political systems of a comparable character have tended during recent years to strengthen more and more the commercial ties which unite their various constituent parts ; this tendency has necessarily affected the rest of the world, although, generally speaking, these political systems have no exchange restrictions and though their economy cannot be regarded as self-sufficient.

The position varies in different cases. In the British Empire, what principally affects other countries is the system of mutual preferences which prevails in the United Kingdom, the Dominions, India and certain parts of the Colonial Empire. The United States maintains a special Customs regime with her overseas territories, the Philippines and Cuba and, apart from this, introduced a particularly high Customs tariff at the beginning of the depression. Again, France, Portugal and Japan are all united with their overseas territories by systems of mutual preferences and, in some cases, by a form of Customs union which, of course, represents a much closer network of commercial relations than a preferential system.

Any preferential system must tend to have some adverse effect in the countries to which it does not apply. The development of preferential systems does not accord with present efforts to mitigate restrictions on international trade, and, in certain cases, it may cause indirect difficulties for countries requiring raw materials.”

The report then draws attention to the effects of the cessation of capital movements, which led to the financial crisis of 1931, and to the almost complete disappearance of international credit which brought about changes in the trend of trade. The disequilibrium between the different national economic systems, which it ascribes partly to monetary depreciations, contributed to preserving and reinforcing Customs barriers and quotas. The Committee considers that the solution of the present difficulties in regard to the payment for raw materials requires concerted action to restore freer circulation of capital, goods and labour, and that any progress in this direction should help to meet certain countries' complaints in regard to payments for raw materials. Such action could, however, only be effective :

“(a) If the countries which at present restrict foreign exchange transactions find means to modify their financial and economic policies so as to re-establish confidence and if they succeed in re-establishing the free negotiability of their currencies ;

(b) If measures can be taken which will protect the countries which have imposed foreign-exchange control, and now desire to abolish this system, against the very dangers in which it had its origin, and which they have reason to fear might again arise if it were abolished ;

(c) If the impediments to trade—such as high or preferential tariffs, quotas, clearings, etc.—can be diminished so as to give the debtor countries the possibility of meeting their obligations ;

(d) And, lastly, if there is a movement towards an international standard which will facilitate the settlement of the balances arising from mutual exchanges between nations, a matter which to-day presents so many complications.”

In this connection, the Committee suggested that practical remedies might be sought, particularly in the following directions :

“(a) The Committee would welcome every effort to abolish clearings. For this purpose, it would be necessary to study in detail the possibilities of financing commercial transactions concluded under the present systems, in order to remove difficulties due to the fact that these systems have to a great extent eliminated credit operations which were previously normal.

The purpose of these suggestions is to facilitate the acquisition of raw materials through the operation of credit, and, in the same connection, it has been suggested that the existence of reserve stocks of such materials might also open up the possibility of credit transactions.

(b) Closer co-operation between the central banks might make it possible to meet certain difficulties against which countries are unable to take effective independent action.

(c) Lastly, there is the vital question whether means can be found of granting financial support under suitable conditions to countries subject to exchange control and wishing to abandon it, in such a way that these countries may be protected against the dangers of an initial deficit in their balance of accounts resulting from this abandonment.”

The report goes on to state that an increase in exports would help to bring about internal conditions such as would enable exchange control to be abandoned. In this connection, the report mentions a proposal to the effect that the scope of application of the principle of the “open door” should be extended as regards trade to territories found, after examination, to be similar in economic conditions to those to which the principle is already applied, namely the Congo Basin and the A and B mandates.

On examining the suggestions made in the report regarding the difficulties of payment for raw materials, the impression is unavoidable that, although it mentions the difficulties raised in particular by the colonial Powers by means of their preferential duties and Customs systems, more is on the whole demanded from the countries which have difficulties with their payments than can reasonably be expected of them. The only practicable suggestion is the grant of financial assistance, although such assistance is only designed to remove the protective measures which in particular the countries lacking in foreign exchange are obliged to take. To say the least, such financial assistance is a very complicated matter. For what could be the possible meaning of such financing unless these countries were from the outset given some guarantee of greater export possibilities and of a regular and normal supply of raw materials ? Moreover the entire problem of payment is dependent on phenomena in the world market which will not soon disappear. It must be constantly borne in mind that, for instance, the German efforts to export are frustrated by a series of counter-measures. Germany's industrial competitors have endeavoured in the past and are endeavouring at present to increase their output as much as possible. This competition between the individual industrial countries has become infinitely keener in recent years. Unfortunately the report does not make clear that the devaluation in some countries has had no other meaning than that export goods have been almost given away. But the preferential system of some colonial States has reduced German exports still more than the general depression, and it is just these conditions that have brought German foreign trade into the rigid track of barter under clearing and compensation agreements. Freely available foreign means of payment, in other words hard cash, are only received in payment for German exports to the extent of scarcely 20 %. The natural structure of German foreign trade, which consisted in using the traditional substantial foreign exchange surpluses in trade with European countries and with the main German markets in order to pay for overseas raw materials, has been unfavourably influenced by the compulsory and protective measures imposed upon Germany. It is quite ridiculous to state with an undertone of reproach that foreign exchange control must be removed because it is one of the greatest evils. The worst effects of exchange control are felt, not by foreign countries, but by the German foreign merchants who, under the pressure of this exchange position, are deprived of free initiative and are subject to restrictions of all kinds. Germany has obviously the greatest interest in being released from these compulsory measures, but it is the present compulsory economic system aggravated by the vast protective measures of the colonial Powers that has brought international trade to such a pass that for some time past there has been a raw material problem even for the League of Nations and that there are countries lacking in raw materials whose future has become a threatening danger, a danger for themselves and for the world.

7. "Is the raw material problem a colonial problem"?

3 % = 10.96 %. The Foreign Secretary, Mr. Eden, and the French delegate, M. Faure, at this year's Assembly, made the very best political use of the findings of the raw Material Committee. Why so much fuss about a "negligible quantity" of 3 % which the Colonies are only able to supply. The raw material problem is not a colonial problem.

In order to refute these "three percent", we have in the first place examined the statistics used by the Raw Material Committee of the League of Nations. On page 7 of the Committee's report we found the statement that the material in question existed in a few copies in the Library of the League, where it was available for examination. The documents in question are numbered E./M.P./13 a, b, c, and c addendum. We found the participation of the colonies in world production of raw materials in document E./M. P./13 (a), where the percentages for 48 raw materials are given according to countries; these are divided into three groups, i.e. main countries, certain small countries (Palestine, Syria and the Philippines) and colonies. The percentages are calculated on the basis of weight, 100 % being equal to the total world production. On the basis of this table we have worked out in figures what is the truth of these "three percent" which have been used for political ends. To our astonishment, we have reached the conclusion that the material of the League of Nations is in contradiction with the statement in the introduction to the report of raw materials. The figures of the above-mentioned document give a result not of three percent or approximately that percentage, but in exact figures 10.96 %. It is in any case three times the amount. In the following table we have extracted the individual figures for 1935 from this point of view from the League document, so that the reader may observe for himself the curious fact that on the one hand a report by League experts, in its introduction, gives a handle to political exploitation, namely that the share of the colonies in the world production of raw materials is only three percent, while the same report refers to statistics which in fact show 10.96 %.

(The percentage is even greater, because the table in the League document does not include in particular important colonial raw materials, such as palm oil, tungsten, hemp and chrome, which for instance, according to John de Wilde's table in Foreign Politics Reports show the following percentages of the colonies in world production : tungsten 25.52 % (including India with 76.90 %); palm oil and palm kernel oil 98.99 %; chrome 34.50 %. The importance of hemp (sisal) is also not shown by the table; the vast areas under sisal in the former German colonies, however, indicates that hemp is also a definitely colonial raw material. It is not clear why these raw materials as such are not also included in the table.)

Percentage of the World Production of Raw Materials (World Production = 100%) obtained in Great Britain, Germany and all the Colonial Territories in the World.

Table prepared by this Journal according to the material used by the Raw Material Committee of the League, in particular League document E./M.P./13 (a) of June 7th, 1937.

We do not claim that this calculation is a special revelation. But colonies have more value for one than for another. This is pointed out in the report where, in referring to the three percent it makes the qualifying remark that the importance of a raw material is not indicated by its weight or value in international "trade. B on the other hand, there can be no excuse for the "three percent" if they are only intended to include production of importance for trade. When the conclusion is drawn in public speeches from the platform of the League of Nations that the raw material problem is not a colonial problem because the share of the colonies in the world production of raw materials only amounts to three percent, this is either a deliberate attempt to deceive public opinion, or lack of responsibility is shown by the failure to use the actual figures which are available to everyone in the above-mentioned League document.

8. Only three "typical" colonial raw materials?

In addition to the "three percent", the introduction to the raw material report unjustly makes a further qualifying remark. On page 10 it states that the raw materials which are typically colonial number only three—viz., palm oil, rubber and copra. Here also, one need only turn to the same League document to prove the inaccuracy of this statement. A glance at our table will suffice. It is in any case true to state that if certain raw materials are produced in the colonies to a greater extent than 10 % of the world production of raw materials, they may justly be regarded as definite colonial raw materials. If this is recognised, we find that according to the League calculation there are 12 products where the percentage is over 10.

There are, however, other calculations which in our opinion are equally reliable and which give a higher percentage of participation. For instance, the above-mentioned table by John de Wilde which we reproduced in our special number 192/206 "Colonies and Raw Materials", page 71, gives the following colonial participation in the world production of raw materials: groundnuts 82.60 % (according to the League calculation only 22.8 %); copra 100 % (in the League table only 68.2 %, although the report states that copra is a 100 % colonial raw material). Soya beans are given in the League table at only 1.8 % while de Wilde calculates 88.2 %. The following differences may also serve as examples: Olive oil, Wilde 17.80 %, League 9.2 %; molybdenum, Wilde 8.28 %, League 1.5 %; magnesium, Wilde 15.19 %, League nil; phosphate, Wilde 54.46 %, League 38.2 %; chrome, Wilde 34.50 %, League nil.

There is therefore every reason to state that if all the raw materials at present produced in the colonies were added together, and if a calculation of the probability of the productive and economic capacity of the colonies had been made, the "three percent propagandists" would have had a less superficial insight into the question and would have remained silent. The statement regarding the three percent is therefore, to put it mildly, an arbitrary play on statistical figures. If the report had examined the percentage represented by the share of certain consuming countries in the colonies, this would have been a useful contribution. It would have shown, for instance, that Germany alone obtains 18 % of her raw materials and food-stuffs from mandated territories and colonies, and this percentage is even increased to 22 when the dominions are included; moreover, this calculation does not take into account the possibilities of development. General Ritter von Epp, in his speech of October 21st at Stockholm, which we reproduce at the beginning of the present number, mentions in this connection a reply by Lord Beaverbrook to Mr. Eden's speech at Geneva. No better reply to that speech could have been given. Moreover, these three percent were disputed even at Geneva; among others, the Polish delegate stated that at the present time not 3 % but 9.7 % of all raw materials in the world came from the colonies.

Juggling with percentages designed to fulfil a political aim can in any case not promote the discussion on this problem. If the discussion were to be continued in this way, League experts might be placed in the most awkward position, for the document in question, which we have used to refute the statement regarding the "three percent", also contains, for instance, the figures for 1925 and 1929 which show an even greater share of the colonies in the world production of raw materials; these two years might be taken to reach a more normal judgment, because 1925 was a time when the colonies were extensively developed and Customs duties and similar obstacles did not exist to the present extent, while 1929 was a boom period just before the general world depression.

9. Great Britain's wealth.

The above statements are sufficient to prove that the importance of colonies for the supply of raw materials is to be estimated higher even in pure figures. The League discussion, therefore, really evaded matters, in order to safeguard the interest of certain colonial empires. As regards the British Foreign Secretary, Mr. Eden, the representative of the greatest colonial empire in the world, who stated during this discussion that the raw material problem was not a colonial problem, it is possible however, to draw attention to British wealth in order to throw a moral light on the value of his statements. The above table is prepared for this special purpose. It gives a comparison between the British Empire and Germany. These figures are taken from the same League document that we have used above; we therefore give them with reservation and merely in order to evade the reproach that we have used German figures.

Of 48 raw materials in the list, the British Empire has 45 and Germany 26. In making this comparison, it must be added that, in the case of almost all the 26 raw materials of which Germany has a percentage in the list, she is dependent on imports, so that the production of these materials is not sufficient for her needs. On the other hand, it may be stated that the British Empire is only dependent on imports or supplied from abroad in three or four cases. Such a comparison may appear to be too simple, but it shows the extreme contrast which exists through the fact that there are rich countries in the world, while others live in a constant, threatening nightmare in dread of the next harvest and even of the anxious question of food for the people for the next few months. These facts are not made any the less by the representatives of rich countries talking at every opportunity of international responsibility and at the same time avoiding difficult questions by trifling and superficial remarks.

10. The value of the former German colonies.

The belittling of the importance of colonies for countries lacking in raw materials and the exclusion of an international discussion on any possible redistribution of colonial territories is still in the interest of certain colonial Powers, although the arguments used against such redistribution are sometimes very naive. It will be remembered that, at the beginning of the discussion on raw materials, there was another percentage which played a similar part to the "three percent" at present made use of by the Raw Material Committee. For there have been constant references until the present time to the statement that, before the War, Germany's trade with her colonies amounted to barely 0.5 % of her total foreign trade. Here again—and it is characteristic of the view taken by colonial Powers who own an Empire consisting of a third of the surface of the globe—it is not realised or there is no desire to realise that modest amounts from colonies have a totally different importance in the case of countries lacking in raw materials. These countries that are rich in raw materials could afford, for instance, to neglect the economic development of the German colonies under mandate for nearly ten years. In spite of this, it is a fact that the natural resources of the former colonies have in recent years shown great prosperity.

The reports submitted in November to the Mandates Commission of the League by the various mandatory Governments have given a striking proof of this. From the two examples of the Cameroons and Togoland, for which territories M. Besson, the representative of France, gave information, the facts and the rights and wrongs of the raw material problem may be made obvious to the experts of the Raw Material Committee.

M. Besson stated that the imports of Togoland under French mandate in 1936 amounted to a total of 20,593,500 francs, and in 1937 they had risen to 38,097,000 francs, while the exports amounted in 1936 to 24,818,000 francs and in 1937 to 51,234,000 francs. We have as yet no information regarding the share of the various countries in this trade. But we gave the figures in our "Colonies and Raw Materials" number for the year 1935. In that year the imports were 31,208,000 francs and the exports 34,692,000 francs. The distribution according to countries was as follows:

Supplying countries:

Germany	Fr. 1,728,000
France and colonies	„ 3,518,000
Great Britain	„ 10,556,000
Netherlands	„ 1,439,000
United States	„ 3,162,000
Japan	„ 2,177,000

France and colonies	„ 20,442,000

It must be recognised in this connection that trade follows the flag, even in the case of mandated territories. In the case of Togoland under French mandate for the year 1935, Germany was only able to supply a quarter of the value of the goods she bought from that territory; that should also be noted.

M. Besson's figures are also convincing enough against the statement by the Raw Material Committee and its political exploitation on the platform of the League that the raw material problem is not a colonial problem. The exports of palm kernels from Togoland under French mandate rose from 13,133 tons to 21,505 tons, palm oil from 2094 to 3281 tons, copra from 4300 to 5656 tons, coffee from 11 to 162 tons, maize from 3183 to 7807 tons.

M. Besson's figures may be further supplemented by pointing out that in 1935 the exports of cocoa amounted to 11,100 tons and cotton to 1535 tons, to mention only the most important export products.

The mandated territory of Togoland is therefore a colonial raw material territory of the first order. If at the present time such brilliant economic progress is reported by the French authorities, it must be borne in mind that German hard work and German colonising capacity created the foundations and conditions for this success. In the course of sixteen years Germany raised the imports and exports of Togoland from nothing to 10,630,000 marks and 9,140,000 marks respectively in 1913, and the French State Commissioner for Togoland, M. Bonnacarrère said in 1920: "Germany was well on the way towards making Togoland a model colony".

M. Besson's figures for the Cameroons under French mandate show the same features.

The exports of palm kernels rose from 37,000 tons in 1935 to 44,000 tons in 1936, palm oil from 7900 to 10,000 tons, maize from 6 tons to 4000 tons, coffee from 1300 to 2000 tons, bananas from 7700 to 16,000 tons.

The information of the League Secretariat of November 11th does not show that the same territory in 1935 exported 7725 tons of groundnuts, 23,375 tons of cocoa, 77,013 tons of building timber, 19,274 tons of mahogany.

In what direction did this trade go? In 1935 it was distributed according to countries as follows:

Supplying countries:

Germany	Fr. 5,626,000
Belgium	„ 3,657,000
France and colonies	„ 19,473,000
Great Britain	„ 24,935,000
Netherlands	„ 1,686,000
United States	„ 10,549,000

Netherlands	„ 16,221,000
United States	„ 6,583,000

In 1913, Germany's foreign trade with the colony of the Cameroons amounted to: imports 34,620,000 marks and exports 29,150,000 marks. It may therefore also be said of this territory under mandate that German colonising work created the primary conditions for the present economic position which the French representative stated at the end of his report was one of great prosperity.

"It cannot be denied that Germany in many respects transferred her methodical spirit, her orderly qualities and her characteristic discipline to her former colonies and to a great extent promoted the development of the territories now under mandate." In the special number of this Journal, to which we have already referred, we quoted this sentence in connection with the colonial guilt lie and the charge put forward by the French that Germany was incapable of colonising. We repeat this sentence because at this year's Assembly of the League of Nations the Socialist politician, M. Faure, as representative of France, did not reach this objective view of the matter in discussing the raw material problem. The sentence was uttered by his party friend, M. Moutet, the present French Colonial Minister, on August 26th, 1924 in the discussion of the mandatory question at the XXIIInd Inter-Parliamentary Conference at Berne. Such a statement should still be valid for responsible French quarters. It is directly connected with the raw material problem. Germany would certainly not, as she undoubtedly did, have promoted the economic development of her former colonies to the utmost, if she had not bitterly needed the raw materials which they could supply. For Germany her former colonies were raw material territories. For Germany, in any case, the raw material problem has always been a colonial problem. We demonstrated this convincingly and most objectively in our special number. The above examples of Togoland and the Cameroons are only used as examples as they happen to be of present interest and have become known through the reports to the Mandates Commission. These examples do not relate to the most extensive of the former German colonial territories, though they were also formerly among the richest.

The importance of the other German colonies from the point of view of raw materials may be further demonstrated by two more examples, namely former German East Africa and South West Africa, which are at present British mandates.

The foreign trade of East Africa in 1923 amounted to: imports 53,360,000 marks and exports 35,750,000 marks. In 1935 the imports were £2,990,000 and the exports £3,354,000. The main exports in the same year included 5,003 tons of rice, 18,886 tons of coffee, 10,140 tons of cotton and 4,115 tons of copra. It should further be noted that in 1935 German East Africa, as a mandated territory, exported no rubber whatever, whereas in 1912 the export of this commodity amounted to 10,019 tons. The principal countries participated as follows in the foreign trade of the mandated territory:

Supplying countries:

Germany	£317,700
Great Britain	£866,000
Netherlands	£ 44,100
British India	£145,000
Japan	£655,800
Kenya and Uganda	£285,300
United States	£197,700

Great Britain	£710,200
Netherlands	£ 67,000
British India	£320,000
United States	£131,100

The foreign trade of the former German colony of South West Africa amounted in 1913 to 43,420,000 marks of imports and 70,300,000 marks of exports. The export trade of South West Africa as a mandated territory in 1935 was as follows: imports £1,499,000, exports £2,454,000. In 1935 the most important exports were: 128,400 carats of diamonds, 3545.3 tons of vanadium ore, 4900 tons of copper ore, 3010.4 tons of jute, 82.4 tons of lamb skins, 109,200 sheep and goats, 87,100 horned cattle.

The share of the most important countries in the trade of this mandated territory in 1935 was as follows:

Supplying countries:

Germany	£ 191,700
Great Britain	£ 69,300
Union of South Africa	£1,039,700
United States	£ 38,500

Sale Markets:

Germany	£ 326,100
Belgium	£ 81,400
France	£ 63,700
Union of South Africa	£ 756,700

These two examples of German East Africa and South West Africa clearly show the preponderant commercial advantage which the mandatory Powers obtain from these territories. After such facts, if an attempt is made in any quarter to dispose of the German claim to colonies as a demand for raw materials with the remark that colonies are only a burden and mandates a source of anxiety, this may be regarded as nothing less than hypocrisy. When, in addition, the mandates are constantly advancing in the direction of incorporating the territories more and more in the administrative body of the neighbouring colonies—a tendency again shown in the recent mandate report of the French Government on Togoland—there should be no further discussion as to the value and interest attached by the mandatory Powers to these former German colonies.

The above facts also show very clearly how far removed the Raw Material Committee is from a solution of the problem and how many reservations and qualifications must be made in the report; for the questions to be considered relate to the smallest part of a problem the solution of which is not to be sought in facilities for means of payment, but in the reparation of a political injustice. In a field belonging to others, illegal owners who already own everything are now reaping what those who have no possessions, once wrung with the sweat of their brow from the soil of Africa. The involuntary description in mandatory reports of the riches of these former German colonies will, it is to be hoped, help public opinion to realise the full extent of the injustice formerly done to Germany.

11. To what extent can the German requirements of raw materials be covered by the possession of the former colonies?

The statement that the return of the mandated colonies could have scarcely any influence on Germany's position in respect of foreign exchange and raw materials can be entirely refuted by the export figures of these territories. The following table shows that the exports of the former German colonies in 1936 amounted to over 200 million marks.

If the colonies were returned, Germany could therefore count in the near future on a considerable economy of foreign exchange. The value of the raw materials and foodstuffs which, if the colonies were intensively developed, would flow from them to the mother country is estimated at 500 to 600 million RM. according to a conservative calculation made two years ago. In the meantime world prices have considerably risen. On the basis of present prices, the colonies, if properly developed could supply Germany with raw materials and foodstuffs of a value of 600 to 700 million RM. per year.

We showed in detail in our special number that the return of her former colonies would represent a decisive solution of Germany's distress in respect of raw materials. To review the position briefly, it may be said that Germany's great dependence on imports of ores and all tropical raw materials, in particular oil seeds and fibres, might be very considerably mitigated by the production of the German colonies. In the Cameroons, Togoland and German East Africa there is sufficient suitable land to safeguard Germany's supply of the most important fat substances, such as palm oil, palm kernels, groundnuts and soya beans. It is possible to plant rubber in German East Africa and the Cameroons to an extent that might make Germany independent of supplies from other countries. The German requirements of textile raw materials, such as wool, cotton, flax, hemp and jute, can be to a large extent covered in the former German colonies. For instance, the German requirements of cotton can be satisfied to the extent of nearly 40 %. The former German protectorates also give rise to the highest hopes in respect of mining. Many things that seemed utopian before the War, such as the mining of iron ore in Africa, have already become realities in other colonial territories. For instance, the mining of copper, tin and gold offer the best prospects for the future in these territories and there is no doubt of the existence of light metals and coal. In addition, these former German colonies are capable of supplying large quantities of wood, including in particular ebony. It is important for all European countries to safeguard their supply of wood, as the supplies of European wood for the manufacture of paper and cellulose may only last another twenty years. Lastly, the colonies offer rich possibilities for planting cocoa, coffee, tea, bananas and lemons, commodities which are now indispensable for a modern civilised State. In view of their climatic conditions and soil, the former German colonies would thus represent an extremely important basis of raw materials, if Germany developed them intensively under her own sovereignty.

* * *

There is no doubt that, in view of the obstacles mentioned in the report of the Raw Material Committee and of the insignificant recommendations which the Committee made for a juster distribution of the raw materials of the world, the question of the development of raw material territories by a country with its own means and from the point of view of its own requirements is of much greater significance than the present position of unequal and unjust administration by a few groups of countries, while countries poor in raw materials are more or less dependent on the discretion and good will of the principal owners of raw materials. The League of Nations, in dealing with the raw materials question, has for obvious reasons evaded this fundamental fact, and has entirely left out of account the actual cause which led to the international discussion of this problem.

12. Raw materials, the growth of the population and armaments.

During the discussion, a tendency made itself manifest which had nothing whatever to do with the raw material problem. The threadbare argument was taken up that the particular distress of certain countries in respect of raw materials was only due to their present requirements for armaments. We have already referred in this connection to the statement by the Soviet delegate Rosenblum. In the Second Committee of this year's League Assembly, the French delegate, Paul Faure, said: "If raw materials, opportunities of emigration and work for all, and national credits were to be placed at the disposal of all States, they would have to be used in the service of peace, and not for purposes of hegemony and conquest." This is the concluding sentence in a speech by a delegate of France, that is to say, of a colonial Power who allowed a socialist politician to speak to the Assembly on a subject which, to judge by his entire speech, he obviously knew nothing about. The argument that colonies are a burden for the mother country shows that the socialist Faure, who thus defends imperialism, is not informed about this discussion. In addition, he used an argument that may be attractive for political meetings, but is not in the interest of his country. He said: "The fact of having many children does not, however, confer the right to conquer foreign territories. That is especially the case when the authorities of those countries which complain most of lack of space for their growing population redouble their appeals, their grants, and their subsidies with a view to increasing the birth-rate still more." It is a sad state of affairs when the discussion of great questions involving the fate of the nations is brought down to such a low level on an international platform. It is in any case incomprehensible that a representative of France at Geneva can utter such a sentence on behalf of France, when at the same time the Government of his country is issuing a postage stamp portraying a mother with her child and bearing the inscription: "Pour sauver la race".

The argument "raw materials for armaments" which M. Faure used to the full was however immediately given the right reply in the same meeting. The Norwegian delegate, M. Maseng, quoted a number of figures proving that the raw materials required for armaments represent a very small part of all raw materials and of the necessary foodstuffs. He concluded from these figures that the raw material problem exists independently of the question of armaments.

13. Concluding Remarks.

With these remarks we may leave the criticism of the League discussion and the evasive statements of the report by the Raw Material Committee. It endeavoured to show the raw material problem as if the lack of raw materials was rather due to the bad will of those who are at present clamouring for raw materials and as if the cause of the entire evil was to be regarded as the maintenance of legislation on exchange control and the clearing procedure. Nowhere in the report is there any indication that these methods are not the primary causes but the undesired result of an economic situation in countries who have only been placed in such a position of defence by the introduction of preferential systems in the great colonial empires. The path recommended in the raw material report of the League of Nations leads to the ultimate object even less than did the point of departure of this League debate, i.e. the demand put forward at the Assembly of September 1935 by Sir Samuel Hoare for the "guarantee of participation by all nations in the products of the world". The interpretation of this demand as an extension of the policy of the open door and an extension of the mandatory system has also shown that in both cases limits are imposed upon a just and equitable fulfilment of the German claim to colonies.

The raw material problem is a colonial problem, which cannot be solved by means of percentages or in any other way except by the reparation of the injustice of Versailles.

THE BEBLIN MANIFESTATIONS ON THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE SIGNATURE OF THE GERMAN-JAPANESE AGREEMENT ⁽¹⁾

DNB. Berlin, Nov. 25th. On the occasion of the anniversary of the signature of the German-Japanese Anti-Comintern Agreement, the Reich Minister Dr. Goebbels and the Japanese Minister of Communications M. Nagai spoke at midday today on all German and Japanese transmitters.

Dr. Goebbels' speech was as follows:

"A year ago the responsible Japanese and German Governments decided to answer the Communist International's declaration of war against culture and tradition, progress and world peace, with an agreement intended to immunise their two peoples against the plague of Bolshevism and to erect a bulwark against the subversive undermining work of the Communist International.

A year is a short time for international agreements. The fact that the German-Japanese Anti-Comintern Agreement has nevertheless in this one year attained an importance extending far beyond the frontiers of the two nations is a proof of the necessity of such an agreement and the beneficial effect of joint work. International Bolshevism has now recognised that a dam is erected here against the floods of chaos and anarchy, which can no longer be broken through.

The German-Japanese Anti-Comintern Agreement is by no means one of those empty agreements in which the trouble taken has hardly ever been in a proper relationship to the subsequent result and which have therefore caused serious disappointment to the nations since the War. This agreement is a matter of conviction among the active elements of two young and determined nations, and there can be no clearer proof of the rightness of the way we have chosen and the usefulness of closer cooperation than the fact that the Italian Government has accepted the invitation conveyed in Article 2 of the agreement and has recently acceded to it.

It may also be stated on this first anniversary that inner approval of the agreement is constantly growing in many other countries.

This attitude is all the more comprehensible as there has been in the meantime no lack of evidence that the Communist International is still endeavouring to interfere in the internal affairs of the nations and thus to threaten not only their peace and social well-being but world peace as a whole.

In transmitting my greetings on the anniversary of the Anti-Comintern Agreement to our friend the Japanese nation, on behalf of the entire German people, I combine with it the wish that the joint work within the framework of this agreement, which is not directed against a third State and which serves as a defence of cultural possessions against subversion and menace by the Communist International, may continue to be crowned with success."

The broadcast speech of the Japanese Minister of Communications, M. Nagai, was as follows:

"On the momentous first anniversary of the Japanese-German agreement against the Communist International, I venture to send my sincerest greetings by wireless from distant Japan to our friend the German nation which, like the Japanese nation, is striving to realise the ideal of world peace. Through knowledge of German science, art and literature, I have always felt myself closely connected with the great German people. When at the present time I picture to myself the new German Reich which, after the Great War, has again courageously arisen from great political and economic disorders under the banner of the swastika, together with its Führer, Adolf Hitler, I am filled with sincere admiration. Our nations, which have a great political and high cultural tradition in common are, in spite of all difficulties, constantly striving towards justice and public order. They are animated by the ideal of a State based on morality. The moral national ideologies of our two nations are expressly opposed to the materialistic subversive ideology of Communism, which serves to satisfy low materialistic interests of mankind and seeks to unite the world on this basis.

The Sino-Japanese conflict is for us a holy struggle, which aims at calling the Nanking Government to account for its anti-Japanese attitude, freeing the Chinese people from the Red danger and safeguarding peace in the Far East.

It is a great joy to us that our friend Italy has recently also acceded to the Anti-Comintern Agreement, thus further strengthening our anti-Communist camp.

The so-called principle of the status quo ante, by which it has hitherto been thought world peace could be preserved, leads today to many contradictions and conflicts and is now on the point of breaking down. The aim of our struggle is to found world peace on the basis of a new order and on a great and just spirit. By strengthening the anti-Communist camp, the axis of which connects Tokio-Berlin with Rome, we are firmly convinced that new and strong foundations will be laid for world peace and therefore also for the well-being of mankind."

DNB. Berlin, Nov. 25th. The Japanese Ambassador, Count Mushakoji, on the anniversary of the conclusion of the German-Japanese Agreement gave a reception, in the course of which he made the following speech:

"It is a very special occasion that brings us here together. It is the first anniversary of the day which initiated a new era in modern world history.

On November 25th, 1936, Japan and Germany solemnly agreed henceforward to wage a joint struggle against the danger threatening the sound development of their two nations from the false ideology and subversive activity of the Comintern.

It is impossible at present to foresee the world historical importance of this step, to which, as you are aware, Italy recently has wisely acceded. There is now, as the Führer has said, a "triangle" which has taken up the first systematic international defensive struggle against the paralysing, life-destroying poison of the Comintern.

I am very glad to have the opportunity of taking part in this great work, in common with the Germans who will carry out the wise and far-reaching intentions of the highly gifted leader of your Fatherland which he has led to fresh power.

May our agreement be now and for ever a symbol of the good relations between our two countries which, combined in cordial friendship, pursue no other aim in this agreement than the protection of their development in order to make a substantial contribution to the safeguarding of world peace."

Dr. Darre, Reich Minister, replied to the Japanese Ambassador:

"The world political significance of the event of which we are today celebrating the first anniversary, has just been described by you, Mr. Ambassador, in convincing terms. We have also learned with satisfaction of the statement made by the Imperial Japanese Prime Minister, Prince Konoye, on the occasion of the anniversary of the signature of the Anti-Comintern Agreement in Tokio.

The extent to which we in Germany are impressed with the importance of the defensive front thus created is proved by the interest with which German public opinion greeted the conclusion of the pact between Germany and Japan and the recent accession of Italy. I do not need to emphasise the fact that the German Government unreservedly abides and will abide by the agreement. This has been sufficiently pointed out by the Führer and Chancellor.

We Germans have sufficiently experienced the disintegrating activity of the Comintern to realise its danger. By this pact we desire to protect ourselves jointly against this menace to our cultural and ideal possessions; it is directed against that menace and not against any country."

THE VERSAILLES LEAGUE OF NATIONS

The End of a Mistaken Method

I. Italy's Withdrawal from the League of Nations

After a short sitting of the Grand Fascist Council, at which on Mussolini's proposal the immediate withdrawal of Italy from the League of Nations was approved by acclamation, Mussolini announced the resolution of the Grand Council to break with Geneva to the crowd assembled in the Piazza Venezia shortly after 10 p.m. in the evening of December 11th, 1937.

As in the case of earlier demonstrations in which the Duce had proclaimed to the Italian people and the whole world from the balcony of the Palazzo Venezia so many momentous resolutions and decisions, the vast square was once again filled that night with a closely packed gathering of people.

The Secretary-General of the Fascist Party, Starace, first announced the resolution of the Grand Fascist Council, the grounds for which were then set forth by Mussolini in the following speech:

Mussolini's Proclamation of December 11th, 1937

The historical decision which the Grand Council has acclaimed and which you have received with your most enthusiastic shouts could not be longer postponed. We have wished, for long years, to offer to the world a spectacle of unheard-of patience. We had not forgotten, and shall not forget, the opprobrious attempt at economic strangulation of the Italian people perpetrated at Geneva.

But some people had thought that at a certain moment the League of Nations would have made a gesture of dutiful reparation. It has not done so. It has not wished to do so. The good intentions of certain Governments vanish as soon as their delegates come into contact with that destructive environment represented by the Geneva Council of fools, manœuvred by turbid occult forces, enemies of our Italy and of our revolution.

In these circumstances our presence at the door of Geneva could not be tolerated any longer: it wounded our doctrine, our style, and our martial temperament. The hour came when a choice had to be made in the dilemma: either inside or outside. Inside? (A shout from the crowd of "No!"). Outside? (Another shout from the crowd this time of "Yes!"). So now we shout "Enough!" and turn our backs without regret on the tottering temple where men do not work for peace but prepare for war.

It is simply grotesque to believe, or to profess, that pressure has been brought to bear to determine our attitude; there has been none, nor could there be any. Our comrades of the Berlin and Tokyo axis have, in very truth, shown the most complete discretion.

The exit of Italy from the League of Nations is an event of great historical significance which has attracted the attention of the world, and its consequences cannot yet be completely foreseen. But it does not mean that we shall abandon our fundamental lines of policy, directed towards collaboration and peace. We have, in the past few days, given a conspicuous proof of this by setting the seal of peace in the waters of the Adriatic.

The threatening voices which from time to time arise and which perhaps will again arise from the herds of the great democracies—(loud hoots from the crowd)—leave us completely indifferent. Nothing can be done against a people such as the Italian people, which is capable of any sacrifice whatsoever. We stand armed in the air, on the land, and on the sea, strong and tempered by two victorious wars. But above all we have the heroic spirit of our revolution which no human force in the world will ever be able to bend.

Communication by the Italian Government to announce its withdrawal from the League of Nations

Rome, December 11th, 1937.

Secretariat League of Nations — Geneva.

In consequence of the decisions of the Grand Council of Fascism I hereby inform you that Italy withdraws from the League of Nations on December 11th, 1937 XVI.

Galeazzo Ciano,
Minister for Foreign Affairs.

Rome Breaks with Geneva

"For years we have given the world an exhibition of unexampled patience."

No one can dispute the accuracy of this assertion, who has watched the collaboration of Italy on the League of Nations since the existence of the latter, and especially in recent years, and her efforts to make the Geneva institution into a workable instrument of peace, based on political actualities and not on illusions and make-believe. Again and again in the course of these years Mussolini has urged with this object, on the one hand, revision of the dictated Peace Treaties and, on the other hand, reform from top to bottom of the Covenant of the League with which the Peace Treaties are so intimately bound up.

One need only recall the Resolution of the Grand Fascist Council of April 8th, 1932, in which a note of warning was sounded—at a time when the Disarmament Conference was still in being, though it was already showing signs of its ultimate petering out—to the effect that the Grand Council reserved the right to review anew the question of the attitude of Italy to the Geneva League. In the summer of 1933 the Four Power Pact was concluded with the object—at any rate in the form originally given to it by Mussolini—of strengthening the main supports of the League building and distributing the weight between them in such a manner as to increase their powers of resistance. It was entirely in accord with the realities of the European position that the four Powers Germany, England, France and Italy should take acute political problems in hand between themselves, and that procedure for the purpose should be proposed of a sufficiently elastic character to cope with all eventualities. Unhappily French policy was able appreciably to nullify the scheme by linking it up with the League machinery. The original and essential idea indicated the direction in which international relations must develop, if progress was to be achieved. It is with the great Powers concerned in any given connection that the ultimate settlement, even of those problems in which a wider circle of States are interested, rests. It was senseless therefore and, in many cases, purely disingenuous to plead constraint of the minor Powers as an argument against this contention of fact. In Geneva, as elsewhere, it is always the attitude of the great Powers which determines the course of negotiations. A concert of the great Powers, organised on elastic lines, in no sense means that other States are compelled to do its bidding. Moreover, when the great Powers are united, union of all the States concerned is as a rule easy of attainment.

The opposition of France was responsible for the breakdown of the Four Power Pact: it was equally responsible for the collapse of the Disarmament Conference.

The withdrawal of Germany from the Disarmament Conference as well as from the League on October 14th, 1933 caused the Italian Government once more to subject the whole position of the League to searching review. The result was the famous Resolution of the Grand Fascist Council of December 6th, 1933, by which Geneva was faced with the question whether it was prepared to undertake a fundamental reform of the League's organisation, methods and objectives. The main features of the Italian Reform plan were the establishment of a healthy hierarchical principle within the League, the object being (as in the case of the Four Power Pact) to make direct understanding between the great Powers the principle, and to embody the principle in the Covenant. The practical effect of the Reform would have been to restrict the principle of unanimous decision in the Assembly and Council of the League. But the Italian proposals were never elaborated in detail or put into the form of a draft. The developments in the external political situation put any such step increasingly out of the question for Italy.

On March 18th, 1934, when the French reaction to the English, Italian and German proposals for a stabilisation of armaments was on the point of delivering the death-blow to the idea of disarmament, Mussolini again urged reform, and made the further continuance of Italy in the League conditional on its acceptance. But year followed year, and not the slightest effort was made by Geneva, though more than one South American State also began to advocate reform, and the recognition of the need for it made headway also amongst the neutral countries of Europe. So far as Geneva was concerned, there was not so much as a discussion of past failures—still less, of any positive proposals for the future.

Instead, there followed in September 1934 the admission of the Soviet Union to the League, with all the disruptive Communistic influences that this brought with it, and in the autumn of 1935 the Sanctions War against Rome. The League now came forward as the instrument of the "power-policy" of imperialistic ideas.

On November 18th, 1935, when 52 members of the League led by England resolved to put an "economic stranglehold on the Italian people", the relations between Italy and the League passed for the first time into the stage of serious crisis. On May 12th, 1936 the Italian delegation was ordered by Rome immediately to break off any further participation in the discussions of the Sanctions Committee, and to leave Geneva. Since that moment Italy has ceased to be represented at Geneva. Deeply embittered, Mussolini nevertheless refrained from drawing the ultimate conclusion; and even when (to quote the expression used by the Duce in his Speech of May 2nd, 1936) the white flag of surrender had at last to be hoisted on the battlements of the world sanctions fortress, though he did not spare the comments which the situation indicated, he was still prepared to add that Italy would not leave the League until the League itself made her continued membership impossible. Italian diplomacy continued its endeavours to make an end of the conflict with Geneva and, since England as the Power principally concerned stood behind the League, to come to an understanding with the latter. The so-called Gentleman's Agreement of January 2nd, 1937 in regard to the strained conditions prevailing in the Mediterranean was a step in this direction.

In these negotiations Italy did not at any time demand formal recognition of Italian sovereignty in Abyssinia, or even acknowledgement of the Roman Empire proclaimed in Rome on May 9th, 1936. She would have been quite satisfied with a finding (which was no more than justified by the facts) in the semi-obscurity of a League Committee to the effect that the ex-Negus was no longer the representative of a State with the requisite qualifications for membership.

At the beginning of the Assembly which met in September 1936 the "Temps" wrote (September 24) as follows:

"There would appear to be a tendency in Geneva to forget that the purpose of the League is not to play the part of a Super-State and apply unbending—and, incidentally, ill-defined—rules to every eventuality as it arises, but to work with a consciousness of responsibility for the maintenance and the strengthening of peace. It is not called upon to make difficulties, but to remove such difficulties as exist in a spirit of conciliation. No State, however powerful, can go against facts; nor, for all the authority which it enjoys in virtue of the statutory instruments which gave it being, can the League. In the present instance the facts weigh more heavily than any considerations of a legal or sentimental character. The facts, which no impartial observer can contest, are none other than the conquest of Abyssinia by the Italian arms, the failure of the League's well-intentioned efforts to prevent this consummation, and the absence of any sort of possibility of Fascist Italy renouncing, directly or indirectly, the annexation of the territory in question. If one is not prepared to declare war on the Italian people, and thereby to kindle a conflagration in all the four corners of Europe—which would be an act of the worst insanity—one must put up with the position as it stands. This being so, to allow a delegation of the Negus to take part in the discussions at Geneva as the representative of an Empire which is no longer either independent or sovereign is tantamount to excluding Italy from participation in the activities of the League.

"It may be that such an eventuality does not specially perturb the representatives of those minor Powers which do not believe themselves to be exposed to the danger of being involved in a new European war. But that is not the attitude of those other Powers which know that active and continuous co-operation by Italy is essential for the organisation of peace, and that, if Italy were to turn her back on Geneva, the whole work of the League and even its existence would be in question... The peoples, whose security depends on a new Pact in Western Europe, will then learn the price they are called upon to pay for the errors of Geneva, and the sacrifices demanded of Europe for the maintenance "jusqu'au bout" of a policy which may square with the Covenant but has long since been outmoded by the facts."

Sensible, but unfortunately fruitless, observations! At the September meeting of the Assembly, though the great Powers had apparently come to an understanding on the above basis, the world witnessed the scandal—how it came about, has not yet been entirely cleared up—of Ras Tafari being expressly admitted by the Credentials Committee to the discussions of the League Assembly. Even so, Italy did not withdraw. Speaking at Milan on November 1st, 1936, Mussolini once more took occasion to define his attitude in relation to the League. He did not mince matters. It was, as it were, a final ultimatum—o rinnovarsi o perire! Reform or ruin! Geneva, he made it clear, must make an end of the illusions and ideologies of Wilson, the make-believe of disarmament, collective security, peace one and indivisible, universality of the League, and equality of its members. "It is extremely difficult for it to reform. So be it! It can be left in peace to die. After all, it is not necessary, in order to pursue a policy of peace, to wander through the lobbies of the League of Nations." But the formation of Geneva delayed and so acted—apart from useless discussions in a Reform Committee set up by the Assembly on October 8th, 1936—as to prevent any progress with this issue, for all its vital importance for the League.

On July 24th, in an article in the "Popolo d'Italia" headed "Reality and Fictions", Mussolini once again arraigned the childish practice of building castles in the air as a means of shutting the eye to realities. In pungent terms he contrasted political affectations and political realities. How many fictions, he wrote, had the post-war period seen pass into oblivion, from the dream of union of all peoples to the vain effort of a vanquished Emperor to maintain under League auspices a shadow existence!

Again in his great Speech in Palermo on August 20th, 1937, delivered on the eve of the Assembly, the Duce sought to build a bridge to Geneva. The much remarked exchange of letters between him and the English Premier Chamberlain had just taken place, on which renewed hopes of improved relations between Italy and England were based. In the Palermo Speech Mussolini once again approached the Geneva Registrars with a request, not for a birth certificate for the new Roman Empire, but only for a certificate of the demise of the former Ethiopian Empire. He warned Geneva not to increase still further the confusion already prevailing in the League by splitting the Members on the Abyssinian issue. But the Assembly issued neither birth nor death certificates. The sterile formalism of Geneva once more prevailed. The Abyssinian issue was not, it was argued, acute for the reason that—mainly as the result of insistent recommendations by the English Foreign Office—no Abyssinian delegation was present, so that the Assembly was spared the necessity of considering whether a no longer existent Abyssinia could really still be regarded as a member of the League. It was of course true that England or France or any other member of the League could have raised the issue; and it is significant of the unsteadiness and indecision of English policy that the first step towards a solution in the shape of the prevention of the appearance of Ras Tafari or his delegation was not followed by any further action on the part of the United Kingdom. England and France preferred to leave the next step to the minor Powers. But when some of these minor Powers, hoping to rejuvenate the League by inducing Italy to return to Geneva, took steps behind the scenes to clear up the situation, their efforts were once more ineffective. Why this was so, is for the present the secret of those concerned.

Mussolini's warnings and his efforts to meet the League half way were once more thrown to the winds. The hopes aroused by the correspondence with Chamberlain remained unfulfilled. The "protocollary" differences between Rome and Paris became more acute, when Mussolini proceeded to draw the conclusion from the attitude of the Quai d'Orsay in leaving the post of French Ambassador in Rome unfilled for a whole year because of the French unwillingness to give the King of Italy his Imperial title in the speech of reception, and decided himself to withdraw the Italian Ambassador from Paris on October 31st, 1937.

Once again Mussolini, by means of an article in the "Informazione diplomatica" of September 10th, conveyed to London his conviction that England and Italy should delay no longer to discuss the position through the normal diplomatic channel, and come to an arrangement on the issues outstanding, if it was not intended to suggest that there was no serious background to the differences, and the whole thing was a put up job. The only answer was the "No!" with which the Under-Secretary, Lord Cranborne, shortly afterwards replied in the House of Commons, on behalf of his Chief, Mr. Eden, to a question whether His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom proposed to recognise the King of Italy as de jure Emperor of Abyssinia.

The enumeration of these facts should suffice to prove the justification of the step taken on December 11th. It was merely a sign either of a weak memory or of scarcely concealed irritation that foreign newspapers expressed their surprise at the time chosen by Mussolini and his abrupt procedure. It was equally little to the point that the same papers regretted this step at the very moment when attempts were being made to clear up the European situation within a reformed League of Nations and a rapprochement had already been begun between the authoritarian and democratic groups. It is the same play with words that we experienced on the withdrawal of Germany from the Disarmament Conference, when it was stated that disarmament was on the point of being realised.

The only reply to this is that the question of reform has merely increased the list of the opportunities that have been lost by the victorious Powers since the War, upon which were based so many problems that could have been solved by good will on all sides and a true desire for peace.

As regards the efforts made by the papers in question to belittle the Italian step by stating that it was only a formality since Italy had not cooperated at Geneva for one and a half years, or that the withdrawal would only become effective in two years by which time it was hoped that Italy might return, we would merely refer to the fitting remarks by Jacques Bardoux in the "Temps" of December 24th:

"On December 11th the Duce stated that Italy was withdrawing from the League and breaking with the League Council. This gave rise immediately to comments, not all of which came from Geneva, to the effect that this decision was of no importance, in the first place because it had been foreseen for a long time, and in the second place because the withdrawal would only become effective in two years and that this would give more than enough time to restore world peace and to regild the Geneva arms.

According to this version, therefore, the Duce had merely chosen the balcony of the Piazza Venezia, convened the Grand Council at midnight and brought together the blackshirts for the sole purpose of giving a notice of withdrawal which would only come into effect on December 11th, 1939. In order to justify a simple decision, which was calculated to take place at a certain time, he had pilloried the poisonous environment of the Geneva Council which was directed by mischievous and secret forces and had stated that the Italian presence on the threshold of Geneva could no longer be borne as it was contrary to "our views, our mode of life and our martial temperament."

If Count Ciano's telegram had been merely a legal notice of withdrawal, would Hitler's Government on the following 12th of December have issued an official declaration again bringing up the Duce's charges against the instrument of the status of Versailles, 'the beneficiaries of which pulled the wires'; would he, like Mussolini, have pilloried this Geneva policy of collective security 'which has in reality merely led to collective insecurity' and is only 'unreservedly supported by Moscow', and would he have stated that 'the return of Germany to the League of Nations can never again come into consideration'?"

II. Germany's Definite Alienation from the Geneva League

The German Official Declaration of December 12th, 1937.

The decision of the Fascist Government to declare the departure of Italy from the League of Nations and the highly important statement with which the Duce has justified this decision find full understanding and the warmest sympathy in Germany. For some time past no doubt could have existed as to the fundamental attitude of Italian policy to the League.

The words spoken by Mussolini in the May Field in Berlin about the false gods of Geneva still ring in all our ears. But it is of the greatest importance that the Italian Government have finally clarified the situation by the decision announced yesterday.

The League receives therewith the reward of its political achievements and merit. At no period of its existence has it proved competent to make a useful contribution to the treatment of actual problems of world politics. On the contrary it has exercised only a harmful, even dangerous, influence on the whole political development of the post-War period. Under the protection of alleged ideals it became more and more the instrument of particular wire-pullers of the Versailles order. Instead of guiding international politics along the road of fruitful development through a reasonable balance of the natural forces and needs of the nations, Geneva has principally occupied itself with the elaboration and application of methods for working against such a development.

Italy has left the Geneva League, not in order to abandon her policy of peace and cooperation, but in order the better to carry it out. In this connection, Mussolini referred to the reinforcement of "peace on the Adriatic", which had been further strengthened by the visit of the Yugoslav Prime Minister Stoyadinovitch and had removed all the friction which might formerly have threatened peace in this stormy corner of Europe.

As the semi-official "Giornale d'Italia" pointed out on December 18th, no one in Rome, or moreover in Berlin and Tokio, is thinking of forming a bloc, a new League of Nations or any other international association. The distinction between League and anti-League is, it states, now clear, and it is made clearer and extended by Italy's determined gesture. It is definitely established that the cooperation of the Powers represented at Geneva has no longer the right to describe itself as work for world peace. The League of Nations now remains the organ of an Anglo-Franco-Bolshevist group of Powers whose instrument it has become more and more with the object of chloroforming and holding down the aspiring nations. The atmosphere has, it says, been cleared by this development which is further emphasised by the simultaneous withdrawal of Italy from the International Labour Office, the social counterpart of the political Geneva League.

The complete failure of the League is to-day a fact which requires no further proof, and no further discussion. The hopes which, above all, many small nations placed in the League have given way to the realization that the Geneva policy of collective security has in fact led to a collective insecurity. It is only from Moscow that an unqualified testimonial to the Geneva ideals is to be heard to-day. It is a confusion of cause and effect to attribute the shattering of the League to the lack of universality, as is still done here and there. The grounds which compelled first Japan, then Germany, and now also Italy to leave the League are evidence of where the radical mistakes of its construction and of the political tendencies governing it are to be found. It is a hopeless effort to desire to remedy these radical weaknesses through partial reforms.

Whether the Powers remaining at Geneva still desire to make the League a serious factor in their politics is their affair. They have, however, no longer the right to put forward the League as the chosen representation of the world of States and as the highest organ of international cooperation. The Reich Government, in any case, in full agreement with the Italian Government, will not let themselves be moved from the conviction that the political system of Geneva is not only a failure but pernicious. A return of Germany to the League will accordingly never come into consideration again.

III. The Balance Sheet and Result of the Mistaken Formation and Mistaken Development of the League of Nations

The German declaration shows almost more clearly and in greater detail than the Italian the net result of the mistaken development pursued by the League of Nations from the moment of its foundation.

1. Creation of the Versailles League of Nations

The ideal of a League of Peace, for centuries the preoccupation of political thinkers no less than practical statesmen, became during the cruel World War the focus of intense longing on the part of the suffering peoples. The stupendous upheaval of the World War was needed to induce in them the will for co-operation in a legally constituted association designed to render impossible a repetition of such a catastrophe and to eliminate war altogether. But the ideal conception of such an association which the peoples had in mind was very different from that which was actually brought into being after the issue of the war was decided.

The idea of a League of Nations was taken up and developed by the American President Wilson during the war. His whole programme, his principles for the liquidation of the war and, above all, his Fourteen Points, were the bases and conditions precedent to the realisation of the League of Nations idea. On the subject of the League itself Wilson said little: seven only of his 60 war speeches make any reference to it. But what he did say was of decisive importance for the reason that his principles were accepted by both belligerents by agreement before the Armistice as the basis of the Peace.

In two passages Wilson developed the idea of a League of Nations as part of the "Points" laid down by him as constituting the main lines of the Peace. The Fourteenth Point, as formulated in the great "programme" speech of January 18th, 1919, was as follows:

"A general association of the peoples must be formed on defined contractual terms, so as to ensure to great and small nations alike their political independence and the integrity of their territory."

The Third and Fourth of the five Points laid down in the Speech of September 27th, 1918 were as follows:

"There can be within the League of Nations no particular, self-seeking economic combinations, no economic boycott or exclusion in whatever form, save in so far as powers of economic penalisation by exclusion from the world's markets are entrusted to the League itself as means of correction and enforcement."

"In the common family of the League of Nations there can be no associations, no alliance, nor yet special treaty obligations or agreements."

The above references do not say much; and the President's utterances did not in fact contain any comprehensive picture of the proposed League. They are as defective in this respect as were his principles for a peace based on law as opposed to force. It is not however a fact, as was frequently contended, that the Fourteen Points were so vague as not to afford a sufficiently specific basis for their application as the foundation of the peace negotiations. In a letter dated January 31st, 1920 Colonel House, Wilson's closest associate and confidential agent, protests with emphasis against this suggestion.

It had, he said been stated that many of the Fourteen Points were so indefinite and couched in such general terms that they were really meaningless, and that the Entente might therefore rightly refuse to interpret them as they were meant. This was not true, for every point was discussed before the conclusion of the armistice and the explanations covered many typewritten pages. They had been cabled in advance to the President for his approval. Clemenceau, Orlando, Lloyd George and the others could therefore not say they did not understand the meaning. These explanations lay on the table every day when we discussed the armistice in Paris. They had often asked the meaning of some point or other and he had then read extracts from the approved explanation.

The Wilsonian principles were also taken as the basis for the elaboration and expansion of the League of Nations project. The ideals which the President of the United States held out to a war-weary world may have been no more than a sign-post indicating the road to a genuine League of Nations; but at any rate the belligerents had undertaken to follow that road.

At the Peace Conference in Paris all such principles and considerations were forgotten, as were the bases for the conclusion of Peace to which all had agreed. Wilson sacrificed them all to the stronger will of his Allies. Nor was it merely the stronger will of the Allies that was "en cause". "The subtlest sophisters and most hypocritical draftsmen were set to work, and produced many ingenious exercises which might have deceived for more than an hour a cleverer man than the President." So wrote J. M. Keynes, who represented the British Treasury at the Peace Conference.

When again it is remembered that the draft of the Covenant was evolved in eleven sittings lasting one and a half weeks (from February 3rd to February 13th), it is impossible not to agree with the American delegate, Secretary of State Lansing, when he writes in his well known book on the Versailles negotiations as follows:

"The fact that the work was completed in ten meetings and in a week and a half is sufficient in itself to raise doubts as to the thoroughness with which the work was done and as to the care with which the various plans and numerous provisions proposed were studied, compared, and discussed. It gives the impression that many clauses were accepted under the pressing necessity of ending the Commission's labors within a fixed time. The document itself bears evidence of the haste with which it was prepared, and it is almost conclusive proof in itself that it was adopted through personal influence rather than because of belief in the wisdom of all its provisions.

To harmonise the conflicting views of the members of the Commission—and it was well known that they were conflicting—and to produce in eleven days a world charter, which would contain the elements of greatness or even of perpetuity, was on the face of it an undertaking impossible of accomplishment."

Wilson had represented the establishment of the League of Nations to himself as the real aim of the peace negotiations, and had done so with all the force of a fanatical idealist. On February 14th he was due to leave the Conference, in order to be present in Washington before March 4th, on which date Congress was to break up. Accordingly, he was anxious to attain his object in this respect at any rate, even if it meant a certain hurry. On February 14th he was in fact able to register the assent of the Conference to the Covenant of the League of Nations at a plenary meeting.

The Great Powers came in the first instance to an understanding; and the decision was theirs. The hurry was not necessarily unwelcome. Even at this stage of the proceedings Wilson had a conception of the League which was far and away superior to what actually emerged. At the Second Plenary Meeting of the Paris Conference on January 25th, 1919, at which the League figured as the first item on the Agenda, he stated in a "programme" speech that the chief purpose of the Conference was to call a permanent order of Peace into being, so as to enable Peace to outlive the peace of the Peace Treaties. Of the Peace Treaties themselves, he had already said they would have sooner or later to be modified and amended, and the chief thing to do was to create the machinery which would make it possible to supplement and amend them and ensure their future continuance.

This sequence of ideas explains why Wilson was moved to abandon his former view and insist on the linking of the Peace Treaties with the League. His change of view on this point was first voiced in his Speech of September 27th, 1918, and was expressed with increasing precision as time went on at the sittings of the Conference.

There is no question therefore that Wilson sought to put the League in a position of precedence in relation to the dictates of the Peace Treaties, of which (as he saw it) it was to serve as a corrective. His own draft of the Covenant (Article III), which he submitted to the American Delegation on January 10th, 1919, provided for the possibility of territorial resettlements in the future on a self-determination basis, with the assent of three-quarters of the Members of the League. "The Contracting Parties recognise without restriction the principle that the peace of the world ranks in importance before any question of political jurisdiction or delimitation of frontiers."

But all this was at the beginning of the Conference. Even before the official negotiations began, the Wilsonian draft had been extensively modified to suit the wishes of the other Great Powers, in the same way as the Wilsonian Plan of February 3rd, of which also hardly anything remained. The resulting settlement was the opposite of that projected by the President. The peace of the world was relegated to the second place, and the League of Nations was converted into an organisation for the execution of the Peace Treaties. Of Wilson's ideas there remained only a torso in the shape of Article 19. When on February 14th, 1919 the draft of the Covenant of the League was submitted to the Paris Conference, Lord Robert Cecil said the main object of the League was to assure the maintenance of the territorial settlement as it emerged from the Peace Treaties. At the First Session of the Council on January 16th, 1920 the French representative, Léon Bourgeois, after describing the meeting of the Council as the birthday of a new order in the world in which the primacy of Justice over Force was acclaimed by all free peoples, went on to point the Cecilian moral with the assertion that the League's chief object was to guarantee the possessions and the independence of its Members, and to uphold the "just frontiers" which the Treaty of Versailles had established.

The fate of the scheme at the hands of the American Congress is well known. On the last day of the Session, March 4th, 39 out of a total of 96 Senators declared themselves against acceptance on the ground that the association of the Peace Treaties with the Covenant of the League, especially in the case of Articles 10 and 16, not only implied a limitation of American sovereignty, but also threatened to entangle the United States in the labyrinth of European diplomacy and involve it in European conflicts. The two-thirds majority required for the acceptance of the Covenant was thus not attained. That was the first and most serious blow to the Covenant. The second followed on March 19th, 1920, when the ratification of the Peace Treaty was rejected so far as the United States was concerned; and with it the idea of a United States of the World in the form of a League of Nations was finally and definitively interred.

At the secret sittings of the Conference the ideal of the League of Nations was thus stultified and distorted in the same way as the other Wilsonian principle of a peace based on law as opposed to force. In the eyes of the Allied Principal Powers the establishment of the League was not the opening of a new era, but a continuation of the efforts and aims they had pursued at the Paris Conference. They never had any intention from that time on of adjusting the principles of their policy to the conception of the League. The States responsible for the enforced Peace of Paris were the same States as created the League; and in so doing they adapted its statutes to suit their own requirements. The negotiations for the creation of the League were based on the same premisses as those on which the Peace Conference was based. The feature of both was the effort to proclaim the predominance of the victorious Powers in permanence and, as President Wilson's Secretary of State, Mr. Lansing, put it, to make the League a weapon in the hands of the strong to arrest the normal development of national strength and national effort on the part of those whom defeat had rendered powerless. The free peoples were not even asked for their opinion. The Great Powers had taken steps from the outset to secure their own preponderance in the membership of the different Bureaux and Committees over the other belligerents and the neutrals. The Great Powers issued the invitations to their Allies to attend the Conference. They dictated the Covenant of the League, as they dictated the Peace Treaties. If the others showed at any moment a disposition to revolt against this or that decision, Clemenceau flung the weight of the 12 million troops of the Great Powers into the scale against them. He enumerated the battalions, and exclaimed curtly: "C'est un titre!" The sceptre he wielded was not the sceptre of Justice, but the sceptre of Power. Similarly at the First Session of the League in Geneva it was repeatedly made clear that the Covenant, as settled by the Allies, must not be touched; and in support of this contention it was argued that the Allies had fought for the freedom of the world and, but for their victory, there would have been no League of Nations at all.

To what extent the neutral Powers were thereby induced, whether by persuasion or by threats, to waive their misgivings and reservations, will never be made public. They had at any rate plenty of time to think out their position, and they had in fact indicated their own views on the creation of a League of Nations long before. They were made acquainted with the text of the Covenant on February 14th, 1919. In the second half of March they received an invitation to express their opinions; but a short time-limit was attached, and it was made plain that there was no question of any substantial changes, and that there was no intention of negotiating with them in regard to particular points. The proceedings were accordingly conducted and concluded in a Sub-Committee in a couple of afternoons (March 20th and 21st). The most the neutrals were able to achieve was the concession that their representations would be considered by the League of Nations Commission of the Peace Conference. The final text of the Covenant shows only the slight traces of the influence of the neutrals.

It is certain that it was with no joyful hearts that the neutrals joined the League. Of the general objections which they raised against it, the chief point was undoubtedly the fact that it was conceived as an organ for the execution of the Peace Treaties. It was moreover to be anticipated that the exclusion of the Central Powers would necessarily bring the latter into opposition to the League, and so incidentally to the neutrals, thereby binding the latter to the cause of the Allies. A further point which the neutrals no doubt made was that, as the League would not be in a position to give adequate support to its Members in the event of war, and as on the other hand the Members were called upon to assume heavy military responsibilities, they might well find themselves in the position of being compelled to use force against a State with which they had every desire to live on good terms.

There can indeed have been hardly a single one of the smaller European States which regarded the Paris Peace terms as just or wise, or welcomed them as a satisfactory conclusion to the World War. The majority of these States were under no illusions as to the possibility of such terms remaining for long in force: they realised that they were bound to lead to new conflicts and serious upheavals, whether in the near or distant future. If nevertheless they joined the League, it was firstly because of their weakness in presence of the victors of the War and the powerlessness of their own resources, and secondly because they hoped that they would be in a better position inside than outside the League to avert impending evils and promote revision of the Covenant.

The only country to which a special legal status was conceded—a part from the United States, which received special recognition of the Monroe Doctrine in Article 21—was Switzerland. The Swiss National Defence Commission had pronounced against Switzerland joining the League in a Report dated July 14th-18th, 1919. It was not until the Swiss authorities had carried their point on the whole issue of neutrality, the Allied Powers waiving all claim to military aid from Switzerland and recognising the Swiss right to refuse the passage of foreign troops across Swiss soil (even in the event of action by the League for the assistance of a victim of aggression, i.e. action under Article 16, paragraph 3), that the Swiss people voted in the Plebiscite of May 16th, 1920 for accession to the League by 414,830 votes to 322,939. (See in this connection our detailed account of the question of Swiss neutrality in No. 166/170 of September 29th, 1936.)

The League of Nations Commission fixed the final text on April 10th and 11th, 1919, and it was thereupon adopted by the Conference in plenary session on April 28th with a small addition. The representations of the German Peace Delegation were, as all the world knows, entirely disregarded; and in the answer to the German counter-proposals which the Allied and Associated Powers conveyed in the Ultimatum of June 16th, 1919 it was said:

"The Covenant of the League of Nations forms the basis of the Peace Treaty for the Allied and Associated Powers. They have carefully considered all its provisions. They are convinced that it is to the advantage of justice and peace and provides an element of progress in the relations between the nations which the future will strengthen and develop."

Never in the history of the world was there a prophecy of which there was so little fulfilment.

The Covenant of the League did not specify when it was to come into force. Its entry into force was therefore conditioned by the Peace Treaties; and it accordingly came into force at the same date as the latter, i.e. on January 10th, 1920, on which date Germany ratified the Treaty of Versailles. The Council met for the first time on January 16th, 1920 in Paris, and the Assembly for the first time on November 15th in Geneva.

The First Act of the tragedy of the League had begun.

2. The Tragedy of the League and its Causes.

"We thought that we were engaged in the task of removing the debris of a great war, of rearranging the map of Europe more in conformity with the wishes of its population, and of laying down the solid foundation of a peace which, with a little goodwill, with help from the League of Nations by the operation of moral forces, might be eternal."

This hope, which Lord Balfour, one of the British delegates at the Paris Conference, expressed in the Third Assembly of the League of Nations on September 8th, 1922, was not fulfilled either then or later. The five dictated Peaces of Paris created an unlimited number of possibilities of conflict which the League organisation could not and did not wish to settle, because it had neither the wisdom nor the moral strength to exclude the political motive, political interests and political influences of the beneficiaries of these dictated Peaces from their solutions or attempted solutions and to prevent these influences from becoming the determining factor. It regarded itself primarily as a political union for the purpose of maintaining as far as possible the position created in 1919.

According to the preamble of the Covenant, it was the duty of the League to promote international cooperation between the nations and to achieve international peace and security. For this purpose the Members also agreed to assume certain obligations not to resort to war; to prescribe open, just and honourable relations between nations; to establish firmly the understandings of international law as to the actual rule of conduct among Governments; to maintain justice and a scrupulous respect for all treaty obligations in the dealings of organised peoples with one another.

It need not be pointed out that these ideal principles were incompatible with the continuance of the Paris peace decisions, not to speak of the arbitrary interpretations and extensions to which they have been subject. But, apart from this, the provisions of the Covenant were not sufficient to realise the lofty programme which was set up. There was a gulf fixed between the guiding principles and the objects aimed at by the principal allied Powers in setting up the Versailles League. This preamble was merely a last reminder of the hopes attached by the peoples of the world at that time to the promised league of peace. For the fact that this preamble might also contain a programme for the future was slight consolation for the neutral States that were caught by it, and this consolation subsequently lost its grounds of justification. The manipulators of phrases at the Paris Conference produced many astonishing achievements and covered up many contradictions. But it was impossible to announce principles at the head of the League Covenant and to sweep them all away in the dictated peace provisions attached to them. This preamble was in any case misleading, since it was intended to give the impression that the States had combined to form an international legal community. In reality they created a purely political organisation which incidentally also assumed certain legal, administrative, social and humanitarian tasks.

The sovereign authority which was to stand above the interests of all the members made the League a servant of the policy of power of the victors in the War. It soon became clear that the fine names by which it was called in all languages were not in accordance with its essential character. It was not a league of the nations, but a league of the Governments for whom peace merely meant a continuation of war by other means. The law under which the League of Nations came into being was not the peace idea of Wilson, but the revenge idea of Clémenceau who had no difficulty in taking advantage of the tragical error into which Wilson had stumbled and finally in obtaining his agreement.

This spirit of 1919 never left Wilson's creation; not even after the Allied and Associated Powers had been joined by the neutrals and subsequently by the countries vanquished in the War.

In spite of the bitter disappointment and irritation caused by the shameful breach of the preliminary peace treaty of November 5th, 1918 concluded on the basis of the fourteen points of President Wilson's peace programme, and in spite of the scornful rejection by the victorious Powers of Germany's first application for admission to the League of Nations, no nation had in 1919 a stronger and more sincere faith in President Wilson's message and in the promise contained in the preamble to the Covenant than the German, and no nation gave its fulfilment a greater chance of success. For half a generation the German nation fought for that fulfilment at Geneva, without ever being anything else than an object of the League, or rather of its Franco-British policy, which committed the greatest political and psychological blunders against Germany. It is therefore not the German nation, but the League which in its belief in its own infallibility and omnipotence has thrown away the chance that was given it.

It is not difficult to draw up a long list of the sins and omissions of Geneva, starting with the connection of the Covenant with the Paris Treaties. A mass of great ideas and impulses were awaiting realisation and development. But the League has really only functioned where it was able to act as the executive organ of the Treaties of 1919. These treaties gave it in the interest of the victorious Powers a number of definite tasks, the execution of which was desired by the united will of those Powers and could therefore lead to the object in the manner which suited them best (the so-called popular plebiscites in the ceded territories, the administration of the Saar territory, the supervision over Danzig, the veiling of the seizure of colonies by the mandatory system, the so-called protection of minorities, the suppression of the freedom of German waterways by international river commissions etc.). In all other questions not directly connected with the dictated Peace Treaties, which should have formed the real field of activity of the League, however, it failed from the outset. It has not succeeded in settling a single political or economic question of importance with its own methods and forces (such as, for instance, the Vilna conflict, the Russo-Polish war, tension in the Far East, the South American wars, the Abyssinian war, the disarmament problem, the settlement of reparations, the freedom of world economy, the distribution of raw materials, the evacuation of the Rhineland and the Locarno question). In addition, through the fact that it always bowed to the tendencies of certain Powers that aimed at strengthening their own position of power behind the facade of the general safeguarding of peace, it has prevented rather than promoted real progress in the development of international relations. This has been shown in particular by its efforts in the sphere of the general safeguarding of peace by treaty (Geneva Protocol, General Act, harmonisation of the Kellogg Pact etc.). And in the particular sphere for which it was set up in accordance with President Wilson's intentions, i.e. the revision of treaties that have become inapplicable and dangerous to peace, it has taken no action whatever in spite of this duty being especially entrusted to it under Article 19 of the Covenant.

Since Germany's appearance at Geneva, and even earlier, she has devoted herself without any resentment and with indefatigable zeal to these objects, and it was not her fault that one League ideal after another became an illusion in the world of international actuality and that national interests and forces proved to be stronger than international idealism. The victorious Powers, it is true, in creating the League of Nations gave the appearance of meeting the needs which the nations felt particularly strongly at that time. But in reality it was only a practical instrument for pursuing the special interests of a particular group of these Powers and therefore failed under their decisive influence wherever there was no question of realising those special interests.

In fact the League from the outset suffered from a disease world of international actuality and that national interests disease really lay in the fact that the political conditions created by the dictated Peace Treaties of 1919 rendered quite impossible a comprehensive organisation of the States for the purpose of fruitful political cooperation. But this does not excuse the further fact that the actual leaders of the Geneva association, though they recognised that all the failures were not the result of uncontrollable higher forces but were so many constant proofs of faulty construction from the outset and from the foundation, never thought for a moment of removing or even of improving these disastrous mistakes, in order to make the League an instrument of solidarity among the nations instead of a strait waistcoat for certain nations and a tool of diplomatic class policy.

The work done at Geneva after the War was either pure formalism or the rigid maintenance of the Paris Treaties. Nothing has done the League more harm than this. Born in the atmosphere of Versailles, it remained a guardian of a bad order of things instead of a seer and a leader to fresh shores. It lived in a world of apparent paper successes. It was of no avail that events and facts always took a different course and that it always turned out that they were not commanded by the augurs of Geneva. It did not matter that the Geneva decisions were always overthrown by facts. New decisions were taken, new agreements concluded and new hopes created. The important point was that the entire system turned on its function as executor and maintainer of the order of 1919.

Coalition, not collectivity was the watchword which was openly expressed by the representatives of France at Geneva and for which they desired the League authority to be exerted. It is not peace, but the intention to mobilise the world against Germany that characterises French League policy which is responsible for the moral and technical deterioration of the Geneva machinery.

An English politician of the last generation, John Morley, considered that any policy was only possible by means of compromises. No one will object to difficulties being removed by mutual concessions. But it often happens that they are neither put on one side nor overcome and optimistic illusions are soon followed by real disillusion. It is possible to make many sacrifices for the desire for peace, but it is not possible at the same time to attack the essential vital forces of a nation and that moral and spiritual substance which alone imparts a meaning to existence. It was the misfortune of League policy that it took no thought of psychology and was couched only in juridical forms and formulae, into which ideas of criminal law frequently crept. The sanctity of treaties is no doubt a fine thing, but then the treaties must also be sacred. But it is impossible to cover an evil treaty with a halo of sanctity. It is therefore also wrong to state that Germany has deliberately infringed sacred legal principles. It is merely a creation of hatred that is collapsing. Versailles is dying of its own disease, the germ of which it contained from the outset, and of the injustice that was falsely described as the peace of the nations. The dictated peace was ultimately bound—and this was the greatest mistake of its authors—to fail on account of the impossibility of permanently keeping down a nation like the German and of thus ordering development to stand still, as if there were no other possibilities outside the framework of the treaty.

The League has also failed because it placed itself in the service of this error. It was based on a doctrine and not on real life. Real life therefore dispensed with it.

The procedure followed by the subtle diplomacy of Versailles could ultimately not hide the fact that decisions are in the long run always dependent on the vital needs and conditions of the nations and their common life and that diplomatic works of art, however subtle they may be, which are not based on the solution of the most burning problems and their causes, ultimately collapse in the face of reality.

The failure of the Geneva method, therefore, need not be taken tragically, for there are sufficient other means of exchanging ideas on international cooperation. Diplomatic relations continue, and—as has often been shown by the Members of the League themselves—the Geneva machinery is not essential for conferences.

Non-membership of the League and the rejection of the method of collective security as exercised at Geneva do not imply the lack of a desire for peace and harmonious cooperation. Germany and Italy have opposed to the complicated and confusing Geneva procedure the more natural and much simpler method of settling definite international problems by means of bilateral agreements and they endeavour to apply a suitable method to each particular case. This principle does not in any way preclude multilateral agreements for questions which a number of States have a common and equal interest in settling. But it does preclude collective settlements in the Geneva sense in which States that are not concerned are included merely for the sake of the principle of collectivity.

The need for collective cooperation is as great for Germany and Italy as their readiness to take part in it. But such a system, in its own collective interest, must comply with the demands clearly formulated by Adolf Hitler in his great declaration of 1935 and laid down in thirteen points. The central point was the sentence: "The German Government is at all times prepared to take part in a system of collective cooperation to safeguard European peace, but in that case considers it necessary to allow for the law of eternal evolution by leaving the path open for the revision of treaties."

It would have been well if these thirteen points had not fallen into oblivion outside Germany, for they constituted most noteworthy proposals for the reconstruction of European cooperation.

And if attention had been paid to the desires for the revision of the Geneva Covenant put forward by Italy, if the "law of eternal evolution" had been followed, the conflict between England and Italy or (to take account of the declarations of British statesmen) between Italy and the League of Nations would not have taken place.

Germany and Italy have in the meantime developed on these foundations a new principle of peace, which has already stood the test. This principle is embodied in the numerous bilateral treaties which Rome and Berlin have concluded with the most important neighbouring States and by which individual security in Europe has been strengthened. Outside Geneva new chapters in the safeguarding of peace have been written. That collectivism which was merely intended to safeguard possessions has been replaced by something new, and its disappearance leaves no anxious gap. Cooperation between the Powers has not become more difficult than before. On the contrary, it has been facilitated by the fact that now the boundaries have been marked out for all hopes which were possibly attached to the patched-up Geneva system as a possible object of barter and bargaining. By the decisive action of Rome and Berlin the last veil was torn aside and the world was faced by actual reality in order to reach true peace by a fundamental change in the former methods.

The German declaration denies the Powers remaining at Geneva the right to regard the League of Nations as a qualified representative of the international world and as the highest organ of international cooperation. These Powers will presumably not all adopt this view. However that may be, the League has forfeited two factors of power, and the relations between England and France on the one hand and Italy and Germany on the other hand can in future no longer be settled within the framework of the Geneva League. The Geneva method is in any case no longer the monopoly method for the settlement of international problems and for the safeguarding of peace.

The conclusion of the German declaration that, in view not only of the "failure" but of the "pernicious" political system of the Geneva League, Germany will never return to the League, in any case creates a clear position which must be taken into consideration by those who compelled Italy and Germany to make it. Whatever the Council and Assembly may decide in future will never be anything more than the expression of a one-sided group.

The era of an idea of collectivity which was intended in the main to serve the advantages and cause of the powerful possessing countries in the world by means of too transparent guarantees of security and peace, has at any rate been closed. It is to be hoped that its place will soon be taken by that other system of sincere and frank conciliation between one nation and another on the basis of complete equality of rights and consideration for mutual vital interests, in order to open up the path to unrestricted international cooperation in the sense of justice and harmony.

IV. A Reminiscence from the Year 1934 - A Neglected Warning

Text of the Speech by M. Motta, Swiss Federal Councillor, on September 16th, 1934 in connection with the Admission of the Soviet Union to the League of Nations.

In connection with the plenary session of the League Assembly, the Sixth Committee (Political Questions) met on September 16th, 1934 to deal with the application for the admission of Soviet Russia. The Chairman of the Committee, M. de Madariaga, representing Spain, opened the meeting devoted to the Russian problem with the not unfitting announcement of a British draft resolution on slavery and then opened the discussion on the application for the admission of Soviet Russia.

The first speaker, M. Caeiro da Mata, Portuguese Foreign Minister, based his Government's decision to vote in the Assembly against the admission of Soviet Russia on the incompatibility between the fundamental principles of the Russian system and the views of the civilised nations of the world which rested on centuries of tradition. The admission of Russia would involve the danger of the encouragement of the destructive propaganda of Moscow, on account of which the Portuguese Government had constantly refused to resume diplomatic relations with the Soviet Government.

The Portuguese Foreign Minister was followed by the head of the Swiss delegation, Federal Councillor Motta, who gave the following explanation of the Swiss "No!"

"The position adopted by the Swiss Federal Council with regard to the application of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics is generally known. Criticised by some, defended by others, this position must be justified and explained all the more as it is contrary to the expressed policy of the greater number of delegates and especially of the three great Powers represented amongst us. I shall endeavour to justify and to explain it with the moderation which alone lends arguments their full weight, but also with that frankness which we owe to one another.

Switzerland is the only State which entered the League of Nations as a result of a plebiscite—that is, of the direct vote of the people and of the cantons. The struggle which took place over this all-important issue was one of the most heated and moving in the long history of our country. The Federal Government advocated the entry of Switzerland with all the authority at its command and its advice was followed. The founders of the League had shown us their confidence in choosing Geneva as the seat of the new institution. Swiss public opinion has always been and still is very appreciative of this great honour. One of its consequences, happy on the whole, has been to concentrate public attention in our country, more perhaps than elsewhere, on the work and activities of the League. Proximity almost always makes for interest.

From the beginning we have been resolute advocates of universality. We have proved it by our acts. Were I not fearful of betraying a lack of taste, I might be tempted to quote the speech I delivered on November 20th, 1920, on the opening of the first Assembly. Therein, directly alluding to Russia, I expressed the hope that, having been "cured of her madness" and "delivered from her misery", she might some day seek and find in the League the help indispensable for her reconstruction.

In spite of its constant and warm friendship for the Russian people, the Swiss Government has, however, never felt able to recognise de jure their present regime. It is determined to maintain this negative and expectant attitude. Our Legation at Petrograd was pillaged in 1918 and one of its officials killed. We have never secured so much as a word of apology. When, in 1918, an attempted general strike nearly plunged our country in the horrors of a civil war, a Soviet mission, which we had tolerated in Berne, had to be expelled manu militari, because it was found to have had a hand in the agitation.

As soon as the possibility of admitting the Soviet Union into the League began to be discussed this year in diplomatic circles, the Federal Council unhesitatingly informed Parliament that it could not, for its part, favour such a step. We realised that an affirmative vote would in fact, if not necessarily in law, lead to the resumption of regular diplomatic relations. That was out of the question. From a proper sense of caution, however, the Federal Council at that time, and until it became necessary to take a more definite decision, maintained its freedom of choice between a categorical negative note and abstention, the latter being, in its opinion, only a disguised form of refusal.

Since then, and as the chances of a Russian application became closer and more imminent, the problem has come to be publicly discussed with increasing vigour. I shall in a moment explain why and how our public opinion has reacted, but before doing so I beg leave to say a word about the significance and force of public opinion in Switzerland.

Swiss public opinion is always free; it is also spontaneous. Our Press is entirely free. The Federal Council has nothing resembling a semi-official Press. No pressure is ever exercised, no indications even are received from above. At the same time, we have many and various patriotic associations which cultivate and stimulate public spirit. We should not be the democracy we are, were it otherwise. We are proud of this democracy; it is one of the reasons of our very existence. Without democracy no Switzerland. If, therefore, on any matter of importance, the Press and these patriotic associations take a like stand, irrespective of political party, region and language, we are confronted with the national will clearly proclaimed. The Government must take account of it. It must do so all the more when its own opinion coincides with that thus expressed. Such is the case here.

Holding to essentials and leaving aside all secondary factors, let me now state how the problem of the admission of the Soviet Union into the League presents itself to us.

Does a regime, does a Government which proclaims and practises an expansive and militant Communism fulfil the necessary conditions of admission?

I shall refer neither to the Preamble nor to the literal provisions of the Covenant. The arguments they suggest are very powerful, but they are of minor importance when compared with the fundamental principles of the Covenant, with its main purpose, with that which it does not explicitly mention because it goes without saying and is therefore necessarily assumed.

In every sphere—religious, moral, social, political, economic—this form of Communism is the most radical negation of the ideas by which we breathe and have our being. Most States even prohibit simple Communist propaganda, all regard it as a political crime as soon as it seeks to pass from the realm of theory into that of action.

Soviet Communism combats the ideal of religion and all that is spiritual in every form. Lenin compared religion to opium. Freedom of conscience is but a mere semblance. The servants of religion and their families are deprived of food cards. Churches are desecrated and fall in ruin. Moscow had five hundred churches and chapels; forty are said to remain. Christian churches the world over feel smitten in the spirit and in the flesh of all those who there profess and proclaim their belief in Christ. A so-called petition for the martyrs was, last year in Switzerland, covered by over two hundred thousand signatures!

Communism dissolves the family; it suppresses individual initiative; it abolishes private property; it organises labour in forms which it is difficult to distinguish from forced labour. Russia is afflicted with the dark curse of famine. Impartial observers wonder whether this famine is a purely natural phenomenon or whether it is the consequence of an economic and social system vitiated in its very roots.

But these characteristics of Communism, which I have sought objectively to define, still do not give a true picture of Russian Communism. There must be added another essential and distinctive trait which still more completely puts it into opposition with the most fundamental and most universally recognised principles prevailing in relations between States. Russian Communism seeks to strike root everywhere. Its ambition is world revolution. Its nature, its aspirations, its inner urge, all make for foreign propaganda. Its vital law is expansion beyond political frontiers. For Communism to abandon these aims would be to deny itself; but by pursuing them, it becomes our common enemy, because it threatens us all. It would be easy for me to base each of these statements on authoritative texts drawn from official Bolshevik literature, but I would spare you superfluous quotations. We are faced with uncontroverted and uncontrovertible truths.

But I perceive the first objection. We hear it said: let us not confuse the Communist Party with the Bolshevik State.

This is no objection. The Bolshevik State, the Communist Party and the Third International to which it owes its birth are all morally one. The Bolshevik State was founded to carry out the programme of the Communist Party. Lenin had united in his person the functions of head of the State and of the Party. The present Secretary-General of the Party, without being the nominal head of the State, is its true master. The bonds between the State and the Party are indissoluble. The Party issues orders, the State carries them out.

I perceive a second and more important objection. Let me formulate it before examining it.

Attention is called to the fact that the Soviet Union is an immense country of a hundred and sixty millions of inhabitants. Facing Asia on one side and Europe on the other, astride in a way on two continents, it cannot safely be ignored and deliberately left aside. The League of Nations is only a new form of international co-operation. It is not an institute of ethics, but a political association whose principal aim is to prevent wars and to maintain peace. If, by admitting Russia, we can serve the cause of peace, we must suppress our fears, our doubts, the repugnance which Governments may feel. May we not hope that continuous co-operation with other States within the League will promote an evolution beneficial for all and for Russia itself in the first instance?

You would rightly be surprised were I to deny these considerations all value. The Governments of France, the United Kingdom and Italy have already placed similar views before the Federal Council through the ordinary channels of diplomacy—that is, through their representatives at Berne. The conversations which, as head of the Political Department, I was privileged to have with these gentlemen, were pursued in a spirit of friendship and confidence. I never had the slightest feeling of any, even indirect, pressure. Let me make that clear in order, in the general interest, to dispel any possible misunderstandings.

While, however, we appreciated the points of view of other Governments, and particularly those of the three Great Powers, we were obliged to adopt another for ourselves. A country like Switzerland, which is neither able nor willing to play a part in high international policy, must necessarily pursue its own conceptions. In certain cases, we must deny ourselves opportunity, even of the highest and most legitimate order. We can emulate other countries only in the arduous pursuit of moral values.

Now, we cannot believe in this evolution of the Bolshevik regime, for which we hope no less than you. We cannot sacrifice to the principle of universality the idea of a necessary minimum of moral and political conformity between States. The League is or should be, in our view, one of the greatest of all human conceptions and realisations. When, on May 16th, 1920, the people and the cantons of Switzerland, overcoming all the obstacles due to their historical traditions, decided that the Confederation should join the League, they generously obeyed the call of an ideal.

To-day the common feelings of all patriotically and nationally minded Swiss is that the League is embarking on a hazardous undertaking. As we see it, it is venturing to wade water and fire. If Soviet Russia all of a sudden ceases to insult the League, which Lenin defined as an institute of brigands, we read the explanation of this novel attitude in the fiery letters of the Far-Eastern sky. We have no confidence. We do not feel able to co-operate in an act which will confer upon Soviet Russia a prestige which it has not here to fore enjoyed.

But the die is cast. Alea jacta est. We prefer to warn, to put you on your guard. We hope the future may show that our misgivings were unduly exaggerated. We count on all the other States to help us in preventing Geneva from becoming a centre of dissolving propaganda. We will be vigilant. That is our duty. For the present, it suffices for us to know that, in oblivion of its past, Soviet Russia will not be admitted to the League by a unanimous vote and crowned with laurels of triumph.

When it has been admitted, the Council and the Assembly will be faced with several questions that are still pending before them. The Assembly's resolution relating to the independence of Georgia will not sleep the sleep of death. Armenia, Ukraine, other countries will still enjoy the interest of men of goodwill. Let it not be said: These questions will no longer be raised. The sympathies of civilised mankind will never fail heroes fighting for life and liberty. No statute of limitations will deny their claims.

And above all, when the Soviet delegates are in Geneva we hope that voices may be raised here to demand explanations of their Government on behalf of the conscience of mankind, voices to denounce this anti-religious propaganda which is without precedent in the annals of humanity and which plunges Christendom into grief and tears and, with Christendom, all men who believe in God and who invoke his justice.

I have finished. I have endeavoured to express the feelings of the immense majority of the Swiss people. We do not want to preach to others, but I was impelled to speak my mind. Had I refrained from so doing, I should have been unfaithful to my trust.

It is to the honour of the Assembly that the procedure of admission, however delicate, has been followed in a calm and serene atmosphere. The Swiss people will take cognisance of decisions of the majority with cool composure and with that wise democratic discipline which it owes to its secular traditions.

The former Foreign Minister, M. Jaspard, spoke on behalf of Belgium and pointed out that his country had not established diplomatic relations with Soviet Russia on account of the lofty considerations set forth by the Swiss delegate. The Soviet Union had never made any reparation for the loss and damage caused to a large number of Belgians by the new regime in Russia. Belgium would not vote against the admission of Soviet Russia but would abstain, merely because three Great Powers with whom she had close relations hoped that this admission would promote international cooperation.

The Argentine delegate, M. Cantilo, gave an even shorter statement of the reasons why his country abstained. Recalling the outrages to which the diplomatic representatives of his country were subject in Russia in 1918 and 1920, he said the Argentine had not forgotten these matters and would abstain from voting.

The Netherlands representative, M. de Graeff, beat all records in brevity. In two sentences he referred to the reasons set forth by M. Motta, and said the Netherlands would vote against the admission.

The Vote.

The resolution by which the Sixth Committee recommended the admission of Russia to the League was adopted by 38 votes against 3, with 7 abstentions.

Thus a truly historic meeting came to a close. The loud and spontaneous applause accorded by almost all delegations to the serious and noble statement of the Swiss attitude by Federal Councillor Motta shows that some delegations who voted for Russia shared the Swiss view, though they did not think fit to draw the same political consequences as Switzerland.

The Soviet Union was admitted to the League of Nations on September 18th, 1934 by 39 votes out of 49. Seven countries abstained from voting, and three countries (Switzerland, Portugal and the Netherlands) voted against. A permanent seat on the League Council was then accorded by 40 votes out of 50, there being 10 abstentions.

The Trojan horse had entered the Geneva League. The President, M. Sandler, said in his speech of greeting: It will be for the future to show all the consequences of this event. The 18th of September marks a turning point in the history of the League of Nations.

In his maiden speech, M. Litvinov soon gave the answer. He told all those who had hoped that the League of Nations would bring about an evolution in Bolshevism that this was not the case.

M. Motta's gloomy prophecy was fulfilled almost as soon as it was uttered. The 18th of September was such a turning point in the history of the League as was not dreamt of at that time, or at any rate not to this extent or with this rapidity.

V. The Present Position of the Efforts at League Reform ⁽¹⁾

During the 100th Session of the Council in January, the work of the Reform Committee is to be again taken up. Italy's withdrawal and the German declaration will not be without effect on this work. As we pointed out in our No. 2 of October 15th, the fundamental attitude of last year's Assembly to two resolutions—the Argentine and Chilian—is proof of the hopelessness of any progress. A general feeling of "malaise" was observable to any close observer. The acceptance of those resolutions was like a bite from a sour apple taken with a view to preventing the threat of withdrawal of further Members. As long as the League has existed it has made attempts at reform, but all these attempts have failed over questions of procedure and the Covenant has undergone no substantial change. In particular, the discussion last September on these League questions, with the numerous reports on reform, showed that it was hopeless to amend the League Covenant which legally and politically expressed the principles of a dictated peace and served to enforce that peace.

On this point no illusions must be created by the fact that, in September last year, the question of separating the Covenant from the Peace Treaties was referred to a legal committee for examination. Before that committee started its discussions, the restriction was laid down that the connection between the Peace Treaties and the Covenant was purely formal and had no legal significance; the Committee was also not to deal in any way with the material competence of the League. The Report of the Legal Sub-Committee states at the outset that it was not the duty of the Committee to propose any modification of the Peace Treaties, or to deal with the powers conferred upon the League by those Treaties. Its duty was merely to eliminate certain expressions in the Covenant which might induce other States to stand aloof from the League of Nations and to remove misunderstandings as to the essential characteristics of the Covenant. The report of the jurists accordingly goes on to make proposals in accordance with Article 26 of the Covenant, amounting throughout to the omission and redrafting of passages in order to avoid the mention of the "Allied and Associated Powers" and the "Peace Treaties".

The stairway of the League procedure, which some incorrigible optimists think should in theory lead rapidly to the summit of the entire League construction, has however in practice always led downwards, namely to the document cellars. In particular the question of the separation of the Covenant from the Peace Treaties, the title of a theme which has been thoroughly exploited at Geneva in order to create the impression that the League of Nations has the courage to deal with the most delicate issues, sank so rapidly to disappointment that after barely three months this question is referred to as a nightmare. From the restrictions in principle to which we have briefly referred above, this question sank to the next downward stage, namely the draft resolution in the report to the effect that from the first day of its existence the Covenant has had an independent existence, as is clear from the purposes of the League. It was however desired to remove certain difficulties arising out of a number of expressions employed in the Covenant, which might be considered an obstacle to the entry of certain States into the League of Nations. The Assembly should therefore decide :

1. to recommend to Governments of Members the prompt ratification of the Protocol embodying the amendments referred to above ;

2. to request the Secretary-General to communicate the text of the said amendments to Members of the League and to States non-members to be named by the Council.

It is characteristic of the opposition raised against this obvious compromise that the Reform Committee, to which the report was submitted for adoption by the Sub-Committee, after a short discussion agreed, contrary to the original intention, not to submit it to the League Assembly that was sitting at the time, but to send it first to the individual member States.

This is, in particular, a means of gaining time. Any further special desires by the Governments, whether of a radical nature or not, will require further meetings ; a new draft will be agreed upon of which it will not be known whether it tears down or raises still higher the walls erected as a protection in front of the spirit of Versailles. At any rate it is clear that the contents and results of the negotiations on the separation of the Covenant from the Peace Treaties have not been advanced by a discussion which at one time might have been of the highest importance. The statement that the entire question must be conducted in accordance with Article 26 leaves it entirely obscure. Even if the report of the Committee of Jurists, which has now been submitted to the Governments, were accepted by the States Members and if the Assembly next September took a corresponding decision, the proposed changes in the Covenant could not take effect until "the Members of the League whose representatives compose the Council and a majority of the Members of the League whose representatives compose the Assembly" had ratified the amendments. The entire question is therefore doubly postponed by procedure.

In this connection, it is particularly noteworthy that the report which M. Umana Bernal (Colombia) submitted to the Reform Committee on the "Choice of Methods" for amending the Covenant reached the conclusion that amendments in the Covenant such as those proposed by the Committee of Jurists hardly ever come into effect. Even if the proposed purely formal amendments really came into effect, that would not be a material and essential reform, nor could it be regarded as a symbolical gesture of moral effect, especially as the most careful efforts were made to prevent this act from being described as a clear departure from the past. The League Covenant would remain as before the formal instrument for justifying and maintaining the status quo of 1919, especially as regards the territorial provisions of the Peace Treaties.

While a purely negative judgment can be given of the past work in connection with League reform, no more favourable result can be expected in the future.

Valuable indications are given in this respect by the reports which were to be prepared on the basis of the plan of work drawn up by the Reform Committee. As we showed in detail in our No. 2, a number of these reports had been submitted at the time of the September Assembly, but the Committee did not get beyond the question as to which of them should be dealt with first ; it was finally agreed that Lord Cranborne's report on the problem of universality should be the first item on the agenda of a future session.

Below we give an outline of these reports which are only intended "for information" and which draw no conclusions but merely serve to state the questions.

1. Problem of Universality.

(a) Report by Lord Cranborne (United Kingdom) on the participation of all States in the League of Nations.

While showing cautious scepticism regarding praise of the universality of the League as a panacea, a distinction is made between three possible types of League organisations :

1. The "coercive type", characterised by the absolute obligation of the Members to impose sanctions in certain circumstances.

2. The "non-coercive type", with machinery for the pacific settlement of disputes, but no coercive means.

3. The "intermediate type", in which the Members of the League would be able to decide in each particular case, without any general legal obligation, what measures—possibly including sanctions—should be taken.

The rapporteur does not hide his sympathies for this third solution, while as regards the others he notes the paradox that in the case of the "coercive type" universality could scarcely be reached, while the "non-coercive type" though leading more readily to universality would at the same time destroy the actual value of the League.

He further raises the question whether the lack of universality and not, for instance, the inherent facts of certain situations or the lack of cooperation of the members have been mainly responsible for the failure of the League ; however decisive the reform, it could not lead to the desired object if certain States were in principle opponents of the assumption of definite collective obligations.

(b) Report by Lord Cranborne on Cooperation between the League of Nations and Non-Member States.

The report draws the following conclusions from the experience gained :

1. For cooperation with the League there must be a concrete interest on the part of the non-Member States concerned.

2. Cooperation appears to thrive best in an atmosphere free from rigid rules. Nevertheless, it is possibly of value to formulate more complete and exact rules of guidance on the basis of former practice.

3. Cooperation is easiest and most complete in regard to technical and economic matters.

4. One of the fundamental obstacles may lie in the "general spirit of non-cooperation" which, in the Rapporteur's view, characterises certain States. The root of the problem is the production of a desire for cooperation.

As a rule, he said, collaboration with non-members could not be a substitute for universal membership. This collaboration had disadvantages. It involved an element of uncertainty and might place the League under certain circumstances in the position of a beggar ; but above all, an extensive collaboration of States might make membership of the League appear superfluous. The question of collaboration would however be of particular importance if it appeared that universal membership could only be reached by a revision of the Covenant which was too radical to meet with general approval.

(c) Report by M. Pardo (Argentine) on the Co-ordination of Covenants.

The Rapporteur expressly points out that the urgent task is not the "coordination of texts of treaties", but the "coordination of measures" which would be taken in a time of crisis on the basis of the League Covenant on the one hand and the "universal peace pacts" on the other hand.

(d) Report by M. Stein (Soviet Russia) on Regional or Continental Organisation of the League of Nations.

The report reaches the conclusion that the continental—regional organisation of the League of Nations is only admissible as a subsidiary means of strengthening the general obligations assumed by the Members of the League.

2. Article 16.

(a) Report by M. Rutgers (Netherlands) on the General Obligations under Article 16.

The Rapporteur first points out that various factors have impeded the evolution of the system of collective security. Apart from the lack of universality, the non-application of Article 8 of the Covenant, and the unfortunate experience in the matter of Article 16, he mentions the factor of disputes affecting the territorial status quo and states that some Members of the League contested the equity of the new frontiers. It was, he says, a matter of regret, in this connection, that Article 19 had been incapable of settling certain political disputes.

M. Rutgers considers that if it were proposed to reduce the League's function to that of a purely advisory organ, it could only be with the object of achieving the universality of the League. Subject to this aspect, all the Members of the League doubtless intended to maintain the system of collective security. Several Members of the League, for instance the former neutrals, were however in favour of restricting the obligations under Article 16. In view of this tendency, it seemed impossible for the Committee to think of making these obligations more burdensome. Good work could, however, be done by removing existing unclearness; the proper method for this would be an interpretative resolution regarding Article 16.

(b) Report by M. Paul-Boncour (France) on Regional Pacts of Mutual Assistance.

The report crassly summarises the well known French view. The main value of these pacts, it states, is to render possible effective military sanctions to a regional extent; in case of flagrant aggression, the parties are to be authorised to take immediate action, the League being frankly left out of account by the phrase: "Les droits du Conseil étant ultérieurement réservés". According to M. Paul-Boncour, the objection that such regional pacts constitute alliances is met by the fact they are open to the accession of any State. The Eastern Pact negotiations and the subsequent attempt in the original wording of the Franco-Soviet alliance to exclude the League of Nations show that regional pacts are nothing more or less than veiled alliances, and that the question of responsibility is intentionally left unclear.

(c) Report by Nasrollah Entezam (Iran) on Article 10 of the Covenant.

The Rapporteur is in favour of maintaining the guarantee contained in Article 10—territorial integrity and existing political independence—unless its abolition were offset by a political accession of first-rate importance, such as the admission of the United States to the League. The Rapporteur is inclined towards the view—which is contrary to current practice—that in case of a breach of Article 10 there is an obligation to impose military sanctions.

The Belgian, M. Rolin, once said that Article 10 was the quintessence of the League Covenant, i.e. that it occupied the predominant position in the Covenant. In 1920 a Canadian proposal was made to omit this article. At that time, on the occasion of the First Assembly of the League, the world was given documentary proof that the League of Nations was intended as an instrument for the maintenance of the territorial possessions under the Paris Peace Treaties. In course of time, however, some Members of the League neglected the obligations which they might be called upon to assume under Article 10, and the view became general that every Member had to decide for himself to what extent he was compelled to ensure the fulfilment of his obligations under Article 10 with his own military forces; the problem, as set forth in the report by Nasrollah Entezam, can thus be regarded as a backward movement which will be only welcome to the beneficiary States of 1919.

(d) Report by M. Undén (Sweden) on Article 11 of the League Covenant.

The Rapporteur endeavours to interpret as broadly as possible the rights granted under this article to the Council and Assembly to settle conflicts, but hesitates to recommend a change in the Covenant. The individual proposals remain within the limits of the previous attempts or are entirely theoretical in character, such as, for instance, the statement that the organs of the League are able under Article 11 and also under Article 19 to make proposals to change the status quo.

Here also it must be remembered that Lord Robert Cecil frankly disclosed the proceedings of the peace-makers in this connection and pointed out that Article 19, which provides for revision, was a part of Article 10 in the first draft of the Covenant, but that the recognition of change, which is faintly expressed in Article 19, was not to apply to the territorial provisions of Versailles; with this argument the clausula rebus sic stantibus in a mutilated form was separated from Article 10 and became an independent article 19; no hope can be entertained of peaceful revision on the basis of Article 11 or of Article 19—which merely provides that the Assembly may advise etc.; League practice has already given so many disappointments that such an expectation must be rejected as the great illusion of League enthusiasts.

(a) Report by M. Umana-Bernal (Colombia) on the execution of the principles of the Covenant. Choice of methods.

The report comes to the conclusion that a change in the Covenant is only possible by means of Article 29. Practice shows, however, that this method encounters great difficulties and that in many cases it has led to no result. The consensus of opinion is that the League organs cannot give a binding interpretation of the Covenant. Lastly, practice has not given encouraging results in the supplementary agreements to the Covenant.

It will be seen that the general trend of the above reports is that they contain no trace of a serious desire for reform amounting to a breach with the former League practice and in particular with the system of collective security. This applies not only to the statements by MM. Paul-Boncour, Stein and Entezam, who are even in favour of strengthening the collective obligations and supplementing the machinery of sanctions, but also to the reports by MM. Undén and Rutgers; both these reports, it is true, incline to the views of the anti-sanctionist group of the former neutral States, but hesitate to depart in the slightest from the existing legal position. As regards the two reports by Lord Cranborne, it will be observed that they attempt to find an intermediate solution between the unconditional adherents of the idea of universality—to which in particular the small States belong under the leadership of Chile—and its opponents, in particular Soviet Russia. This attempt would appear to be doomed to failure because the two interests in question are entirely opposed to each other; while Soviet Russia and her friends aim solely at exploiting the League of Nations as an instrument of battle against the “Fascist States”, the object of the smaller States is in particular to avoid implication in a conflict between the Great Powers. The solution which Lord Cranborne recommends—though he does not do so expressly—i.e. to convert the League of Nations into an intermediate type between the present coercive type and a non-coercive type would therefore presumably not satisfy either of the two Parties. Moreover the system of collective security would be maintained in its essential characteristics, and its effects would be more incalculable than before.

THE CHILIAN ACTION IN THE QUESTION OF REFORM

Extract from the speech by M. Edwards, Chilean delegate, in the Reform Committee on September 10th, 1937

Having been invited by the Chairman to let him have any suggestions I might wish to make, I sent him a reply in which I expressed my Government's deep regret that our work was proceeding so slowly.

Our Chairman's communication to which I was replying showed that the tendency to adjourn the question of the reform of the Covenant, which my Government considers as urgent and of primary importance, was persisting, and that in spite of the efforts made by him and by the General Secretariat, League of Nations circles were displaying some lethargy (not to say resistance) in reaching a decision to follow the only direct course which could lead to universality.

No action has been taken with regard to the suggestion my Government has made on three occasions, namely that the States non-Members should be consulted as to possible reforms. Nor has this suggestion been considered up to the present. Yet it is the only means of approximating to, if not actually achieving, universality, and without it there can be no improvement in the application of the Covenant. Several Members of the League of Nations have expressed the same view, but as yet there has been no sign even of a study of the procedure for opening such a consultation. An in the meantime the League is entangling itself in an inextricable network of platitudes and more or less theoretical resolutions.

It has always seemed to us elementary logic that if the collaboration of a sovereign State is desired in an international organisation, the first step must be to invite it to discuss the foundations on which that organisation is to be constructed, or reorganised, and to explain in what conditions it would be prepared to co-operate. To suppose that sovereign States can be placed before accomplished facts is to display undue optimism. Suppose, as I think we all desire, we decide upon certain reforms—for instance, the separation of the Covenant from the Peace Treaties, the amendment of Article 4, the application of Article 8 (which seems to have been overlooked for a long time, although it is one of the fundamental bases of the Covenant), the deletion of Article 10 and the amendment of Article 11, the definition of the vague Articles 16 and 17, the reform of Article 21—and then find that several States non-Members might have considered joining, or returning to, the League of Nations if these changes, adjustments and omissions had been of another character. Should we have to begin our work again and to admit that we had been writing in water? Or should we abandon any attempt to satisfy them, in the belief that the League of Nations is more effective and has greater prestige and authority if it is incomplete?

What is essential, in my Government's opinion, is that no effort should be spared to make the League universal. We believe no sacrifice is too great in the interests of universality.

As far as concerns the universality of the League of Nations, which we all desire, the procedure hitherto adopted has led us in 1937 to a situation far worse than that of 1936. Instead of advancing, we are losing ground. In 1936 four States had already left us; in 1937 there were seven. We are afraid that this progression will accelerate if the first step of all towards universality is not taken at once, namely, the consultation of States non-Members to ascertain their ideas and their desires with regard to changes in the Covenant.

The members of the Committee will remember that it was in the month of July 1936 that the Head of the Delegation of Chile to the League of Nations, M. Rivas Vicuna, formulated the request he had the honour to repeat to the Assembly in September, a request which it was my duty to formulate yet again, for the third time, at the only meeting held by our Committee in December last, and which I have just formulated to-day for the fourth time on behalf of my Government.

Our efforts have met with a disheartening silence. We have heard and read theoretical pronouncements on the universality which all seem to seek, which all seem to recognise as essential if the League of Nations is to do effective work or even to continue. Yet universality is still suspended in the heavens like those stars which shine but give the world neither heat nor light. The earnest, clear, precise suggestion of the Delegation of Chile has never been the subject of examination, still less of a decision. To-day, I repeat, is the fourth time we have made it in a year. Is it this time to meet with a more encouraging reception? I hope so with all my heart, for that would be the most eloquent testimony to the real desire of the League of Nations to extend its foundations and to become universal.

After nine months, during which the Committee held no meetings, we are convened to a preliminary meeting at which we are presented with the whole of the work accomplished. But this work covers only certain special items of reform, which are to be examined after the Assembly.

Unless a special session of the Assembly is convened, we shall have no opportunity, during 1937, of discussing in the great deliberative body of our League any ideas on which we may reach agreement. The conclusion reached by the Committee of Twenty-Eight will come before the 1938 Assembly, and it is to be feared that this further delay will add to the number of those who feel discouraged.

The preliminary and fundamental question of a consultation of States non-Members is not included in our programme of work for either this preliminary meeting or the meeting to be held at the end of the Assembly.

It would seem that we shall have no report from the Committee which could be discussed during the Assembly. Once more we shall see a discussion vital to the League of Nations adjourned as being premature. May I venture to remind you that as early as the 1920 Assembly, when the Delegation of the Argentine Republic raised the question, inter alia, of universality—raised it in terms which do great credit to the foresight of its Government—it was declared to be premature. It would be tragic if after seventeen years it were still regarded as premature. If, during the general discussion on the annual report of the Secretary-General, proposals concerning universality and the consultation of States non-Members—which would, of course, have to be referred to a committee—are submitted to the Assembly, it is obvious that it is our Committee of Twenty-Eight which should deal with them.

It would seem more logical to convene the Committee of Twenty-Eight and ask it to reach a decision and submit a report to the Assembly.

This, however, is the moment when it is suggested that we should adjourn our discussions until after the Assembly is over.

I submit to the Chairman and to my colleagues that it would be wiser not to take that decision. It would be better to hold ourselves in readiness to study any proposals that may be presented during the Assembly to the effect that States non-Members should be invited to send us their views on the reform of the Covenant.

I even go so far as to believe that we might with advantage inform the Assembly when its discussions open, that we are prepared to meet to examine these proposals, if necessary, and that we desire as far as possible to speed up the procedure so that results may be achieved on which the Assembly might express an opinion this year.

My Government's attitude has been interpreted in some circles as aimed only at the return to the League of Nations of certain great Powers. It certainly has this aspect of the question in mind, since without their help it is difficult, and perhaps even impossible, to apply the principles of the Covenant, but our preoccupation, our principal object, is wider.

It must not be forgotten that seven of the twenty States of Latin America have withdrawn from the League of Nations among them the biggest State of all. Brazil, which has a population of 48 million and a territorial area almost as great as that of the United States of America. What reason is there for not inviting them to express their views and to co-operate with us in the reform of the Covenant itself? Chile views with regret their exclusion from discussions which naturally interest them.

Most of the admirable reports we have received testify to the legal training of the Rapporteurs and the scrupulous care with which they have analysed the questions referred to them. They deal with specific aspects of the Covenant such as, for instance, the separation of the Covenant from the Peace Treaties, the internal organisation of the League, Article 11, Article 16 and Article 21. Three others—those of the representative of the United Kingdom, Viscount Cranborne and that of the representative of the Argentine Republic, M. Pardo—approximate more closely to the Chilean point of view.

I could say a good deal about these reports, but I must refrain from speaking on them until we have had an exchange of views on what I deem to be the preliminary question of the Chilean suggestion.

But I wonder why, after 18 years of a precarious and difficult existence, we continue to study hypotheses. Why, instead of groping in the dark and guessing what kind of League of Nations would attract the States non-Members, do we not ask these States frankly, point blank, for their views?

We must insist first on a preliminary consultation of the States non-Members and must endeavour to confer on the League of Nations something more than indirect, and above all doubtful, universality,—I mean the complete, frank, indisputable universality, which would result from direct membership of the League in full knowledge of the facts.

That has been Chile's aim for the past year, convinced as she is that the League of Nations is in danger—in imminent danger—unless it alters its course.

What we wish to bring about is not the end but the renaissance of the League.

I will confine myself to-day to explaining to my colleagues on the Committee of 28 the general bases of the Chilean point of view. We consider that the invitation to non-Member States is a preliminary question covering all the proposals for reform which can possibly be made and all the reports submitted to us.

I shall have the honour to communicate my Government's views to the Assembly and to dwell on certain special aspects of the League's situation as it appears to a State which considers it its duty to analyse it openly, enumerating its good points and its shortcomings, its virtues and its vices, with the noble aim of making if only a minute contribution to the task of restoring to the League the breath of life which is gradually departing from it.

At the Assembly the Chilean delegate on September 14th repeated his warning, and at the decisive meeting of the Committee of Twenty-Eight on September 25th on the question of a further adjournment which was demanded in particular by the Soviet Russian Foreign Minister Litvinov, he accompanied it with the following solemn declaration:

"The Governments of the South American States might find themselves unable to continue their cooperation with Geneva if they gained the impression that there was a firm intention to deprive the League of its character of universality. Any decision regarding an adjournment and any obstacle preventing the Assembly from discussing the matter in its present session might result in very serious consequences."

As a result the Assembly on October 4th exerted itself to the extent of passing the two resolutions, the first of which—dealing with the procedure of consulting non-Members on the question of reform—will only come before the Council in the January session, while the second decides upon the convening of non-Members to the peace endeavours of Geneva in case of a war or threat of war.

VI. Unconvincing Remarks by the "Times" of December 13th, 1937 on the Italian Declaration of Withdrawal

"The decision to leave the League of Nations, makes no real change in the international situation. If Italy has remained nominally a member—with a seat, moreover, in the Council—in actual fact she has held herself aloof from the work of the League for the past eighteen months.

The step announced with so much emphasis on Saturday formally confirms a long-standing defection and puts an end to ambiguities which were of no use either to the League or to Italy herself. Yet, in spite of all the difficulties with which it has had to contend, it has done much invaluable work, and it remains the necessary nucleus for developing an effective organization for the promotion of peace, the need for which is beyond dispute—in the present confusion. The scene just staged in Rome should prompt all who desire this end to examine very coolly and very carefully the means by which it may be reached.

So far as this country is concerned there can of course be no question of abandoning the League, of scrapping an immensely valuable piece of machinery, just because it has proved unequal to a strain far greater than it was ever designed to bear. That would be to throw up in despair all hope of securing international cooperation on a common platform under accepted rules, and to leave to force and opportunism the whole conduct of human affairs. If the League in its present form has failed, then the Governments composing it must seek for a new form which will have a greater chance of success. Discussion during the past year has revealed two conflicting tendencies. There are some who would have the League ignore the awkward fact that it no longer comprises even a majority of the Great Powers, and endeavour to make up by vigour what it lacks in strength, dictating settlements and seeking to impose them even at the risk of war. Yet the only conceivable effect of this policy must be to accelerate and harden the division of Europe into two opposing camps, with the League Powers on one side and on the other the Powers which desire some modification of the status quo and which suspect the League of being in effect, under a high sounding name, just an alliance to prevent any change. That would not be a League system as originally understood, which presupposes the widest and most representative membership and itself as the instrument of peaceful revision, but a reversion to the old system of the balance of power, increasing instead of diminishing the danger of war. The goal of peace, organized and secure, is not to be reached along this road. To emphasize the coercive character of the League would tend to make it even less representative than it is at present. Faced with the prospect of a violent clash between the two groups of Powers, many of the smaller countries would be tempted to provide for their own safety by a timely withdrawal. It may well be argued that most of the present difficulties have arisen just because too much attention has been paid to prevention and coercion and too little to construction and reconciliation.

The essential object of the League is the same as that of the Kellogg Pact—to substitute discussion and settlements by consent for war and the threat of war. It can best serve this purpose by acting as an international clearinghouse, for removing causes of friction, for redressing grievances, and for reconciling differences. Whether we like it or not, the world is not ripe for the creation of a super-State overriding national sovereignties and imposing by force obedience to the general will. What is immediately practicable is not a compulsory arbitration court, whose awards would have the force of law, but rather a court of conciliation, which would strive to promote agreement in cases of dispute. There are two courses, supplementary one to the other, by which the League can be revived and started again on a career of great and increasing usefulness. One is by working out practical proposals for removing the main causes of international conflict, economic as well as political, if indeed it is possible to separate the two. The other is to induce as many countries as possible to cooperate in this work. Few countries are likely to deprive themselves of the benefits resulting from international collaboration when they see the collaboration of others beginning to bear fruit. Thus the machinery of the League has been at work for more than a year seeking the basis of a concerted policy for economic recovery. Economic distresses are among the most powerful factors responsible for the existing tension in international politics. It would be an invaluable contribution to political appeasement if this preparatory work could be accelerated, and the League enabled to formulate effective measures for promoting world trade and for bringing the general standard of living nearer the higher levels of which the modern world is capable. Any success in this field must have an immediate tranquillizing effect upon the political situation. It would, moreover, provide a powerful inducement for Powers outside the League to resume their collaboration. In the meantime the Governments concerned for the maintenance of the League ideal, with all that it implies, can make their best contribution by resisting the tendency to split Europe into two opposing blocs and by promoting whatever agreements and appeasements are found possible."

We agree that the great City newspaper has in the past few months constantly used this train of thought as a warning and admonition to Geneva, for instance in the two leading articles of April 14th, 1937 (The League to-day) and of September 14th, 1937 (What the League can do). We recall the numerous letters to which it gave space in order to issue a warning against making the League a super-State or a Ministry of War.

Two letters to the "Times".

Probably the criticism of the methods and aims of the Geneva League has never been so thoroughly probed as in the letter published in the "Times" on April 14th, 1937, which was signed by prominent persons of the most various views and experience. This letter is still of current interest, since it shows openly and frankly the defects which ultimately caused Italy and Germany to withdraw from the League.

"Sir,—On January 1st you published a "Declaration on Peace". It originated apparently from the International Peace Campaign and is being backed by the League of Nations Union. On March 18 there followed a supporting appeal signed by a number of mayors, clergy, and other notable persons. It is now clear that there is an organized campaign to get support for the campaign all over the country. In both letters it was declared that war can be averted and a stable peace permanently maintained if the members of the League of Nations make plain their determination to fulfil their obligations under the Covenant and take any measures required for the prevention or repression of aggression, including, if necessary, military sanctions.

The declaration also urged the importance of establishing within the framework of the League effectual machinery for remedying by peaceful means international conditions which might lead to war, though it made no practical proposals for doing so.

If all nations were members of the League, if the League possessed power to revise treaties, reduce barriers against the movement of goods and of people, and to remedy other conditions calculated to lead to war, economic sanctions might prevent aggression without serious risk of war. But it is quite clear that the present international tension and crisis is fundamentally due to the fact that the League has not been able to deal with any of the major problems of the contemporary world. It has been unable to modify frontiers admittedly unsound, to abate economic nationalism—though this is by far the biggest single cause of social unrest, dictatorship, and international tension—or to limit armaments, just as it was unable to give to Germany, even when it was a republic, the "equality" which was its natural right. To urge us, therefore, to commit ourselves not only to economic but to automatic military action, instead of equipping the League to do justice as between nations, is simply to increase and not diminish the risk of explosion. It will inevitably result in dividing the world into two great military alliances, the one standing for the status quo, the other for revision of it, with more and more of the smaller Powers returning to neutrality, as Scandinavia, Belgium, and Switzerland are already doing.

By far the most urgent duty of the League to-day is to formulate the practical proposals which it thinks would remove the main causes of international conflict. Until it has done this with some prospect of being able to give effect to its proposals, and until it commands universal membership, to strengthen its sanction system is merely to increase the probability of war, to turn every local war into a world war, and in the end to destroy the League altogether.

We believe that the ideals of the League represent the only road towards lasting peace. But we believe that the way to restore the League is not to turn it into an international war office, but rather to prove that it is an effective instrument for reconciliation, for the settlement of international disputes by pacific means, and for the removal of the causes of war.

Yours faithfully,

Arnold, Astor, Henry Carter, John Fischer Williams, Edward Grigg, Hardinge of Penshurst, George Lansbury, F. O. Lindley, Lothian, Edith Lyttelton, Charles E. Raven, Rennell, Sanderson, Donald Soper, Trenchard.

Lastly we may mention in this connection another letter published in the "Times" on May 4th, 1937 to which reference has frequently been made since that time in other papers. It was written by P. A. Molteno who died on September 19th, 1937 at the age of 76 years and whose life as a politician and member of parliament, as a scientist and philanthropist, and as a friend of the former Prime Minister Cambell-Bannerman and of the Boer General Louis Botha, was recorded in the "Times" of September 21st in a detailed obituary notice.

German offers! This was the title of his letter to the "Times", in which he described to his readers impressively and briefly the series of opportunities lost by British diplomacy (and thus also by the League of Nations).

"Germany seems to have made a number of offers in the direction of peace, and also made substantial contributions to the peace of Europe. Allow me to refer to some of them.

Hitler has recorded that Germany has renounced all intention of seeking a reacquisition of Alsace-Lorraine. Has solemnly recognized and guaranteed France her frontiers as determined after the Saar plebiscite, and has further declared "We are prepared to do everything on our part to arrive at a true peace and a real friendship with the French nation." Has made peace with Poland. Has offered to join in complete disarmament. Has offered to limit her army to 200,000, and when this was abandoned, offered to limit her army to 300,000. This was refused. Has stated her willingness to be ready in principle to conclude pacts of non-aggression with neighbouring States, and to supplement these pacts with all provisions which aim at isolating the war maker and localizing the area of the war.

That Germany is ready at any time to limit her arms to any degree that is adopted by the other Powers.

Prepared to take an active part in all efforts which may lead to a practical limitation of boundless armaments. Prepared to agree to the prohibition of the dropping of gas, incendiary, and explosive bombs outside the real battle zone, and stated that this limitation could then be extended to complete international outlawry of all bombing.

Hitler also offered the concrete proposal for an air pact on the basis of parity of strength as between France, England, and Germany.

Prepared to agree to any limitation which leads to the abolition of the heaviest arms especially suited for aggression such as (1) heaviest artillery, (2) heaviest tanks.

Declared Germany's readiness to agree to any limitation whatsoever of the calibre strength of artillery, of battleships, cruisers, torpedo boats, and of the size of warships, the limitation of the tonnage of submarines, or their complete abolition in the case of international agreement.

Prepared to agree to prevent the poisoning of public opinion among the nations by irresponsible elements, orally or in writing, through the theatre or cinema, having already taken steps to this effect in Germany.

Of all these proposals the only one which eventuated in agreement was his offer to limit the Germany Navy to 35 per cent. of the British Navy.

In his speech on March 7th, 1936, he recalled all these proposals and their complete rejection except for the Naval agreement with Britain.

Finally, on March 21st, 1936, he made the offer of a most comprehensive peace plan to the British Government and people, including an offer to return to the League of Nations. This has had no answer, but a query was addressed to the German Government by the British Government in regard to certain points of the offer.

Thus there appear to have been a number of opportunities open to British diplomacy for forwarding the conclusion of real peace in Europe, and the restriction of the mad race in armaments. We are without information why, with the exception of the Naval agreement, no advantage has apparently been taken of these opportunities".

In view of these warnings and admonitions of the "Times", have not the authors of the article of December 13th perhaps not had the feeling they should have headed their doubtless well-meaning remarks with the words: "Too late"? Had they not the inner conviction that the time limit which has run since 1919 for the Geneva League is now definitely and irrevocably past, after waiting 17 years for it to take up its real task?

The "Daily Telegraph" perhaps took a more realistic view of the position on December 13th, when it wrote:

"Saturday's declaration, in fact, simply recognises, de jure a state of things that has long existed de facto.

On the other hand, it is claimed in Italy that this severance from the League is "the beginning of a new period of international relations"; and in one sense that may be true. With three of the Great Powers—Germany, Japan and Italy—withdrawn from the League; with the United States sympathetic but disinclined to share any responsibility; and with Russia weakened by Stalin's drastic "purges," it is evident that questions requiring international settlement can no longer be referred to the League with confidence or even with utility; because the writ of the League will no longer run. The method of direct negotiation between the Powers concerned—as in the present conversations between Great Britain, France and Germany—will be the only practicable resort".

A Belgian expression of opinion.

In this connection we may reproduce a Belgian view, as expressed by the "Independence Belge" of December 14th.

"Now that Germany, Italy, Japan, the United States and Brazil have left the League, the latter no longer corresponds in any way to what its founders meant it to be, when they conceived a genuinely universal instrument of peace. Nor does it correspond any longer to what the Belgian Government had in mind when it joined the League. The League is now fast becoming the political organisation of an ideological group, which is as much as to say, a weapon of war directed against another group. It belies in so doing its peaceful mission; and we should be making ourselves the accomplices of such a betrayal if we continued to co-operate under such equivocal conditions. Is it our desire to risk the maintenance of our policy of independence by taking sides against our convictions in a connection where the interests of peace no less than our own interests indicate on the contrary the very utmost caution? The Geneva ulcer must be cut. Belgium must either withdraw from the League or take the initiative towards a new policy in Europe, that is to say, towards an international reorganisation, based this time on the co-operation of all Powers (irrespective of the ideological group to which they belong) and taking the experience of the post-war years into account. We for our part would prefer the second alternative to the first, not being advocates of what we should regard as a retrograde, selfish and, for that matter, dangerous step. We believe, moreover, strongly that, if the ideal of international co-operation has had so many set-backs, that has been because there has been a disposition to leave out a stage, and not because it was utopian in itself. Before therefore we can proceed to a World League of Nations, we must first rebuild Europe.

It is in any case essential to take the initiative towards a new European policy. France and England are at present embarked on a church steeple policy devoid of any trace of imagination: and we shall soon have no choice left between excited and selfish nationalisms on the one hand and a false internationalism on the other revealing itself with every month that passes as more and more what it really is, namely, an engine of war. If one reads Hitler's speeches, one sees that there is plenty of room for a genuine international organisation based on foundations of reality. Here is the angle of approach, if the worst is to be avoided."

VII. The Idea of Political Collectivity⁽¹⁾

By Baron von Neurath, German Minister of Foreign Affairs

The conception of a policy of collectivity or collective security is a typical example of the manner in which real political tendencies and activities ultimately lead to the formation of a catchword which claims a higher morality for itself as compared with other political views and thus exercises a wide influence. An attempt to shape international relations in accordance with a more or less far-reaching solidarity of States quite naturally appears to be a method which represents an epoch-making advance over other methods used in the past. It is obvious that this catchword has its origin in the ideology of the League of Nations, which desired and was intended to represent the perfect realisation of political collectivity. The principle of collectivity can moreover not deny this origin although attempts have recently been made to gain acceptance for it outside the framework of League policy. If, therefore, my subject leads me in the first place to make some remarks about the Geneva institution, I have naturally no intention of repeating the reasons for Germany's withdrawal from the League of Nations or of expressing any views about the policy hitherto pursued by the League from the point of view of specific German interests. That is a closed capital which needs no further comment. What I desire rather is again to draw attention to some points of principle in the League Covenant which characterise the attempt proclaimed at Geneva to organise the States in such a manner that the ultimate questions of the destiny of the peoples, the questions of peace and war, should find their answer solely in the joint and total will of all States.

It may of course be said that even such a fundamental and general examination of League principles is entirely superfluous, as the failure of these principles has at present almost become a political platitude, and there not many politicians left who seriously believe that a better realisation of the League ideals can be attained in the future. In a recent debate in the British House of Commons it was stated openly in an authoritative quarter that the League of Nations was not in a position to fulfil its proper function of securing peace, that it offered no guarantee against a war of aggression and that there was therefore no point in constantly emphasising the confidence in the Geneva methods and the desire to make them more effective. However gratifying this frank recognition may be in comparison with the opinions expressed until quite recently on this subject in England, it was again stated at the same time that the League principles as such were thought to be right and that their failure in practice was primarily due to the fact that some of the powerful States were outside the League. To make lack of universality of the League of Nations responsible for the failure of the policy of collectivity is, I am convinced, a direct confusion of cause and effect—a confusion that shows that, despite all the obvious experiences, it is still necessary to deal with the fundamental aspect of these problems.

We entirely understand, even at the present time, that mankind, shaken to its foundations by the War, was to a great extent filled with hope and trust in 1919 when it was offered a league of all States which was to guarantee for all future time the pacific settlement of State conflicts and the suppression of any war of aggression, a league in which all would stand for one and one for all. But it is less comprehensible that those who knew the position, especially in the countries that remained neutral in the War, did not even at that time recognise and strongly oppose the points which must have shown from the outset how faulty was the construction of the Geneva institution. And those who at that time could not or would not take fully into account the intentions of certain great victorious Powers in the direction of a policy of power, should have seen, even if only as jurists, the serious defects displayed by the Covenant of the League of Nations from a purely objective standpoint. Since these matters have long been known, I will merely refer in this connection to the following points which must still be borne in mind in order to obtain a proper judgment of the value or worthlessness of the idea of collectivity.

The Covenant prescribes a certain procedure for the pacific treatment of all conflicts between States, whether of a legal or political nature, whether of limited scope or of vital interest for the nations concerned. At the same time, it strictly forbids the States to take action with their own forces to safeguard their interests, however legitimate they may be, until the procedure in question has been complied with. If such a radical system was thought possible and if it was really considered that it could be put into effect, would it not have been a matter of course that the League procedure should from the outset be so arranged that, at any rate in principle, one of the parties should be really ensured a definitely binding, impartial decision of the conflict and at the same time the loyal execution of such decision? But this was not done in the Covenant. It leaves open the possibility that a decision attained by one party in its own favour is not carried out by the other party, and the further possibility—and this applies particularly to important political disputes—that no objective decision is reached at all. In that case, the party in question, after devoting many months to the pacific system, is ultimately compelled to utilise its own means of force in order to obtain its rights, without being able to claim the support of the Members of the League. It has always been pointed out with satisfaction that the time necessarily spent in complying with the procedure of conciliation is in itself a particularly effective means of preventing war. But this would only be an argument, if the State concerned obtained real compensation for a loss that is often irreparable, and not merely the consolation that it had acted in accordance with the Covenant.

But that is not the most important point. What about the authority which, according to the Covenant, is called upon to give a decision in political disputes? Could it ever be thought that the League Council could claim to be an impartial judge, although the majority of its permanent Members, the representatives of the Great Powers, and also its non-permanent Members are in many, if not in most, cases directly or indirectly concerned in the dispute, and would therefore be judges in their own case? Moreover, on what material principles should the decision of this authority be given? According to the text and spirit of the Covenant, the supreme law is scrupulous respect for existing law, in particular treaties that have been concluded. But the League Covenant does not take into consideration the fact that every legal system which is formally applicable is, and must necessarily be, subject to evolution if it is not to destroy the healthy development of life, and that in a peace system which lays claim to totality there must not be lacking an effective factor which guarantees the reasonable further development of the law and therefore a revision of the treaties in accordance with the vital needs of the nations. It is true that one cautious article, worded almost shamefacedly, hints at this necessity, without however drawing the consequences in a manner which could be put to practical use.

Lastly, we come to the most important point in which the idea of collectivity should find its most immediate expression. Despite all obvious defects and gaps in the system of conciliation, the authors of it thought they could crown their system of safeguarding peace by a mutual guarantee of the territorial possessions of the States and by sanctions against the so-called peace-breaker. Every Member of the League was to assume joint responsibility for the observance of the League Covenant and to take action, even to the sacrifice of its most important interests and by the use of its military forces, so that a conflict between other States which in no way concerned it and which possibly could not be settled amicably might not lead to warlike entanglements. That was to be the correct course, although it could in no way be foreseen now a reliable answer could be given to the decisive question as to the establishment of the aggressor or what would happen in the not improbable case that the Members of the Council took opposite views on this question of the aggressor, or finally how a decision of the League could be successfully put into effect if it were directed against a State of great economic and military power or, still more, against a group of such States.

To assuage all these serious doubts, the only fact that could be referred to in the League Covenant was that it contained a definite promise of general disarmament. From the point of view of the new peace system, therefore, the carrying out of general disarmament should undoubtedly have been treated as the most important and first task in order to ascertain whether the promise was to be taken seriously or, as has turned out to be the case, was merely an empty promise.

When at the present time we regard the League in the light of events that have occurred since its foundation and in the light of its failures which have constantly become more striking, we find that everything which the birth certificate of this first and most comprehensive attempt at incorporating the idea of collectivity gave grounds for expecting has been fully confirmed. It became more and more evident that the political forces which supported the Geneva institution and determined its practice did not really aim at the introduction of a just legal order corresponding to the real needs of the life of the nations, but were directed, under the protection of this alleged ideal, towards the pursuit of definite onesided interests of power. A system such as that represented by the Covenant, in view of the defects which I have pointed out, proved to be a very suitable instrument for a policy directed towards the perpetuation of a given political position and the maintenance of a certain position of power which had once been established. But this combination of moral promises, utopian ideas and political intentions has proved fatal to the League of Nations in practice. I will give a short review of this practice in so far as it is directly connected with the fate of the idea of collectivity and its various modifications.

The basic tendencies of the years of work by which it was desired to develop and safeguard the peaceful organisation of the world soon became quite clear. The famous Geneva protocol of 1924, it is true, was a perfect draft treaty for the pacific settlement of conflicts between States, but it laid down the supreme principle that the treaties of 1919 were sacred and should not be subject to any evolution. At the same time, every care was taken in the Protocol to enable sanctions to function automatically in spite of the difficulties to which I have just referred. The Geneva protocol came to grief through the resistance of England, but the tendency of the subsequent efforts of the leading League politicians remained the same. There is no doubt that the representatives of some Governments have throughout endeavoured sincerely and in good faith to bring about real progress in the shaping of international relations. But they were unsuccessful against a group of Powers that desired to utilise the Geneva machinery in order to maintain their political possessions to the full and, in case of a conflict, to secure for the use of their own military resources the moral and also practical support of the League of Nations. It is very instructive to follow the efforts made to attain this transparent aim in the years after the rejection of the Geneva Protocol by means of a new form of a policy of collectivity. As there was no longer any hope that, in case of conflict, military sanctions would be applied in their totality as was originally planned, that is to say with the participation of all the League Members possessing strong armies, the idea of the so-called regional pacts became more and more prominent in the Geneva discussions. Under the auspices of the League Council, individual groups of States were to combine to conclude special treaties, under which they undertook to grant each other immediate mutual assistance in case of war. The composition of these groups of States was not, as the word "regional" would seem to imply, to be determined from a purely geographical point of view, but the States adjoining each other might be joined by other non-contiguous States if the latter had a special interest in so doing.

The proposal for such regional pacts and the manner in which they were to be brought about have formed the subject of many long discussions in Committees; model drafts have been prepared, and there has been no lack of urgent recommendations that they should be used. Such pacts have, however not been concluded within those groups of States which the authors of the idea had principally in mind. While all these efforts were being made round the committee table, the League of Nations with its ideas of collectivity encountered one failure after another in the world of real political events. It was incapable of contributing to the solution of any of the concrete problems that arose; in none of the cases which led to warlike complications could it do good service by means of its procedure for safeguarding peace. The Disarmament Conference, at which the idea of regional pacts was put forward with special emphasis, led to a disastrous fiasco. In only one case did it take the decision to apply seriously the main requisite of the policy of collectivity, namely sanctions; but it has been rightly pointed out that in this particular case it would have been far better if the League had remained true to its tradition merely to indulge in talk. But while the most faithful adherents of the League of Nations could no longer speak merely of a crisis, but had to recognise complete failure, the idea of regional pacts was not dead. According to everything one hears, it again appears to play a considerable part in the discussions taking place at Geneva regarding a reform of the League of Nations.

There is naturally no occasion for us in Germany to adopt an attitude towards such plans of reform. But it is a matter of importance for us that the idea of regional pacts has in recent years arisen also outside League policy. Especially in this recent period, if I am not mistaken, the catchword of collectivity or collective security has become current for this idea. I will merely point out quite incidentally that for some time the Government of the Soviet Union has made itself the main propagandist of these ideas and in addition has invented for its own particular purposes the further catchword of the indivisibility of peace.

It is easy to see what difficulties would be encountered by an attempt to introduce a collective system of pacts with an obligation of mutual assistance even if this attempt were made, not in the form of universality, but in the form of regional pacts. Such a system of pacts, like the sanctions system of the League of Nations, would also fail in case of emergency. If it functioned at all, it would certainly only be in such a manner that other political agreements and interests of the participants, lying outside the alleged aim of the pact, would play the decisive part. Even if it is considered possible that the parties to the pact would in case of emergency neglect all other agreements and interests and keep strictly to the pact, the fact would still remain that this would always act in favour of the stronger party with the stronger military forces, since it would be difficult to imagine an effective protection of weak military parties against superior military parties.

More concrete proof of this may be given by a definite example. For this purpose I will select the plan of a so-called Eastern Pact which was put before us in the summer of 1934. Although the negotiations were at the time carried on confidentially, the draft pact and the other essential details have in the meantime been published. I can therefore refer to it without hesitation, especially as the proposal put forward at that time is now of no importance. But I will leave on one side everything that was not typical for the regional pact idea but was connected with the special political peculiarities of this particular proposal.

The proposal was to the effect that Germany, Poland, the Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia, Finland, Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania should undertake to consult together in case of a crisis, and in case of an attack by one party against another party to support the attacked country. It was also provided that in certain important cases of conflict, France should also take part in the consultation and military support. It will be immediately obvious to what doubts even the selection of these eight, or in certain cases nine, Powers must give rise, when the nature of the political relations existing between them is borne in mind. Moreover, no provision whatever was made as to what would happen if the Powers that had undertaken to support each other were of different opinions as to which of the countries involved in the conflict had been attacked. In such a case, the result would necessarily have been either that the smaller parties would immediately bow to the will of the stronger party, or that opposing groups would be formed within the parties so that there would be war by all against all. Lastly, it could not be overlooked that in so far as such a pact really strengthened the security of certain participants, it would under certain circumstances act to the disfavour of States outside this group—a result which would not be in the interest of general peace.

I am convinced that the same or similar objections would also arise in other cases in which attempts might be made to introduce such a hard and fixed system as an unconditional agreement of mutual assistance for a more or less large group of States. Such projects, in the most favourable case, that is to say if they are really considered as an equal guarantee by all parties, will merely remain on paper and only give an illusory feeling of increased security. But in less favourable cases they will serve to camouflage and strengthen alliances between individual parties to the disadvantage of other parties. Naturally I do not mean that the conclusion of multilateral security pacts which also form a basis of obligations of military guarantee are politically impossible. It is well known that Germany has expressed her willingness to enter into negotiations for the conclusion of a new Western Pact to take the place of the Rhineland Pact of Locarno. It is not possible at present to make a public statement regarding the position of these negotiations, which have for obvious reasons been placed in the background by other more pressing political problems. But it is obvious from the outset that such a pact is only thinkable if, as was essentially the case with the old Rhineland Pact, it is restricted to the settlement of concrete, well defined eventualities, and if the extent of the obligations to be assumed by the various parties is made clear in advance; but on the other hand it is unthinkable if the intention is to apply an abstract scheme of an unlimited obligation of mutual assistance between the participating Powers.

According to all experience inside and outside the League of Nations, it may be taken as a definite law that an effective organisatory combination of States is only possible if it serves exclusively to attain objects which these States all have the same interest in attaining. Abstract ideas of collectivity, the transfer of hard and fast constructions to any problems whatever and to any geographical areas whatever are not only of no use, but they render political progress more difficult. The German Government, recognising this elementary fact, has always been in favour of dealing with every concrete international problem according to the methods suited to that particular problem, not to complicate it unnecessarily by combining it with other problems and, in so far as problems between only two Powers are concerned, to choose the path of direct understanding between those two Powers. We may point out that these political methods have proved their value to the full not only in the interest of Germany but in the general interest. In this connection, I need only refer to the German-Polish agreement of January 1934 or the German-Belgian exchange of notes of the middle of October this year. I state my opinion quite frankly that such agreements are of much greater use in the direction of safeguarding peace that all the proposals that have hitherto been advanced on the basis of the idea of collectivity.

There is one thing that I should like to emphasise in conclusion. Voices are frequently raised abroad which place the unconditional preference for collective security methods on an equality with the will for peace and international cooperation, while at the same time the rejection or even the criticism of such methods is regarded as a lack of desire for peace and cooperation. If the adherents of the idea of collectivity refuse to be converted either by the experience of the last few decades or by a calm consideration of the real political possibilities, they should at any rate refrain from claiming a higher morality and greater good will for themselves. Let them show what tangible results they have obtained with their plans. For myself, I see none. In politics and in peace policy the decisive factor is success, and not merely the setting up of fine objectives which may look tempting but are not realisable in practice and are therefore worthless.

VIII. Flight from Collective Security?

SWITZERLAND AND COMPLETE NEUTRALITY

Declarations by Federal President Motta in the Swiss National Council on 22nd, Decembre 1937

From the interpellation by National Councillor Gut.

Switzerland joined the League of Nations, as the records show, in the expectation that the League would become universal at no distant date. The course of events was the exact opposite. The United States of America never joined; and—what for us is the decisive consideration—of our four neighbours numbering some 150 million people, two great Powers numbering over 100 millions are no longer members. If the provision “rebus sic stantibus” is applicable to our accession to, and continuance in, the League, we have long since been in a position to plead the clause in operation and draw the logical conclusions. We have not taken that step; and the retrograde development of the League has merely proceeded to the accompaniment of a succession of reservations on our part as the circumstances indicated. Our reservations were made in the form of independent declarations of our view of the relation between the Swiss political principle of neutrality and our obligations to the League.

I recall in that connection the declaration made by Federal President Motta in Geneva on October 9th, 1935 on the occasion of the Ethiopian dispute, the decision of the National Council on January 28th, 1936, the declaration of the Federal Council on September 4th, 1936, and our own resolution of March 10th, 1937. These successive statements point the unanimous moral that Switzerland does not mean to depart from the principle and tradition of her century-old, perpetual neutrality, that she reserves the right to interpret and fulfil her obligations under the Covenant of the League within the limits of that neutrality and in the full possession of her sovereignty, and that she cannot recognise any sort of obligation which implies the imposition of sanctions, the nature and effect of which are such as to jeopardise the maintenance of her neutrality.

These statements were plain; they were unilateral: they left the door open to subsequent restatement of our neutrality in future conflicts according to the nature of the case.

The Sixteenth and Seventeenth Assemblies of the League, which dealt with the liquidation of sanctions and the reform of the Covenant, destroyed the last hopes of a rapid modification of that instrument in such a way as to mitigate the danger arising for us in connection with sanctions. Article 16, said the representative of an authoritative great Power, “must not be touched. Economic sanctions must remain obligatory on every member of the League.”

In presence of such a standpoint, when even newspapers of countries which are supporters of the League assert that the withdrawal of the three great Powers has transformed the Geneva institution into the organ of an “axis”, we can no longer refuse to admit the force of the argument already more than once put forward beneath this roof that under present circumstances, when our second great neighbour has formally notified its withdrawal, any form of “differentiation” cannot be other than dangerous and open to misunderstanding, and that everything therefore points to the reassertion of our traditional neutrality.

Numerous utterances in the Press from all parts of Switzerland have been emphatic in this sense; and it is noteworthy in this connection that French and Italian and German Swiss organs are in complete agreement in the matter. The unmistakable efforts of Belgium, Holland and the Scandinavian countries to cut loose from “active” and “relative” neutrality and revert to neutrality plain and simple and “undifferentiated”—which, under present circumstances, is tantamount to saying, freedom from sanction obligations—have not failed to secure the attention which is their due.

Statement by Federal President Motta

Federal President Motta answered Herr Gut's interpellation as follows. He said:

The Federal Council will give as definite an answer to Herr Gut's interpellation as is possible under existing circumstances.

But I must not fail in the first place to thank Herr Gut for submitting his interpellation and arguing it in the admirable speech to which we have just listened. What I have now to say is no personal utterance of my own : it is the fruits of common and unanimous deliberation. I have put it in writing, in view of the extremely delicate nature of the subject, so as avoid the pitfalls that beset the path of improvised utterances.

What you are interested in, what you want to hear from the Federal Council, is what in the opinion of the latter is likely to be the effect on the position of Switzerland in the League of Nations of the decision taken and made public by the Italian Government on December 11th. That decision is, in our opinion, a pregnant one. We do not share the view of those who seek to belittle its significance and seriousness by saying or writing that Italy's withdrawal from the League makes no difference to political realities, and that it does no more than give legal form to a position of fact which has already existed for more than two years. In spite of everything we always hoped that Italy, once her sovereignty over Abyssinia was recognised, directly or indirectly, would no longer refuse to resume her active co-operation with the League, as befitted a country which was among the League's founders. The policy of the Federal Council, as Parliament is aware, has always been guided by the desire to see such a resumption of Italian co-operation realised. Our hopes have been belied by the events. It would be useless to attempt to place responsibilities in the matter; and we resolutely decline to embark on any such attempt.

But what we cannot shut our eyes to is the fact that the League of Nations of the year 1937 can hardly be said any longer to resemble the picture which we had of it in 1920. We entered the League as a result of a highly controversial, but quite definite, decision of the Swiss people. The motive which led to that decision was a noble one and, in my opinion, politically wise. The chief difficulty in the way arose out of our traditional neutrality. We believed at the time that, provided our neutrality was fully assured in the military sense, we could venture to take part in the League, inasmuch as the risk of such participation would be offset by the additional guarantees of security which the new institution would afford us. A further consideration was the circumstance that the Swiss city of Geneva had had the honour to be chosen as the seat of the League.

Our neutrality was laid down by the 435th Article of the Treaty of Versailles and by the London Declaration of February 13th, 1920; and we had every reason to assume that the question was thereby satisfactorily settled. Today we are faced with the urgent duty of enquiry as to whether that settlement meets in every respect the requirements of our security. More than once in recent years we have had reason to doubt whether this was the case. So long as all our neighbours were members of the League, it was justifiable and natural that we should feel assured in these respects. Even the withdrawal of Germany did not arouse direct uneasiness on our part, for the possibility of her return to the League did not seem entirely out of the question. But the withdrawal of yet another of our great neighbours now makes it imperative for us to concern ourselves with this grave issue.

The Federal Council's view is that the Confederation must now proceed without delay to make it clear that we cannot be content with differential neutrality, and that our neutrality must be comprehensive in accordance with our tradition of centuries and with the geographical position and past history of our country.

The Federal Council took the first steps in this sense two years ago in 1935. On October 10th of that year, on the occasion of the armed conflict between Italy and Abyssinia, it informed the Assembly of the League in Geneva through the mouth of the head of the Swiss delegation that Switzerland did not feel bound to apply economic and financial sanctions except in so far as they left her neutrality unaffected. We did not apply the particular sanction which consisted in a complete rupture of commercial relations with Italy. Again, when it was a question of prohibiting the export of arms and war material, we based our prohibition of export of these things to either belligerent on the Hague Convention concerning the rights and duties of neutrals. Our attitude in this connection gave rise to certain criticisms, and led to a certain amount of misunderstanding on the part of some of the members of the League; but we were able nevertheless to carry our point.

A year later, in 1936, the Federal Assembly had occasion to express its views on the policy followed by the Federal Council under the circumstances referred to; and we had the satisfaction of finding that the whole Assembly was at one with us without distinction of parties.

Then came the question of the revision of the League Covenant. Switzerland is a member of the Committee of 28 States appointed for this purpose. In a letter to the Secretary-General of the League dated September 4th, 1936 the Federal Council gave expression to its views on the subject of reform, and took occasion to reassert its views and standpoint in the matter of neutrality.

The Federal Council has never lost sight of the desirability of taking every favourable opportunity to clear up the legal position of Switzerland in the League. When on August 1st last the Federal President broadcast a message to Swiss nationals in foreign countries, he did not omit to point out to them that the general course of political developments had led Switzerland to lay increasing emphasis on her desire for neutrality, even in relation to the League of Nations. I am given to understand that these utterances attracted attention in foreign countries. Here in Switzerland they did not give rise to further discussion, presumably because they synchronised with another speech which I had the honour to make, also on August 1st, in Giornico.

The appropriate moment has now come; and the Federal Council is called upon to act with firmness and calm, without precipitancy or undue haste. Rest assured that we shall do all that is in our power to rise to the occasion. As to the end in view, indeed, there is something in the nature of moral unanimity; but as to the means to the end, as to the proper course to take, opinions differ. The Federal Council asks you in this connection to give it time for ripe consideration. The Political Department proposes, after taking counsel with certain persons who command its confidence, to submit a report in writing to the Federal Council in the course of January next. This departmental report will form the basis of a subsequent report by the Federal Council to the Federal Assembly. The Federal Council will proceed in closest touch with Parliament and public opinion. We observe that a Committee has recently been constituted with a view to a plebiscite for the purpose of embodying the principle of neutrality in the Constitution and defining its legal effect in constitutional form. The Committee, which consists of honourable persons whose patriotism is beyond question, will be well inspired if it leaves the Government a free hand to proceed by means of the ordinary diplomatic machinery and does not intervene to curb or hinder our proceedings. I have good reason for supposing that the Committee in question has already modified its views, and will refrain, at any rate for the present, from giving publicity to expressions of opinion on international policy which could not fail to assume an impassioned character. Public discussions of such a character might do very serious political and moral harm.

No one should think of demanding the withdrawal of Switzerland from the League. We are the country in which the League has its seat. We cannot forget that the aim of the League was to promote peace through justice. I admit that it has only partially fulfilled that aim. But its value as a symbol is not thereby affected, and is beyond criticism at the hands of all impartial observers. International co-operation is one of the necessities of the modern world. The form of such co-operation may be shattered and replaced: the need for such co-operation remains beyond dispute. The peoples long for justice and security. They wish the great Powers would not regard one another as rivals, but would concert their efforts to ensure the happiness of humanity. All States must have a meeting-ground where they can make themselves heard. The function of the small States, especially when they combine in common efforts, is fruitful and beneficent.

It would be distressing to leave in the lurch a field of activity which we have learnt in the past eighteen years to know and appreciate increasingly.

Moreover, we must not create the impression, or give rise to the suspicion, that we desire to follow any particular system of great Powers like planets moving in prescribed orbits. We are neutral, because we desire to be free and independent. The chief value of our neutrality is its function as one of the most precious safeguards of our independence and inviolability.

This neutrality is not at present threatened, and will no doubt not for a long time to come be threatened, as a result of our belonging to the League. In its military aspects it is beyond question. All the States which are signatories of the Versailles Treaty have placed on record their conviction that maintenance of the neutrality of Switzerland is an international obligation essential to the cause of peace.

The League of Nations as it stands can no longer contemplate the possibility of sanctions of an economic character against any party. The system of sanctions is in future unworkable in practice. Article 16 of the Covenant is, as it were, crippled. Without abandoning its interest in the need for collective security, the League of Nations will in future have to seek salvation in other directions. If it desires to revert to the ideal of universality, it will take courage and renounce resort to physical force, in order to become what it truly is and should be, a mighty and beneficent instrument of peaceful co-operation. The renunciation of the resort to force will not prove a source of weakness, but rather a turning-point on the road to rebirth. Those arguments which give rise to irritation will no longer be heard in the council chambers of the League; and their absence will strengthen the force of the appeals which the League may make to do justice and practise moderation.

The League of Nations is exposed, through no will of its own, to the danger of transformation into a coalition opposed to another coalition. It will know how to avoid this misfortune, which could not but prove menacing — and that in a very short space of time. No! Whatever happens, Geneva must not become the seat of a coalition. The Federal Council does not for a moment doubt that Powers like Great Britain and France, supported by the firm resolution of the other States—I have in mind primarily the Netherlands, Belgium, the Scandinavian States, Austria and many others—will be on their guard against allowing the League of Nations to fall into the fatal and unpardonable error of becoming the handmaid of this or that ideology, thereby belying its nature, its raison d'être, its aims and its efforts.

Switzerland will continue in the future, as in the past, to play in the League of Nations a modest, but yet not insignificant, part.

A POLISH VIEW

An Article from the semi-official "Informations politiques polonaises" of December 14th, 1937

The problem of the League has been developing for a number of years past. The forms which that development has assumed of late have been of such a serious nature that it is neither excessive nor exaggerated to speak of a "crisis of the League". This state of things finds its clearest expression in two recent events—the decision of Italy and the German declaration by which it was followed.

Polish policy has made systematic efforts for a long time to prevent the development of the situation in which the League of Nations now inevitably finds itself after the final withdrawal of Italy. Unfortunately, these efforts have not met with the appreciation which they deserved at the hands of the members of the League. Poland, it should be remembered, was the first country to suspend the operation of sanctions against Italy by a decree of the Polish Cabinet dated July 27th, 1936, i.e. some days before the resolution of the Co-ordination Committee. In a statement made on December 18th, 1936 to the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Senate the Polish Foreign Minister stated that the Ethiopian question was closed, so far as Poland was concerned, with the suspension of sanctions. He added that he hoped the next session at Geneva would finally wind up the affair. This was not the case, however; and the Polish Government accordingly instructed its delegate to raise the question officially at the Assembly in May 1937. The representative of the Polish Government there stated that, as the Polish Government was not interested, directly or indirectly, in the part of Africa concerned, their sole concern in the Ethiopian dispute was its bearing on the future of international co-operation within the framework of the League, and the existence of the League should be based on realities. The Polish Government accordingly regarded the Ethiopian question as closed, so far as Poland was concerned.

Press comment in certain countries endeavours to belittle the significance of the Italian decision and the German declaration, suggesting that they are "purely symbolic". We are unable to share that view for two reasons—in the first place, because the Covenant of the League was conceived as the statute of a universal international body and, in the second place, because in spite of the failure to make it universal at any time since its foundation there was nevertheless a moment when the League system at least covered all Europe, so that it was reasonable to suppose that it had an important part to play as a European institution at any rate. That conception may be said, as a result of recent events, to be in process of dissolution: it was already greatly weakened before those events.

Some of the Press comment in question goes on to argue frankly that what the League of Nations should now do is to assume the championship of a certain school of doctrine—and that, not merely in connection with international policy, but also in respect of the internal political structure of States.

If such were ever accepted as the attitude of the States represented on the League, the Geneva institution would become nothing more than the camp of a particular doctrine, which is as much as to say, the camp of one particular party in a "religious war".

The attitude of the Polish Government in this matter is well known. It has been stated in Parliament and through the diplomatic channel. But the circumstances of the present moment are such as to seem to call for its restatement.

Speaking on January 15th, 1936 in the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Polish Diet, the Polish Foreign Minister, Col. Beck, stated that the internal political systems of other countries could not affect the decisions of Polish policy. "It is a sign of the times," he said, "this variety of political systems in different countries, and the general process of political development along the most diverse and sometimes conflicting lines. To look no further, of the six States which are neighbours of Poland, each has adopted a different internal form of government, which it champions in the name of different political doctrines. Each governs itself under a different system and by different methods. If one attempted to direct international policy, and to determine one's political attitude in regard to particular countries, in accordance with the brand of constitutional doctrine they affect, the whole world would be likely to end by finding itself faced with a situation comparable to that prevailing in the period of the wars of religion."

On December 10th, 1936 the Polish Government submitted a memorandum to the Secretariat of the League on the subject of the work proceeding in connection with the reform of the Covenant. In this document the Polish Government drew attention to the fact that the League was created and conceived as an organisation with a universal basis. The Polish Government pointed out that the reality was very far from this ideal, and expressed a fear that under these conditions the labours of the League might become academic and abstract, while at the same time the most serious problems of international life would develop outside the League. Such a state of things, it added, might expose the League to the danger of succumbing to the attempt to turn it into a bloc of States, whose interests might well conflict with those of States not members of the League.

The Polish Government has always been opposed to the idea of a division of the world into two hostile camps. It draws particular attention to this danger, and is of the opinion that it can only be averted by creating conditions favourable to the realisation of the principle of universality.

The Polish Foreign Minister returned to the question in a statement made to the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Senate on December 18th, 1936. Once again he uttered a warning against the danger of the formation of two blocs—one of League members and the other of non-members. "Our aversion," he said, "to being shut up in one or other of two camps which, if they do not openly combat one another, are none the less mutually hostile, is part and parcel of the principles of Poland's foreign policy, and is at the basis of those conceptions in the light of which we turn to a number of important States. The discussion on the Spanish peril has brought the force of this peril to light. I am glad therefore to be able to say that up to the present we have been able, in conjunction with certain other countries, effectively to oppose this tendency."

The force of the standpoint above indicated appears perfectly clear. It is to be interpreted as an expression of the friendly interest we feel in an international institution which makes contacts possible on a very wide basis, and so enables solutions to be sought for questions in dispute by the meeting of representatives of countries holding different views round a conference table. If, however, there were to become apparent a definite tendency in Geneva to engage in the conflict of doctrines, the Polish Government would be compelled to consider carefully whether such a development would not be inconsistent with the fundamental principles of Polish policy, and to determine its future relations with the League of Nations accordingly.

All the Governmental declarations above quoted, as also the line taken by the representatives of Poland at Geneva in connection with particular concrete questions dealt with by the League, show clearly that Polish policy regards the possibilities of restoration of the atmosphere of confidence in Europe as bound up with the respect due to all States as the associates of one another in all international understandings, and no less with the respect due to the right of every nation to model its internal activities according to its own ideas and conceptions.

SWEDEN AND THE LEAGUE

From the Speech of the Swedish Foreign Minister, Hr. Sandler, in Upsala on November 6th, 1937 on the occasion of the 35th anniversary of the "Laboremus" Association in Upsala

Hr. Sandler referred in his speech to the dangers to Swedish security inherent in the present situation, and in particular to the anxieties and uncertainties which have been apparent in the discussions in the newspapers on Sweden's position as a member of the League and her resulting obligations. There is talk, he said, as to its not being clear whether Sweden is pursuing under present circumstances a League of Nations policy or a policy of neutrality; and it is said, we ought to come to a definite decision as to which we mean to pursue. Those responsible for our foreign policy are reproached for the deplorably passive attitude they are said to adopt, without any clear conception of the obligations incumbent on Sweden as a member of the League.

In all this discussion of Sweden and the League the question of what Sweden's security stands to gain as a result of membership of the League is relegated to the background. The discussion turns entirely on the importance and the greater or lesser degree of menace attaching to the dangers involved. It is unquestionably true that the general political situation is quite different from what it was at the time of the Locarno Pact, which was the point de départ and the justification of the Swedish disarmament programme. But the moral of the changed situation has already been drawn; and the results are apparent in the reorganisation of the Swedish defence forces. There will, I think, be substantial agreement in all quarters of our country as to the impossibility, in an age of aggression, of replacing our own defence resources by reliance on international obligations and international solidarity. But closer consideration reveals the existence of other factors in the problem. The position is not the same in all our neighbours' countries. The dangers inherent in our League obligations, which loom so large, are offset by the consideration that Sweden herself is exposed to relatively small risks; that is to say, the risk of a direct aggression against Sweden is not large. The real danger, it is said, is of our country being involved in a conflict which does not in any way affect in its origins either Sweden or Swedish interests. Hence the argument that membership of the League threatens to involve us in such disputes.

That argument implies that Sweden is exposing herself to dangers which she would not otherwise encounter, for the benefit of the general security and without increasing her own security. If that were so, it would be plain indeed that we ought to advocate withdrawal of our country from the League. But the fact that there are only very few who advocate this extreme view in itself suggests that the public is apprehensive of the consequences of such a step and uncertain as to the correctness of this view. The problem of Swedish security is by no means confined to the estimate of the dangers of direct aggression. Hence the inclination to attach indirect security value to the maintenance of the League organisation even in the case of countries least exposed to danger, so long as the international community is credited with the slightest ability to avert conflicts in this continent, or at any rate to evade or mitigate them.

As to the membership of the League itself, I have nothing to add to the Statement of Reasons which the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Riksdag issued in May against leaving the League. The Statement of Reasons said:

"The present international position does not, in the opinion of the Committee, constitute a reason for our country leaving the League. If Sweden were to take such a step alone, the effect might be to place the country in a position of anything but desirable isolation, which might be interpreted as indicating a change in our foreign policy. If on the other hand a number of small States left the League together, there would be a danger that such a reduction in the membership of the League would have the effect of converting the latter into a bloc of States in the nature of an alliance. Such a development would enormously strengthen the opposition between the different groups of Powers, and would intensify the existing tension in Europe—which in turn might diminish the security of the States which left the League. The Committee is of opinion that it is in the general interest to try and uphold the League, so as to enable it to carry on the important work of international co-operation on which it is engaged in various connections."

But the chief point of the discussions in the Press is not the membership itself so much as the question of our attitude in regard to the obligations arising out of membership: in which connection the sanction obligations under Article 16 of the Covenant are naturally given prominence. Here again the programme of the Swedish Government will be found embodied in the Statement of Reasons of the Foreign Affairs Committee.

The Statement of Reasons reproduces, and explicitly endorses, the declaration published in Geneva on July 1st, 1936 by the Foreign Ministers of seven States, of which Sweden was one, and in particular the following passage:

"We recall that directives for the application of Article 16 were agreed upon in 1921, and declare that, so long as the Covenant of the League as a whole is applied only in any incomplete and inconsistent manner, we are obliged to take the fact into consideration in connection with the application of this Article."

It is added, with an expression of the approval of the Committee, that the Swedish Government attached the Statement of Reasons to an official communication to the League of Nations on the application of the principles of the Covenant in August 1936. The Committee goes on to point out that the position of the bigger Powers differs from that of the smaller Powers appreciably in more respects than one, in so far as the assumption of risks in connection with the measures contemplated in Article 16 is concerned. The Committee considers it desirable that the Swedish Government should take steps, in conjunction with the Governments of those States with which we are closely associated, to promote within the League of Nations a modification of the provisions of Article 16 in accordance with the standpoint of the smaller States and in the sense of the Statement of Reasons. "The continued discussion of the question of the application of the Covenant and the possibility of its revision within the League will," the Committee adds, "no doubt afford opportunity for the Government to indicate its attitude in the matter before the competent organ of the League concerned."

All this is known to the public, or ought to be. But the question then arises, and has been the subject of discussion, whether—given the programme I have described—anything is being done to carry it out or to secure recognition for the points which it embodies. I may say that the anxiety now expressed in regard to our alleged "purely passive attitude" closely resembles the emphatic apprehensions formerly apparent in certain organs of the Press in regard to the "excessive activities" and "too frequent journeys" of the Foreign Minister!

The apprehensions to which the present situation is liable to give rise in the case of a country like Sweden derive partly from the legal misgivings which the present uncertainty as to the precise scope of our obligations is apt to arouse, and partly from the political misgivings occasioned by the grouping of the Powers in and outside the League.

I myself attach by far the greater weight to the political misgivings to which I have referred. The real danger, as I see it, is of the League developing into a system of alliances directly opposed to the States outside the League. It should however be remembered in this connection that the United States will not allow themselves to be included in any such grouping, and that there are powerful forces within the League which are perfectly alive to the necessity of preventing any such development. So far as we ourselves are concerned, the best and only effective safeguard against this danger is for Sweden to pursue an independent policy of her own in concert with the other States not tied by alliances, and to avoid any identification of our interests with those of any particular group of great Powers.

As regards the legal misgivings, there is an error current which it is necessary to remove. It is not the case that the Covenant of the League gives certain Powers any claim against us which they can put forward, as occasion arises, in the matter of the application of sanctions. The Covenant is a collective instrument; and no one of the sovereign members of the League more than any other has the right to assert a particular legal interpretation of that instrument. Any such claim must be based on the Covenant itself, and not on interests which have nothing to do with the League; and, as such, it can only be put forward by the organs of the whole body, viz. the Council or Assembly, and in both these cases our country has the power of putting its view. The system of application of Article 16, as proclaimed in the directives of 1921 and as tried for the first and only time in connection with the sanctions experiment in the case of Abyssinia, has been shown by experience in that case to be such as to enable individual States to protect their vital interests. The very idea of penalties for a member of the League for defective application of Article 16 is fantastic at a time when the whole Article is being treated as if it did not exist in presence of the gravest violations of the provisions of the Covenant. The States against which the Geneva declaration of 1936 was directed could indeed with good reason answer that a law, which does not apply to all and on every occasion, has ceased for the time being to be a law.

There is another important distinction to be made in this connection. On the one hand there is the question of the attitude which is made necessary by the weakness of the League and the notorious absence of consistency in the application of the Covenant. It is quite another question what ultimate interpretations of this or that provision of the Covenant will be practicable and effective over an unlimited future. We do not know how long the present period will last, or what will come after it. We simply cannot say what sort of a League there will be in five years, or ten years, from now. A certain reserve is therefore indicated in connection with any proposed change in the League's constitution. Under present circumstances the general position is such as to render suspect any and every application of Article 16. That is indeed the present position de facto. Neither the Spanish War nor the War in the Far East have so far led to any application of the provisions of the Covenant.

When the question of Sweden's entry to the League was under discussion in this country, the principal point of discussion was what changes such a step would involve in our traditional policy of neutrality. The application of Article 16 with its military sanctions, its economic sanctions and the right of passage across our territory were felt to be departures from the old system of neutrality. The present is a favourable moment to put forward once again the consideration of those rules by which the Northern and neutral nations would have the League direct its activities—at the time when we joined the League these rules were never able to obtain an altogether satisfactory hearing—and so to revert on one important point to the old policy of neutrality. The point I have in mind, now as in the discussion in Parliament, is the special point of the right of passage across our territory.

For my own part I am convinced that the sovereign right of States to allow or refuse passage across their territory has such strong support on the part of the members of the League that it is possible to proceed forthwith to an interpretation of the provision of the Covenant concerned. An interpretation of this particular provision would eliminate that deviation from our former neutrality policy which weighs heaviest in the balance after the military sanctions. Concrete achievement is here possible without adversely affecting the future potentialities of the League's development. I would ask those who are not content with this, and want a reversion to "absolute" neutrality, to begin by trying to determine exactly what sort of neutrality they want. Is it Swedish neutrality, or neutrality of the Northern Powers? That is a question which everyone who speaks of "indivisible Northern peace" has to answer. Is it to be a neo-American "cash and carry" neutrality, or the maintenance of the neutral economic rights of the pre-war period? Words solve no problems; and catch-words are no sort of intelligent way of approach to the problem.

I will sum up.

The attitude of Sweden in relation to the League, was discussed in May last in the Riksdag. By the acceptance of the Statement of Reasons of the Foreign Affairs Committee by Government and Parliament alike, the authorities responsible for the governance of the country approved certain general rules of guidance in the matter of membership itself and the obligations resulting therefrom. Those rules will be observed.

The manner of their observance was also indicated in the course of the debate in Parliament. Discussions will take place within the framework of the League, with the co-operation of all the States free of alliances, in connection with the question now under consideration of the applicability of the Covenant and the possibilities of its revision. Nothing has happened since the debate in Parliament to suggest any departure from the programme then adopted.

Sweden has done everything in her power to secure rapid handling of the whole body of questions. We are prepared, as soon as the work is seriously begun, to put our views as publicly stated and approved by the country.

We cannot ignore the possibility of the whole process of clearing up the position in the League being postponed, or of our views not getting a proper hearing. Should that be so, it does not mean that we recognise the existence of claims under the League Covenant, since in such a case it is clear that the conditions precedent to its general application are not present.

The reservations made by virtue of our adhesion to the Geneva declaration of the alliance-free Powers of July 1936, our letter to the Secretary-General of the League of August 1936, and the attitude taken up by the Swedish Government and Parliament in May 1937 will be maintained.

The maintenance of our attitude depends lastly on our own resolution to stand by it, and on the resources on which any independent policy on the part of Sweden must be based.

That means that the application of the directives for the assertion of our country's position as a member of the League must go hand in hand with a policy of preparedness and appreciation of the necessity of the assertion, in opposition (it may be) to the views of other Powers, of that freedom of action and independence of judgment which the uncertainty of the situation and the vital interests of Sweden demand.

The first steps towards such a policy of preparedness have already been taken, and further steps will follow. Such a policy includes, over and above the fulfilment of the defence resolution, the action to be taken in connection with the neutrality of the Northern Powers and the supply of commodities to all the Northern countries, and lastly measures for the uninterrupted provision of certain articles currently required.

The strengthening of our resources for the maintenance of an independent and neutral policy in relation to the contentious and changeable interests of the great Powers is under present circumstances, in my opinion, the more important of our two tasks. Respect for our right to draw our own conclusions from the current weakness of the League will not diminish, but increase, our prospects of positive political action within the League in an intermediary capacity, should the openings for such action be greater in the future than they are at present.

It was to be expected that the German-Italian step would exercise a lasting effect on those States Members of the League of Nations who are anxious to maintain their independence against the Great Powers.

In the first place the former neutrals.

After the League of Nations had become a guarantor of Versailles, the Allies had every interest in bringing all the neutrals into the League as soon as possible, and this for two reasons. In the first place it was desired from the outset to reduce the possibility that the neutrals should in any way take the part of the vanquished. In the second place the neutrals were needed in order that, by their indirect participation, the dictated Peace of Versailles should appear to them and to the vanquished as an order of things approved by the public opinion of the whole world. In this manner it was worth while to couple the dictated Peace with the League Covenant. Anyone who sat at the table of the League also sat indirectly at the table of Versailles. He could be made to take part morally and in his own interest in the status quo established at Versailles.

The participation of the neutrals was naturally not to the advantage of the real League idea under the Versailles conditions. From the ideal point of view they would naturally have given it a clearer imprint. In view of the natural reasons bound up with their own existence and the greater impartiality implied by their neutrality, they were necessarily interested in a real League of Nations and a real peace. The victors were aware of this, and therefore endeavoured from the outset to make cross-connections between the dictated Peace and the neutrals. This was also the reason why the League Covenant was made an integral part of the Versailles Treaty, although this combination was a blow to the idea of neutrality. But there were many other cross-connections, by which the neutrals were caused to be interested in and bound by Versailles. The question of the International Labour Organisation was incorporated as Part XIII of the Versailles Treaty; the neutrals were admitted to the Mandates Commission in order to compel them to give moral and legal support to the seizure of the German Colonies. They were placed in the Commissions of internationalised German rivers. The League was made in as many cases as possible the arbitrator, guarantor or court of appeal for certain articles of the dictated Peace. Neutrals were intentionally allowed to take part in the administration of German territories placed under the League of Nations.

In short, care was taken that the League of Nations, and thereby the neutrals, became executory organs for the provisions of Versailles.

But it was also desired that the tension which still remained and the enormous political, moral and spiritual pressure created by the peace dictates should be transferred to the neutrals. The League Powers therefore endeavoured as far as possible to undermine the conception of neutrality legally, politically and morally. Hence the desire of France to bring about an international system of sanctions; hence England's desire that all wars should be League wars. In this manner the neutrals and the small Powers must help to bear pressure entirely unconnected with their interests. They were lured with the fiction of real and permanent protection and a complete guarantee of their existence. In reality they were made guarantors of the discord and violence of Versailles. Thus they had to keep aloof from Germany and to regard with distrust any German attempts to escape from the most oppressive of the dictates of Versailles. For, in view of the Geneva joint responsibility, they might be involved at any moment in the fight for one or another of the provisions of Versailles, and in certain cases in sanctions of all kinds against Germany. But when they honestly called for a better League of Nations or openly favoured an impartial settlement of a dispute—for instance in questions of minorities—they had had to keep silent so long and so often when the League idea had been falsified and law and reason had been violated, that they could not make their voice heard. The same applied to the so-called b o r d e r S t a t e s. With the foundation of the League of Nations, all these States have forfeited the right to safeguard and defend their own interests with suitable means and have had to give up the protection afforded by neutrality under international law without acquiring any really reliable fresh support.

They suffered from the fiction of equality exactly in the same way as the vanquished. Their equality and equal rights really existed only on paper. In practice, they were compelled to join one or other group of Powers. For all these reasons the Versailles League of Nations could not be what they had expected.

This became obvious to them in the s a n c t i o n i s t war against Italy. While the three colonial Powers, Italy, England and France had to defend a direct interest, the smaller and medium-sized States, when approached with a view to sanctions, had to ask themselves how the matter concerned them. It was indifferent to them what happened four thousand miles away in the heart of Africa. Some of them had no special interests either in the Mediterranean or in Africa; but on the other hand they were dependent upon freedom of trade. Many had to consider what the economic consequences would be if they joined the anti-Italian front without having any direct conflict of interests with Italy. What nevertheless impelled them to add their quota to the crusade of the League of Nations was in the first place the hope that the League would do its duty without regard to person or subject and would at some time become a protector and guarantor for themselves. As on the other hand certain Great Powers either appealed to their idealism or left them no choice but to cooperate, they were justified in expecting that they would not be disappointed. For this was to be the first test case, a lesson and example as a result of which the authority of the League would be ultimately established over all nations and the Geneva machinery would function in future cases.

So the small and medium-sized States came to the Geneva battle ground, received their instructions and moved forward to the line of siege, while a stubborn struggle was taking place behind the scenes between England and France; the shadow of the Bafana agreement of January 7th, 1935 always stood behind France, so that she was unwilling to enter the sanctionist front. But the thorn of exasperation entered the flesh of the Italian people, while the Negus was filled with vain hopes.

When, after the imposition of economic and financial sanctions, the military question of oil sanctions was raised and the Geneva League was to be converted into a war machine, it ultimately appeared that, despite all the provisions of the Covenant, the individual Powers were no longer prepared for the sake of maintaining a principle to engage their countries and peoples beyond the limits prescribed by their own interests.

The final result was inevitable. With the ultimate victory of Italy, the sanctions front crumbled and then collapsed.

After these experiences it was difficult to assume that the States which were not directly concerned would a second time hasten to the League standards, and it is natural that many of these States are again taking refuge in neutrality or are at any rate reserving the right and freedom to refuse to take part in sanctions of any kind. The former neutrals (Switzerland, Holland, Spain, Sweden, Norway, Denmark and Finland) did this in the famous declaration of July 1st, 1936 mentioned by the Swedish Foreign Minister, M. Sandler, in his speech. In the meantime this tendency has been further strengthened in some cases in view of the fresh tension in the Mediterranean and in the Pacific. Belgium has followed them, and Poland has taken advantage of the German-Italian step to express clearly her intermediate position between the camp of the League adherents and that of the League opponents. In Yugoslavia the discussion in the Finance Committee on the budget of the Foreign Ministry on December 27th showed that, as the deputy Kostrenchitch stated: "We must be convinced that the League of Nations, as a universal institute for the organisation of world peace, has entirely collapsed, is at present in a state of complete ideological and organisatory dissolution, and no longer offers any security whatever to its members." Similar opinions are heard from Hungary, where in particular the helpless minority policy of the League strengthens the opposition.

In any case, in spite of an attitude of reserve still maintained in some quarters, the neutrality aspirations of League Members situated "between the fronts" have been greatly encouraged. And though these aspirations do not yet take the form of complete alienation from the Geneva League, they nevertheless result in a more decisive rejection of the obligations of Article 16 of the Covenant and thereby in the beginning of a flight from the system of collective security.

THE CIVIL WAR IN SPAIN

The Spanish fronts—especially the diplomatic and political fronts—after the warlike atmosphere in the summer and autumn of 1937 became calmer towards the end of the year. We have therefore complied with various suggestions and wishes expressed by our readers that we should give as complete an account as possible of the events up to date of this diplomatic and political struggle, which has mainly taken place round the table of the Non-Intervention Committee in London. In view of the voluminous documentation and the mass of other important material, we have been compelled by pressure on our space to refrain from reproducing texts and have had to confine ourselves to a chronological report of the main events, in which we have reproduced the most important material either verbatim or in report form.

The Spanish civil war and the policy of non-intervention adopted towards it by the European Powers have raised a large number of legal and political problems, to which the jurists and politicians will no doubt still have to devote their attention. The object of this non-intervention policy is to localise not an international war but a civil war. It implies the self-defence of the Powers against the dangers of European complications. To that extent the system of control which it involves is something new; it is an international police action which has never previously been taken or put into effect on this scale. The Spanish example is therefore extremely instructive and as important for the future as for the immediate present. It is true that in this case it relates to a civil war which is solely the business of the country concerned. But in the internal Spanish conflict, so many immense problems of a political and ideological nature have come to light that other nations have felt themselves to be affected. To his extent there was a danger to peace. That danger was at first averted by the policy of non-intervention, the formation of a practical organisation which, however inadequately and unsatisfactorily it has functioned, was nevertheless the means of preserving Europe from the danger of sparks from the conflagration.

But if we consider the question as to why and for what reasons this policy of non-intervention did not give the entire result expected of it—namely to put an end to this unhappy fratricidal struggle as soon as possible and thus to remove an obstacle from the path of a new, positive and useful work of European reconstruction—and why this policy was, on the contrary, on several occasions on the point of collapsing and could only be saved with difficulty, the course of this policy up to the present has facilitated a reply to this question.

From the beginning of the civil war there were on the one side Powers who could not regard General Franco's struggle merely as a revolt against a legal State authority but who saw in the action of the nationalists the way in which this part of the old European continent could be preserved from the fate of becoming a province of world Bolshevism. That the Soviet Union, on the other hand, regarded the red Spanish Government as a pacemaker for its own ideas and from the outset supported it to the greatest possible extent, was only to be expected. In addition, other Powers, on account of certain sympathies or other political considerations, did not disguise the fact that the victory of Franco's movement was undesirable or at any rate inconvenient to them. Hence their adherence to the view that first Madrid, then Valencia, and now Barcelona represents the legal Government, while Franco, though controlling three-fifths of the entire country, is nothing more than a rebel and insurgent. The taking of sides for an ideology, especially in France, in view of the open sympathies felt for Red Spain by the Popular Front under the influence of the Second and Third International, constantly exercises pressure on responsible Government circles with a view not only to making non-intervention more elastic in favour of Red Spain, but of sacrificing it wherever possible and thus opening the barriers for the unhindered transport of arms and men; this tendency has subsequently been strengthened by considerations of naval strategy, since it is difficult to accept the idea that Franco's troops represent a nationalist rejuvenated army which is aware of its own strength and is capable of leading Spain to victory, thus affecting the sea connections between France and her North African colonies. Similarly, the attitude of the United Kingdom has developed from the ideological views of liberal and labour circles to the naval considerations of the Government brought about by the tension with Italy. At the present time therefore we find the internal events of the civil war more and more overshadowed by the anxiety of the Great Powers to maintain European equilibrium, so that unfortunately in the case of the two western Powers full consideration is not given to the Power that has been proved to be the originator of this civil war and to its admitted aim of making Spain a branch of Moscow and a jumping-off place for the further bolshevisation of Europe.

This mentality is also the cause of the numerous serious attempts at disturbance which—in spite of the repeated assurances from Germany and Italy—always culminated in assertions that these two Powers intended to misuse the Spanish troubles for egoistic, imperialistic and even territorial aims, such as intentions on Spanish Morocco or the possession of the Balearic Islands. These alarmist rumours were generally set on foot when Germany and Italy repeated their attempts by all the means in their power to check the sabotage of the non-intervention policy which took place behind the scenes and, in respect of sea and land control, while maintaining absolute parity, to introduce more powerful and effective safeguards in the part of the control plan which had proved ineffective or even dangerous, in order by means of more comprehensive supervision, to give full effect to the idea of non-intervention and thus to the localisation of the civil war.

These attempts, which were ultimately concentrated on the two central points of the non-intervention policy—the question of volunteers and the cognate question of the grant of belligerent rights to both parties—in the solution of which the non-interventionist States were to place their entire relationship to Spanish events on the basis of neutrality under international law, met with the greatest resistance from the Soviet Union. In view of the hesitant attitude of France and England, the Soviet Union succeeded not only in constantly sabotaging the efforts of the London Committee but also, by means of its diplomatic counter-blasts in torpedoing the cooperation of the four naval control Powers.

Spain for the Spaniards! This is the watchword that guided the German-Italian proposals which, by their logic and realism, showed the way in which the aim of the policy of non-intervention could be successfully reached. It was not and is not Germany or Italy that tried to destroy the European equilibrium in Spain or elsewhere; but they did not wish it to be destroyed by the Soviets more than it has already been destroyed by the Franco-Russian alliance and by the penetration into the Mediterranean which resulted from the Straits Agreement of Montreux. Consequently, a Spain rising out of the victory over communism is in the highest sense a European affair, after which the great Powers can and should find the way to each other undisturbed by the influence of Moscow.

OF THE EVENTS OF THE SPANISH CIVIL WAR AND THEIR EFFECTS ON INTERNATIONAL POLICY

1936

July

13. Murder of the leader of the national movement, Calvo Sotelo, by political adversaries in Madrid.
15. Withdrawal of Spanish parties of the Right from Parliament.
17. Outbreak of disturbances in Spain. Extension of a military rising, starting from Spanish Morocco, under General Franco.
24. Formation of a Spanish National Government at Burgos.
31. Speech by the French Foreign Minister, M. Delbos, to the effect that France would remain neutral in the Spanish civil war. Denial that arms are supplied by France to Madrid.

August

1. French Government's appeal to the British and Italian Governments to conclude an agreement on non-intervention in Spain.
4. Affirmative reply from the British Government, with a suggestion to include Germany and Portugal.
5. The French Government suggests the inclusion of the Soviet Union and requests the Soviet Government, through the French representative in Moscow, to accept the proposed agreement.
6. Affirmative reply from Italy with an inquiry whether moral solidarity with one of the parties to the Spanish civil war is not in itself a form of intervention, whether the obligation of non-intervention is to bind private persons and whether measures are to be contemplated for controlling the observance of this obligation.
6. Affirmative reply of the Soviet Union with a request for the inclusion of Portugal and the cessation of any support granted to the nationalists.
7. The French Government transmits to the Governments of the United Kingdom, Italy, Germany, the Soviet Union and Portugal a draft Non-Intervention Agreement on an embargo on the delivery of arms, ammunition and war material, including aeroplanes and warships.
8. Decision of the French Council of Ministers to stop the export of arms, ammunition and war material to Spain.
11. Declaration of the Spanish National Government at Burgos on the false rumours of an agreement for the grant of concessions to Germany and Italy in Spanish Morocco.
13. Broadcast appeal of the Madrid Government to the democratic Powers not to remain neutral, but to support the "legal" Government.
13. Conference of the French trades unions with the Socialist and Communist Parties on measures to be taken to support the Madrid Government.
14. Affirmative reply from Portugal regarding the proposed Non-Intervention Committee, with a request for the inclusion of the Soviet Union and for French and British support in case of the spread of Communism to Portugal.
14. Communication from the French Government to the Italian Government that the proposed Non-

August

- Intervention Agreement should also be extended to a prohibition of the participation of foreign volunteers.
15. Franco-British agreement on the text of the French proposals for preventing the export of arms, and its communication to the Governments of Germany, Italy, Portugal and the Soviet Union for their assent.
 17. Affirmative reply from the German Government. Willingness in principle to accede to the Non-Intervention Agreement on condition that all States producing war materials equally undertake that the embargo also covers supplies from private persons and that measures are taken immediately to prohibit the departure of volunteers.
 17. British merchant ships are authorised by the British Government to reply to attacks made on them in the Mediterranean.
 19. The United Kingdom decrees a complete prohibition of the export of arms to Spain.
 19. The German refugee ship "Kamerun" is fired on and searched by red Spanish warships.
 20. Sharp protest by the German Government stating that in future all measures will be taken against such acts which are contrary to international law.
 20. Brazil breaks off diplomatic relations with Spain.
 21. Italy's agreement to the draft Non-Intervention Agreement subject to the settlement of questions of detail.
 21. Portuguese Government's reply with the following reservations: guarantee for the national security of Portugal, mediatory action with the parties to the civil war, defence of European culture against a subversive form of the State in Spain, prohibition on indirect intervention, effective control measures, prohibition of the use of poison gas by the parties to the civil war.
 22. Note from the British Government to the Madrid Government that a blockade on the Spanish coasts cannot be recognised in the absence of a state of war.
 23. Agreement of the Soviet Union to the draft Non-Intervention Agreement.
 24. The arms embargo is put into force by the German Government with immediate effect.
 25. Note from the British Government to the Spanish National Government warning it against attacks on British shipping.
 26. French Government's proposal to convene and set up a Committee of Control.
 27. Note from the American Government to the Madrid Government that it cannot recognise a blockade of the Spanish coast, but maintains the principle of the freedom of the seas.
 27. British Government's proposal to set up a Non-Intervention Committee.
 27. General Franco is appointed Commander-in-Chief of the Spanish national forces.
 28. Italian and Soviet Russian arm embargoes are imposed.

September

1. Mexico considers herself entitled to continue supplying arms and ammunition to the Madrid Government.
5. The Madrid Government declines the request of the diplomatic corps to humanise warfare.
9. First meeting of the Non-Intervention Committee. England, France, Germany, Italy, Portugal, the Soviet Union and 21 other States took part. A sub-committee of the Non-Intervention Committee was formed to supervise the execution of the Non-Intervention Agreement. This sub-committee consisted of representatives of France, England, Germany, Italy, Portugal, the Soviet Union, Belgium, Czechoslovakia and Sweden.
23. Uruguay breaks off diplomatic relations with Madrid.
25. Speech by del Vayo, Foreign Minister of the Madrid Government, in the League Assembly, describing non-intervention as a legal monstrosity since it places the "legal" Spanish Government on the same footing as the "rebels".

October

- 6 and 7. Soviet Russian note to the Non-Intervention Committee on an alleged breach of the Non-Intervention Agreement by Portugal, Italy and Germany.
7. The Spanish National Government is taken over by General Franco.
9. The Non-Intervention Committee transmits the Red Spanish and Soviet Russian complaints to Germany, Italy and Portugal.
12. Further Soviet Russian note to Lord Plymouth, Chairman of the Non-Intervention Committee demanding supervision of the Portuguese ports by British and French ships in order to prevent alleged deliveries of arms through Portuguese ports.
15. Negative reply by Lord Plymouth on account of the lack of proof of the alleged breach of the agreement by Portugal.
20. British action at Madrid and Burgos in favour of the exchange of hostages.
21. German note to the Non-Intervention Committee repudiating the Soviet Russian accusations and proving the breach of the agreement by the Soviet Union.
23. Portugal breaks off diplomatic relations with Madrid.
25. Statement by Count Ciano, Italian Foreign Minister on his negotiations in Berlin and Berchtesgaden: "We also discussed the position of Spain and it was agreed that the national Government of General Franco is supported by the firm determination of the Spanish nation in the greatest part of the territory where it has succeeded in restoring order and civil discipline as opposed to the anarchic conditions which had reigned there. At the same time we reaffirmed the principle of non-intervention in Spanish affairs and again confirmed the maintenance of the international obligations entered into in this respect. It is unnecessary to add that we were of one opinion that Germany and Italy have no other desire than that Spain—in her absolute national and colonial integrity—should soon again resume the position in the life of the nations which is her due."
26. Rejection of the British proposals for an exchange of hostages by the Madrid Government.

28. Finding of the sub-committee of the Non-Intervention Committee that the agreement had not been broken by Italy and Portugal.
29. Debate on Spain in the British House of Commons. Mr. Eden summarised the development of non-intervention policy since the beginning of the Spanish civil war. In particular he met the charge that the non-intervention policy acted one-sidedly against the Madrid Government. He gave a warning that all the reports of alleged breaches of the agreement should not be believed. As an example he mentioned the charges of the Soviet Union—the main source of complaints of the non-intervention policy—against Portugal all of which had proved baseless. The opposition must not be more Soviet than the Soviets. The non-intervention policy was a safety curtain, and the only one that the Government could at present apply.

November

9. Transfer of the red Spanish Government from Madrid to Valencia.
12. Acceptance in principle of a plan of control for the arms embargo by the Non-Intervention Committee.
13. A decree by Franco's Spanish National Government that all laws and decrees issued by the red Spanish Government since July 18th are invalid.
17. Declaration of the Spanish National Government regarding Russian supplies of arms to Barcelona.
18. Recognition of the Franco Government by Italy and Germany.
19. Speech by Mr. Eden in the House of Commons. The British Government does not recognise the two Spanish parties as belligerents. Statement that, as regards the keeping of the obligation of non-intervention, other Governments are more to blame than Germany and Italy.
20. Mr. Eden's speech at Leamington. England's duty in the Spanish civil war is to prevent its spread beyond the frontiers of Spain. This has hitherto been successful in spite of the fact that the Non-Intervention Agreement has not been strictly kept.
21. General Faupel (retired) appointed German chargé d'affaires to the Franco Government. Letters of credit handed over on November 29th.
27. Note from the Valencia Government to the League of Nations. Appeal to Article 11 of the Covenant on account of the recognition of the Franco Government by Italy and Germany.

December

- 1 and 3. The British Bill on the arms embargo to Spain accepted by both Houses of Parliament. In the House of Commons, Mr. Eden dealt with the accusations made by the opposition regarding the alleged pro-Franco policy of the Government. In the first place he said it was the practice in civil wars to recognise belligerent rights. Contrary to previous practice, England had not done this, but had pursued a policy of non-intervention. Thus she had not favoured Franco at sea, where he was the stronger. Mr. Eden rejected as baseless the accusations made principally by the Soviet Union against Germany, Italy and Portugal of not keeping the Non-Intervention Agreement. If volunteers came from both sides this was at present not a breach of the agreement in which the question of volunteers had not been settled. But this was not England's fault.

December

2. British proposal to the Non-Intervention Committee to issue a prohibition of the participation of foreign volunteers in military action in Spain.
5. Anglo-French memorandum of December 4th to Germany, Italy, Portugal and the Soviet Union regarding an extension of the agreement and joint mediation in Spain.
7. The sub-committee of the Non-Intervention Committee expresses itself in favour of a prohibition of volunteers to Spain. The German representative, Ambassador von Ribbentrop, recalls in this connection his proposals on the subject on August 17th, likewise also the Italian representative, M. Grandi.
9. Anglo-French statement on the note of December 4th, asking that, in the interest of European peace, no action should be taken which might signify foreign interference in the Spanish conflict.
9. Acceptance by the Non-Intervention Committee of the sub-committee's report on the question of indirect intervention.
9. Reply of the Soviet Government. The Soviet Union does not regard the supply of war material to the "legal" Valencia Government as an act of intervention.
12. Reply from the German Government. Germany refers to her note of August 17th proposing a prohibition of volunteers which was, however, rejected by other Governments.
12. Replies from the Italian and Portuguese Governments, in principle identical.
12. Resolution of the Council of the League of Nations referring to the Anglo-French action, condemning any intervention, and recommending the Powers represented on the Non-Intervention Committee to spare no pains to render the non-intervention undertakings as stringent as possible and to take effective measures for their supervision.
16. Mr. Eden, in reply to a question in the House of Commons regarding the Balearic Islands, said the Italian Government, in reply to a written enquiry of November 12th, had stated verbally that no agreement had been made with General Franco which would result in a change of the status quo in the western Mediterranean.
18. In the debate on Spain in the House of Commons, Mr. Eden again defended the Spanish policy of the Government, which was not dictated by sympathy for either party but was intended to serve the best interests of Europe. The policy of non-intervention, in spite of its insufficiency, had reduced the danger of a European war by restricting the conflict as far as possible within narrow limits.
23. Meeting of the Non-Intervention Committee. The supervision plan for the import of arms by land and sea was to be submitted to the Powers represented in the committee.
24. Anglo-French proposals in Berlin, Rome, Lisbon and Moscow for preventing the influx of volunteers into Spain.
29. Affirmative reply from the Soviet Government.
31. Lord Plymouth, Chairman of the Non-Intervention Committee, transmits the plan for the control of arms imports to the British Foreign Secretary for transmission to the Governments at Burgos and Valencia with a request for their views within ten days.

January

4. The Portuguese Government declares its agreement in principle with the Anglo-French proposals of December 24th, 1936.
6. Unanimous decision of both houses of the American Congress regarding the prohibition of the export of war material to Spain. Put in force on the 8th by the signature of the President.
7. German Government's reply to the Anglo-French proposals of December 24th, 1936. Expression of surprise at the repeated appeal on a question forming the subject of discussion in the committee and repudiation of the impression that Germany and Italy were to blame in the question of volunteers. Further reference to the rejection by England and France of the prohibition of volunteers proposed by both at the outset. Reference to the results of the one-sided encouragement of elements combating the Spanish National Government after the unhindered influx of foreign volunteers for months to Red Spain. Nevertheless willingness to cooperate if all possibilities of direct or indirect intervention in the Spanish conflict are excluded once for all by the removal of all non-Spanish participants, combatants and political agitators and propagandists and by the restoration of the position of August 1936.
7. Reply from the Italian Government identical in principle. Special reference to indirect intervention, including public announcements, financial support and public collection of funds. Criticism of the previous erratic, restricted and biased method in the treatment of the question of non-intervention.
7. Belgian Government's claim on the Madrid Government for compensation for the murder of Baron de Borchgrave in Madrid.
8. Visit of the French Ambassador in London to Mr. Eden. Statement that the French Government has received information regarding the impending landing of German volunteers and German engineers to erect fortifications in the Spanish Morocco zone.
11. Reply from the red Spanish Government to the Belgian note regarding Baron de Borchgrave is considered by Belgium as unsatisfactory. It is decided to send a further protest note.
11. Instructions from the British Government to its diplomatic representatives in Berlin, Rome, Paris, Lisbon and Moscow explaining the reasons for its action of December 24th, proposing an extension of the plan prepared by the Non-Intervention Committee, noting the general agreement of the five Governments, and requesting the diplomatic representatives to hand in a note of January 9th, proposing that this plan should be speedily examined and making further proposals for an adequate and effective system of control for preventing direct and indirect intervention.
11. On the occasion of the New Year reception of the diplomatic corps in Berlin, statement by the Führer and Chancellor to the French Ambassador, François Poncet, regarding the rumours of alleged landings of German troops etc. in Spanish Morocco.
12. Communiqué by the Havas Agency on the conversation between Hitler and Poncet: At yesterday's diplomatic reception in Berlin Chancellor Hitler assured the French Ambassador that Germany had no intention of infringing the integrity of Spain or Spanish possessions in any form.

January

The French Ambassador gave the assurance on behalf of his Government that France was firmly determined to respect the integrity of Spain within the framework of the existing treaties.

12. Speech by Mr. Eden at the banquet of the International Press Association. He spoke in favour of a free choice of Government in Spain. The Spanish Government would be neither Communist nor Fascist.
13. Affirmative replies from the Portuguese and French Governments to the British suggestions of the 11th and the Note of the 9th January.
15. Affirmative reply from the Soviet Government.
15. Unanimous acceptance by the Chamber of the French Government's proposal for a prohibition of the recruiting and despatch of volunteers. Adopted by the Senate on the 21st by 285 votes with 21 abstentions.
19. Statement by the Mexican President, Cardenas, that Mexico would continue to supply war material to red Spain.
19. Speech by Mr. Eden in the House of Commons. He first pointed out that the danger of the spread of the Spanish civil war had substantially decreased.

"But if any hon. member believes that as the outcome of this civil war in Spain any single foreign Power—or pair of foreign Powers—is going to dominate Spain for a generation, to rule its life, to direct its foreign policies, then I am convinced he is mistaken in his judgement and I would reply to him that of all the possible outcomes of this civil war that is the most unlikely. I will tell the House why.

We should be strongly opposed to any such happening, and I have no doubt that we should not be alone in our opposition, for there would be all the 24,000,000 of Spanish people themselves.

Yet there are British interests in this Spanish conflict and they are twofold. First, that the conflict should not spread beyond the boundaries of Spain; and, second, that the political independence and the territorial integrity of Spain shall be preserved.

More recently we have been engaged in this problem of volunteers, which has raised the whole issue of non-intervention in a still more acute form. It is true that this question of volunteers was not dealt with in the early days of this dispute, and to that extent certain Powers, we must recognize, have a case when they complain that this was not done."

He further admitted that the question of volunteers had not been dealt with in the first few days of the conflict and that in this respect certain Powers had had grounds for complaint. He went on to refer to the Morocco incident of the beginning of January, the investigation of which by British officers and officials had proved the baselessness of the rumours, as had moreover been shown by Adolf Hitler's statement to the French Ambassador in Berlin.

25. Affirmative replies from the German and Italian Governments to the British note of January 9th. Regret that the proposals regarding volunteers in the note of the 7th were not considered.
27. Statement by Mr. Eden in the House of Commons that the officer entrusted with a journey through Spanish Morocco had not observed the presence of any German troops.
28. Final British note stating that a time limit for carrying out the embargo on volunteers was to be fixed immediately after the agreement on the plan of control and that the German-Italian proposals regarding withdrawal of the foreigners fighting in Spain was to be examined.

29. Statement by the Portuguese Government denying press reports regarding an agreement with Germany on Angola. Sharp criticism of the propaganda of certain newspapers.

February

5. In a note to the Non-Intervention Committee, the Soviet Government raises objections to division into zones for supervising the Spanish coasts and demands mixed naval units with the participation of the Russian navy.
9. Note from the Valencia Government offering France and England economic, military and territorial advantages in Spanish Morocco in return for stronger support against Franco. (Disclosed on March 17th by the Government in Salamanca.)
9. Negative replies from the British and French Governments (published on April 11th).
- 10-11. Meeting of the sub-committee of the Non-Intervention Committee. Portugal rejects the proposals for the supervision of her frontiers. Discussion of the Soviet Russian proposals for setting up mixed naval units in the coast control.
15. Communiqué on the meeting of the non-intervention sub-committee, recommending a general prohibition of recruiting and transit of volunteers as from the 20th/21st together with the putting into force of the system of control worked out by the technical advisory sub-committee between March 6th and 7th, 1937.
16. The Non-Intervention Committee approves the decisions of the sub-committee, the representative of Portugal making some reservations. Appointment of an international supervisory office. Germany, France, the United Kingdom and Italy are entrusted with the coast control. The essential feature of this control, which is exercised outside Spanish territorial waters, does not consist in the declaration of a blockade, but the States taking part in the Non-Intervention Committee are to instruct their merchant ships to call at certain ports in order to take supervisory officers on board. The duty of the warships is, however, restricted to seeing that this provision is observed. If they find that the provision has been infringed they are not authorised to search the suspected vessel, but have to write an official statement which is transmitted through their Government to the Non-Intervention Committee.
18. German, Italian and French laws are issued for preventing the participation of foreign volunteers. Prohibition of entry, departure, transit and recruiting.
20. Official declaration by the Portuguese Government in order to clear up errors regarding Portugal's attitude to the question of control.
21. The embargo on volunteers is put into force by the 27 States represented in the Non-Intervention Committee.
- 21 and 24. Statement by Lord Plymouth in the Non-Intervention Committee and by Mr. Eden in the House of Commons regarding an Anglo-Portuguese agreement on the control of the Portuguese-Spanish frontier by British officials.
26. Communiqué on the meeting of the non-intervention sub-committee. Discussion of technical questions regarding naval control. The representatives of the Soviet Union and Portugal state on behalf of their Governments that they will not take part in naval control. This statement is repeated on the same day in the plenary meeting of the Non-Intervention Committee.

March

3. General Faupel, appointed as German Ambassador to the Spanish National Government, hands his letters of credit to General Franco.
3. Note from the Franco Government to the signatories of the Algeciras Act on the smuggling of arms and other machinations on the frontier of French and Spanish Morocco.
5. The dispute between Belgium and the Valencia Government on the Borchgrave case is brought before the Permanent Court of International Justice.
6. In the non-intervention sub-committee the plan of supervision for the Spanish frontiers is adopted; it is adopted on the 8th in the full committee, which then has to deal with the further forms of non-intervention.
- 23 and 25. Meeting of the non-intervention sub-committee and the full committee. On account of Soviet charges against Italy, the Italian Ambassador Grandi refuses to discuss the withdrawal of the volunteers. The German Ambassador von Ribbentrop demands guarantees that the proceedings of the committee should not be used for propaganda purposes and unjustified accusations.

April

1. Protest note from the Valencia Government to London and Paris against the alleged use of Italian regular troops in Spain.
11. Publication of the reply of March 20th from England and France to the Valencia Government's offer of February 9th to grant privileged rights in the Spanish Morocco zone.
12. In a speech at Liverpool Mr. Eden repeats the views that he expressed in the House of Commons on January 19th regarding the probable result of the Spanish civil war.
15. At the meeting of the non-intervention sub-committee, the Soviet Ambassador Maiski takes back the charges made on March 23rd against Italy. The questions of volunteers is referred to a technical sub-committee.
19. International control is put into force.
- 14, 19 and 20. Spanish debate in the House of Commons on questions connected with the blockade of Bilbao. Refusal of belligerent rights, protection of British ships in Spanish waters outside and inside the three-mile limit. Instructions of the British Admiralty. Warning to General Franco. Mr. Eden opposes the demand put forward by the opposition that the Valencia Government should be recognized as a belligerent. Such rights could only be granted to both parties, in accordance with previous practice of which he gives three examples.
- 14, 19 and 20. Franco Government's protest against the continued breaking of the Bilbao blockade by British warships. On the 12th the Prime Minister, Mr. Baldwin, had stated in the House of Commons that, in view of the position at Bilbao, England could not tolerate any interference with her shipping and could not recognise or assume belligerent rights in this question.

27. Destruction of the town of Guernica which was set on fire by red Spaniards (see Mr. Eden's speech in the House of Commons on May 6th, the official finding of the Spanish National Government of May 3rd, and the verbal protest of Ambassador von Ribbentrop to Mr. Eden on May 5th regarding the tendentious reports of the British press alleging that the destruction was caused by German bombing aeroplanes).

May

5. Meeting of the Non-Intervention Committee. Statement that the control plan was fully working on land and at sea as from April 30th. Sharp

May

- repudiation by the Chairman, Lord Plymouth, of tendentious press reports on the proceedings in the committee.
- 5, 7 and 18. Discussions in the non-intervention sub-committee and the full committee on the humanisation of the civil war by the prohibition of the bombardment of open towns and the abandonment of air bombardment.
14. Rejection of a truce by the Spanish National Government.
17. British note to the Powers regarding mediation of a truce.
- 24-26. Attack by red Spanish airmen on the international control ships lying in the harbour of Palma. On the 26th the Italian s.s. "Barletta" is hit, six officers being killed. Italy makes a protest on the 28th in the Non-Intervention Committee.
27. The Foreign Minister of the Valencia Government, Alvarez del Vayo, transmits to the League of Nations a White Book on an alleged Italian expeditionary corps in Spain.
28. Soviet Union's reply to the British note of the 17th, agreeing to the proposal for a truce only in case the Spanish nationalists first lay down their arms.
29. Resolution of the League Council to transmit the Red Spanish complaint to the London non-intervention committee.
29. Bombardment by red Spanish aircraft of the German armoured vessel "Deutschland" acting as control ship in the roads of Ibiza; 31 German seamen were killed and 73 wounded.
30. Statement by the German Government on the bombardment.
31. Bombardment of the fortified Red Spanish port of Almeria by German naval forces as a reprisal for the bombardment of the "Deutschland".
31. Note from the German Government to the Non-Intervention Committee on the bombardment of the "Deutschland" and the bombardment of Almeria, and the decision to refrain from cooperation in the system of control so long as there is no guarantee that such attacks on control ships will not be repeated.
31. Similar decision of the Italian Government.

June

2. British note to Germany, France and Italy on the resumption of a guaranteed naval control.
8. Soviet complaint to the Non-Intervention Committee against the negotiations of the four naval control Powers outside the committee. On the 9th the complaint is declared by the Chairman of the Committee to be groundless.
12. Agreement between the British Foreign Secretary and the Ambassadors of Germany, France and Italy regarding the resumption of guaranteed naval control.
16. German-Italian statement on the basis of the agreement on the question of control. Resumption of cooperation in the Non-Intervention Committee and active participation in coast control.
- 15 and 18. Attempts by red Spanish submarines to torpedo the cruiser "Leipzig".
19. Statement by the Reich Government on these incidents. Meeting in London of the representatives of the four naval control Powers on the basis of the agreement of the 12th.
- 21 and 22. Discussions in London lead to no result, as no agreement can be reached on the German proposal to make an immediate joint naval demonstration. Official London communiqué of June 22nd on the result of the four-Power discussions.

June

23. Discussion in the House of Commons on the bombardment of the "Deutschland" and the attempt to torpedo the "Leipzig". In this connection Mr. Eden states that the rumours that German guns have been placed at Ceuta—opposite Gibraltar—have not been confirmed.
23. Note from the German Government to the Governments represented in the control committee, to the effect that there is no solidarity among the control Powers and that Germany definitely withdraws from the control system.
23. Official Italian statement regarding the definite withdrawal of Italy from the control system.
24. Detailed attitude of the Deutsche Nachrichtenbüro in principle to the note of the 23rd.
25. Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Eden in the House of Commons appreciate Germany's reasons for withdrawal from the control system. They recognise the moderation in the attitude of the Reich Government.

Mr. Chamberlain warns the press, the members of the House and foreign countries to weigh their words carefully before uttering them, and to reflect on the consequences of a hasty and thoughtless remark.

"In the high mountains there are sometimes conditions to be found when an incautions move, or even a sudden loud exclamation, may start an avalanche. That is just the condition in which we are finding ourselves to-day. I believe, although the snow may be perilously poised, it has not yet begun to move, and if we can all exercise caution, patience, and self-restraint we may yet be able so save the peace of Europe."

In the further course of the debate, Mr. Eden defends himself against a sharp attack by Mr. Lloyd George who accuses the Government of cowardice in the exercise of its policy.

"Russia has kept very well in the background. Whereas in fact there is no doubt that war materials, aeroplanes, tanks, and so forth supplied to the Government side in Spain from Russia is very large in quantity. I cannot say how much, but hon. members will find no difficulty in arriving at assumptions on their side.

For the majority of the people of this country the preservation of peace is of some account. Non-gentlemen opposite, and I think the right hon. gentleman himself (Mr. Lloyd George) assume as a matter of course that if non-intervention was abolished it would benefit the Spanish Government.

If non-intervention ceased, is it the view that belligerent rights should be granted? But suppose belligerent rights were granted, how much of these arms would reach the Government in Spain. It is perfectly well known that General Franco is much the stronger on the sea and the exercise of belligerent rights would mean that he would have comparatively little difficulty in intercepting the majority of these supplies of arms going to Spain.

If you do not grant belligerent rights, what is the alternative? Then each country sending arms to Spain has to protect its ships carrying these arms right into Spanish territorial waters, and it does not require very much imagination to see the danger to Europe which must inevitably arise from that. One has to consider these aspects before we abandon the policy of non-intervention, and those who invite us to abandon it must also consider them."

25. Anglo-French decision to propose to the Non-Intervention Committee that they should alone exercise naval control, in order to fill up the gap left by the withdrawal of Germany and Italy.
27. Speech by Adolf Hitler at Würzburg on the "Deutschland" and "Leipzig" incidents and on the consequences for Germany of the failure of the four-Power negotiations.

"National Socialist Germany has only one desire, namely while maintaining her own rights to live at peace and to cooperate in friendship with the whole world. We have however grounds for doubting the effectiveness of certain international pledges or assurances. I have endeavoured in one particular case to test the effectiveness of such international agreements in practice. You are aware that recently Communist Bolshevik criminals treacherously attacked a German ship with bombs, causing us 31 dead and 73 wounded. I therefore decided that we would ourselves give these gentlemen of Valencia without delay the kind of warning which I am convinced is the only one capable of calling such criminals to order and making it clear to them that the time has gone for ever when the German nation could be treated in this way.

It was said that that would be a quite unjustified action. In these modern times, such measures should be entrusted to those institutions which are at present everywhere trying to take the protection of the interests of the nations out of the hands of the individual States and to place it in collective hands.

I gave way to this demand and we returned to the control committee with the desire and sincere hope that such plans would be put into practice.

After our declaration that we would henceforward immediately fire on every approaching red aeroplane and surface vessel, the Bolshevik criminals could no longer make attacks on the surface, and they therefore went below the surface and made four torpedo attacks on the "Leipzig".

We then expected that international solidarity would bring about a collective and joint protection of peace. But, as you have seen, the result was that Committees were to be set up to investigate etc. etc.

All we asked was that the authorities at Valencia should at any rate be shown by means of a joint declaration of all the control Powers concerned that they are no longer dealing with one, but with all Powers. But it was no longer possible to carry out even this modest action. You can therefore see what we Germans would have to expect if we ever placed the fate of the Reich in the hands of such institutions or such agreements.

But the people in London may be convinced that the experience we have gained on this occasion will be a lesson to us which we shall never forget.

From now onward in such cases we shall prefer to take the freedom, independence, honour and security of the nation into our own hands. We are, thank God, today strong enough to be able to protect ourselves.

From these events we have drawn consequences which will have their effect over our entire future. Phrases uttered in parliaments and by statesmen will not deceive us in future. We suffered an attack, we saw the treatment accorded to it, and we are cured for ever.

I did what it was my duty to do. A trial was made and no one in the world can now say that we were maliciously in any way prejudiced against collective agreements.

No! If this collective agreement of June 12th had stood the test, we might have considered whether we could not continue. But after this smallest of agreements proved unworkable in practice, let us take warning, so that we may not suffer a similar disappointment some day in a worse case.

June

Every cat may burn its paw once and every man may once make a mistake, but only fools make the same mistake twice. Neither I nor the German nation are anxious to subject ourselves to the same danger a second time."

29. Germany and Italy in the Non-Intervention Committee oppose the assumption of naval control by England and France alone.

July

2. Counter-proposals by the German and Italian Governments in the Non-Intervention Committee, including the recognition of both parties as belligerents, whereby the entire control procedure would be substantially simplified and facilitated and the gap in the naval control would be filled. Count Grandi gives many examples proving the ineffectiveness of the patrol control. Rejection by the representatives of England, France and the Soviet Union.
7. Note from General Franco to the Non-Intervention Committee claiming recognition as a belligerent.
9. Rejection of the Anglo-French and the German-Italian proposals by the Non-Intervention Committee. The French Ambassador, M. Corbin, threatened that his Government would raise the control on the Pyrenees frontier unless the Portuguese Government cancelled a similar measure which it had taken shortly before on the Spanish-Portuguese frontier. Identical note from the French Government to the Non-Intervention Committee on the 12th. Ambassador von Ribbentrop on the part played by Moscow. Count Grandi points out that Italy is not pursuing territorial or political intentions in Spain, but is aiming at protecting Christian civilisation from the Bolshevik danger. At the suggestion of the Netherlands representative, the British Government is requested to draw up a plan of reconciliation.
12. Statement by Mr. Eden in the House of Commons that there are many precedents of cases where Great Britain has recognised "insurgents" as belligerents.
14. The British plan of reconciliation is submitted to the Powers in the Non-Intervention Committee. The various proposals are as follows:
A. Reconstruction of the system of supervision.
(1) Supervision of traffic entering Spain by sea.
(a) The system of placing observers on ships visiting Spanish ports to be continued. (b) The naval patrol system to be discontinued and replaced by the establishment, with the consent of both parties, of international officers in Spanish ports under proper safeguards. (2) Supervision of traffic entering Spain by land. — B. Further measures for meeting the present situation and for filling certain gaps in the supervision system. (3) With a view to the more effective application of the policy of Non-Intervention, all Governments parties to the Non-Intervention Agreement to recognize the two parties in Spain as possessing a status which justifies them in exercising belligerent rights at sea in accordance with the rules governing such exercises but subject to special conditions. (4) Extension of the system of supervision on sea. (5) The Committee to inform Non-Member Powers of their intention to recognize the belligerent status of the two parties on the above terms, and to invite their cooperation with a view to making the policy of Non-Intervention more effective. (6) Supervision of foreign aircraft which enter Spain under their own power in specified aerodromes in Spain. — C. Withdrawal of foreign Nationals. — D. Execution of above programme. (a) Establishment of officers in Spanish ports, and withdrawal of naval patrol, as soon as possible; (b) Establishment of commissions to make arrangements for and supervise the withdrawal of foreign nationals. (c) Recognition of belligerent rights to become effective when the Non-Intervention Committee place on record their opinion that the arrangements for the withdrawal of foreign nationals are working satisfactorily and that this withdrawal has in fact made substantial progress. — E. Immediate Action by His Majesty's Government to be authorized by the Committee to enter immediately into discussions with the two parties in Spain on the following points:

July

(1) The establishment of officers in Spanish ports.
(2) Withdrawal of foreign volunteers including the establishment of the Commissions in Spain.
(3) The conditions on which belligerent rights are to be granted.

These proposals were published together with a summary of the proposals of the technical sub-committee on the withdrawal of volunteers, which had been prepared several weeks previously but had not yet been discussed and published.

15. Debate in the House of Commons on the plan. Detailed statements by Mr. Eden on the various points.
16. Unanimous adoption of the plan by the Non-Intervention Committee as a basis of discussion. French reservation regarding the order of the points. The questions of control and volunteers should be cleared up before the discussion of the grant of belligerent rights to the parties. The opposite view was taken by the Portuguese representative. The Soviet representative reserved the right to make substantial proposals for amendments.
20. Meeting of the non-intervention sub-committee. Adjournment as no agreement was reached on the differences of opinion regarding the order in which the points should be dealt with.
22. Debate on Spain in the House of Commons. Violent dispute between Mr. Duff Cooper, First Lord of the Admiralty, and the opposition on the protection of refugee ships by the British navy against attack and removal. The opposition demanded such protection in view of the humanitarian tasks of these vessels. (This relates to the evacuation of the town of Santander which was defended by Valencia troops.) Mr. Duff Cooper denied the correctness of this view. He said that it was very difficult to draw a line between humanitarianism and military assistance. While it was easy to say that humanitarianism demanded that we should see that women and children did not suffer, it might be held that action taken in the way of importing food or of diminishing the demand for food by taking away women and children was military assistance. Let us beware of incurring the accusation so often thrown at this country of cant and humbug when we say that it was a monstrous thing to starve women and children.

Let us remember that for 4 ½ years we did every thing is our power to starve the women and children of Germany, and if we had then been approached by the United States or some other great Power with the demand that we should allow foodstuffs to go in to the population, should we have said on humanitarian grounds that we could not refuse so reasonable a request? The Admiralty had taken the definite line from the beginning that they would protect ships flying the British flag on the high seas. When ships went into territorial waters they forfeited the right to British protection in the same way as a British subject when he went into Spain did not expect, if he knew there was a civil war being carried on, to be protected by the British Army.

July

These ships which were chartered by the Basque Government and paid large sums of money to go in and assist the Spanish Government in the war they were carrying on against the insurgents were performing valuable service for the Spanish Government. They were volunteers as much as any of the volunteers from Italy, Germany, Great Britain, and France who were alleged to be fighting on either side. They were taking part in the war, and could they really expect that the British Navy would see them safe to harbour? If the British Navy agreed to that, how could they be sure their commitments would end there? There was only one alternative he could suggest.

Mr. Wedgwood Benn. — "Common humanity."

Mr. Duff Cooper said that was the most useless suggestion he had ever heard. Common humanity in this case would mean firing on a Spanish ship, entering into the war, and risking the lives of British sailors for a cause which not one man in this country outside the Opposition benches thought worth while fighting for.

26. Further meeting of the non-intervention sub-committee to discuss a British questionnaire, an Italian counter-proposal and German proposed amendments to the British plan. The entire plan failed, as the Russian Ambassador Maiski, in spite of his original acceptance, suddenly stated that his Government was not in a position to accord belligerent rights to General Franco, as provided for inter alia in the plan, since this would place the "rebel general" juridically on the same footing as the "legal" Spanish Government. Moreover the Committee was not competent to decide this question.
30. Meeting of the Non-Intervention Committee. The failure of the British plan was noted and the meeting was adjourned for an indefinite period. Ambassador von Ribbentrop sharply criticised the obstructionist policy of the Soviet Union, the only one of the 27 Governments represented in the Committee to state that it was averse to the principles of the plan and to its early discussion.

August

6. Bombardment of British, French and Italian vessels in the Mediterranean by unknown aircraft.
6. Meeting of the non-intervention sub-committee. Renewed adjournment, as the differences of opinion on the British plan were not removed.
24. General Faupel, the first German Ambassador to the Spanish National Government retired for reasons of health.
27. Further meeting of the non-intervention sub-committee. Examination of a technical control report. Request to parties in arrears to pay their committee contributions as the control office would otherwise be unable to work.

September

1. Torpedo fired at the British destroyer "Havoc" on the Spanish Mediterranean coast by an unknown submarine.
6. For this reason, the British and French Governments invited Italy, Germany, Soviet Russia, Yugoslavia, Roumania, Albania, Bulgaria, Greece, Turkey and Egypt to a Mediterranean Conference in order to decide upon defensive measures against submarine piracy.
6. Note from the Soviet Russian Government to the Italian Government accusing it of being responsible for the torpedoing of two Russian ships in the Eastern Mediterranean. Repudiation by the Italian Government.
9. In view of the provocative attitude of the Soviet Union, the Italian Government declined to take part in the Mediterranean Conference and proposed that the question should be referred to the Non-Intervention Committee.

September

9. Reply from the German Government declining to take part in the Mediterranean Conference on account of the lack of solidarity among the Powers in the case of the attempts to torpedo the "Leipzig". Identical proposal to refer the matter to the Non-Intervention Committee.
13. Adolf Hitler's statement at the Nuremberg Party Congress. Warning to Europe of the danger of Bolshevism. "It is a gross distortion of facts to state that the Bolshevik oppressors of the people are the bearers of legal power while the combatants for National Spain are illegal revolutionaries. No! We regard General Franco's men as representing what is pure and permanent in Spain and the usurpers of Valencia as the international revolutionary troops paid by Moscow who are today afflicting Spain and may tomorrow afflict some other country.
- Can we be indifferent to these events? First I would like to state briefly the following fact: The press of our western democracies and the speeches of many politicians constantly tell us how great are the natural spheres of interest of those Powers. It appears quite natural to the representatives of those States that as a matter of course their interests should include every sea and every State in Europe and also extend outside Europe. On the other hand, there are immediately outbreaks of indignation as soon as a nation not belonging to this exclusive circle of international possessors also dares to speak of definite interests outside its own frontiers. As regards this pretension, I should like to make the following remarks.
- England and France constantly tell us that they possess sacred interests in Spain. What kind of interests are they? Are they political or economic interests? If they are political interests, we do not understand this any more than we should understand if any one stated that he possessed political interests in Germany. How and by whom Germany is governed does not concern anyone but ourselves, so long as this regime does not intend or does not practise hostility against other States. But if England and France are thinking of definite economic interests in Spain, we will admit this immediately, but it must be pointed out that we claim exactly the same economic interests for ourselves.
- Just as people in England and France state that they are concerned at the idea that Spain might possibly be even occupied by Italy or Germany, we shudder at the possibility that it might be conquered by Soviet Russia. Such a conquest need not take the form of occupation by Soviet Russian troops, but it becomes an accomplished fact as soon as a bolshevist Spain has become a section, that is to say an integral part of the Bolshevik Moscow central authority, a branch which receives political instructions and material subventions from Moscow. We regard every attempt to extend Bolshevism in Europe in principle as a displacement of the European equilibrium."
- 10-14. Mediterranean Conference at Nyon at which the Soviet Commissary of Foreign Affairs, Litvinov, again made fierce attacks on Italy and Germany.
13. Anglo-French invitation to Italy to take part in the Mediterranean control.
14. Italian Government's protest against the division into zones in the Nyon Arrangement of the 14th and claim to absolute equality of rights with all other Powers in every zone.
17. Additional protocol to the Nyon Arrangement. Extension of the control to attacks by surface vessels and aircraft.
21. Anglo-French invitation to Italy to take part in a conference of the naval experts of the three countries in Paris to deal with a modification of the Nyon Arrangement and Italy's participation in the Mediterranean control. The latter accepts on the same day.

22. Much commented conversations of the French Foreign Minister Delbos with the Italian delegate to the League, M. Bova-Scoppa, on the occasion of the League Assembly at Geneva, regarding Italy's accession to the Nyon Arrangement and a conversation on Spain between the three Powers. As regards the latter a step was taken by the diplomatic representatives of France and England with the Italian Ministry of Foreign Affairs at Rome during Mussolini's journey to Germany.
- 27-29. Conference of the Anglo-Franco-Italian naval experts in Paris. Italy accedes to the amended Nyon Agreement.
- 27-30. Debate on Spain in the Sixth (Political) Committee of the League of Nations. On the 30th the Committee adopted a draft resolution stating that, if the foreign volunteers are not shortly withdrawn, the Members of the League, in so far as they are represented in the Non-Intervention Committee, would consider the end of the non-intervention policy.

October

2. Identical Anglo-French note to Rome. Reservation regarding the necessity of a Three-Power agreement, otherwise it will be difficult for the Governments to maintain the obligations which they have assumed under the international agreements to prevent Spain being supplied with arms and men. The question of volunteers is placed in the foreground and there is no longer any question of the recognition of the parties as belligerents.
2. The draft resolution of the Sixth (Political) Committee of the League of September 20th is rejected by the League Assembly by 2 adverse votes (Albania and Portugal) and 14 abstentions (Argentina, Bolivia, Chile, Peru, Panama, Venezuela, Cuba, Uruguay, Ireland, South Africa, Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria, Switzerland).
7. Fresh diplomatic step by England and France in Rome. Request for an early Italian reply to the note of the 2nd.
8. Speech by the British Prime Minister, Mr. Chamberlain, at the Conservative Congress in Bournemouth, in which he hopes that Italy will agree to the plan of a Three-Power Conference.
9. Italian reply. It first repeats the previous assurances regarding the political independence and territorial integrity of Spain, the mother country, the islands and colonies, and then points out that Italy and Germany first drew attention to the question of volunteers, the prohibition to despatch them and the measures for their withdrawal. It goes on to refer to previous notes and statements in which the Italian Government stated that it could never subordinate the question of the recognition of belligerent rights to the two parties to the question of the withdrawal of volunteers. For it is incontestable that volunteers only took part on the side of Franco after strong foreign forces had taken part on the other side by whom they were provoked. It refers to the attitude of the Valencia representative at Geneva, whose speech had excluded all possibility of the withdrawal of the volunteers. Lastly, the note states that Italy is still prepared for negotiations, but only in the Non-Intervention Committee and with the participation of Germany.
12. Conversation of Mr. Eden with the French Ambassador in London, M. Corbin, on the convening of the Non-Intervention Committee.
12. Speech by General Franco at Burgos denying the reports of a cession of Spanish territory.
- 13 & 14. Cabinet discussion in London and Paris.

October

15. Article in the "Times" to the effect that the Comintern is responsible for the outbreak and prolongation of the civil war and is to blame for the "competition in intervention".

15. Speech by Mr. Eden at Llandudno. He said England and France would no longer admit tactics of procrastination in the Non-Intervention Committee. The United Kingdom had observed the letter and the spirit of the non-intervention policy.

"I want to make a clear distinction between non-intervention and indifference. We are not indifferent to the maintenance of the territorial integrity of Spain. We are not indifferent to the foreign policy of any future Spanish Government. We are not indifferent to the complications which may arise in the Mediterranean as the result of the intervention of others. We are not indifferent to vital British interests in the Mediterranean. A clear distinction must be made between non-intervention in what is purely a Spanish affair and non-intervention where British interests are at stake." We should continue to be watchful to see that our interests in the Mediterranean and in the maintenance of our line of communications with the Near East and India were not endangered.

"A feature of the present situation is proclaimed intervention, the glorification of breaches of agreement. In such conditions no one can complain if the patience of those who have striven to keep their responsibilities towards Europe constantly before them is wellnigh exhausted. I, for one, should certainly not be prepared to utter criticisms of any nation which, if such conditions continue, felt compelled to resume its freedom of action."

16. Re-assembly of the non-intervention sub-committee after a long interval. A French plan is submitted which is substantially similar to the British plan of July 14th. The plan contains five points: Withdrawal of the volunteers within as short a time as possible. Grant of belligerent rights to both parties as soon as the international commissions have found that the withdrawal of the volunteers has taken place to a sufficient extent. Influence to be exercised by the Governments represented in the committee on the Governments of Salamanca and Valencia for the immediate withdrawal of a certain number of volunteers in proportion to the numbers fighting on both sides (symbolic withdrawal). Renewed undertaking by the Governments represented in the committee not to allow further volunteers or air material to be sent to Spain. Introduction of a stronger system of control.

The French Ambassador, M. Corbin, stated that France would resume full freedom of action if no agreement could be reached on the proposals within a time limit to be fixed. On behalf of the British Government, Lord Plymouth accepted the proposals. England would also regain her freedom of action if the proposals failed. The Italian representative, Count Grandi, also agreed, but demanded that for the symbolic withdrawal there should be the same number on both sides.

The German representative, Ambassador von Ribbentrop, again explained in detail the German point of view in the question of volunteers. He pointed out that at the end of July, the British plan, which was adopted by 26 States represented in the committee, was buried on account of the refusal of the Soviet Union to grant General Franco belligerent rights. He also pointed out that both on August 17th, 1936 and at the end of January 1937, Germany and Italy had made proposals for the prohibition of volunteers, but these had not been accepted by England and France. It was therefore a misrepresentation or a deceptive manoeuvre when at the present time a certain international press regarded England and France as the originators of the idea of the withdrawal of volunteers. He then turned to the intentions of the press in question to put pressure on the committee's work by more or less open threats, such as for instance that the Pyrenees frontier would be opened and freedom of action regained. Lastly he dealt with Mr. Eden's statement in his last speech; his criticism of the committee's work could not be directed against Germany or Italy who, in treating the question or volunteers had always been animated by the spirit of cooperation. Mr. Eden's criticism had not been directed in the right quarter, namely the Soviet Union whose dilatory tactics were responsible hitherto for the failure. The present talk of the exhaustion of patience, freedom of action etc. was therefore not comprehensible. Germany and Italy, as originators of the idea, were at all times prepared to discuss the question of the withdrawal of volunteers within the entire framework of the British plan and on the basis of the French proposals.

The Russian Ambassador Maiski gave a negative reply but was prepared to submit the proposals immediately to his Government.

18. The Italian Government announces the number of Italian volunteers on the National Spanish side as 40,000. Official communication on the 25th in London and Paris.
19. Ineffectual negotiations in the non-intervention sub-committee on the British and French plan. The representative of the Soviet Union, Ambassador Maiski, prevents any agreement by constantly refusing to connect the question of volunteers with the recognition of General Franco as a belligerent. The Soviet Government could only consider the grant of belligerent rights when the last volunteers had left Spanish soil.
20. Fresh Italian proposal, supported by Germany, to send a commission to Salamanca and Valencia and regarding the symbolic withdrawal of an equal number of volunteers on both sides. Mr. Eden in the chair, together with M. Corbin, stress the very great progress implied by these proposals. The representative of the Soviet Union reserves his attitude.
21. Mr. Eden informs the House of Commons that at the end of the meeting of the 19th he saw no alternative but for the sub-committee to report to the Non-Intervention Committee that it had failed, together with all the consequences of such a decision. But at the eleventh hour a new and very welcome contribution had been made by the Italian Government.
22. The Powers, excepting Russia, agree in principle on the text of a draft resolution to be submitted to the Governments regarding the withdrawal of volunteers. The central point of the differences of opinion is occupied by the symbolic withdrawal of volunteers and the powers of the two counting commissions, together with the time of the recognition of belligerent rights. On the former point France and England take the view that the numbers counted by the commissions are irrevocable and must serve as a final basis for the proportional withdrawal. Not only the Soviet Union, but also Italy and Portugal, however, reject such calculations and the symbolic withdrawal based upon them. Count Grandi proposes a figure of 5000 volunteers. In the Russian view the grant of belligerent rights should only be discussed after the main body of the volunteers have left Spain. The Soviet Union reserves the right to decide when this moment has come.
26. Further resolution by the non-intervention sub-committee. The symbolic withdrawal of volunteers is dropped. Commissions are to negotiate with both Spanish parties regarding the withdrawal.

October

The question of belligerent rights is to be settled on the basis of the British plan.

29. At the meeting of the Committee M. Maiski states that his Government can no longer take responsibility for a continuance of the non-intervention policy and can therefore accept neither the British plan of July 14th nor the French proposals of October 16th. In contradiction to this, however, he states that he will only reject point 2 of the resolution which deals with the question of the grant of belligerent rights. He will therefore abstain from voting. Ambassador von Ribbentrop emphasises the danger which the Soviet Union's attitude and its unusual methods involve for the Non-Intervention Committee and the entire European position.

28-31. Transfer of the Valencia Government to Barcelona.

November

1. Very frank and informative speech by Mr. Eden in the House of Commons, dealing with the charges that the Government has not taken stronger action on the Spanish question in the League of Nations and that—according to Mr. Lloyd George—its non-intervention policy has favoured the Franco Government.

“Let me assure you that the League never showed any enthusiasm to handle the Spanish problem, for the very simple reason that the League knew how sharp were the divergencies of view within that organization about Spain.

Whatever the merits or otherwise of trying to impose sanctions in the Spanish dispute, there was never the remotest chance of the League doing anything of the kind, and frankly I do not think it right to come to this House and even to discuss the possibility of these things when we know how utterly unreal it all is. The truth is—and it must be faced—that the whole world does not look upon the Spanish dispute exactly in the same way as hon. gentlemen opposite. There is no doubt that there are a great many nations members of the League who want General Franco to win. That belief is particularly strong among South American States who are related in blood to the Spanish people. On this issue the League and world public opinion in the great democracies is very sharply divided, and if we do not face that fact it is frankly useless to attempt to discuss this Spanish problem at all.

May I come to Mr. Lloyd George's criticisms? The right hon. gentleman drew, a highly coloured picture of the international situation and of the Spanish situation in particular, but, like many accomplished lightning artists, the right hon. gentleman left out all those elements in the composition of his picture which he found most inconvenient.

I think we must proclaim the fact that the international brigade saved Madrid a year ago. The right hon. gentleman drew a highly coloured picture of the international situation and of the Spanish situation in particular, but, like many accomplished lightning artists, the right hon. gentleman left out all those elements in the composition of his picture which he found most inconvenient.

The result of the Nyon Agreement, though not its aim, has been to facilitate the arrival of very large quantities of material to Spanish Government ports, and of course there have been enormous quantities of material arriving in Spanish Government ports throughout the year. There is no need for me to dive into secret service sources for that. I have only to look at the official figures of the Soviet Government.

These figures, official Soviet Government figures, show that Spain is now Soviet Russia's third best customer, and that she took from Russia in the last nine months 440,000 tons of goods valued at £3,500,000. The trade was hardly complementary, because at the same time Spain only exported 44,000 tons of goods. The interesting thing which the figures show is that from January to September this year Russia shipped to Spain nearly 10 times as much in weight and $4\frac{1}{2}$ times as much in value as in the corresponding period for 1936.

Some of these increases are very interesting. For instance there is a very large figure for tractors, a very large figure for fertilizers, large figures, as one would expect, for oil, oil products, and so forth.

I could not stand here and tell the House that during the summer months of this year there have been more material reaching the insurgent forces than there had been reaching the Government forces. I could not suggest that. It certainly has been very large, but this is still not the point I want to make. The point that I want to make is the connexion of the question at sea with the fact that the Government of Spain can get not only war material but anything at all.

Supposing it is admitted that normally belligerent rights would have been granted, the granting of such rights in the present conditions would have been immensely beneficial to the power which was stronger at sea—at present, of course, the insurgent forces. What happened was that non-intervention sought to create a new form of neutrality. Say if you will that it has succeeded or failed, but the result of that new form of neutrality has been that belligerent rights have not been granted and the result has been to deprive the Power that is stronger at sea—surely this country of all others should understand the importance of that—of the use of its superiority. At the moment the insurgent forces are paying a very heavy price at sea for the assistance they may be receiving from foreign nationals on land, the weight of the policy of non-intervention has been on one side. I venture to forecast that when full details are given of what has arrived in Spain, in the way of munitions and so forth on both sides some hon. members will have some surprises."

2. Further discussion of the draft of July 14th in the sub-committee. Ambassador Maiski states that in the question of belligerent rights he will merely abstain and not give an adverse vote. But the Russian standpoint on this question remains unchanged. Though he no longer makes the grant of belligerent rights conditional upon a hundred percent withdrawal of the volunteers, he does make it conditional upon the withdrawal of the main body and upon the assurance that the intervention will not be renewed. The Soviet Union reserves the right to decide when these conditions are fulfilled.
4. Acceptance of the new draft of the 2nd by the Committee, the Soviet Union abstaining. Unanimous approval of the recommendation of the chairman, Lord Plymouth, that the British Government should be authorised to submit the draft to the Spanish parties for their comments.
6. Notes to this effect from the British Government to the Governments at Valencia and Salamanca.
11. British agreement with the Franco Government regarding the mutual exchange of commercial agents.

This agreement caused sharp criticisms from the opposition, which led to long debates in the House of Commons on November 4th and 8th. The opposition charged the Government with having used this measure, which was connected with the release of seven merchant ships seized by the Franco Government in order to conclude a transaction which was a first step towards its recognition as a legal Government and a belligerent, and in the second place with having thereby infringed the non-intervention agreement. In both debates, therefore, the Prime Minister, and the Foreign Secretary explained the reasons which had led to the agreement with the Franco Government.

November

"There is no intention on the part of his Majesty's Government to make any variation in the attitude which they have consistently adopted towards the contending parties and which is governed by the international agreement for non-intervention to which they have subscribed. They are however bound to take account of their responsibility for the protection of British nationals and British commercial, industrial and financial interests throughout the whole of Spain.

It has become increasingly evident that the numerous questions affecting British interests in these areas cannot be satisfactorily dealt with by means of the occasional contacts which have hitherto existed."

Nobody denied that General Franco was in control of two-thirds of Spain at the present time or that there were large British interests there or that those territories were large buyers of British goods and sellers of products that we needed. There are many million pounds sterling of British capital invested in this area. The greater part of this is in respect of iron ore, copper and lead mines. During the first nine months of this year the insurgent territories purchased from this country goods of the value of just over 2,000,000 pounds out of a total purchase of 2,800,000 by the whole of Spain. The amount of coal purchased during those nine months was 500,000 tons. This trade was worth taking normal steps to protect and further.

It was wrong to say that the release of the seven ships was the price we had paid to Franco. It was the precondition of the negotiations and the exchange we got was the exchange we wanted—the presence of consular officials at Salamanca and other points.

The answer to the question as to whether this arrangement constituted any form of recognition was "No". The agreed communiqué which would be issued very shortly would make it clear that it did not constitute recognition of General Franco's side as a Government or as a belligerent. Naturally Franco had the same right to appoint a commercial agent in London.

12. Acceptance in principle by the Non-Intervention Committee of a plan of control for imports into Spain.
16. The United Kingdom appoints a Commercial Agent to the Spanish National Government.
16. Surprising acceptance of the British plan of July 14th and the resolution of November 4th without reservations by the Soviet Union.
20. Acceptance by the Spanish National Government of the resolution of November 4th which had been sent for its comments.
30. Reply from the Barcelona Government to the British Government regarding the resolution of November 4th. The reply, like that of the Franco Government, contains a number of questions and objections to the proposals contained in the resolution.
30. Recognition of the Franco Government by the Japanese Government.

December

7. Meeting of the non-intervention sub-committee. The Spanish replies to the resolution of November 4th are noted. The chairman is authorised to engage in informal negotiations with the Powers concerned for the withdrawal of the volunteers.
7. British note to the Franco Government, describing the blockade of the Red Spanish Mediterranean ports announced on November 28th as contrary to international law, since no belligerent rights have been granted to either party.

THE JUBILEE SESSION OF THE LEAGUE COUNCIL

General Observations.

On January 24th the Council of the League of Nations met for its 100th Session. The jubilee atmosphere could not in any case have been festive; and the depression was not exactly relieved by the postponement of the original date of the meeting from the 17th of the month owing to the French Cabinet crisis.

There were 26 items on the agenda, of which 21 related to internal, social or cultural activities of the League. Of the remaining five, three were items for adjournment viz. the questions of Disarmament, the Locarno Pact and Alexandretta. Consequently, the general interest was finally concentrated on two points, the Dispute in the Far East and the question of the Reform of the Covenant, both of which—as, for that matter, all other points, settled or unsettled—turned on the fundamental issue of the continued existence of the Geneva institution. That fundamental issue was raised in its clearest form by the Chilean representative when he pointed out that eleven nations, four of them having a claim to a permanent seat on the Council and representing between them a population of 360 million people, had no longer any connection—or had only a very loose connection—with Geneva.

It was common knowledge that a plan of campaign had been evolved in Paris on January 25th between Chautemps, Delbos and Eden, following on the London conversations between the French Premier Chautemps and the French Foreign Minister Delbos on the one hand and the English Premier and Foreign Secretary Chamberlain and Eden on the other on November 29th and 30th, 1937, and the subsequent visit of the Secretary-General of the League Avenol to London and Paris at the beginning of January. To save the Sick Man of Geneva from complete collapse, it was proposed that the representatives of the two Powers should make a common declaration at the opening meeting of the 100th Session in favour of the League and the inviolability of the Covenant, as a counterblast to the defeatist tendencies of certain members and a reassurance on the subject of their preoccupations as to the application of Article 16 of the Covenant. But the plan miscarried.

Attempts have always been made to ascribe the paralysis of the League to those that stand outside this "Association of Nations". In the first period of the League's failure, the cause of the entire evil was regarded as the absence of the United States and subsequently, after the withdrawal of Japan, Germany and Italy, more serious charges were concentrated on these States and the tones became constantly shriller. With the admission of Soviet Russia and after the outbreak of the Spanish civil war, it was repeated more and more frequently that the States which regarded the League as an organisation serving the egoistic policy of certain Members were aggressor States, and the Red Spanish delegate Del Vayo was able in the Reform Committee, without fear of contradiction, to describe Japan, Germany and Italy as criminals and to refer to them as States that stood "hors la loi".

The "jubilee speeches" made on January 27th at the first public meeting of the 100th Session of the Council, however, proved once for all the emptiness of a theory which aims at finding scapegoats to bear the actual, legal and moral blame. For the principal result of these speeches was to disclose profound differences of opinion even within the relatively small Council of the League. The gulf which was evident the first day was seen in its entire depth on the following days when the so-called Reform Committee of Twenty-Eight received declarations regarding the universality of the League. In so far as an estimate can already be formed of the crisis of the League, a future League Assembly will ultimately subject the methods and procedure of this institution to a criticism which can in no way be ascribed to actions taken and humiliations received from outside. For such criticism is determined exclusively by the vital interests of a great number of States which, with a view to the realisation of the lofty League ideals, have in the course of years shown more courage and a greater readiness to make sacrifices than certain League Powers who are so suspiciously fond of describing themselves as the bearers of the League banner.

"The historians of the future may well ask whether the decline of the authority of the League of Nations has not been due as much to the doubts and scepticism of some of its more important Members within as to the criticism and attacks of its professed opponents without." The Chinese delegate, Wellington Koo, who has taken part as a member in the Council meetings from the beginning, uttered the above words on the occasion of the meeting of January 27th. He could not be expected to express himself more sharply. But in fact his remarks only contained a half-truth.

They should have been supplemented by the words: "and also to the fact that the League was formed in order to perpetuate an unjust peace for all time." In a leading article in "Gringoire" of February 4th, 1938, a man who should know, namely André Tardieu, in dealing with this hundredth session of the Council frankly gave his confirmation to this idea. He said the League system had not arisen spontaneously out of the War; nothing better had been found than to safeguard peace by a union which was to be given a "force collective". This system of 1919 had failed and no one had had the courage to admit that it was necessary to return to the old system of alliances. The League of Nations had its brilliant future behind it, and this fact remained unaltered even by Paul-Boncour's speeches.

It would be possible to pass over this 100th session and no event of any great historical importance would be overlooked. As far as the actual agenda was concerned, the traditional avoidance of decisions showed for the hundredth time the high measure of proficiency attained in the Geneva school of procedure. Of the twenty-six items on the agenda, there were only two of any importance. The first was the Assembly resolution of October 4th, 1937 regarding the request for the suggestions of the non-Member States in order to render possible cooperation with the League. The Council was to deal with the preparatory measures; as was to be expected the question was adjourned till the May session. It was desired to await the result of the proceedings of the Committee of Twenty-Eight, while, in addition, according to the usual League formula since 1920, "in view of the present position", there are no prospects of taking "premature" steps.

A second important item on the agenda was provided by the China resolution of the Assembly of October 6th. In the foreground was the question of possible assistance to China, which had been demanded in vain by the representatives of that country at the 18th Assembly and which had also been refused by the Brussels Conference which took place later. The Assembly resolution of last year merely granted moral support to China and recommended the Members to refrain from any action which might weaken China's power of resistance. The question was now to be considered to what extent China could be assisted individually. In the negotiations which took place behind closed doors the most important point was China's threat to demand sanctions, in which she was supported by Soviet Russia. The rumours that this course was being adopted were for a time fostered by the fact that Washington was kept informed of the negotiations, so that the fiction gained ground that individual assistance for China was planned by the main Powers in cooperation with the United States. That the wish was father to the thought ascribed to China was finally made clear in a remarkable manner by a categorical declaration from Washington and by a statement of the facts which the press bureau of the China delegation found it necessary to issue. The Council of the League of Nations left the Chinese question de facto as it was, that is to say, its new resolution did not go beyond the statements contained in the resolution of October 6th; Poland and Peru abstained from voting. The Polish Foreign Minister, M. Beck, based his abstention on the view that, as regards individual assistance, the words in the resolution "in consultation with other Powers similarly interested" rendered possible action on the part of a group of States to which the Geneva organisation had no right to give a free hand in advance.

Apart from these two more important items, the 100th Session of the Council was, however, enlivened by incidents which were the subject of critical remarks without being on the agenda. Some parties wished to deal immediately with the Roumanian Jewish question, on which petitions had been submitted by the World Jewish Congress and the Jewish Committee for the defence of Jewish rights in Central and South-Eastern Europe. This matter was disposed of under the rule that the Council can only adopt an attitude to the question when a reply to the petitions has been duly given by the Roumanian Government.

The very people who in this connection made an artificial attempt at dramatisation endeavoured to belittle another subject of importance for the future of the League which was dealt with in secret discussions.

The "revolt of the small States". It was merely a fortuitous circumstance that the claims of various small League States reached the stage of serious discussion at the very moment when it was desired to raise a song of praise to the principles of the League of Nations at the 100th session of the Council. After these States had been compelled by the failure of sanctions against Italy to refuse in their own vital interests to accept in advance any future undertakings of an automatic nature, especially after the recognition of total war shows that even economic sanctions are of a military nature, the small States, as loyal Members of the League and in the interest of that body, expressed unreservedly the objections which they had felt since 1921 to the sanctionist machinery of Article 16. If these States, after great political events—the failure of the Disarmament Conference and the consequent breach of the obligations under Article 8, the complete failure of sanctions against Italy, the disastrous effects of the Franco-Soviet Pact, the denunciation of the Locarno Pact, and the Spanish civil war which Moscow is trying to exploit for its world revolutionary plans—made a justified attempt to remain outside the conflicts of the Great Powers, no one could reproach them for this, though this has been done by certain people who regard neutrality not as an honourable concept but as a one-sided view and as an obstacle to the League Covenant. Neither these nor other recriminations and attempts at intimidation were able to prevent the responsible statesmen of these countries from reminding the League of its pacific tasks, which had been entirely overlooked.

The external cause of this "revolt" did not, however, even start from these countries themselves. It was only when Paris and London, shortly before the 100th session of the Council, stated semi-officially that a joint declaration regarding Article 16 had come within the range of possibility, and that such a declaration, on the occasion of a jubilee, would have the effect of expression of power and would represent League sanctions as inviolable, the moment had come for the neutrals to give their veto. The most ridiculous charges have been made against these States on this account. They have been given the ominous title of "dissidents", their conception of neutrality has been described as "degenerate", and while, on the one hand, they were stigmatised as "tools of the dictatorships", on the other hand attempts were made to frighten them by the argument that they would one fine day be "eaten up by the aggressor States". Moreover, M. Litvinov, after his advice had not been followed before the beginning of the hundredth public session of the Council, vented his anger on these States by referring to them contemptuously as "faint-hearted", for, he said, people did not come to Geneva "merely to pray".

But all this does not alter the fact that the protests of these States, at the head of which were Switzerland, Belgium, the Netherlands, Sweden and even Poland, had the result that the League of Nations was once again prevented from sliding down the slope to an "alliance of the democracies against the dictatorships". The Great Powers mainly interested in the League of Nations therefore agreed for the moment to postpone the inclusion of the small States in the sanctionist system. While the representatives of the latter agreed not to say anything in their speeches at the 100th session of the Council which might make still clearer the obvious weakness of the League, the Great Powers represented on the Council for their part abandoned the idea of declaring concretely in any way their adherence to Article 16. None of the speakers referred to Article 16 in their jubilee speeches, but all kept to the general principles of League policy, thus contributing to the remarkable character of this meeting of the Council of January 27th. From this alone a correct judgment may be formed of the kind of discipline used in order that League circles and the pro-League press might give the impression that the result of this session, including the declarations made in the Reform Committee, was a confession by all of the correctness of League methods. It was a confession which should merely be regarded as conditional. Sweden, Belgium, the Netherlands and others such as Poland will not let themselves be prevented from considering sanctions otherwise than as optional, nor will Switzerland abandon the struggle for the restoration of her complete neutrality. The discussion in the Reform Committee, with which we deal in another chapter, only showed unanimity to adjourn the questions of revision and interpretation. The crisis of the League was established at any rate as clearly by the same States as their conditional confession of faith, and if we compare the speeches and declarations of this jubilee session, we realise not only the profound differences of opinion, but also the real significance of this adjournment, the formal grounds for which were that a solution of the existing internal problems of the League of Nations could and should only be sought in an "improved atmosphere".

The hundredth session of the League Council was awaited with ill humour, and the delegates left Geneva in a depressed mood. As regards the points of discussion for which there was no other solution than an adjournment till better times, the ill humour was justified. Some of the diplomats must have cursed the convention attached to the number 100, for the crack in the foundations of the Geneva construction is so serious, that no artificial devices are sufficient to make it bear the burden placed upon it. This ill humour was also not disguised by conventional speeches. Most of these members were compelled—contrary to previous custom when many regarded it as obvious but did not expressly say so—to make a reservation on behalf of his Government in one part of his speech to the effect that, in view of the Rump Parliament of the Nations, it was not possible merely to carry on a pure League policy. Even in this sense the speeches of January 27th are significant, and the confession of faith in the League of Nations which they contain does not play the decisive part. It is desired to retain Geneva, because some institution must exist which offers possibilities of personal contact and discussion for as great a number of nations as possible. But this is in contradiction with the many decisive steps taken by a small group of League Powers, for which however the majority has had to bear the responsibility. It is also in contradiction with the fact that the most important decisions in international post-war policy have been taken outside Geneva, and that by Powers who were directly interested in a particular question.

It was constantly heard at this session how good and valuable it was to admit the crisis of the League; it was pointed out that the League is still in its childhood. But the fact was overlooked that this child inherited the spirit of its parents and was ordered, before it could stand, to carry the world on its shoulders. Under this great burden after twenty years the growing stripling has broken down and it shows a lack of any sense of responsibility to place further burdens upon him. For the ultimate question is not to care for a sick man but to organise the peace of the world with the best means and the most suitable methods.

Let us examine the "jubilee speeches" in this sense.

The British Foreign Minister, who was the first to make a statement, exposed the British attitude to the League of Nations in a reserved tone which seemed to be weakened in important points to the extent of unclearness. His statement is of special significance on account of its reference to the preamble of the Covenant, the general principles such as the achievement of international peace and security and the promotion of cooperation between the nations. Here we hear the British reservation, namely to take up negotiations in the interest of general peace also with nations that are not Members of the League of Nations.

Since British foreign policy clearly shows a leaning towards "Realpolitik" in this connection, the future conduct of Great Britain towards League action must appear uncertain at any rate for adherents of the League. Great Britain regards the League as one method of maintaining peace, but she points out that as a result of the withdrawals the zone of cooperation has been reduced and the League methods can only be applied where circumstances permit. Great Britain continues to hold fast to the principles of the League because, according to Mr. Eden's statement, it is still the best instrument of international cooperation; from this idea may be derived the British view that peace can only be attained if all nations work together in some system.

As there is at present no prospect of such cooperation, though this must be ascribed to those who have hitherto rejected international cooperation outside Geneva, the British statement concludes with the remark that, under present circumstances, it is impossible to change the Covenant. This paved the way for the result of the discussions in the Reform Committee which met the next day, i.e. further postponement.

The French Foreign Minister, M. Delbos, as was to be expected, laid greater stress on the loyalty of France to the League of Nations. But it was not so easy for M. Delbos as subsequently for M. Paul-Boncour. France also does not omit to state that, in spite of frank advocacy of the Geneva institution, she is nevertheless prepared to seek all possibilities of peaceful settlement and cooperation with States outside the League. In view of this statement, it is difficult to understand the French pessimistic view that peace is to be based on force, if it does not receive the blessing of the League of Nations. Such a statement, which is in accordance with the "theoretical" continuity of French foreign policy, is moreover in contradiction with French practice, for since the War France has neither abandoned the old pre-war system of alliances nor have the aims of this system become more League-minded by the formal registration of treaties with the Secretariat. Many people have been unable to understand up to the present how this system of alliances which is directed against the vanquished Powers of the War and which finally through the alliance with the Soviet Union in 1935 brought the unrest in European relations to its culminating point can be openly and frankly declared to be compatible with the Covenant of the League of Nations.

In face of the difficulties arising for the League M. Delbos thinks the remedy lies in the necessity of union among the Members themselves. Too much had been expected of the League and it was reproached for the gap between the hopes of yesterday and the disappointing realities of today. At these words his British colleague will no doubt have called to mind that struggle in which the collective security system so deplorably failed because, as had been always hoped and expected, it had not first had to be tried on Germany.

As an obvious proof of the resort to force, M. Delbos assumed that the danger of war and the further competition in armaments were the result of non-observance of the Covenant and of a weakening of the League. At this, his British colleague no doubt thought his own thoughts and may have remembered his own statement in the House of Commons on May 21st, 1935 in connection with the violated disarmament article, No. 8, of the Covenant and the responsibility of the French policy on this matter.

We have refrained from reproducing the text of the remarks by the Russian Foreign Minister Litvinov. They are the usual propaganda statements, the length of which is in inverse ratio to their constructive contents. The speech in question consists in the first place of a glorification of the Russian love of peace and loyalty to the League of Nations, and in the second place of open or concealed attacks not only against Fascism and National Socialism, but also against other League States that do not entirely believe in the genuineness of the Russian assertions. It is to be hoped that they will now do so after Litvinov has again reminded them that the Soviet Union, in view of "justified doubts" as to whether most of the League States were prepared to keep their League engagements for the maintenance of peace, considered for a long time whether it should enter the League. But when these doubts were removed and in addition an invitation was received from the majority of League Members, Russia kindly consented to accept, and has since that time given no cause for doubt as to the fulfilment of her obligations.

"Whenever matters went as far as the real execution of these obligations by the fulfilment of collective decisions, the Soviet Union did not seek pretexts for evading these obligations but, on the contrary, loyally carried them out, sometimes even to the detriment of its national interests." Moreover Russia does not require this. In the same breath M. Litvinov pointed out that the Union did not need to depend on the advantages accorded to it by the League, but that it could rely on its own strength, its own armed forces, its own resources and finally on the enthusiasm and patriotism of its peoples. For this reason the Soviet Union was, in the words of M. Litvinov, one of the firmest and staunchest champions of the League as an instrument of peace, on account of its sense of international duty and international solidarity. The foreign policy of the Soviet Union was therefore free from deviations and zigzags. M. Litvinov then made matters clear to those unbelievers who accepted the admission of the Soviet Union to the League in the hope that this Power had abandoned or at any rate would abandon its aim of the Communist world revolution. Has the Communist danger become less in many countries since the admission of the Union into the League? Among the many current publications of the Secretariat there is a "Chronology of International Treaties and Legislative Measures". Not the least of its space is devoted to decrees and regulations which States have been obliged to issue in order to drive Communism out of the country. Litvinov with his "straight-forward policy" naturally does not refer to this, but to the preservation of peace and, despite some disappointments, he kindly gives most of the other Member States a certificate to the effect that that is also their desire though some of them are "rather hesitant". He passes ironically over the objections to the formation of blocs, and after cleverly juggling with the idea of such bloc formation, finally says: "We naturally form a block, a peace bloc, or rather a peace axis." This is a clear hint, and the Geneva institution has no meaning for Litvinov and his Moscow superiors if it is not an organisation for combating the aggressors which are to be sought solely in that other bloc or axis. The reasons why all the other speakers at this meeting of the Council rejected the idea of the formation of a bloc now become clear, and the necessity for such statements is merely a proof of the tendency and determination of certain Members of the League to form such an ideological bloc inside the League.

The statement by the Polish Foreign Minister, M. Beck, regarding the League of Nations have the advantage of showing clearly by their brevity the attitude of reserve adopted by Poland and are given from the standpoint of the attentive observer. Poland's interest in the League is not thereby weakened. International cooperation in the sense of the present Polish foreign policy comprises above all a European adjustment either with the League of Nations or, if it appears necessary, without it. This policy is confirmed in the final sentence of the Polish statement, in so far as certain conceptions are given their full weight: States are sovereign; their political independence, a principle of the Covenant, gives them an inalienable right as against decisions of the League to determine what contribution they can make to the League in case of certain conflicts, in accordance with their individuality and the extent of their responsibility; this is all the more justified as the present position of the League has made it impossible for it to attain its original objects. On the basis of this practical admission Poland gives her cooperation on the assumption that the consolidation of peaceful relations takes the course of friendly cooperation between all nations.

At this hundredth session of the Council, only one delegate spoke against the League, namely the Chinese representative, Mr. Wellington Koo, who is at present the doyen of the representatives of the Powers at the Council table. While it is possible, in view of the tragic disturbances with which China is at present visited, to feel some understanding for the sharp accusations made against the Members of the League, the Chinese representative appears to have forgotten that, at a time when certain executory regulations of the dictated peace treaties were issued by the League, he, as a member of the Council, threw his vote into the scale in respect of decisions which represented a great injustice to the countries concerned and thus helped to create the position in which the League is now placed. In this matter China co-operated without understanding Europe, or without basing her understanding on anything but a "victory mentality". At the present time Wellington Koo demands absolute comprehension for China from all the European States. In so far as he presents the counter-bill to certain Powers for whom his support was at that time necessary, this may be comprehensible. But even these have not met the bill, while the United States whom he dealt with so tenderly have hitherto given the cold shoulder to the desires and hopes of China and other Members of the Council, as was undisguisedly shown at the Brussels Conference. The Chinese question as dealt with by the League has again confirmed the method followed at Geneva in particular by the Great Powers—and sometimes also by China—of placing one's own interests above the ideas and ideals of the Covenant. Mr. Wellington Koo may be right in regretting this. But this does not entitle him, without going into the reasons of the Powers that have withdrawn from the League, to speak of them as "ogling" with aggressions and breaches of the law. Neither Germany nor Italy have attacked China nor broken any treaty concluded with her, nor have they given her any other cause to make such accusations. And as far as her conflict with Japan is concerned, under its surface which appears to be so simple and clear there are deeper political, social, economic and cultural causes which cannot be simply classified as "aggression and breach of treaty". In the Far Eastern conflict it is even more obvious than in the Italo-Abyssinian and in the Spanish conflicts that, instead of localising it, it is extremely foolish to demand that it should be extended to a world conflagration and that nations should be involved that have nothing whatever to do with it. And this for the sole reason that, nearly twenty years ago, on account of the exaggerated idealism of some and a determined, materialistic and egoistic determination on the part of others to perpetuate the dictated peace of Paris, an Article 16 was adopted which has developed more and more into a danger for peace.

On behalf of the Little Entente, the Roumanian Foreign Minister, M. Micescu, expressed his approval of the ideas and principles of the League. As regards international cooperation he said it could not be effectively attained without universality and pointed out that in any case, in view of the lack of universality, an ideological conflict with non-Member States was intolerable. As a second principle he emphasised the equality of rights of all Members. But the Little Entente only desires a partial application of this principle formally and legally to Austria, Hungary and Bulgaria, in view of the third principle mentioned in the declaration, namely the demand for a collective and effective guarantee of the present status quo. The picture of the League of Nations of 1938, he continued, bore little resemblance to that of 1920.

This is quite true. But it appears to us that this incomplete picture of the League in 1920 was viewed differently by its Members according to the improvements which were still to be made in it. That these improvements at the same time brought conflicts was certainly not in the minds of those who hoped that the further development would make the League a factor of adjustment and of the revision of discriminatory provisions which were a danger to peace. That it did not ultimately become this is due not least to the fault of Roumania and of the Little Entente as a whole.

Text of the most important speeches at the opening meeting on January 27th, 1938

M. A d l e, President, Representative of Iran : It was a little over 18 years ago, on January 16th, 1920, that the first meeting of the Council was held, inaugurating thereat a new system for the collaboration of sovereign States.

The League has an impressive record of accomplishment. There have been failures—serious failures. This is surely inevitable in all great experiments, but should not make us any the less resolved to do what lies in our power to contribute to the success of a system in whose principles we continue to believe.

In this modern world where the acts of one State may react upon the wellbeing of other members of the world community with a rapidity undreamt of by even the immediately preceding generation, a League is a vital necessity.

Mr. E d e n, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland : You have referred, Mr. President, to the fact that this is the 100th meeting of the Council of the League of Nations. This fact is in itself sufficient to show that the League has given its proofs. It has a record of achievement which should not be forgotten by those who are more apt to contemplate its failures. Diplomatic successes have little news value while diplomatic failures have resounding consequences which continue for long to be heard and felt. The League can legitimately be proud of its achievements but there can be no advantage in shutting our eyes to certain events, however regrettable and however much we may deplore them. By the defection of some of its more important Members the League is now faced with the fact that the area of cooperation is restricted, and that its ability to fulfil all the functions originally contemplated for it is thereby reduced. We are compelled regretfully to recognise that fact ; but His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom do not think it inappropriate, at a moment when they have to acknowledge the repudiation in some quarters of the League of Nations to declare that their faith in the aims and ideals that inspired it remains unchanged.

The principles on which the League was founded are laid down in the Preamble to the Covenant. They are the promotion of international cooperation and the achievement of international peace and security on the basis of respect for international law. To those principles His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom hold fast, and they believe that true peace and orderly progress and prosperity cannot be looked for in the world unless all nations cooperate in some system based upon those principles.

For the moment we must realise that in the present circumstances the League is not in a position to achieve all that was hoped of it. It was designed to hold all the nations of the world together in resistance to war and injustice. It was born of the universal desire to avoid a recurrence of the horrors through which the world had just passed. It was an idea hailed by all nations as responding to an urgent and spontaneous impulse. Believing, as we do, that that impulse survives, we can hope that it will ultimately prevail, and that differences will be narrowed to those of method. For that reason and others, it seems to His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom essential, in these difficult times, to retain what still exists. They consider that the League, despite its existing limitations, is the best instrument which has yet been devised for giving effect to the principles of international cooperation, and they are therefore determined to keep it in existence, to give it their full support and to make use of its machinery and procedure to the fullest extent that circumstances permit. Within the limits which they have to recognise, they intend to make it as efficient an instrument as possible.

His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom will welcome any cooperation in the work of the League which non-Members may be disposed to give, and they do not regard their membership of the League as preventing or hindering friendly relations with non-Members, since they see no reason why such relations should involve them in any departure from the principles to which I have referred. In the meantime they still believe that one day, possibly with more or less adaptation to circumstances, the League will become the universal organisation which its founders contemplated.

For the present, if and for so long as other great Nations withhold their collaboration, the field of action by the League is to that extent, in practice, inevitably restricted. Attention has recently been drawn in more than one quarter to the danger of widening this breach by the advocacy of any particular system of government. The League has never been, and His Majesty's Government for their part are resolved to do all in their power to ensure that it shall not become, the home of any ideology save that of peace through international cooperation. Let us hold fast to our principles, if we believe in them, and devote our whole energies to proving their worth. Let us not be drawn into any sterile and embittering controversy with those who do not think and work with us at this moment. Let us rather hope that an appeasement may be achieved that will unite all nations in the desire once again to find the way of peace through cooperation. When that day comes, it may be that we shall unite in finding new and better methods and in adapting or modifying our procedure, but for the present we must recognise realities and our best course would seem to be that we should continue to use the instrument that lies ready to our hand, for all the purposes for which it is fitted, and thus show our faith in the essential principles on which the League was founded.

M. D e l b o s, France : The Government that I represent desires to assert its fidelity to the League of Nations and its continuing confidence in its future. Not that it closes its eyes to the difficulties through which the League is passing : but it sees in those very difficulties and in the consequences resulting therefrom, the proof that it is necessary for us to unite more closely in order to find remedies for them. The crisis which is at present affecting Europe and the whole world indeed shows that perils grow greater in proportion as the League's principles are forgotten. Doubtless because too much was expected of it, the League is reproached with the distance which separates the hopes of yesterday from the disappointing realities of to-day ; because, only too often, it has appeared powerless, people have drawn the conclusion that its methods are ineffective—instead of endeavouring to apply them all the better.

How can we now fail to perceive the errors underlying the desertions and defections which we have to note ? It has been stated that peace and war can be kept in separate compartments. Now, we see the intercommunication between conflicts ; we see it manifested in the most significant examples, affecting the most distant sectors of the world. The war in Spain, although a civil war and therefore the least likely to affect and influence other nations, has had serious effects throughout Europe, and who can claim that it is unrelated with the conflict in the Far East ?

Do not such observations prove that the destinies of peoples are inter-connected, and that peace is all the better guaranteed for each, the more it is ensured to all ?

What reproach may rightly be levelled at the fundamental ideas of the Covenant, which are the criminal absurdity of war, the danger of an armaments race, the free collaboration of peoples knowing that isolation is a mortal danger, the obligation to respect treaties and to settle conflicts peacefully ? If those ideas are abandoned, the relations between States no longer repose on anything but relationships of force ; the unstable equilibrium of which is liable at any moment to be overthrown, thus leading to war.

We find an obvious proof of this in the fact that as belief in those ideas has grown weaker, the dangers of war have grown more serious, with an acceleration in the armaments race and an increasing anxiety engendered by economic and political insecurity. Such are the results of a departure from essential principles, and that is why we must go back to those principles.

But because this is an ideal, there are those who conclude that it is chimerical. The fact is that the ideal, far from being harmful to action, is the indispensable condition of action. Even those who combat the Covenant and tax it with expressing an ideology, have had to invoke another, and bilateral methods tend to widen breaches in collective conceptions.

Are we going to abandon ideas of collective methods at the moment when their necessity is obvious to all? If we fail to recognise those of the League of Nations, we shall quickly be compelled to discover them anew; nothing, therefore, is more legitimate and more necessary than an active revival of international opinion.

There can be no question of intervening in the internal system of other countries; how could the League wish or be able to do this, since all forms of Government are represented in the League in mutual respect for the preferences of each Member?

We have to defend our conception of the relations between States against the risks of international anarchy. The League of Nations offers the peoples of the world the best setting for peaceful collaboration. If it has not realised all the hopes that were placed in it, all its possibilities still subsist. Only too frequently people forget the service which the League and the institutions attached to it, such as the International Labour Office, have rendered in all fields, the contacts and the agreements which the League has facilitated between Governments—and Governments which, without the League, would not have known one another; the part which the League has enabled many States to play whose voices would not have been raised at all or would not even have been heard. Such States have largely benefited by the spirit of comprehension and mutual assistance introduced by the Covenant into international relations.

Salvation depends on the will that we are able to place in the service of the ideal which is common to us. It does not lie in abstention, which would be imprudent because it would lead to isolation, but it lies in collaboration of all in favour of peace. How can we doubt our possibilities, since the nations grouped at Geneva constitute, if they have the will, a material and moral force that is greater than any other? Though circumstances of fact have been such as to impose limits on the application of the Covenant, we must none the less maintain the will to put those principles effectively into action. There can be no question of creating or crystallising antagonisms; France, resolutely devoted to literal and democratic principles, as also to the ideal by which we are inspired, none the less remains ready to seek with other States all possibilities of peaceful settlement and collaboration.

The Government of the French Republic, which maintains complete confidence in the League of Nations, is profoundly convinced that it is in the extent to which the League of Nations is animated by those who have charge of it that peace will be maintained and organised.

M. Beck, Poland: I listened with the greatest attention to the statements made by the distinguished Members of the Council of the League of Nations who have preceded me on the occasion of the 100th Session of the Council. It would seem to me that these declarations reflect the interest which States bear in the future of international collaboration within the framework of a permanent organisation. So far as my own Government is concerned, it has emphasised this interest on various occasions. But these statements show at the same time an understanding of the present situation, which unhappily is so far removed from the objects and the aspirations that were assigned to the League of Nations at the moment of its inception.

Quite recently I had an opportunity to make clear my Government's views on this problem. The ideas and principles which I set forth in our own Parliament still determine our attitude both within the League of Nations and also in other fields of international co-operation. In collaboration with other countries we shall endeavour to maintain an equilibrium between duties and rights. The Government which I have the honour to represent is devoted, above all, to a real sense of international collaboration, considering that modifications or evolutions in form of that collaboration are of secondary importance.

Noting that in present conditions vital decisions have to be taken individually by the Governments of sovereign States with a full realisation of their responsibilities, the Polish Government is resolved by its decisions to contribute to the consolidation of peaceful relations and friendly collaboration between all countries.

Mr. Wellington Koo, China: During the nearly two decades of its existence the League of Nations has never found its prestige and authority at such a low ebb as it finds them to-day. Notwithstanding its duty to promote international co-operation and achieve international peace and security, the world is confronted with a state of lawlessness and violence seldom witnessed in the long course of history. There has been raging for several years an economic war between nations unprecedented in its intensity and violence. There is also a war of ideologies, the bitterness of which approaches that of religious wars in the Dark Ages. Peace has been broken in two important regions of the world, and a sense of insecurity prevails everywhere. All nations, great and small, are feverishly arming for fear of being attacked suddenly. International law, instead of being established as the actual rule of conduct among Governments, is openly challenged or swept into the limbo of oblivion; while treaty obligations, far from receiving that scrupulous respect which is properly due to them in the dealings of organized peoples with one another, have been wilfully disregarded with impunity. The whole world finds itself on the brink of an abyss, and thoughtful people everywhere feel apprehensive even of the near future.

Yet every conflict which exists in Europe or in the Far East, every threat of peace, nay, every problem that seriously divides the nations to-day, is embraced under the Covenant of the League, which provides not only principles for settling them but also the necessary machinery to bring about a settlement. But of all these conflicts and problems the League of Nations, instead of discharging its sacrosanct duty as a great dominant factor of justice, peace and security, has become a passive spectator. In spite of its past record of achievements, it now merely serves as a platform for empty platitudes and a centre of wordy excuses for inaction. In the face of such delinquency, can it be wondered at that the friends of the League begin to lose heart in its future to the gratification of its enemies, and that its prestige and authority before the world should have been steadily declining?

The historians of the future may well ask whether the decline of the authority of the League of Nations has not been due as much to the doubts and scepticism of some of its more important members within as to the criticism and attacks of its professed opponents without. The argument most frequently advanced in favour of a policy of lassitude and indifference in the face of overt aggression is that the League is not what it was intended to be, namely, a universal association including all the principal Powers as members. It cannot be contested, however, that the absence or withdrawal of certain Powers from the League does not relieve its actual members of the obligations which their membership comports under the Covenant. "A scrupulous respect for all treaty obligations in the dealings of organized peoples" is ordained by the Covenant, and it is an indispensable basis of order and stability in international relations. If the members of the League do not take their duties under the Covenant seriously, how could they expect other nations not members thereof to be more scrupulous in their observance of treaties and feel deterred by the existence of the League?

It is a fact that the action of the League because of its lack of universality, cannot be as effective as it would be if its membership comprised all the important Powers of the world. But it does not follow that all action of the League to restrain aggression and safeguard peace would produce no salutary effect. Those vital provisions of the fundamental charter of the League designed to enforce peace and prevent aggression have not been fully tested. In the experiment of three years ago brought about through courageous and far-sighted initiative, the ultimate failure was due, not to any unsoundness of the provisions applied, but rather to the incompleteness of the measures adopted and the sudden, unexpected breakdown of solidarity of action among the League members. As a consequence, there exists a feeling of restlessness and want of confidence in the League on the part of a number of member States. The League has to-day fallen so much in the estimation of the world that it is necessary to make a radical change in its policy if it is to be rescued from its state of apparent paralysis and threatened disintegration. Instead of always seeking to avoid responsibility behind a veil of pretended prudence, it should boldly try to live up to its obligations and discharge its sacred mission in the world of maintaining peace and restraining aggression. By constantly refraining from positive, constructive action in the face of grave situations, it plays into the hands of its enemies who wish first to discredit it and then bring about its destruction, and disheartens its own friends who desire to see it develop into a veritable citadel of world peace.

The principle of collective security is the only logical principle the realization of which may lead the world to an era of durable peace. It is predicated upon the axiom that the combined strength of the whole is greater than any of its parts. And the League of Nations, which is the embodiment of that principle, should deservedly represent the hope of the peace-loving nations. For the strength and resources of even those who remain outside and who cherish or actually pursue a policy of violence and aggression in disregard of law and order in the world, are not comparable to the collective strength and resources of the entire membership of the League of Nations, especially when reinforced as was the case from time to time in the past, by the co-operation or parallel action of that great peace-loving democracy on the other side of the Atlantic Ocean. It is the want of faith, the lack of conviction, or the persistent spirit of national egoism, which accounts for the ineffectiveness of the League and the steady eclipse of its authority and prestige.

M. Munters, Latvia: On the occasion of the hundredth session of the Council of the League, I feel it my duty to reaffirm the unqualified adherence of my country and people to the ideal of international peace and to the principle of international collaboration which form the basis of this great institution. We firmly believe that the ideas on which the organisation of the League and its Covenant are based are sound, and correspond to the instinctive longing and the universal desire of the people of the civilised world. Moreover, we believe that the period of trial which the League is passing through will eventually lead to a new maturity of its ideology and hence to a strengthening of its authority and position.

The Covenant to which the Members of the League have pledged themselves is, in our view, not only a legal instrument, but primarily a great political act. Herein resides the source of both its strength and its weakness. A political act for the establishment of permanent world peace must be universally accepted; it must, on the other hand, take account in its application of political realities. These two vital conditions of an effective working of the Covenant are, to a great extent, correlated and interdependent. Their absence is the cause of deficiencies of which we have had a number of discouraging experiences and which, in their accumulation, have reacted on the confidence of individual States in the League itself and resulted in numerous manifestations of doubt and disappointment.

But doubt and disappointment are essentially transitional states of mind, and they must necessarily develop into something of a more definite character. I wish to associate myself with the expression of hope which may be read into the declarations we have heard at this table that this development will assure a successful future to the League of Nations. The doubts which exist to-day should develop into the reasoned conviction that the League is a useful and indispensable framework for pacific and equitable international intercourse. Its disappearance would mean chaos and the establishment of the rule of force. The feeling of disappointment should give room to a realistic appreciation of political forces and tendencies, the reconciliation of which constitutes the essence of international collaboration. This implies the necessity of avoiding ideological antagonism between the League and non-Member States.

Mr. President, I would like to end on a note of gratitude to the League of Nations for all the valuable services it has rendered to its Members and to humanity.

M. Micesco, Roumania: As this is the first occasion on which I have had the honour to speak at this table, I am very glad to take this opportunity, afforded by the meeting of the hundredth session of the Council, to repeat on behalf of the Little Entente the expression of our devotion to the ideals and principles which were at the basis of the League of Nations. We are indeed amongst those who participated with enthusiastic faith in drawing up and putting into force the Covenant of the League of Nations. It is all the more pleasant to me to recall this fact since the Covenant in our eyes represented the possibility of ensuring the triumph of the three great principles on which the maintenance of peace between the nations depends. These principles are: the organisation of international co-operation, the establishment of absolute equality as between States, and collective guarantee of the territorial integrity and the political independence of all States Members.

So far as international co-operation is concerned, we have always considered, and we continue to believe, that this cannot be organised in an effective and continuous way unless the League of Nations is ensured that character of universality to which it has aspired since its inception, and failing the attainment of this, unless it maintains its activity within a setting that is devoid of all ideological conflict with States that are not Members of the League.

So far as the principle of equality is concerned, it seems to us impossible to conceive of an association of States the members of which do not enjoy equal sovereignty, do not enjoy the same rights, and are not subject to the same duties.

Finally, as regards the guarantee of the territorial integrity of States Members, we conceive this under the aspect of a guarantee that is both collective and effective, based upon the existing status quo and upon our political independence.

Such, indeed, were the principles which led us to sign the Covenant, and such still remain the principles on the basis of which we conceive our collaboration with the League of Nations. This all the more since we have been assured from the most authoritative quarter that there can be no question of intervening in the internal régime of any country, and that it is agreed that all forms of government being represented here, it follows that mutual respect for national conceptions must remain the rule. We must indeed note that our institution has not realised all our desires, nor justified all our hopes, and that the League of 1938 hardly resembles the picture that we conceived of it in 1920. Nevertheless, although we are compelled to make such an observation, we promise, as loyal Members of the League of Nations, our joint support to any effort which, taking full account of realities, shall be of such a nature as to ensure the application and the maintenance of the principles on which we based our adhesion to the Covenant.

Mr. Undén, Sweden: I have listened with the very keenest satisfaction to the statements that have been made which have expressed a firm will to support the League of Nations in a spirit that is in conformity with the principles on which it was founded. The Swedish nation remains firmly devoted to the League of Nations. It is convinced that the League will retain the character of a vast international organisation within which any State desirous of making a sincere and effective contribution to the common stock will find its place. Sweden belongs to the category of States that have sometimes been called States which have no alliances. For them participation in the League has in no sense the meaning of an alliance with any country or any group of countries. Through their collaboration with other Members within the League these States consider they are able to contribute towards ensuring that the League of Nations remains an international association in the real sense of the word and towards ensuring that they shall not defend the national and selfish interests of any particular State or group of States. The attitude of the League of Nations has frequently during the past years caused disappointment among the nations. I shall not now embark upon a discussion of the causes of the weakening of the League, nor shall I express any view as to the responsibilities incurred in that respect by different Members of the League, nor in fact shall I discuss the question whether another attitude adopted at decisive moments by Members of the League might have led to events taking a different turn and thereby leaving intact the very foundation of the League. Unfortunately the facts are there and it is an act of loyalty to recognise that the application of the provisions of the Covenant, the realisation of the aims which the League of Nations set before itself, has proved too great a task for its means has gone beyond the strength which its Members were prepared to put into the services of the common cause. The situation thus created calls for serious consideration, and the meeting of the Committee of Twenty-Eight will doubtless offer an appropriate occasion for such discussion. I am convinced that a discussion by that Committee for the purpose of throwing light upon the situation and better defining the relations between the League and its Members would in reality result in strengthening the links between those States who are Members of this institution.

M. Spaak, Belgium: Belgium remains faithful to the League of Nations. For my country the principles of the Covenant represent a high ideal to which sooner or later all peoples of the world must rally unless the world is to sink into anarchy. Belgium believes in the necessity for international law which shall be scrupulously observed. She sees therein the safest guarantee against all enterprises of force. For herself she is prepared to accept all solutions of conciliation and arbitration and she rejects with horror the idea of war. She is firmly convinced that the pacific ideal is the highest and most noble ideal that people can set before themselves. But the devotion that I intend to express towards these governing ideals cannot prevent me from emphasizing the evil from which the League of Nations suffers. On reflection, nothing would seem to be more dangerous to the very principles I have just stated than that such a situation of fact should be repeated, and it makes it possible to believe that the Members of the League are incapable of expressing their aspirations in action. Discredit is unfortunately fatal for our institution if it should seem to be merely the manifestation of a praiseworthy intention whereas it ought to be an effective implement. The peoples of the world must be given back their confidence in the League of Nations and the principles for which it stands. To bring that about they must be promised only what we are sure we can do. Moreover, was not this the work to which the Assembly invited us to set our hands, on July 4th, 1936, when it stated that it was desirous of strengthening the authority of the League of Nations by adapting the application of these principles to the lessons of experience. This it would appear to me implies a loyal effort to give the League of Nations a necessary universality. Belgium does not intend to renounce the possibility of any progress in the domain of law and international organisation, but she intends to serve her ideal without departing from reality. It is in this spirit she proclaims herself faithful to the League of Nations, being prepared to collaborate in anything that may render the League powerful and living.

THE DISCUSSION IN THE COMMITTEE OF TWENTY-EIGHT FOR THE REFORM OF THE COVENANT

Those Members of the League who want it to remain exactly as it is at present as the instrument of their common policy gave it clearly to be understood at the meeting of the Council on January 27th that the renewed discussions in the Committee for the Reform of the Covenant would have to conform strictly to the limits of the agenda, i.e. would be confined to a discussion of Lord Cranborne's Report on the universality of the League. It was in any case perfectly clear to everybody that the Committee would not under present circumstances take any action, and that it would put off recommendation "till better days".

But it was not possible to bar the subject altogether. Though on the one hand the declarations in the Council refrained—as the result of a compromise reached in previous negotiations behind the scenes—from any expression of sympathy for Article 16, the discussions in the Reform Committee on the other hand centred in Article 16, the starting-point of the criticisms of the so-called "mutineers" being none other than the necessity of any collective security system being based on universality as a condition precedent.

On this as on previous occasions the discussion in the Reform Committee ended to the satisfaction of the pro-sanctionist party in a victory over the "captious critics". Such "victories" inside Committees of the League can hardly be said to come as surprises; and the result on the present occasion changes nothing in the realities of the situation. The only striking feature about such victories is that it is always the same elements that emerge victorious; and that is really the greatest reproach that can be urged against the League. For the outcome of this discussion, the origin of which was the failure of the League attempt to apply Article 16, is simply that everything remains as it was. There will never be any reform of the Covenant, or at any rate no thorough-going reform. That is the conclusion that emerges from the discussion.

The stage management of the discussion was itself a demonstration of how a "revolt" can be quelled by means of the procedure Report, Counter-Report and Concluding Remarks. The real Report on this occasion was the Council meeting of January 27th. The Counter-Report was the "Neutrals' Day" which introduced the discussion in the Reform Committee. In conclusion, as at all public meetings, the safe speakers were put up—i.e. in this case the champions of sanctions and the further extension of the same—in the belief, for which there is as much foundation at Geneva as elsewhere, that the public always applauds the last speaker. The last speaker on this occasion was the French delegate Paul-Boncour.

It was the heavy-weights in the competition for Article 16 who spoke; and they spoke in the following order—Czechoslovakia, China, U.S.S.R., Colombia, Red Spain, Mexico and France. Some of them said that they were not against Fascist countries as such, but only against them because they had aggressive tendencies. It was left to del Vayo, the delegate of Red Spain, to say the Fascist countries were “hors la loi”. The representative of Colombia was allowed without opposition to describe the policy of neutrality as “public enemy Number One”; and the third of the group, the “godless” Litvinov, hastened to add in this connection that it was no good waiting till “God is for us all”, for people did not come to Geneva “merely to pray”.

The Press which is in the service of these tendencies had precluded the proceedings with unsavoury polemics against those delegates who in the interest of their own security, as well as from a true understanding of what is meant by international co-operation, were not prepared to toe the line. The chief offences in the eyes of these organs of the Press were the “scandalous” utterances outside Geneva of the Polish Foreign Minister Beck, the Swedish Foreign Minister Sandler and the Swiss Federal President Motta, all of which preceded the 100th Session of the Council and were treated by the Press in question as indicative of the “danger” that the Reform Committee might possibly at the eleventh hour live up to its name.

Although these utterances and the declarations to a similar effect which were duly made in the Reform Committee were unconnected, except in the most indirect way, with the attitude of Italy and Germany, it was inevitable that the counter-attack and the rally in defence of Article 16 should take the form of an offensive against that attitude; and any hesitations on the point were nipped in the bud by crediting Germany and Italy with the intention of destroying the League. These tactics have had one result at any rate. The idea of the formation of ideological blocs has now reached such a stage of development in the case of certain Members of the League, despite verbal assurances to the contrary within the League, that any amendment of the Covenant in the sense of those who advocate change may now be said to have become all but impossible. The decisive utterance on this issue came from Paul-Boncour. The countries, he said, who have left the League made the elimination of Article 16 the principal point in their attack on the League. That, he said, is a striking proof of the fact that they regard Article 16 as the chief danger to themselves. Consequently it is an indispensable necessity to uphold Article 16, and even to develop and extend it in the interests of the peace of the world. No other attitude could nowadays be expected of Paul-Boncour.

His utterances breathe, as always, the very spirit of Versailles. The only charge is that, since the renewal of Germany's strength and the emancipation of Italy the division of States into “conquerors and conquered” has been abandoned in favour of the division into “peaceful and aggressive peoples” or alternatively “democratic and Fascist systems”, to be regarded accordingly with the same mistrust and to be handled by the same methods.

France, U.S.S.R., China, Red Spain, Mexico and Colombia in common contempt of the non-Member States took occasion in the course of the Reform discussions to advocate the development and extension of the automatic sanctions system of the League, making scant concealment of their motives. It was no more than cheap phrases therefore when they hastened in the same breath to add, by way of a sedative for the “desponded” delegates, that they too were opposed to blocs.

It is in point of fact astonishing, when one reads the statements of a whole number of delegations, to observe what weight they all attach to the avoidance by the League of the establishment of blocs at all costs.

The declarations by the Neutrals clearly indicated the limits to be set in this connection. The fact that they differ from one another in certain respects cannot obscure the fact that their support of the collective security system of Article 16 is subject to very important conditions and to far-reaching reserves, and that even so they insist on a purely voluntary application of the Article on the basis of the directives of 1921.

It means very little, in the light of such interpretative explanations of the Article amounting as they do to a further important extension of the directives in question, that a formal majority was found to approve the principle of collective security. The criticism to which the principle was subjected loses none of its significance from the fact that the adoption of an escape resolution in favour of universality was successfully prevented. It was not only Sweden, Switzerland, the Netherlands, the Argentine and Chile who gave clear expression to their views on the subject: Poland and Belgium also made it plain that under present circumstances there can be no question of any enforcement by the League of the collective security system. The recent negotiations of the Little Entente and Balkan Entente have also shown that there is no longer any such overwhelming conviction in favour of another war of position by those within the League against those who stand outside, when normal friendly relations are possible without the League.

But what power of action is left to this League with its present Constitution and its inevitably European—rather than international—orientation, when a series of European States put forward such far-reaching reservations, and back them by cogent and cumulative arguments drawn from the realities of the European situation?

And if, in spite of this, and in spite of the pressing warnings that have been given, a discussion of this kind ends in a general certainty on the part of all the participants as they return to their respective countries that fundamental reform of the Covenant can never be carried, it is true to say that all the legal and political arguments against Geneva which have hitherto been urged still hold good, and that all hopes reposed in Geneva will continue to prove, as they have hitherto proved, vain.

Statements in the Reform Committee

Opening of the meeting by the Chairman M. Bourquin, Belgium: Members of the Committee will recall that when they dispersed at the end of September it was agreed that at the present session the Committee would consider Viscount Cranborne's Report on the participation of all States in the League of Nations. Together with its many other great merits, this Report has the advantage of considering the problem before us in its widest aspect. Of course it does deal with special and detailed questions also, or raises such questions, but above all it deals with the general conception of the League of Nations, and I think that Members of the Committee will agree that our exchange of views to-day ought to be confined to these general, and, in a sense, preliminary considerations. Since our first session the international situation has developed rapidly and preoccupations have emerged or become accentuated. No doubt these will find their echoes in our discussions, and I hope the discussion will provide full opportunity for the frankest expression of these preoccupations, of course in the atmosphere of confidence which always prevails in this Committee.

M. Undén, Sweden: During the present meeting of the Committee of Twenty-Eight we shall certainly not find it possible to deal thoroughly with all the problems that arise. Political conditions at the present time are uncertain, obscure and no one can say with certainty whether the League of Nations will be in a position to take initiatives and to proceed to those contacts that are necessary with a view to realising in a wider measure than at present that universality which is one of the objects towards which the League must direct its efforts. In the Swedish Government's opinion the question of universality is closely bound up with that of collective security. That is why I have asked to be allowed to speak in order to set forth the Swedish Government's attitude in this respect. At the beginning of his statement the Rapporteur says that there are three different ways in which the organisation of the collectivity of nations for the maintenance of peace may be regarded. In the first place there is a League of a coercive character. Such a League is based upon the idea that its Members are in certain circumstances bound to impose sanctions of one kind or another. The present League of Nations possesses this characteristic. The second type of organisation is a League of a different character, of an opposite character, that is to say, of a non-coercive character. Its Members have not accepted any obligation other than that of consulting together in the event of one Member violating the rules of the society. Between these two there is a third kind of society which the Rapporteur describes as intermediate. Such a League would be based on the idea that on the one hand the Members do not in advance undertake an obligation to impose sanctions, but on the other hand they do not abandon the possibility of taking part in them should it prove necessary, or should the occasion arise.

It is clear from the Rapporteur's statement that the realisation of a League of this kind can be conceived in various ways. The Rapporteur has not expressed his opinions in detail on the various alternatives which offer in this respect. Doubtless the League of Nations as defined by the provisions of the Covenant does possess the characteristics of a League of a coercive character. The Covenant is based on the idea that peace cannot be ensured merely by promises of non-aggression and by arbitration and conciliation agreements. Article 11 and Article 16 are both based on the concept of a League of Nations capable of intervening, not merely through mediation or through the adoption of resolutions and protests, but also in certain circumstances, if inevitable, by measures so serious that an aggressive State would expose itself to risks that were too great if it endeavoured to realise its aims by force. In view of the fact that the League does not possess an international military force, it follows that its means of effective intervention in the event of war or threat of war depend entirely on the solidarity of its Members, a solidarity which the Covenant makes a juridical obligation.

I am convinced that the ideas which are at the basis of the Covenant are correct in themselves. The League of Nations cannot, in the long run, maintain its cohesion or exercise an influence over international politics if it abandons in principle all means of pressure other than those of a moral character. An organisation of States which makes of respect for peace a fundamental principle of international law cannot regard with indulgence the violation of that principle without exposing itself to the danger of gradual decomposition. It is a sociological fact that violations of law against which action is not taken in the ultimate resort by coercive measures do rapidly lead to further violations, and very soon cause the principles of law to lose their influence over men's minds. Nevertheless, it should be recognised that the idea of collective security, however true it may be, cannot be realised in practice unless the League obtains a wide adhesion from the nations, unless it obtains, as is so often said, universality, this expression being taken in a relative sense. It is naturally impossible to indicate in any exact or general way the essential extent of participation, but no one, I think, will dispute the fact that a League of Nations which is very reduced in numbers finds it impossible to operate in accordance with the letter of the provisions of the Covenant. Further, the question must be asked, as the rapporteur has asked it, whether other factors than the number of members do not, indeed, influence the possibilities of the League from the standpoint of the taking of coercive measures. It is, indeed, possible that even should a large number of States belong to the League, economic and financial sanctions might prove to be ineffective in view of the resources possessed by the aggressor, his geographical situation or other circumstances which enabled him to offer a lengthy resistance; nor can we ignore the fact that, in a given case, economic and financial sanctions may appear to be inexpedient owing to the general political and economic situation of the world. The Covenant of the League of Nations does not take expressly into account any of the circumstances to which I have just referred or other situations that are of obvious importance. In the letter, Article 16 imposes on each member the duty of applying economic sanctions to the aggressor as soon as a war breaks out, but this system has never operated in practice. During the history of the League many acts of aggression and of war have occurred with which the League has had to deal. Now, Article 16 has been applied on one occasion only, and then in an incomplete and hesitating manner.

The experiences of recent years are of particular interest. During this period there have been conflicts about Manchuria, the Chaco War, the Italo-Ethiopian War, the conflict in Spain and the war in the Far East. I shall not attempt to indicate the reasons and the facts why, in each of the cases mentioned, the Members of the League have adopted an attitude of reserve; I shall confine myself to pointing out that the small States, who are often regarded as timid and hesitant in the matter of the application of sanctions, cannot rightly be held responsible for the failure of the League of Nations. On the contrary, it is rather the States which in theory support Article 16 with the greatest enthusiasm who have had objections to put forward against the application and pursuit of economic sanctions during these years. I desire to add, in passing, that I am not making any criticism; I do not at present in any way wish to open up a discussion with a view to fixing possible and ultimate responsibility. What I desire is, in particular to point out that to judge of the attitude taken by different States in the matter of sanctions, account must be taken not only of the declarations during the discussion but also, and above all, of their acts. I am convinced that a large number of Governments, if not all, represented in the League of Nations are of the opinion that in practice the provisions of Article 16 cannot at the present time be applied in their entirety. No State represented here could deny the evidence or dispute the fact of failure to apply sanctions during recent years in several cases in which, in accordance with the Covenant, sanctions were obligatory. Certainly I could not indicate the reasons which my colleagues, each for his own part, would desire to put forward to explain the attitude of their respective Governments. Probably the reasons urged would vary considerably. In my capacity as representative of the Swedish Government I would define the situation thus: following on the experiences of recent years, in view of the weakness of the League of Nations and the general political situation, the Members of the League have been led to recognise that the system of sanctions does not operate in an obligatory and automatic fashion. To any one who does not share this view, and who is prepared to state that economic sanctions continue to be obligatory and automatic, I would venture to point out that by taking that attitude he is reproaching his own Government for having failed in its obligations. Is there for instance, a single State amongst us—I venture to put this question—which, in accordance with the provisions of Article 16, is applying sanctions in the conflict now taking place in the Far East?

The system of sanctions is, I would note, for the moment in actual fact suspended. So, many statesmen have made pronouncements, both before the organs of the League and outside this institution, which go to show that they do not close their eyes to realities; and in this connection I would venture to refer to the passage in the speech of M. Delbos in the last Assembly in which he stated, in particular, that it would for the moment be chimerical to believe that the means of action which have been allowed to grow too weak are totally applicable as from to-day. Another expression of the same thought is to be found in the communiqué of July 1st, 1936, published by the Foreign Ministers of seven States, including Sweden, on the eve of the cessation of the sanctions applied against Italy. In this communiqué the following statement appears: "Whilst recalling that guiding principles were adopted in 1921 for the application of Article 16, we declare that, so long as the Covenant as a whole is applied only in an incomplete and inconsequent manner, we are compelled to take account of this fact in the application of the said Article."

However regrettable we may find the development that has taken place, it cannot in any case be denied that it has taken place. Taking note of the fact that the League refrains from intervening according to the methods laid down in the Covenant in conflicts that are taking place, it serves no useful purpose to close our eyes to the fact that this failure is the result of a comparison of the formal provisions of the Covenant, on the one hand, with the realities of the present time on the other hand. In my opinion we cannot but recognise openly that, for reasons which are well known, the League is not capable of carrying out the programme of the Covenant in its entirety. The conclusion to be drawn from this observation is that the League of Nations, in practice, no longer has the characteristic of a coercive League corresponding to the provisions of Article 16 of the Covenant. By the force of events, without any amendments to the Covenant, the practice has become established according to which Members of the League do not consider themselves bound to undertake coercive action against an aggressor State. This practice implies that at present time the League of Nations should be described as a League of the intermediate type, according to the rapporteur's expression.

I would like to add that the remark which I have just made regarding the application of the Covenant does not imply abandonment of the idea of collective security for the future. It does not even necessarily mean that at the present time the League abandons the possibility of intervening effectively in the case of a conflict through a spontaneously established collaboration between the Members of the League, a collaboration which might, in certain circumstances, be extended to non-Member countries.

The objection may be put forward to what I have said that a finding of the kind I have set forth would mean a further weakening of the Covenant and of the League; but the League is not weakened by recognising the weakness from which it actually suffers in fact. It is weakened rather by offering to the nations of the world repeated occasions for remarking the nonconformity of doctrine with practice. By maintaining in the present situation, which I should personally like to describe as a transition period, the friction of a system of automatic and obligatory sanctions we do not bring about the realisation of such a system. On the contrary, there is a danger that the League may be reproached with failing in its undertakings towards its Members, and that, on the other hand, Members may be reproached with failing in their undertakings towards the League. Such a result would inevitably be prejudicial to the political and moral authority of the League; it should be avoided.

M. Gorgé, Switzerland: The report which Viscount Cranborne has drawn up on the question of universality suffers from one defect. Doubtless it is its only one, but it is that it comes rather late. This lateness is not, however, in any way due to its author. If the report had been discussed without too great a delay, our deliberations might perhaps have led to happier results than we can expect from them to-day. The fact is, that in the meantime universality has received a further blow, the gravity of which it would be vain to hide.

As M. Spaak said the other day in the Council, the ill is there, and we can only fear that our remedies — if we do indeed discover any — may have lost something of their curative value owing to delays which we have not been the only ones to regret.

But though Lord Cranborne's report deals with a problem of which recent events have inevitably diminished the practical application, it does nevertheless raise certain questions of which the present importance cannot be doubted. Starting rightly from the idea that the problem of universality is governed by the very character that it is desired to confer upon the League of Nations, Lord Cranborne gives us a choice between three solutions: a League of Nations of a coercive character, a League of Nations of a non-coercive character, and a League of Nations of an intermediate character—that is to say, one endowed with a system of optional coercion. Thus we come straight away to consider the fate of Article 16 of the Covenant.

Article 16 thus becoming at this stage in our work the pivot upon which the whole reform of the Covenant seems to revolve, it is comprehensible that certain States should have thought it necessary to stop at that point. That a discussion of this character is delicate, we agree; it might easily clash with legitimate convictions or generous hopes. For our part, contrary to what has been said for example in a certain section of the Press, we are anxious to do nothing which might needlessly add to the difficulties—which are already sufficiently great—with which the League of Nations is now struggling.

But when a discussion is opened on a problem like that of sanctions we are bound to express our opinion. This problem does appear on our agenda; Sweden, in particular, has expressed her intention of stating her attitude thereto. That being the case, how can Switzerland argue from her special situation in order, for tactics' sake, to avoid any discussion of a matter which affects both the general interests of the League of Nations and its own essential interests? Our silence would not have been understood by our own public opinion.

After the statement made on December 22nd in the National Council by the head of our Foreign Political Department, M. Motta, Federal Councillor, some will perhaps think that the time has come for our country to make clear what is its position as a neutral State with regard to the League of Nations. This, however, is neither the time nor the place to take up that problem.

In this Committee, my duty is a more modest one. It relates only to one aspect of our neutrality within the League of Nations, namely, the problem of sanctions.

Switzerland was certainly defending her own interests, but she does not think that by denouncing certain illusions that were brought about by the breach of Article 16 she was doing a disservice to the interests of the League of Nations. Nevertheless, the confederation none the less remained faithful up to that point to the principle of sanctions. She was to remain faithful to it; she was bound to do so; she had undertaken engagements, therefore she was bound to keep them to the extent that was possible in view of the neutrality which had been universally recognised. To-day she finds herself in a different situation. What she was still able to do in a League of Nations which included three of her neighbours and which might still keep some hope for the return of a fourth, she would no longer be in a position to do without exposing her neutrality to most serious dangers in a League which two great neighbouring Powers had left and from which moreover two other great Powers, geographically distant, were absent. These facts in our eyes are decisive; they remove the political and psychological basis for differential neutrality which render Article 16 inapplicable for Switzerland. As M. Rutgers points out in his analytical statement, a League of Nations which is deprived of the co-operation of four great Powers renders more doubtful the eventual efficacy of sanctions contemplated in the Covenant, and increases the burden of those sanctions for the States called upon to employ them. In our case the increase in the burden would be so great that it would go beyond what we could reasonably sacrifice to international solidarity. Our very existence is at stake. It will be perhaps better understood to-day why we have so constitutionally the necessity for struggling in the cause of universality. Swiss people gave their co-operation to this great institution only in view of the hope that ultimately it would rally to its cause all the countries which are the creators of civilisation. Devoted as it is to a neutrality that is not selfish and is a necessity, jealous as it is of a political maxim which has freed it from struggles internally, whilst reducing the possibility of threats from without, how could my country not through a vital instinct revert to its traditional neutrality when the League of Nations gives disturbing signs of weakness? This so-called differential neutrality involves more sacrifices than has been generally recognised. Those sacrifices were counter-balanced by the very fact that the League of Nations was sufficiently compact for its universality not to be seriously compromised; there was an equilibrium. To-day the equilibrium is broken. We must deduce consequences from that fact. We have done everything possible not to reach this position. In September at the last Assembly our delegation exerted itself still further in order to facilitate the entry, the return or the continuance in the League of States whose co-operation in our view would give its full significance to such an effort of international collaboration as is ours. Doubtless, this effort to rally all might have led to increasing the elasticity and, let us say it quite clearly, to weakening certain Articles of the Covenant, but, as the Federal Council pointed out, what the Covenant would have lost in juridical substance it would have gained in moral effectiveness. Unhappily—and we regret it very deeply—our efforts, asserted with those of others in favour of universality, remained fruitless. We do not abandon that great objective; far from that, because that must be the objective of any real League of Nations. Doubtless Article 16 in the present political configuration of the world contains nothing that is particularly threatening. It is, it has been said, smitten with paralysis. As has been stated on various occasions, and as the Swiss Government notes once more, the League of Nations has in fact been brought back to the intermediate type referred to in Lord Cranborne's Report. If this were indeed the fact we would be justified, as far as we are concerned, in concluding that there is nothing that now prevents our neutrality from regaining the serene heights of impartiality, for if sanctions were optional Switzerland might have abstained. Though Article 16 may be devoid of binding force it has none the less remained in the Covenant. Controversies may arise as to its juridical value. Now as the Belgium Government said in a Note dated November 10th, 1936, it is important that in so serious a matter States should know as clearly as possible the extent of burdens falling upon them and of the external co-operation of which they are assured. At present we are in a state of uncertainty; this uncertainty is disturbing. Public opinion is uneasy. A state of disquiet exists. It would be advantageous to overcome this. The moral authority of the League would gain thereby.

For these reasons we felt we should associate ourselves with the initiative taken by Sweden. Sweden's preoccupations on this point are shared by ourselves; her findings, too. We draw different conclusions, but the starting point is the same. Just as the Swedish Government is, we are convinced that by taking note of facts as they are the League of Nations would be doing its own cause a real service. It would be emerging from an equivocal position which is bound to weigh heavily against its credit. We are resolved loyally to pursue our collaboration in this great institution for international co-operation. The League may, if it can but find inspiration in the spirit that should be hers, accomplish great things for the good and welfare of humanity. All that we ask—we ask nothing more—is that it should grant us conditions which enable us to collaborate with it without endangering the very bases of our national existence. We appeal to your clearheadedness as to your friendship. Act so that the League of Nations is sufficiently elastic not to drive away from it those who can no longer assume a burden which political circumstances have rendered too heavy. The League of Nations, it has been said, has often been behindhand in accepting an idea. Let us not this time be behindhand in noting a fact, in recognising the optional character of Article 16.

M. Rutgers, Netherlands: I should like to take the opportunity of the Report on the universality of the League to-day to submit a few observations concerning the obligations of Members of the League of Nations as arising under Article 16. I had the honour to prepare a report on this subject. You may think, perhaps, that it is not necessary for me to add anything further. May I remind you, however, that in that report I was not expressing the opinions of the rapporteur but as far as possible was dealing with the situation impartially. Now I am in a position in which I can speak freely and express my own personal views, and, what is more important, the views of my own Government.

As I stated in my report, there are several causes that have hampered the development of collective security. The first of these is the absence of universality in the League of Nations. If all the countries of the world were united it would be comparatively easy to take the necessary action to restrain any refractory State, but the situation is certainly very different at the present time, when the majority of those States that would be entitled to occupy permanent seats upon the Council are outside the League of Nations. A rupture of obligations under the Covenant might now, in all probability, be due to the action of very highly armed States, and therefore those who were called upon to take action in consequence of that rupture would have to bear very heavy sacrifices, and their resultant success would be by no means certain. Then in the next place there is the question of peaceful changes of existing territorial and other arrangements. Fourthly, as I have mentioned in my report, we must remember the unhappy results of the application of Article 16 on the one occasion on which it has been applied. It is difficult, I think, to say which is the worse—the failure to apply a provision or the application of a provision leading to failure on the only occasion on which it is applied.

What conclusions can be drawn from our observations? On July 1st, 1936, the Foreign Ministers of seven States, including the Netherlands, published a special statement—a statement that has already been quoted this morning. Now we are able to make the following observations. The military sanctions provided for in Article 16 have always been recognised as optional in character. The economic sanctions provided for under Article 16 were in accordance with the letter of that Article deemed to be compulsory. They depend, however, in practice, not merely on the question of whether a casus foederis has arisen but on a whole series of factors that cannot be defined beforehand, and one of these factors that must be taken into account is the political relations existing at any given moment between the Great Powers. I think we should be doing an ill service to collective security if we shut our eyes to the reality of facts. I think it is no exaggeration to say that there has been in fact a tacit revision of Article 16 so that the League, instead of being a coercive body, is now nothing more than an optionally coercive body. Those countries that have not permanent seats on the Council cannot allow the idea to be accepted that sanctions are to be applied when the Governments occupying permanent seats decide that they should apply. That would make of the small States nothing more than auxiliaries in carrying out action that was decided upon by the Great Powers without at the same time any guarantees being offered to those small States acting as auxiliaries. Nothing can be more harmful than a state of confusion, of doubt.

It is not with any feeling of satisfaction that the Netherlands Government has been led to take note of the present facts as I have outlined them. We adhered to the Covenant in a spirit of complete conviction; with, as we thought, a full knowledge of the consequences it involved. We do not—we never did—desire to return to the old system of general neutrality on the outbreak of any war. We still support the idea of collective security, but we feel bound to recognise facts. The prospects that were contemplated, the conditions that were anticipated when the Covenant was drafted, have not been realised. Therefore, the obligations imposed in the light of those prospects and conditions can no longer continue. Indeed, of those obligations, we may say that some are dead and buried.

Burial, however, involves the idea of resurrection.

The above speeches have been given at length for the reason that they state in positive and definite terms the attitude of the speakers on the question of Article 16, and are not merely collections of meaningless phrases. Starting from different standpoints, they have the same aim in view.

The remarks of the Polish delegate Komarnicki also came within the category of far-reaching reservations on the subject of Article 16. Komarnicki referred to the speech of the Polish Foreign Minister Beck in the Polish Diet of January 10th, to his declaration in the Council, and further to the Polish Government's Memorandum on the Reform of the Covenant of December 9th, 1937. The French paper "Populaire", an organ of the Front populaire, described the Polish representative's utterances as "scandalous", and made great play with the "duplicity of a country which proclaims its alliance with France and continues at the same time to flirt with Hitler."

The representative of the Argentine, Cantilo, reminded his audience that the Argentine had striven for the universality of the League as a genuine instrument of Justice and Peace at a time when there was no such intention on the part of those responsible for its foundation. The reference is to the decision of the former Allied and Associated Powers that the conquered countries must give proof of a change of heart by an initial period of "probation" before they could be admitted to the august society. The efforts of the Argentine in this connection must have afforded ample evidence of the strength of the opposition to universality at every period of the League's existence. The explanation of that opposition is quite simple. The establishment of equal rights for all would have meant the abandonment of the policy of using the League as an instrument for the enforcement of the dictated Peace Treaties by the former victors. The connection between the two conceptions is equally unmistakeable today.

The efforts of the South American countries to evolve peace methods of their own for the prevention of war have led them, without any desire on their part, into a position of continually increasing antipathy to the tendencies which have been at work on the transformation of the Geneva institution into a conscious coalition of Powers and will continue, if they have their way, to transform it still further. But what to the South American countries appears as a first necessity of the situation—such steps, for instance, as the co-ordination of the League Covenant with the Saavedra Lamas Pact—is as far from the intentions of the champions of Geneva collectivism as Buenos Ayres is from Geneva—not to say, Moscow. The years of negotiation in the attempt to co-ordinate and the continual postponements of the negotiations are sufficient proof of this divergence of views.

The Argentine representative suggested that the Committee might at any rate do its duty to the extent of drawing up rules for application in "better times", while adhering for the immediate future to the "Directives" of 1921. But everyone has not the same idea of what is meant by better times. There are members of the League to whom it would be as the breath in their nostrils to be able to make a second "test trial" of the sanctions machinery. "Better times" is a relative term. This much is certain that the League of Nations has never bettered any time.

The Chilean delegate Valdes-Mendeville spoke immediately after the Czecho-Slovak representative, the Czecho-Slovak Ambassador in Paris, Osusky. The latter had just said he could well understand the anxieties of Sweden, Switzerland and the Netherlands; but the violation of a rule ought not to be taken as a reason for doing away with the rule. The Ten Commandments were violated every day; but they still stood. To this sally Valdes-Mendeville answered that the question at issue was not the reform of the Ten Commandments but the reform of a man-made institution.

Chile, he went on to say, had been engaged for two years past in the struggle for universality. What was yesterday merely a desirable objective had today become a vital and imperious necessity. The achievement of universality was the only justification of the League's existence; and it was only the hope of its achievement which had induced Chile to join the League. The first and greatest breach in the principle of universality was the refusal of the United States to join; but that did not prevent Chile from continuing her loyal co-operation with the League at the time. Again in 1926, when another great American nation withdrew in the person of Brazil, Chile did not lose heart. In 1932 moreover complete universality was realised de "facto".

"All States, including those whose important co-operation is lacking to-day, were gathered round the table of the Disarmament Conference. The long proceedings led to a complete fiasco. Was this merely the failure of a Conference? No, it was the collapse of Article 8 of the Covenant, which opens up the entire construction, that is to say, the first article of a complete system for the maintenance of world peace, the article which signified a universal economic and political hope. In view of this brutal collapse of Article 8 and of all the decisions and events which ensued, can it be thought that the obligations under other articles, such as that of collective action, must be maintained in their entire force and scope? We are of opinion that such a statement is not only vain, but is extremely dangerous."

At the close of the discussion the Chilean representative was led, in presence of the negative results, to make the following declaration:

"Chile has constantly taken the view, and is to-day more than ever convinced, of the necessity of a substantial reform of the Covenant in a general discussion between Member and Non-Member States, and considers that this is the only solution and the only effective attempt to procure real authority for the League by means of far-reaching authority."

The Government of Chile, after noting the negative results of this Committee and taking into consideration the practice for the application of the Covenant in the past, is compelled, in the present position and so long as that position exists, to reserve formally her freedom of action, both as regards the impending discussion in the Council on this question and as regards the League of Nations in general."

The other countries represented on the Committee made short statements through the mouth of their representatives to the effect that they did not consider reform of the Covenant opportune for the moment, or on other grounds had no objection to the adjournment of the discussion. Of the utterances of the unflinching Sanctionists, two extracts must be made from the speeches of Litvinov and Paul-Boncour. Our readers shall be spared the remarks of Del Vayo, representative of Red Spain, the bombastic character of which was such as, even in the judgment of his friends and supporters, to outdo any previous performances of the Spanish Popular Front champions at Geneva.

With the self-conscious tone of a 150 per cent. League enthusiast Litvinov proceeded "with every kind of waggishness", as a leading Swiss newspaper put it, to review the speeches of the Neutrals. Their attitude he sarcastically described as an attempt to turn the League into something between a diplomatic Academy and a philanthropic institution. Their watchword seemed to be "Each for himself and God for us all".

"The cynicism of Litvinov," wrote the Neue Zürcher Zeitung, "could not fail to create a deplorable impression in view of the highly unsatisfactory situation of the League, for which the fatal activities of the Soviet Union at Geneva are themselves more than a little responsible." That is a mild way of putting it; but it reveals the beginnings of a glimmering of what the part played by Moscow at Geneva really means. Coming from such a quarter, the charge of selfishness launched against States whose loyalty to the League and its Covenant is more unsullied than that of any other member of the League and constitutes indeed the last element of moral support of that tottering institution, is nothing less than shameful. Continuing in the tone of a schoolmaster, the representative of Moscow set to work to ply the Neutrals with questions with the object of making them appear ridiculous. Should their neutrality be regarded as unilateral or bilateral? Did they expect the League of Nations to protect their neutrality, or should the League itself remain neutral when their neutrality was violated? Litvinov in this passage of his speech himself supplied the proof that in the eyes of the Soviet Union the Geneva institution is worthless except in so far as it can be organised as a coalition directed against the Soviet's enemies, the "aggressor States". If the U.S.S.R. had been concerned to pacify the "mutineers", it would never have made such play with this argument. But that is not the purpose of the U.S.S.R. at all. Moscow's whole aim and object is to create a bloc, which Litvinov is clever enough to disguise as a Peace bloc, but which on closer inspection is revealed as an ideological bloc directed against the Fascist States.

The line taken by the Russian was followed up by his Ally, the French representative Paul-Boncour. He described Litvinov's speech as "admirable". Article 16 was the "point vulnérable" of those who were out to shatter the League. It was a mistake in his opinion to sacrifice the Covenant in the interest of increase of the League's membership. To advocate such a course was to misapprehend the "true interests" of Geneva. Article 16 was more valuable as an asset than the co-operation of countries outside the League or, for that matter, the lukewarm support of members whose attitude he could understand but never approve: such lukewarm supporters failed to realise that "the burden of to-day may become the lucrative investment of to-morrow." Such was the theme of this representative of France. One would like to know to what extent it really represents the attitude of his Government.

The clean-cut contributions of this master of French dialectic to the problems of League policy are not new. It is a source of satisfaction to him to be able with fine-spun arguments to discuss such questions as the maintenance of Article 16. He is ready to discuss them with his last breath, heedless of the resulting postponement of the solutions until such time as the League itself has gone under.

STATEMENT BY M. JOSEPH BECK, MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS, IN THE FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE OF THE DIET, ON JANUARY 10TH, 1938

Gentlemen,

The period with which I propose to deal today is a part of that series of years which I have defined in my previous statements in parliament as a period of fundamental change in the methods of international policy.

I would like to recall briefly that I have characterised this change as a disturbance of the methods proposed for the settlement of relations between States in the post-War atmosphere. It was thought at that time that the sudden shock would radically and definitely bring about a change in the methods of thought and action of humanity.

As far as we are concerned, we have always affirmed our sympathy with the idea of seeking fresh paths to spare mankind the victims and sacrifices suffered at the particular point where the best forms of agreement might possibly have prevented them. Nevertheless, apart from the deeper changes which take place in the structure of international life, the very forms assumed from the outset by this new idea carried the germ of many failures and on more than one occasion necessarily gave rise to reservations.

Conclusions.

It is intelligible in the light of such discussions, proceeding merrily ever since October 10th 1936 and always without result, passing from the Assembly to the Council and from the Council to the Committee and then back again to and fro, to and fro, how heavy, dead and unpractical every ripple of the waves that go out from the Geneva institution must be. The Jubilee of the Council was also the jubilee of the adjournments. It is astonishing with what obstinacy the League goes on spinning its old threads regardless of the ever-recurring rents in the fabric. The obsolete and inoperative methods of the past still dominate its activities. There is scarcely even an attempt to face the confused realities of the modern world with clear vision and wholesome thinking. International law a live thing? Yes, indeed! But what can the Geneva League claim to have contributed to the development of international law in the shape of a living or directive idea or a transmutation of theory into practice? On the contrary, the League has become more and more of an instrument of political interests instead of a regulator of unsolved and dangerous problems calling, not merely for attention, but for settlement in such a way as to relieve tension and promote peace. The law of which it is the embodiment is to-day responsible for more injustices than ever. Its binding connection with the dictated Peace treaties has prevented the League from making the decisive transition from the present system of attempts with unsuitable means to settle disputes or prevent wars to a system of actual and effective establishment of real peace.

A leading article which appeared in "The Times" on the Jubilee of the Council pointedly remarked that, if the League was no longer in the same position as it was when Germany, Japan and Italy were members of it, that was due to the failure of the democratic countries to make any attempt to transform its character. In principle, its character had remained unchanged throughout the years since its foundation. It served no useful purpose, "The Times" concluded, to ignore the fact that the countries leaving Geneva left it because they felt the League was more concerned with the maintenance of the "status quo" than with the revision of the Peace treaties.

"Much phrase-making and very little conviction!" Such was the verdict of the Paris "Journal" on the speeches of the Geneva matadors. "Words, words, nothing but words!" So it ended its comments on the League Session. Well! There was nothing new in that.

During the period of which I propose to speak, this process of transformation and these failures sometimes assumed a drastic character, and yet it would be difficult to maintain that this process has already reached its conclusion. I venture today to give again a detailed analysis of these general phenomena. I will begin by reviewing our own affairs.

Here the picture I am about to paint will not be so pessimistic. In previous years I have frequently had occasion, in speaking to you, Gentlemen, to insist on the tendency of our Government always to examine in a strictly realistic fashion each of the problems concerning our State, independently of contingencies and changing currents of opinion in the world.

It is for this reason that we have been charged on more than one occasion with our alleged excessive predilection for "bilateralism" and for too scrupulous a limitation of our conversation to those parties who could give a direct decision in the problems under discussion.

I think today we can dot the i's and state that we have endeavoured to work in such a manner that none of the essential political interests of Poland should if possible be injured or dragged into the confusion observable in methods of international cooperation based on too wide a plan.

Our relations with our neighbours, which are essentially governed by our two pacts of non-aggression with the Soviet Union and the German Reich, are independent of any international institution or procedure. Indeed, these treaties were concluded while both these Powers were outside the League of Nations; they are based on well thought-out reasons and political interests and they continue to retain their full value.

Our two treaties of alliance, with France and Roumania, though they are in no way opposed to the Covenant of the League of Nations and even mention the Geneva institution in their text, date back to the year 1921, that is to say to a time when the organisation of the League of Nations was insufficiently defined and when these alliances were regarded essentially as a matter in themselves, and not as a rider or supplement to the League Covenant.

The greatest measure of confusion was introduced into these problems by the Locarno agreements. However that may be, the obsolete form of those agreements is now a thing of the past.

I think I may regard it as a significant fact that, particularly during the last two years, the scope, vitality and advisability of these alliances have been thrown into relief, both here and in the allied countries, while our direct contact with those countries has been expressed in a manner that was both important and particularly agreeable to us. It is this particular fact which best determines the character of these agreements.

The stay in Poland of eminent statesmen of other European countries cannot, in my opinion, but confirm the fact that while, on the one hand, the foreign policy of Poland tends deliberately to restrict its action in accordance with the real means at our disposal, on the other hand we do not conceive our duty too strictly and we endeavour to strengthen and develop the friendly agreements with the States with whom we may have common interests or common conceptions.

Under these circumstances we may note that the past year has brought practical possibilities of contact, exchange of views and cooperation with other States. We may therefore repeat that it is rather the forms of international life that have weakened and not its essence.

Reverting to matters which directly concern Poland, I would also remind you of the important results that we have attained through the fact that, as far as we are concerned, we do not refuse to seek new forms. For this reason, by endeavouring, in agreement with the Government of the German Reich, to consolidate our relations which are based on the principal of good neighbourly feelings, we have decided to settle one of the most essential problems in this sphere, namely that of the treatment of national minorities on both sides of the frontier. We had at our disposal no system which has resisted the test of life.

But, while realising clearly the object to be attained, we found in the declaration of November 5th, 1937 a new model which, I am convinced on the one hand reasonably guarantees the internal cohesion of each of the two States and on the other hand is calculated to create proper conditions for the co-existence of an important group of citizens attached to their own culture with the principal national element of each of the two States. I consider that this act—together with the simultaneous liquidation last July of the last traces of the interference of external elements in certain parts of Polish and German territories—as a very essential fact which is destined to consolidate and strengthen the principles of the agreement of January 1934.

As regards our second neighbour, in the opposite geographical direction, namely the Soviet Union, the past year has brought no essential changes. Our attitude and our policy continue as in the past to be based on the Pact of Non-Aggression of 1932 with all its supplements, so that the current problems which have arisen have been settled in an atmosphere of objective negotiation.

On going further to the East, mention should be made of the fact that last Autumn the Legations at Tokio and Warsaw were raised to the rank of Embassies, and this is a testimony of the spirit of good-will and mutual esteem which characterise Polish-Japanese relations.

A chronological statement of a whole series of visits which have been paid to Warsaw and of contemplated visits are sufficient to prove both the sustained interest which we have in the Baltic and the importance which we attach to the consolidation of relations conceived on a plane of wide cooperation with the States bordering on that sea. A sentiment of constantly increasing solidarity connects us with those States with which we have a common frontier, either by land or sea, with the sole exception that is well known to you.

Similarly in the Danube basin we are anxious to maintain our traditional friendships and I hope that our relations in that region will continue to develop happily. As regards this question it should be borne in mind that, of the various political plans and conceptions that have been put forward, the idea that enjoys the greatest favour in Poland is that of settling relations in this sphere in accordance with the principles proposed by the French and Italian Governments during the visit of the French Minister of Foreign Affairs to Rome in January 1935.

Permit me, Gentlemen, again to remind you of my opinion of the present situation: (1) the crisis of the forms of international life has been aggravated; (2) we can state without fear of contradiction that Polish policy has suffered relatively least from this cause.

I return to the crisis which is connected with the League of Nations, its difficulties and failures. Indeed, certain undoubted successes obtained by means of international arrangement reached outside the League of Nations do not give a favourable testimony of its present position.

For a long time I have been unable to avoid the impression—which I have moreover communicated to the Chambers in my remarks on this subject—that there are two radically opposite tendencies at Geneva. On the one hand, practice and experience have shown beyond question that the integral application of the principles of the Covenant goes beyond the means of the instrument called upon to put it into effect. On the other hand, it is paradoxical to note not only the progress of doctrinary or political passions which tend to impose on this poor League of Nations more and more arduous tasks, but also a formal tendency to widen, by means of theoretical formulae applied only on paper, the gaps in the effective activity of the League. Polish diplomacy, being desirous of maintaining a correct attitude in the actions of our country and being moreover anxious for the very fate of the Geneva institution, has endeavoured for more than two years to bring this dangerous contradiction into relief, and to find for the definite settlement of the problems raised at the Geneva sessions its own course which is determined both by respect for treaty undertakings and by a sense of realities and a clear view of the future.

Naturally I do not mean by this that the search for better and juster solutions of international conflicts is an unreal undertaking.

But, what is unreal?

It is, in the first place, the alleged possibility of maintaining a state of affairs in which the statute and regulations of an institution destined to embrace all the countries in the world are only applied in the long run by a certain number of States between themselves and to others. Moreover the fact that the League of Nations did not from the outset combine all States and more particularly the States possessing the greatest power was in itself a source of crisis. We definitely realised this from the time when the League of Nations even lost its character of a European organisation. This state of affairs was particularly aggravated when various acts and declarations reduced almost to zero the hope that a number of States of the first importance whither Geneva would return to it.

Moreover we are not alone in affirming that it is impossible for a group of States alone to bear the heavy burdens and obligations which are imposed by the Covenant of the League of Nations on its Members while the other States are relieved of these burdens. I allude in particular to the obligations which a State individually might be compelled to fulfil automatically, solely on account of its participation in the League, the obligation of undergoing sacrifices and acting against other States.

Public opinion in the Scandinavian countries, Belgium, Switzerland, the Netherlands and other countries insists definitely on this point.

We are also not alone in maintaining that the Geneva meetings cannot, without prejudice to the whole of world policy, degenerate into federations of doctrines and still less into a bloc which would direct its action against other blocs. Quite recently, Mr. Eden, in his statement in the House of Commons, emphasised this point of view.

But views on this problem die hard and conclusions on this state of affairs are reached so slowly that I have been compelled to have recourse to the press in order to explain our attitude to Polish and foreign public opinion. On several occasions I have taken the opportunity of presenting to the Chambers the Government's view regarding the very idea of the League of Nations and of stating the importance I attach to the existence of this international institution. But I have also had occasion to state no less clearly that it would be impossible for Poland to adhere to doctrinal blocs or to make our State an instrument of a policy the aims and means of which are not clearly defined by ourselves.

We have no intention of taking any initiative to accentuate the present crisis of the League of Nations. But we must always know exactly for what we are responsible, what are our definite commitments, under what conditions and on what principles international institutions take their decisions. The main reason that leads me to raise this problem in public is, on the one hand, the fact that in certain quarters of international public opinion the changes recently brought about by the withdrawal of Italy and the German declaration regarding the League of Nations have been taken too lightly, and on the other hand the opinion disseminated in various quarters that the League of Nations could not but profit from present events. It is difficult to avoid the impression that certain persons would like the League of Nations to be an instrument directed against the so-called totalitarian States. It is striking to note that these same persons would like, as it were, to "totalise" international life by using the League of Nations for the purpose. This seems to me to be a flagrant contradiction which needs no comment. I merely wish once more to emphasise the fact that we respect the right of all to handle their affairs in the way most suited to their conceptions, provided they do not claim to model the others, and ourselves in particular, on their own lines.

There is another danger at Geneva. It is moreover a matter of procedure rather than of written principles. As I have already pointed out, as new problems arose, it was fairly natural that the difficulties encountered by the League should cause certain States which were interested in these problems or which could at any rate influence their solution to meet in more or less numerous Conferences. We have taken part in some of these steps, in particular in the Committee for non-intervention in Spanish affairs, in the profound conviction that this was the only practical means of avoiding an extension of the complications which might arise out of the events in Spain. On the other hand, we have categorically opposed, and will continue to do so in future, the consistent practice of causing the League of Nations with all its Members to adopt decisions taken by a single group of States outside the League of Nations. I am very much afraid that, in the opinion of many countries that have already a sort of attachment to the international action accomplished at Geneva, this latter factor has had a certain discouraging effect on their attitude towards the Geneva institution.

I have endeavoured to give you an analysis of certain organic defects of the League of Nations and of the influence of the events of the last few years on its action.

Nevertheless, the statement of the political problems which directly concern us shows that we have come out fairly well. It does not follow that we shall escape complications in certain spheres. I am thinking of the fate of certain Polish ideas and measures which we desire to realise with the assistance of the cooperation of Geneva with the other States. As you are aware, we have put forward in this field some questions which are of keen and direct interest to us, in particular emigration and the access to raw materials. The discussion to which these questions have given rise has enabled our demands to be made known to and understood by the other States.

Independently of general subjects, the League of Nations has in its hands the decision of a concrete problem, the future of Palestine. This question constitutes an essential factor for the settlement of the general problem of Jewish emigration. This problem, in turn, constitutes a very important section in our entire emigration problem. For reasons varying according to the countries and their conditions of life this problem has moreover exceeded its local framework and become a European question. All these problems are and will remain essential for us, independently even of the fate of the League of Nations, for they are practical questions which demand constant attention. We hear more and more frequently of plans and ideas for a reconstruction of international, economic and financial relations. We have been compelled to note that there are no serious prospects of the success of these plans so long as people close their eyes to the urgency of the problem of raw materials and that of emigration.

It is obvious that if the League of Nations proves to be powerless in this respect we shall not abandon our efforts to find, either by agreement with the various Powers or by means of some collective action, effective means of solving problems which not only concern our vital interests but also constitute a part of the general work of reconstructing a normal and tolerable life in the world. I must add that the first result of the study of this problem is by no means discouraging.

The anxieties of which I have spoken are largely due to the fact that the League of Nations, in the time of its prosperity, took upon itself great rights and obligations in the entire world. The means of accomplishing these tasks were not always well calculated; we have had an opportunity of observing this in the sphere of action of our direct interests, for instance in the Free City of Danzig.

Geneva will still have much trouble with the problems arising in various parts of the world and I really do not know how the Geneva collectivity will meet the obligations it has assumed.

It would be risky at the present time to make any prophecies as to the fate of the Geneva institution. It seems to me equally doubtful that the next session of the Council of the League in January can bring any decisive decisions in this respect. But I have the impression that the undeniable weakening of the League cannot fail to increase the feeling of individual responsibility of the various Governments, the vast majority of whom undoubtedly desire a peaceful existence for their peoples and therefore also for others.

It is therefore with the keenest interest that we follow the attempts to bring about discussions between the various capitals, since we are convinced that the experiences of recent years and a sound appreciation of the position by the European States will not allow us to be faced with proposals for international cooperation which are contrary to the immovable principles of our policy and to our vital interests.

SPEECH BY THE FÜHRER AND CHANCELLOR, ADOLF HITLER, BEFORE THE GERMAN REICHSTAG ON FEBRUARY 20th, 1938

I. Text of the Statements on Foreign Affairs

Gentlemen, men of the German Reichstag!

I am well aware that you, and with you the German Nation, were expecting to be called together on the occasion of the fifth anniversary of the day on which we entered into power, to the end that you, the elected representatives of the Reich, might celebrate with me the beginning of a new period in the development of our nation, a date that is fraught with so many memories for us National-Socialists.

My reasons for calling the meeting of the Reichstag for to-day were twofold: in the first place I wished to make a number of changes in important posts and it seemed to me fitting to make them after, rather than before, January 30th; while in the second place I deemed it advisable to effect a further and very necessary understanding is a certain department of foreign affairs before addressing you.

You all expect, and justifiably, that on such a day there should be not merely a report on the past, but also some suggestion as to what may be expected in the future. My speech to-day will, therefore, contain both.

The new National Socialist Army

A great German peace army — Party and Army

Gentlemen, eighteen years ago, at this time, I first proclaimed the programme of the Party. Then, during the period of Germany's deepest humiliation and greatest helplessness, at a time of inconceivable misery, I proclaimed as one of the aims of the National-Socialist Party the abolition of the army of mercenaries forced upon us by the Treaty of Versailles and the creation of a great, strong national army. As an unknown soldier in the Great War, I formulated this daring programme. For fourteen years I fought for it against a world of internal enemies and hate-inspired foreigners. In five years I have brought this programme to realisation! As regards this, the greatest achievement of the New Reich, there is no need for me to go into details. I only wish to make known the following facts:

Germany's peace-time army is complete! A powerful German air force protects our homeland! A new navy guards our coasts! Together with the gigantic general increase in our production, it was possible to carry out an unparalleled rearmament programme!

If wiseacres abroad are comforted by the thought, we are quite willing to let them believe in the existence of the Lord only knows what kind of differences between the Armed Forces and National Socialism. We do not in the least begrudge them this kind of satisfaction. However in case they should ever wish to come to other conclusions, I will say the following to them now: There is in Germany no problem of a National-Socialist state and a National-Socialist Party, and no problem of a National-Socialist Party and National-Socialist Armed Forces. In this Reich, everyone who holds a responsible position is a National-Socialist!

Every man carries the National-Socialist emblem on his cap. Every institution of this Reich is under the command of the supreme political leader, and they have all pledged themselves to, and are united in, the will and determination to uphold this National-Socialist Germany, and, if it should become necessary, to defend it to the last. It would be a mistake to believe any other version on the authority of those who in Germany have already proved the poorest prophets. The Party leads the Reich in political matters, and the Armed Forces protect the Reich. Each institution in the Reich has its allotted task, and there is no one in a responsible position in this state who doubts that I am the authorised leader of this Reich and that the nation through its trust in me has given me a mandate to represent it everywhere and in every sphere. Just as the German Armed Forces are devoted to the National-Socialist state with unswerving loyalty and obedience so the National-Socialist state and the Party which leads it feel pride and joy in them. We see in them the consummation of National-Socialist training which holds the individual German under its influence from early youth onward. The political and mental attitude which he acquires in the political organisations is here supplemented through his training and education as a soldier.

On this occasion I cannot fail to mention with appreciation those men who, as the trustees of the Armed Forces, the Army, the Navy and the Air Force, have helped me to build up this wonderful instrument.

When the first great work of reconstruction was completed, I was compelled to respect Field-Marshal von Blomberg's wish to retire in order to restore his impaired health after all his exertions. But I should like to express here my own and the German nation's thanks for this soldier's infinitely steadfast and loyal work for the new Reich and its armed forces. This work will always be inseparable from the history of the foundation of this Reich. The same is true of the activity and admirable work of General von Fritsch, and of all those who in the rejuvenation of our political and military corps of leaders have, with great unselfishness and generosity, given up their places to younger men.

We all know what sort of a foundation the former Reichswehr of a hundred thousand men was for the quick rearmament of the German armed forces. But we know also that the mighty tasks presented require for their performance a steady influx of younger men to take the places of those who have grown old. Above all we know that the tasks of the future demand a stronger concentration of the political and military power in the Reich than was perhaps necessary before. I therefore resolved, after Field-Marshal von Blomberg's retirement, to place under my own direct command the three services and to make them directly subordinate to me personally as Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces. I hope thus to achieve in the shortest possible time that strengthening of our military powers of defence which the general conditions of the time seem today to require.

As its elected Leader I should like to assure the German people today that however much peace means to us, we are equally resolved to defend our honour and the inalienable rights of our people. Though I stand for the cause of peace, I shall always see to it that that instrument which I am convinced is the only sure and effective guarantee of peace in such troubled times, is never weakened, much less taken away from the German people.

And though I can assure the world of the German people's sincere and profound love of peace, I must assert, beyond all doubt, that this love of peace has nothing to do with feeble renunciation or with cowardice and dishonour. If ever an international campaign of hatred and defamation seeks to wreck the peace of our Reich, steel and iron will protect Germany and her people. And then, as quick as lightning, the world would see to what extent this Reich, Party and armed forces are imbued with the same fervid spirit and will! It is, however, not my intention especially to defend the honour of the German Officers' Corps against the slanderous attacks of international journalists. Nor is it necessary to do so. For, after all, there are two kinds of journalists, the truth-lover and the perjured, despicable liar, deceiver of the people, and warmonger. But there is only one kind of German officer!

Thought for the future

Gentlemen, you have just listened to the description of the great progress which Germany has made thanks to the National-Socialist revolution and under the leadership of the Party. But the greatness of this achievement compels one to be concerned for the future.

The economic programme for the future is known to you. No other way remains to us but to work harder and thus to produce more. The German people is a people which makes high demands on life. If the rest of the world were influenced by great statesmen instead of by journalists, it would be thankful for this fact. For, the higher the standard of living and culture of a nation, the greater will be its longing for peace. It is peace alone which can enable it to accomplish those things which make a high standard of life possible.

Lack of fertile soil

Our economic position is difficult—not, however, because National Socialism rules in Germany, but because in this country there are 140 human beings to the square kilometer, because we have not been given those great natural resources which other nations possess, because, above all, we have a lack of fertile soil. If the British Empire were suddenly to be dissolved to-day and England were to be restricted to its own living space, then perhaps the English would better understand the difficulty of the economic problems which confront us. The fact that Germany has mastered these problems and the manner in which she has done so are miracles and something of which we can be really proud. Germany possesses no sort of gold or foreign exchange reserves, the reason for this not being that National Socialism is in power, but that the non-National-Socialist, democratic-parliamentary State was despoiled for 15 years by a world eager for plunder; Germany is a country which has to support 140 people to the square kilometer and possesses no colonies whatever; Germany is lacking in numerous raw materials and is neither able nor willing to lead a fraudulent existence on credits; but this same country has reduced its unemployment to zero, and has not merely maintained its standard of life, but has even improved it and has done all this by its own efforts. Now when a people has accomplished a miracle of this sort, then those nations at any rate should be silent who, in spite of the most favourable economic conditions, hardly manage to solve their own unemployment problems.

Currency cover

In future too it will be our task to preserve the German people from all illusions. But the worst illusion is to imagine that one can enjoy anything which has not first been created and produced by labour; in other words, in future too it will be our duty to make it clear to every single German, in town and country, that the value of his labour must always be equivalent to his wage. That is, the farmer can only get for his agricultural products what the townsman has previously earned, and the townsman can only get what the farmer has won from the soil, and taken all together, they can all only exchange what they produce, and money only plays the part of intermediary. It has no utility-value of its own. Every mark more paid in Germany presupposes that a mark's worth more labour has been performed. Apart from that this mark is a mere piece of paper without purchasing power. But we want our German Reichsmark to remain an honest note, an honest token for the product of labour just as honestly performed by another. This is the true cover for a currency, the only real backing. In this way we have made it possible, without gold and without foreign exchange, to maintain the value of the German mark, and have thus secured the value of our savings at a time when the countries which are overflowing with gold and foreign exchange have been compelled to devalue their currencies.

A new phase of national production

The increase in the birth rate alone will force us to increase our production in order to secure a greater competence for the community. In the years 1934-35 we saw ourselves compelled to apply German labour power in the most primitive way in order to make it effective at all. In those years spades and shovels were the tools used by hundreds of thousands of German men. With the gradual revival of our economic life there took place also a slow transformation in our working methods. Today Germany suffers from a lack of skilled workers. Unemployment as such is almost entirely abolished. We are now entering a new phase in our national production. The task is now slowly to replace primitive working methods by those that are improved and technically perfected. Our goal must be to relieve the highly qualified worker of primitive work and to give him appropriate work to do. But the most primitive work we shall leave to machines created by the skilled work. But in bringing this about we must take care that we do not remove the workers from the country districts, in which this change-over to machinery can only take place gradually and subject to certain conditions. But this goal can best be attained if we make up in a natural way for our lack of workers by perfecting our working methods, thus enabling us to stop the flow of the lowest type of labour from the country districts.

That is in a few words a programme which will indeed take years to realize. But like all National-Socialist projects it will, in the long run, be accomplished.

The colonial claim

But however much we may achieve thus in the way of an increase of production, the hopeless inadequacy of the space allotted to the German nation will not thereby be removed. Therefore our demand will become more and more insistent as the years go by for those colonial possessions which Germany after all never deprived any other nation of, which are practically worthless to the powers that hold them but appear indispensable to our own nation.

I should like here to point out that it is futile to hope that we shall bargain away our demand in return for credits. It is not credits that we want, but those fundamental necessities of life which will enable us, by our own efforts, to secure the existence of the nation. Above all, we do not want naive assurances that we shall be permitted to buy what we need. Once and for all we reject such declarations, which are felt in our country to be only a mockery. There is no economic recipe which could be a complete substitute for the possibilities of intensive economic activity in one's own currency area.

Distrust of Conferences

You will not expect me, gentlemen, to define my attitude to the separate international plans which at the moment seem to awaken, to a greater or less degree, the interest of various governments. These plans are too vague and too nebulous for me to express any opinion on them. But above all I want you to realize that I have the deepest suspicion of all so-called conferences, which may perhaps provide their participants with hours of interesting and stimulating conversation, but which generally lead only to the disappointment of the hopes of mankind.

Rejection of the Geneva League as an institution for perpetuating injustice

You will agree that if my programme in 1933 had been that we should wait until a world economic conference came to our assistance, Germany would probably have 15 million unemployed today, if we had not indeed perished completely in Bolshevik chaos.

Neither can I admit that certain definite natural demands be connected with political bargaining which has no bearing on them. Recently it has again and again been rumoured that Germany was about to revise her views concerning a possible return into the League of Nations. Notwithstanding the danger that the journalists of the democratic world press, who are as dense as they are indolent, may by tomorrow have forgotten again what I am about to say, I should like to state once more the following:— In the year 1919 there was imposed on several nations a treaty of peace which involved violent interference with national communities and property rights, to an extent hitherto inconceivable. The violence done to national and economic life, the tearing asunder of national communities took place behind a smoke screen of moral phrases which were perhaps good enough to soothe the bad consciences of the perpetrators, but which seemed to the victims to be only a bad joke. After this act of violence had completely and decisively altered the map of the world, from a territorial as well as from a demographic point of view, a League of Nations was founded whose task it was to be to make permanent this insane and unreasonable action as a final conclusion to the political and economic development of the nations and to fix the results of the Treaty as the eternal and unalterable foundation for the life and boundaries of human communities on this planet. In future no one was to seek to change by force what had arisen through force. But in order to mitigate somewhat the insanity of such an atrocious violation of humanity, the possibility was at least kept open that in future this violent reorganization of what had arisen through thousands of years might be modified in a legal, that is to say reasonable, way.

This somewhat difficult task was then, incidentally as it were, assigned to the League of Nations.

Germany herself had, to begin with, no right at all to join this noble society for the moral defence of former acts of violence, but only received the gracious permission to do so through the memorable Reich Chancellor, Gustav Stresemann. Now you know, Gentlemen, what a failure this institution has been. It never was a League of Nations, for, from the very beginning one of the greatest powers in the world did not belong to it, while yet another important power resigned later; neither was it an institution of justice nor yet, as is still maintained to-day with astonishing affrontery, of the principles of justice; it is an institution for the maintenance of a state of things which has arisen from the injustice of a thousand years. For either might is right, or might is wrong.

But is might is wrong to-day, then might was wrong in the past. If, therefore, the present condition of the world has arisen through might, and there is no doubt that this is so, then this condition is one which was produced by a wrong. The League of Nations does not, therefore, defend a condition of right, but one born of a thousand years of wrong. We do, indeed, hear that all this is to be changed. We often hear, for instance, that English politicians would be only too delighted to give us back our colonial possessions if they did not suffer so much from the thought of all the wrong and violence which the natives would thereby undergo. In the year 1918 when the League of Nations had not yet come into existence, it was quite possible to hand over these territories to their new owners without the consent of the natives, in order later to have this transfer morally confirmed by the League of Nations. To be sure, if one were to extend this noble principle that a colony may only belong to the owner expressly desired by the natives to the past history of colonial acquisitions, the colonial possessions of the world powers would probably be seriously diminished. (Applause) All these colonial empires have in fact not come about through plebiscites, much less democratic ones, of the people living in them, but have been acquired by naked and brutal force.

They are to-day, of course, inseparable parts of the states in question and as such form a part of that world order which is always represented to us, by democratic politicians in particular, as the 'World Order of Law'—of that 'law' which the League of Nations exists to protect. I quite understand that those who have an interest in the maintenance of this legal order see in the League of Nations a convenient moral forum for the maintenance and, if necessary, the defence of the possessions which they formerly acquired by force. But what I do not understand is that the nation which has itself been robbed by such an act of force should in its turn become a member of this illustrious society. And I must protest against the accusation that we are not ready to stand for the principles of law because we are not in the League of Nations. On the contrary: we are not in the League of Nations, because we believe that it is not an institution of justice, but rather an institution for the defence of the wrong done at Versailles.

But there are in addition a series of objective considerations.

1. We left the League of Nations at the time because, true to the principles of its birth and constitution, it denied us the right to equal armaments and therewith equal security.

2. We shall never join it again, because we have no intention of being involved in the defence of injustice in some part of the world by a majority decision of the League.

3. We believe that we are thereby doing a service to all those nations who are so unfortunate as to rely on the League as a factor of real assistance.

For, in the case of the Abyssinian conflict, for instance, we should have held it better to have had, to begin with, more understanding for Italy's vital needs and secondly to have given the Abyssinians less hope and, above all, fewer promises. This would perhaps have made possible a simpler and more reasonable solution of the whole problem.

4. But, if the worst should come to the worst, we have no intention of allowing the German nation to be drawn into conflicts in which our own interests are not involved. We are not willing to stand up for the territorial or economic interests of other nations if Germany obtains no visible advantage thereby. In addition we do not ourselves expect support of this kind from other nations. Germany is resolved to impose upon herself a wise restriction in her interests and demands. But if German interests should anywhere be seriously at stake, we shall not expect assistance from a League of Nations, but shall straightway assume that we shall have to do what is necessary ourselves. And it is as well to be clear about this, for it will always impose on our wishes and hopes that moderation which we often unfortunately fail to see among those who enjoy collective security.

Finally: 5. We do not intend in future to allow an attitude to be prescribed for us by an international institution whose actions do not resemble those of a reasonable human being, but those of the ostrich. Since the League of Nations is itself obviously incapable of understanding historical or economic necessities and of fulfilling the demands based on them, and since on the other hand the essential interests of nations are in the long run stronger than formal consideration, a peculiar situation would arise if it were to continue for a hundred years. For it is very probable that in the year 2036 new states will have arisen, or others have disappeared, without it having been possible to register this new situation at Geneva.

I will therefore sum up by saying once more that Germany has not the slightest intention of ever returning to the League, especially now that Italy has left it. This does not mean that we refuse to cooperate with other powers; on the contrary, it means only that we refuse to undertake obligations which are incalculable and in most cases impossible of fulfilment.

Recognition of Manchukuo

Germany was once compelled by her membership of the League to associate herself in such an unreasonable action; she was, thank Heaven, as a result of leaving it, in a second case able to act in accordance with reason and justice. But I make known to you today, gentlemen, that I have now decided to make the necessary correction in respect to the first case.

Germany will recognize Manchukuo. By deciding to take this step we make a final break between a policy which is phantastic and incomprehensible, and one which implies a sober respect for real facts.

No relations with the Soviet Union

We are of the opinion that Germany has made many valuable contributions to cooperation with other powers. The Reich today cannot be considered isolated, either politically or economically. I have on the contrary endeavoured since taking office to establish the best possible relations with most of the other States of the world. There is only one state with which we have not sought to establish good relations, nor do we wish to enter into close relations with Soviet Russia. More than ever do we see in Bolshevism the incarnation of the human destructive instinct.

But we do not make the Russian people as such responsible for this ghastly ideology of annihilation. We know perfectly well that a small, powerful set of Jewish intellectuals plunged a great nation into a state bordering on insanity. This would not concern us so much after all, had this doctrine remained within the frontiers of Russia herself, since Germany has no intention of foisting our conceptions of life on the Russian nation. Unfortunately, however, the Bolshevism of international Jewry attempts from its breeding-ground in Soviet Russia to rot away the very core of the nations of the world, to overthrow the existing social order and to substitute chaos for civilization.

We certainly do not seek for contact with Bolshevism. On the contrary, it makes persistent efforts to corrupt the rest of mankind with its thoughts and ideas, and by so doing to plunge the world into a disaster of unprecedented magnitude. And here we are ruthless foes. We overcame the communist machinations of Moscow in our own land, and we have not the least intention of allowing Germany to be annihilated from without by the material forces of Bolshevism.

British statesmen have repeatedly assured us of their desire to maintain the "status quo" in the world. Since this is the case let her apply it here. Whenever a European country falls a prey to Bolshevism, a shifting of positions becomes apparent. For the territories thus bolshevized are no longer sovereign states with independent, national lives of their own, but are now mere sections of the Moscow Revolutionary Centre. I am aware that Mr. Eden does not share this view. M. Stalin does, however, and is perfectly frank about it. In my opinion M. Stalin is still at the moment of speaking a much better judge and interpreter of Bolshevik views and aims than a British Cabinet Minister! Therefore we look upon every attempt to spread Bolshevism, no matter where it may be, with utter loathing, and where it menaces us, we shall there oppose it.

Germany and the conflict in Eastern Asia Relations with Japan

This explains our relations with Japan. I cannot agree with those politicians who think they do Europe a service in harming Japan. I am afraid the defeat of Japan in Eastern Asia would never benefit Europe or America but only Bolshevik Soviet Russia. I do not consider China strong enough, either spiritually or materially, to withstand on her own any attack by Bolshevism. I believe, however, that even the greatest victory gained by Japan would be infinitely less dangerous to world-peace than any success achieved by Bolshevism. Germany has concluded a pact with Japan to counteract Comintern aims. She has always been on friendly terms with China, so I think under the circumstances, we may best be considered truly neutral spectators of this drama. I need hardly say we all earnestly desired, and still desire, appeasement between these two great Eastern nations, and the ultimate restoration of amicable relations. We are certain, however, that peace would have been restored long ere now, if certain elements had not, as in the case of Abyssinia, upset the balance in Eastern Asia by putting their advice and perhaps promises of moral assistance into the scale of one party. This attitude—as matters stand—could only have a platonic significance. A drowning man, however, clutches at every straw. It would have been more expedient to have drawn China's attention to the full gravity of her position, instead of citing, as so often before, the League of Nations as the safe guarantee of peace and security!

No matter at what time and in what manner happenings in Eastern Asia may ultimately right themselves, Germany, in the defensive attitude she adopts towards Communism, will always regard and appreciate Japan as an element of security, and a guarantee, moreover, for the culture of mankind. For just as we are perfectly certain that Japan's greatest victory would not affect the civilization of the white races in the very least, so do we not doubt for a moment that a victory gained by Bolshevism would signify the end of the present thousand-year-old civilization of the white races!

In this connection I should like to defend myself most emphatically against those idiotic attacks which accuse Germany of betraying the interests of the white race in the conflict in the Far East, because of the attitude we have adopted. Really, I must confess we are simply amazed when forced to read such assertions in French and English newspapers. That just this very National-Socialist State, always the object of attack on account of its racial policy, should now suddenly have the honour of drawing the sword for racial ideals, or, rather let us say racial interests, is a huge jest in world-history. Germany has no territorial interests in Eastern Asia. She has the natural wish to carry on trade and commerce, and in so doing she is not obliged to support any one party. But one thing we are obliged to do, and that is to recognize the fact that a Bolshevik victory would destroy all possibilities here.

Moreover, Germany once possessed territory herself in Eastern Asia. True this did not prevent certain powers with the help of a coalition of white and yellow races from expelling the German Reich from the country. To-day we have really no longer any desire to receive invitations to return, to Eastern Asia, let us say.

Attitude to the Spanish civil war An independent National Spain

Neither has Germany any territorial interests which might be connected in any way with the terrible civil war now raging in Spain. The situation there is similar to that which once prevailed in Germany. The attack inspired and conducted both personally and materially by Moscow, is directed against a national independent state and arouses the fierce opposition of a national population unwilling to be slaughtered. And precisely as in the case of Germany, the democratic International is on the side of the Bolshevik incendiaries. The German Government would see in the bolshevizing of Spain not only an element detrimental to the peace of Europe, but also one disturbing to the balance of power on the Continent. If Spain were to become a section of the Moscow Centre, there would be grave danger of the spread of this plague of annihilation and destruction, the consequences of which we could under no circumstance view with indifferent calm. We are indeed happy in the knowledge that our anti-Bolshevik attitude is also shared by another state.

German-Italian relations: Common views of life and State

Italo-German relations are based on conceptions of life and state policy common to both nations, as well as on co-operative action in warding off the international dangers that menace us both. How greatly this fact is appreciated everywhere in Germany, was most strikingly evidenced in the joyous enthusiasm with which the creator of the Fascist State was welcomed in the Reich. One fact at least ought to be acknowledged by all European statesmen. If Mussolini had not conquered Italy in 1922 with the help of his Fascist Movement, the country would in all probability have fallen a prey to Bolshevism.

The dire consequence to Western culture in the event of such a collapse would be inconceivable. They very thought of such a possibility is horrifying to a man of historical vision and sense of responsibility based on a knowledge of the facts. Benito Mussolini enjoys the admiration of the German people to a phenomenal extent.

Italy's position resembles that of Germany in certain respects. Under the circumstances, therefore, it was but natural that, suffering as we both do from over-crowding, we should evince keen understanding for the activities of a man and his government who, refusing to allow their people to be sacrificed on the altar of the phantastic ideals of the League of Nations, were fully determined to save their nation. And all the more so, since there is no doubt that the apparent ideals of the League of Nations coincide rather too closely with the exceedingly realistic interests of its chief powers.

Furthermore, Germany and Italy have taken a common stand with regard to the Spanish conflict. Its aim is to see a national Spain which enjoys complete independence. The Italo-German friendship, springing as it does from definite sources, has become an element of stabilization in the appeasement of Europe. The connection of both states with Japan presents the most powerful of all obstructions to the further advance of the menacing power of Russian Bolshevism.

There has been much talk and still more writing in recent years about the differences between France and England on the one hand, and Germany on the other. I do not quite see wherein these differences are supposed to be embodied. Germany has no further territory in Europe to claim from France, a point I have frequently stressed. We hope the regaining of the Saar districts has now definitely closed the chapter of Franco-German territorial disputes.

Nor has Germany any quarrel with England, unless perhaps it may be our wish for colonies. There is, however, not a single reason for any kind of possible conflict.

The international press campaign

A danger for peace and a heavy burden on international relations

But what does poison friendly relations between the two states, and consequently causes trouble, is the intolerable Press campaign which is being conducted in these countries under the slogan of "Liberty for expression of personal opinions". I have little use for the reiterated sentiments of foreign statesmen and diplomats who declare that there is no law in these countries to put an end to lies and calumnies. Here it is not a case of private affairs, but one concerned with the fellowship of peoples and states. And we are not in a position to make light of such things for any length of time. We simply cannot close our eyes to the effects of such a virulent campaign. If we do so, it may easily happen that in certain lands the malicious machinations of weavers of lies will succeed in arousing hatred of our country, which, if disregarded, will gradually develop into a universally hostile attitude towards us. The German nation could not possibly face this with the necessary power of resistance, since our own Press policy prevents the expression of such hostility towards these nations. And this is a grave menace indeed, and one that endangers peace. For this very reason, I refuse to tolerate any longer the unbridled and persistent scoffing and slandering to which our country and people are subjected. We shall answer these calumnies in future and that with real National Socialist thoroughness.

What has been disseminated during the last few weeks alone in the way of insane, impudent and stupid statements about Germany, is simply outrageous. When Reuter invents attempts on my life, and English papers tell of large-scale arrests in Germany, of the closing of Germany's frontiers towards Switzerland, Belgium and France, etc., of the alleged flight of the Crown Prince from Germany, of a military rising, of the imprisonment of German generals, or, as an alternative, of the march of German generals to the Chancellery, when reports are rife that Himmler and Göring had quarrelled over the Jewish question, and that I was therefore in a difficult position, or that a German general had formed contacts with Daladier with the help of intermediaries, that a regiment had mutinied at Stolp, that 2,000 officers had been cashiered, that the whole of German industry had been mobilized for war, that differences had arisen between the Government and private industry, that twenty German officers and three generals had fled to Salzburg that fourteen generals had fled to Prague with Ludendorff's corpse, that I had lost my voice, so that our cunning Goebbels was looking for a man who could imitate it and my speeches could be made by gramophone records. I fear that tomorrow this same journalist will either doubt my identity, or else will say that I made the gestures and a gramophone was behind me, and so on. Mr. Eden boasted in a recent speech of the various liberties of his land. One special liberty he failed to mention, liberty for journalists to slander and jeer at other nations, their organizations, men and governments, to their heart's content! We might of course say all this stupidity is not worthy of being taken seriously. After all millions of foreigners in Germany see that there is not a single word of truth in it. What a contrast to the Soviet member of the League of Nations, who banishes strangers from his land, and even closes the Consulates, whilst in Germany everyone is at liberty to accumulate experiences on the spot.

But such obstacles to international amity cannot be permitted indefinitely. I am glad to state that a section of the foreign Press did not participate in the despicable attacks on the honour of other nations. But the harm caused by such incitement is nevertheless so great that in future we do not intend to tolerate it without a flaming protest. This crime is all the more serious when it deliberately aims at goading on the nations to war. I need only mention a few facts in this connection.

State leadership and press policy

Let me remind you of the sudden, slanderous reports of last year when it was alleged that Germany had landed 20,000 men in Spanish Morocco. It was indeed fortunate that this infamous lie could be immediately refuted. But what would happen if such a dementi could not be made quickly enough to avoid trouble.

This list of major crimes also includes statements that Germany and Italy had formed an alliance to divide up Spain, and a recent malicious statement to the effect that Germany and Japan had made a pact to possess themselves of the Dutch colonies. Can one call this an honest trade, or still speak of a liberty which enables international criminals of this kind to keep the world in a state of constant unrest? Are not these people war-mongers and war-makers of the most infamous kind? The British Government wishes to limit armaments or ban bombing. I once proposed that myself. But at that time I also suggested that it was still more important to prevent the poisoning of public opinion by infamous articles in the Press. What has strengthened our feelings towards Italy—if that were at all possible—is the fact that in that country State leadership and Press policy follow one path. The Government does not talk of mutual understanding while the Press agitates for the opposite course.

This chapter on the disturbance of international relations includes the impertinence of writing letters to the Head of a foreign state asking for information about sentences passed in Courts of Law. I would suggest that certain members of the House of Commons concern themselves with sentences passed by the British Courts Martial in Jerusalem, and not with the sentences passed in the German People's Court. We can understand interest in German traitors, but it does not improve relations between England and Germany.

For the rest, let no one imagine that such tactless intervention will have any influence on German Law Courts or on their sentences. I for instance, would never allow a member of the German Reichstag to interfere in matters of English justice. The British Empire has wide interests, and we recognize them as such, but the affairs of the German Nation and Reich are directed by the German Reichstag, and by me, its representative, not by a delegation of English letters-writers! I am sure it would be a most praiseworthy achievement were we to come to an international agreement, so as not only to prevent the use of poison, incendiary and explosive bombs, but above all to prevent the circulation of those newspapers which do more harm to the promotion of friendly relations between nations than any poison or incendiary bombs.

Strengthening of military forces

Since such an international press campaign is not conducive to appeasement, but must rather be regarded as a grave menace to peace among the nations, I have decided to carry on with the reinforcement of Germany's Armed Forces as a security against the day when these threats of war might actually turn into bloodshed and terror. The necessary steps were taken on February 4th and the work is being carried on speedily and efficiently. Germany at any rate has a sincere desire to restore mutual confidence between herself and all the Great Powers of Europe, as well as with other States. If this is not successful, it is not our fault. We earnestly believe that little can be expected at this time from conferences and single conversations because of this attitude on the part of the Press. It is impossible to deceive oneself as to the following facts. This international Press campaign against peace will immediately destroy every attempt to arrive at an understanding between peoples and nations. It will immediately misinterpret or distort the meaning of every conference. It will immediately place a false light on every agreement. And there is, therefore, nothing to give one confidence under these circumstances that any good can come out of such conferences or out of such conversations, as long as governments on the whole are not in a position to act decisively because they must always consider the public interpretation placed upon their actions.

For the time being exchange of notes

We believe, therefore, that for the time being the only practical way of arriving at an understanding is through the normal diplomatic exchange of notes, thus preventing too crude falsifications of the International Press.

Though Germany does set a limit to her interests, this must not be taken as a lack of interest in everything that goes on in world outside. We are happy to have been able to maintain normal, and in part also, friendly relations with most of the states that border on Germany. We believe that by so doing the feeling of general tension has been relieved. We are filled with deepest satisfaction at the genuine wish to maintain a real neutrality, that we have observed in several European States. We believe we can see in this an element of increasing calm, and therefore of increasing security.

Germany's thought for Germans abroad

But we see also, on the other hand, the deplorable consequences of the economic and population problems caused by the violence done to the map of Europe in the mad act of Versailles.

Over ten million Germans live in two of the States adjoining our frontiers. Till 1866 they were constitutionally united with the whole German people. They fought up to 1918 in the Great War shoulder to shoulder with the German soldiers of the Reich. Under the terms of the Peace Pact they were kept against their will from forming a union with the Reich. This in itself is sufficiently distressing. But about one thing there can be no doubt. The fact that they are now citizens of other states should not deprive them of their natural rights as members of a national community. Yet a people has the right to self-determination, as we were solemnly assured in Wilson's Fourteen Points which served as the basis of the Armistice. This cannot be overlooked simply because the people in question happen to be Germans! In the long run it is intolerable for a self-respecting world power to be permanently deprived of its entity, and to know that across the frontier are kinsmen who have to suffer severe persecution simply because of their sympathy, their feeling of union, and their common point of view with the whole German people.

Of course, we realize that a frontier settlement pleasing to all is scarcely possible in Europe. It should, therefore, be all the more important to avoid all unnecessary humiliation of national minorities, for it is quite enough that they must be separated from their homeland without adding to this the pain of persecution for belonging to a different national community. We can prove that it is possible with a good will to find ways of compensating, that is, of relieving the tension. If one tries to prevent the solution of the problem in this way and uses force in so doing, then one day this violence will be returned with violence. We cannot dispute the fact that as long as Germany was feeble and powerless, she simply had to endure these persecutions of Germans across her frontiers. Just as England looks after her interests which cover a large part of the world, so also will the Germany of to-day look after her comparatively restricted interests. And to these interests of the German Reich belongs also the protection of those fellow-Germans who live without our frontiers and are unable to ensure for themselves the right to a general freedom, personal, political, and ideological.

The German-Polish détente

We are glad to be able to state now in the fifth year after the first great foreign political agreement of the Reich that in our connection with the state from whom we might have expected the greatest opposition, there has occurred not only a loosening of the tension, but also during this year has been a pronounced "rapprochement". Of course I realize that we have a certain circumstance to thank for this—the circumstance that there was then no western parliamentarianism in Warsaw, but rather a Polish marshal, an outstanding character, who realized the importance to Europe of relieving this tension. That work, regarded at the time with scepticism by many people, has endured the test of time, and I may well say that dating from the moment that the League of Nations finally gave up its continual attempts at disturbing affairs in Danzig and appointed a new Commissioner, a man of high personal qualities, from that very moment the danger point to European peace entirely lost its threatening aspect. The Polish State respects the national relations of Danzig, and Danzig and Germany respect Polish rights. So it was possible to find the way to an understanding in spite of attempts to disturb it, and, beginning with Danzig, to remove difficulties in relations between Germany and Poland, thus arriving at a sincere spirit of friendly co-operation.

The German-Austrian Agreement Another contribution to European peace

I am happy to be able to tell you, Gentlemen, that during the past few days a further understanding has been reached with a country that is particularly close to us for many reasons. The Reich and German Austria are bound together not only because they are the same people, but also because they share a long and common history, and a common culture.

Difficulties in full measure have presented themselves since the agreement of the July 11th brought about an attempt to clear away misunderstandings and hindrances on both sides, thus preparing for a final reconciliation. Had this not occurred it was clear that an intolerable situation might one day have developed, whether intentionally or otherwise, which might have brought about a serious catastrophe. It is then as a rule no longer within the power of man to stay the course of a destiny that first arose through negligence or stupidity! I am glad to be able to assure you that these considerations and their interpretation correspond with those of the Austrian Chancellor whom I invited to come to visit me. The idea and the intention were to bring about a relaxation of the tension in our relations with one another by giving under the existing legislation the same legal rights to citizens holding National-Socialist views as are enjoyed by the other citizens of German-Austria. In connection with this there should be a practical contribution toward peace by granting a general amnesty, and by creating a better understanding between the two States through a still closer friendly co-operation in as many different fields as possible, political, personal and economic. All this is a result of the Agreement of the July 11th.

I want to express in this connection before the German people my sincere thanks to the Austrian Chancellor for his great understanding and the warm-hearted willingness with which he accepted my invitation and worked with me so that we might discover a way of serving the best interests of the two countries, for after all, they are interests of the whole German people, whose sons we all are, wherever we may have been born.

I believe that in reaching this mutual understanding we have also made a contribution to European peace.

The best proof that we are right in this supposition is the rising fury of democratic world citizens who are always talking about peace, and yet let no opportunity pass of inciting to a war. They are angry with, and infuriated by, this work of understanding. It is therefore a permissible conclusion that our work was good. Perhaps this example will be helpful in gradually bringing greater relief to the tense situation in Europe. Germany is willing, in any event, supported by her friendships, to leave nothing untried in order to preserve that greatest good, that is the basis for every future work, namely, peace.

I can assure you, gentlemen, that our relations with the other European powers, as well as with the states outside Europe, are either normal or else very friendly. I need only point to our cordial friendship with Hungary, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia and many other states. Our foreign trade balance has given you an impressive picture of our economic cooperation.

Joint defence with Italy and Japan against the Comintern

But above all stands our cooperation with those two great powers who have recognized a world danger in Bolshevism, just as Germany has, and are determined to unite their strength in common defence against the Comintern movement. That this work of cooperation with Italy and Japan may ever become closer is my sincere desire. In addition, we are happy for every relief of tension that can be effected in the general political situation. For however great may be our success we are not in doubt of the need of strengthening international cooperation.

The German nation not warlike but soldierly

The German people in its whole character is not warlike, but rather soldierly, that is, while they do not want war, they are not frightened by the thoughts of it. They love peace, but they love their honour and their freedom just as much. Fifteen terrible years lie behind us as a warning and a lesson, which, I believe, the German nation will always remember and never forget.

Construction of a new form of nation and State

In all fields of our national existence it has only now become possible to set truly great tasks, and above all to ensure the material means which are the prerequisite for the realisation of great creative plans. Thus National-Socialism corrected in a few years the deficiencies of centuries, and redressed the results of the sins of numerous preceding generations. Thus by putting an end to the internal state and party divisions, we were able to undertake and also in part to complete those tremendous tasks which today inspire the entire German people with pride and therefore with self-respect. Imposing traffic routes, gigantic industrial structures, unique city planning and buildings, tremendous bridges, are today under construction, are about to be built, or in part are already completed! By the end of the next five years the Germans will be conscious of achievements which can well fill the entire people with the greatest pride.

One of the greatest of these achievements, however, is the setting up of a form of government of the people and the State, equally remote from parliamentary democracy and military dictatorship. National Socialism has given the German people a form of government which, as a party, not only mobilizes the people, but also organises them. This organisation is such that the most natural principle of selection appears to guarantee the continuance of a stable political leadership for all time to come. This is perhaps one of the proudest chapters in the history of the past five years.

Contrary to the impression some petty international journalistic hack may have, National Socialism did not capture the German Foreign Office on the 4th February. National Socialism controls all Germany, without the slightest exception, and has done so ever since the day five years ago when I left the building in Wilhelm Platz as Reich Chancellor. Above all, however, in these five years the National-Socialist Party has not only made the nation National-Socialist, but has also given to itself that perfect organisation which makes certain its continued existence for all time. The greatest safeguard of this National-Socialist revolution with regard to leadership, consists both within and without in the complete penetration of the Reich and all its organisations and institutions by the National-Socialist Party. Its protection against the outside world, however, is entrusted to the new National-Socialist Armed Forces.

Gentlemen! You have authorized me to act by adopting the laws giving me full power. I have laid before you an account covering five important years in the life of the German people. I cannot close without assuring you how great is my faith in the future of our people and the Reich, that we all so warmly love. My motive as an unknown soldier in taking up the struggle for the regeneration of Germany was my belief in the German people—not belief in her public institutions, her social order and social classes, her parties, her state and political power, but belief in the eternal values inherent in our people. And above all there is my belief in the millions of individual German men and women, who just as I was once myself, are nameless servers of our community and our people. It is for them that I endeavoured to build up this new Reich! It shall belong to no class, it shall belong to no one group of men, for it shall belong to the whole German people. I shall try to make it easier for my people to find their path of life on this earth and to make their existence happy. What I have called into life during these years was backed by no idea of self-gain. All is, and will be, transitory. That which remains for us is a substance of flesh and blood, the German People. Party, State, Army, Trade and Industry, all are institutions and organisms which are of value only as a means to an end. History will decide their value according as they serve this end, which is the people.

They are passing factors, but our people is everlasting. To serve it with my whole strength was, and is, the happiness of my life. To thank my many excellent collaborators without whom I should never have succeeded in this work, is a pleasant duty to me. In this hour I pray that the Almighty will give His blessing in the years to come to our work and action, to our judgment and to our strength of resolution, that He may guard us from all false pride as from all cowardly submission, that He will let us find the right way, which He in His providence has allotted to the German people, and that He may give us always the courage to do right and never to waver or weaken before any force or danger.

Long live Germany and the German People!

II. EXTRACT FROM ADOLF HITLER'S REPORT OF RESULTS ACHIEVED

Germany's economic, social and cultural development since the assumption of power by National Socialism The vast achievement of five years

An account of the economic progress in figures

And to-day, in giving you, Gentlemen, and the whole German nation this account of things, I can point to such tremendous and such unique accomplishments that they alone contain the highest justification for the methods which we have followed and thus also for the security of these accomplishments. As I have already stated, the German economic situation in 1932 had also fallen to such a low plane that many persons who were specially trained as experts in this field were unable to see any prospect whatever of improvement.

Courage to act

When on the January 30th the late President entrusted me with the Chancellorship, this aspect alone of the condition of the Reich appeared practically hopeless. The best minds had failed in their attempts to remedy it! All traditional economic methods had proved useless! A malignant fatalism had taken possession of our people. They listened more and more to those who preached that everything must first be destroyed before any reconstruction could be considered.

The people themselves had no clear idea of the possible way to recovery, but only a dull feeling of increasing misery, more or less ascribable to fate. They were accordingly equally prone to agree with those who said this was the result of an immutable course of development and, at the same time, to follow anyone who had some bogus enterprise which promised the simplest and easiest possible way out of an unbearable situation. And time was all the more pressing since not only had the income of the individual been undermined, but the finances of private and public corporations were also on the verge of ruin. It was at such a juncture that I took over the Chancellorship and leadership of, and consequently the responsibility for, the German Reich!

In view of such a disastrous situation it was essential to begin with far-reaching measures and to act at once.

There was neither time to be lost nor any hope that a continuation of halfway measures would lead to any other result than that already existing. If the nation was to be saved at all it could only hope for courage to act, and not courage to talk or to criticize.

When in a country hundreds of thousands of farmers are about to lose their houses and lands, when hundreds of thousands of enterprises must close their doors, employees and workers are being dismissed, when an army of 6,000,000 unemployed, constantly increasing, more and more burdensome to the finances of the Reich, the states and the communes, is scarcely able to buy vital necessities in spite of all assistance rendered, when an intellectual proletariat is growing up whose acquired knowledge acts as a curse rather than as a blessing, when all the flourishing industrial cities are becoming desolate and huge areas beginning to become depopulated for want of a market for their products, when in other regions children of three and four years have not developed teeth because of an appalling poverty and the resultant undernourishment, when neither bread nor milk can be obtained for them, when the statement of a hard-hearted enemy that our German nation contains 20,000,000 people too many is thus almost becoming a terrible reality, then such a nation does not cry for journalistic scribbles or parliamentary prattlers, it does not cry for commissions of inquiry, international debates, ridiculous votes or insipid platitudes from so-called "statesmen" at home and abroad! No! It cries for action which will bring salvation in spite of all prattling and silly newspaper articles. It has no interest in the literary discourses of drawing-room Bolshevik international correspondents; it is interested solely in assistance which will snatch it back from the utmost misfortune! And above all, a man who feels it his duty at such an hour to assume the leadership of his people is not responsible to the laws of parliamentary usage or to a particular democratic conception but solely to the mission placed upon him. And anyone who interferes with this mission is an enemy of the people.

Without foreign assistance

And in giving this account to the German people to-day I can look proudly and frankly into the eyes of all those hundreds of thousands and millions who, in town and country, earn their honest bread by the sweat of their brow. In these five years I too have been a worker. Only, my personal cares were increased by the care for the present and future of 68,000,000 others.

And so, just as they can justly refuse to allow ignoramuses or idlers to disturb them in their work, I have declined to permit my work to be disturbed by incompetent nincompoops, ne'er-do-wells, or malicious idlers. I have had a right to take steps against anyone who, instead of helping, saw his mission only in unfair criticism of our work. Nor does a profession of faith absolve a person from his obligation to adjust himself to the work of those who are carrying out the salvation of a nation. But that I have had a right to protect this work of mine and of all of us from such disturbers of the public peace, I should now like to prove by the results of this work. They are indisputable, but above all they are made more remarkable by the fact that in most cases I had no models of former achievements to go by, except my own common sense and the determination never to give in to obstacles, but to defy them bravely and courageously.

In this connection I should like to point out another fact here, namely Germany's economic salvation is due solely to the nation's own efforts under its own leadership. Foreign countries contributed absolutely nothing. Except for hateful rejection or limited priggishness we know of nothing that could even be counted as a positive interest in Germany, to say nothing of assistance.

Nor did I ever expect anything else. For us National Socialists it is a cardinal principle of our political and economic faith not to look for salvation in the form of any kind of aid from outside, whether of a political, economic or financial nature, but to seek such aid solely in the orbit of our own wisdom and energy.

Increased national income — Increased production

In the centre of our policy has been a realisation that the standard of living of the nation can only be the result of the total production of vital goods, i.e., that every wage and every salary paid out in Germany possesses only the real value represented by actual work done in the form of goods produced. A very unpopular doctrine at a time which echoes with the cry of "higher wages and shorter hours"!

When I took over the leadership of the Reich the number of unemployed had risen to well over 6,000,000 and the number of members of families thus concerned to more than 15,500,000. Thus the solution of this problem meant not only paying out the money for these fifteen million people to live, but, above all, to produce the goods to be bought with this money. Hence the National-Socialist economic programme is not a programme of money but essentially one of production. The greater the volume of production, the greater will be the share which the individual enjoys. Money itself is only an auxiliary in the service of distributing the goods of production. But in order to give the nation the position in the world which it needed for the unhampered carrying out of its vital tasks, it was necessary also to carry out an additional production of national armaments which do not benefit our people directly but only indirectly. But it was obviously out of the question to identify German salvation with fraudulent currency manipulations, i.e., to defraud our fellow-citizens by such things as sliding scales of wages, and therefore also of prices. Rather, it was necessary to increase production in order to insure a constant purchasing power for the increasing income of the nation.

Let me give a brief extract from our economic life in the form of sober figures to indicate whether and to what extent National-Socialism has solved these problems.

In 1932, that is before the National-Socialist assumption of power, the German national income amounted to 45.2 milliard Reichsmark. It increased to 46.6 milliard Reichsmark in 1933, and in 1937 reached the round figure of 68 milliard Reichsmark.

In contrast to this increase in income, the general cost of living index remained practically unchanged, being 120.6 in 1932 and 125.1 in 1937.

That is to say, while the national income increased by nearly 50 %, the increase in the general cost of living index was only 4 %.

The reasons for this are to be found in the growth of our total production.

The value of industrial production rose as follows :

1932	37.8 milliard
1933	39.9 "
1937 more than	75 "

Corresponding to these in detail are also the turnover figures, for example in trades, which were as follows :

1932	9.5 milliard
1933	10.1 "
1937	22 "

For purposes of comparison I should like to note here also the turnover figures for retail trade :

1933	21.8 milliard
1937	31 "

But agricultural production, in spite of an intensive cultivation of the soil, also shows increasing results. The production figures are :

1932	8.7 milliard
1937 over	12 milliard Reichsmark.

That we are concerned here not merely with the problem of price fixing, but with one of increased production, is proved by the fact that it was possible, in spite of the increased buying power of the German nation and the consequent increased demands especially on the food market, to raise the amount of supplies from home production, which in 1932 amounted to 75 %, to 81 % in 1936.

If the value of industrial products thus increased from 37.8 milliard to over 75 milliard, this can be illustrated in particular by separate examples. In the five years of National-Socialist guidance in economic affairs, paper manufacture	has increased by	50 %

the manufacture of Diesel oil	" "	66 %
the production of coal	" "	68 %
the production of oil-fuel	" "	80 %
the production of mineral oil	" "	90 %
the production of artificial silk	" "	100 %
the production of kerosene	" "	110 %
the production of steel	" "	167 %
the production of lubricating oil	" "	190 %
the production of petrol and other fuels	" "	470 %
the production of aluminium	" "	570 %
the production of staple fibre	" "	2500 %
etc.

End of unemployment

This vast increase in national production formed those values which assured the German Mark its buying power and its stability, although in the same period—corresponding to this increased production—the number of unemployed decreased from over 6.5 million at the time of the National-Socialist assumption of power to 470,000 at the beginning of October 1937.

But the number of those newly included in the process of production amounts to some 2 million.

Increase in foreign trade and credits

This tremendous economic activity is also expressed in foreign trade figures. Without taking part in world economic conferences, without having at our command the gigantic possibilities of other world powers, we have succeeded in increasing our foreign trade in imports from 4.2 in 1933 to 5.5 milliard in 1937

from 4.9 milliard in 1933 to 5.9 milliard in 1937.

The confidence of the German people in its economic policy is also in accordance with these facts, and finds its expression in the increase in savings deposits. In the public savings banks the deposits increased as follows :

1932	11.4 milliard Reichsmark
1933	12.1 "
1937	16.1 "

An accompanying factor of this national economic planning was the organic reduction of interest, which for short term credits decreased from 6.23 % in 1932

to 2.93 % in 1937,

and also for long term credits sank

from 8.8 % in 1932
to 4.5 % in 1937.

The State revenues were as follows :

1932	6.6 milliard
1933	6.8 "
1934	8.2 "
1935	9.6 "
1936	11.5 "
1937	14.0 "

In 1938 they will amount to more than 17 milliard.

From the abundance of evidence of this tremendous increase in German production and of the economic revival, I shall select only some extracts with a few figures.

The rise in production Coal and Minerals

One of the most important foundations of our national economic system is our wealth in coal.

The production figures were as follows :

1932	104.7 million tons
1933	109.7 "
1934	124.9 "
1935	143.0 "
1936	158.0 "
1937	184.5 "

The figures for lignite present a similar picture :

1932	122.65 million tons
1933	126.79 "
1934	137.27 "
1935	147.00 "
1937	184.70 "

Gentlemen, this annual increase of some 80 million tons of coal and 62 million tons of lignite represents a value of a different kind than is indicated when in the much-extolled democracies the money in circulation is increased by so many milliards without any corresponding value. No less impressive is the picture afforded by a review of steel and cast iron production and of iron ore. The Steel production was as follows :

1933	9,660 million tons
1935	16,010 "
1936	18,614 "

while in 1938 it will amount to some 21 million tons.

In the same period the production of cast iron increased from 1.4 million tons to 3.7 million tons.

These are the results of a process of production, the external signs of which are the tens of thousands of factory chimneys which are once more smoking, the thousands and thousands of factories and workshops in which those millions of Germans whom National Socialism has delivered from unemployment find work and a livelihood once more.

After the U.S.A., Germany is today once more the leading steel country in the world.

German iron ore production was as follows:

1932	1.3	million	tons
1933	2.6	"	"
1934	4.3	"	"
1935	6.0	"	"
1937	9.6	"	"

By means of the measures introduced earlier, the production of iron ore will be increased by 1940 to 20 million tons; in addition there is the supplementary production initiated by Field-Marshal Göring in execution of the Four-Year Plan; in this connection the Hermann Göring Works will in 1940 represent a contribution of over 21 million tons. German iron ore production will thus amount in 1940 to at least 41-45 million tons, as compared with 1.3 million tons in 1932. From this the German nation may see that its distress is being relieved not by idle talk, but by unique measures on a vast scale.

There is a similar increase in German production in a number of other fields.

For example, the production of bauxite increased from 1,360 tons in 1932 to 73,280 tons in 1937.

The extraction of magnesite rose from nil to 21,000 tons. The production of fluorite from 36,000 to 127,000 tons, of barium sulphate from 110,000 to 423,000 tons, of graphite from 21,000 to 24,000 tons, of asphaltic lime from 33,000 to 109,000 tons, of arsenic ore from 2,800 to 26,400 tons, of pyrites from 165,000 to 420,000 tons, of nickel ore from nil to some 87,000 tons, of lead and zinc ore from 1.18 to 2.4 million tons.

The extraction of crude potash increased from 6,415 million tons in 1932 to 14,460 million tons.

The production of mineral oil increased from 238,600 tons in 1932 to 453,000 tons in 1937.

The production of volatile fuels, i.e., petrol, etc. increased from 386,000 tons in 1933 to 1,480,000 tons in 1937 and this year will amount to more than 1,700,000 tons, although the large plant set up in connection with the Four-Year Plan will not yet contribute to the total.

The production of Diesel oil increased from 60,000 to 120,000 tons, of lubricating oil from 45,000 to 140,000 tons, of oil-fuel from 167,000 to 320,000 tons, of kerosene from 19,000 to 40,000 tons.

The production of wool increased from 4,700 tons to 7,500 tons in 1937; of flax from 3,100 to 24,000 tons, of hemp from 210 to 6,000 tons, of staple fibre from 4,000 to over 100,000 tons, of artificial silk from 28,000 to over 57,000 tons.

I might illustrate this series by many more examples. They are all documentary evidence of work such as has never before been accomplished in our nation.

In a few years, however, the vast additional results of the Four-Year Plan will supplement these successes. What, in view of a world achievement of this scope, is the purpose of the absurd comments of critics at home and abroad, of the scribbling of half-witted or ill-intentioned journalists or parliamentary incapables? Is it not finally a joke of history when in those very countries which are themselves suffering from depressions, people consider it necessary to criticise us and to give us good advice?

Without advice and above all without help from others we have attempted to overcome a state of distress in the face of which many another country is still helpless.

Increasing traffic

I should now like to present to the German people the results in some other fields of our work.

In 1932 German engineering industries had a turnover of 37.1 million Reichsmark

1933	of 42.1	"	"
1934	55.8	"	"
1935	73.3	"	"
1936	88.7	"	"
1937	(first nine months)	111	million Reichsmark.

The following numbers of motor vehicles were licensed:

1932	56,400	motor cycles,
1937	234,000	"
1932	41,100	passenger vehicles,
1937	216,000	"
1932	7,000	commercial vehicles,
1937	59,600	"

Altogether 5 ½ years ago Germany had 1 ½ million motor vehicles, as compared with 3 million today. The "People's Car" will, however, supply very different figures in a few years' time. Whereas in 1937 roughly five times as many motor vehicles were licensed as in 1932, the export of motor cars has increased almost eightfold as compared with the same year.

This increase in motor transport is accompanied by an increase in general transport.

German inland shipping conveyed

in 1932	73.5	million tons,
in 1937	130	million tons of goods.

The great new river regulation schemes and construction of canals will supplement the already vast system of our inland waterways and lead to further increases in transport.

German ocean shipping conveyed

in 1932	36	million tons,
in 1937	61	"

The idle tonnage to be seen in 1932 along the Elbe and Weser and in all other German coastal districts has disappeared.

New ships are also being built in our shipyards. In 1932 our shipyards had orders for 22,000 tons, and these only from Germany itself, foreign orders being practically non-existent. At the end of 1937 we have 370,000 tons of home orders and 350,000 tons of foreign orders. A further 400,000 tons await laying down, thus making a total of 1,120,000 tons. The new constructions for the Navy are not included in these figures. In other words, the German shipyards, which in 1932 had orders amounting to 22,000 tons, are at present working on orders for 1,120,000 tons for merchant shipping alone.

In the German Railways the average week-day car loading figures for goods transport were in 1937 47 % higher than in 1932. The receipts from goods transport have increased accordingly. In 1937 there was an increase in receipts of 70 % as compared with 1932, an increase of 78 % in tons hauled and an increase of 88 % in ton-miles.

The number of motor lorries owned by the German State Railways increased from 217 in 1932 to 3,137 in 1937, the number of road transport routes from 53 to 1,131, and the mileage from 800 to 29,200. Long distance buses increased to the same extent. The total number of persons carried by the Railway buses has increased from 480,000 in 1932 to 2 ½ million today.

The State Railways returns also show an increase in effective ton-mileage, which rose from 178 milliard to 274 milliard, that is, an increase of 54 %. A similar increase is to be observed in all other fields of Railway traffic, as ultimately shown by the receipts. In 1932 they amounted to 2,234 milliard, by 1937 they had increased to 4,480 milliard Reichsmark.

The increase in the postal services confirms this great general revival in German economic life. The number of letters handled increased from 5.6 milliard in 1932 to 6.4 milliard in 1937. The number of parcels from 227 million to 296 million. The number of postal cheque accounts from 1,021,819 to 1,119,372. The credit balances on a yearly average from 461 million to 729 million Reichsmark. The postal cheque transactions from 703 million to 904 million. The turnover in postal cheque business from 103 milliard to 161 milliard. The number of telephones from 2,960,000 to 3,578,000. The amount of air-mail postings from 135,000 kg. to 3,600,000 kg. The total returns from 1,658 million to 1,940 million.

The Post Office motor coaches conveyed in 1933 60 million people, and in 1937 over 80 million. The distance covered in air-mail delivery increased from 19,375 miles to 39,750 miles. The distance covered annually from 5 ½ million miles to 11 million miles. The number of air passengers from 100,000 to 326,000. The number of air-ports has increased by more than 100 since 1933, with an additional 62 landing grounds for passenger and industrial purposes.

Since 1933 the numbers of the German Air Sports Association had risen to 600,000 members, in 1937 the National-Socialist

Flying Corps has 3 million members, including 50,000 active members, with 6 flying schools and 22 permanent gliding camps, 400 aeroplanes and 4,600 gliders.

Roads, bridges and house-building

The development of German road construction is enormous. For the maintenance and development of German roads, including the Autobahnen (Reich motor roads), the following sums have been spent:

1932	440 millions,
1933	708 "

1500 miles are under construction. The system of Autobahnen is the largest building undertaking in the world and already, with a displacement of 240 million cubic meters of earth, by far exceeds the building achievement of the Panama Canal.

Between 1934 and 1937 approximately 6,000 miles of highways were widened, giving them a 6 metre carriage-way and an overall width of 8 to 10 metres. On 4,600 miles heavy or medium surface was laid. 344 bridges were repaired or newly built, hundreds of level crossings done away with and by-passes constructed.

In the same period 3,750 miles of first and second class roads were widened, 3,000 miles equipped with heavy or medium heavy surface, 600 bridges for these roads were repaired or newly built, and here, too, numerous level crossings done away with and by-passes constructed.

The following large bridges were built:

6	bridges over the Rhine,
4	" " " Elbe,
2	" " " Oder,
3	" " " Danube,
1	" " " Weser,
1	" " " Pregel.

Approximately 3,400 additional bridges were built in connection with the Autobahnen.

The tremendous increase in achievement in these and other fields is paralleled by the increase in our housing activity. In 1937 340,000 dwellings were constructed, this being more than double the figure for 1932.

Altogether since the National-Socialist assumption of power over 1,400,000 dwellings have made available on the housing market.

Social welfare achievements

An account of the action of National Socialism

New social legislation

I should like to supplement the foregoing with some details concerning our great organisations and our social welfare work.

The total membership of the German Labour Front for 1937 is 17,973,000 members. Including the corporative members the number exceeds 20 million. This does not include the members of the Reich Chamber of Culture or of the Reich Food Estate.

The following are the achievements for the welfare of the working population.

The wage arrangements before the advent of the National-Socialist régime may be summed up as follows: 13,000 wage schedules, bargaining between groups out for their own interests, hard and fast agreements, levelling of working conditions, wages under the standard log, struggles for power, strikes and lock-outs, general dissatisfaction. After five years of National-Socialist constructive work: 7,000 wage schedules, clearly defined legal relations, no hard and fast agreements, but minimum basis rates, wage scales according to performance, no class war with strikes and lock-outs, no wages under log standard, effective protection of all social interests, social settlement though the German Labour Front, social peace all round.

Holidays before the National-Socialist régime: Holidays mostly at the worker's own expense, no legal claim, long period of waiting before the first holiday granted, insufficient holiday period, at the most 5 days. After 5 years of National-Socialist constructive work: each working individual has a claim to holidays with pay, minimum and not maximum holiday fixed, grading of holidays according to length of service in firm, age, number of years employed and difficulty of work; a short period of waiting, as a rule only 6 months before the first holiday is granted, increased holiday period up to 18 days for young persons, holidays also for seasonal workers, healthy recreation by means of cheap "Kraft durch Freude" tours.

Wage-policy before the National-Socialist régime: Wage equals price for the article "work", schematic maximum wages, wages influenced by unemployment, wages below log standard, piece work under pressure, no stability of income, loss of earnings on public holidays. After five years of National-Socialist constructive work: Assurance of the right to work, assurance of a minimum income, increase of wages with the increase of production, relation of wages to performance, stability of income, sound and honest piece work conditions, preferential treatment for large families, payment for public holidays.

The people's health, education and sport

Public health: In recognition of the fact that the maintenance of the health of the working individual is of the greatest importance for nation and Reich, the German Labour Front has devoted special attention to this question, as is shown by the following figures: 1937: Factory investigations and visits, approximately 17,000. Medical examination of employees, treatment being started in cases of illness, approximately 620,000. Some 36,000 factory inspections were carried out. Improvements of a social nature undertaken by the works since 1933 exceed the sum of 600 million Reichsmark. All this was formerly wasted through strikes and lockouts.

The following improvements or new constructions were carried out: 23,000 working premises; 6,000 factory grounds; 17,000 dining and rest-rooms; 13,000 wash-rooms and changing toms; 800 club houses; 1,200 sports grounds.

Improvements were also carried out in the crew's quarters on 3,600 ships. 5,000 villages have already taken part in the village improvement campaign.

Cultural welfare

By means of the German Popular Education Organisation German workers were able to take part in some 62,000 activities, including lectures, courses of lectures, popular educational activities in works, towns, and villages, study-circles, conducted tours, study-tours, exhibitions, etc. In 1936 over ten million people took part in these activities. There were approximately 22.1 million visitors to 48,000 theatrical performances, and in addition over 18.6 million visitors to approximately 47,000 film performances, 5.6 million visitors to approximately 11,000 concert performances, some 3.3 million visitors to approximately 1,800 factory exhibitions, and about 121,000 other cultural events with altogether more than 50 million participants. In addition some 600 workmen's community camps (Reich Motor Road camps, Alpine Road camps, military construction camps, etc.), with over 180,000 members, were provided for. Recreation was provided for 190,000 members of the Armed Forces and of the Reich Labour Service in over 300 special programmes. 74,000 men took part in land and sea trips etc. Over 30 joint functions were held for the armed Forces and the Reich Labour Service, 225,000 taking part. About 500,000 people attended 480 works concerts given by army and Labour Service bands. Altogether over two million people were given the possibility of a recreational use of leisure.

In the field of sport since 1934 approximately 21 million people have taken part in over 1 million classes. At the seaside resorts about 350,000 people were afforded an opportunity for sport. Over 4,500 sports instructors are in charge of sports activities. When has more ever been done for the worker?

Travel, hiking and the organisation of holidays have developed considerably. Cruises have been made to Norway, Madeira, the Azores and Italy; the following figures give a survey: Since 1934 altogether 384 cruises with 490,000 participants, over 60,000 land trips with over 19 million participants, and 113,000 walking tours with some 3 million participants have been carried out. The German Labour Front has nine large ocean steamers at its disposal, four of which it owns. Expenditure up to date for the "Kraft durch Freude" fleet alone amounts to over 21 million Reichsmark. The total expenditure since 1934 for "Kraft durch Freude", without investments and shipbuilding, amounts to approximately 77 million Reichsmark. Since the founding of "Kraft durch Freude" in 1934 a total of 155 million participants in the programmes has been counted.

The Labour Service represents an entirely new and purely National-Socialist departure. In 1933 there were in the voluntary Labour Service about a dozen large and 100 small Labour Service associations. After a period of transition of 1 ½ years the structure of the new Labour Service was in the main assured. At present it accommodates some 400,000 men per annum in two six-months periods. The female Labour Service comprises 25,000 girls. Since 1933 1,850,000 young German men and 120,000 girls have been through the training of the Labour Service.

Care of the young

The picture of German youth organization is equally impressive. Before the National-Socialist assumption of power German youth was split up into numerous organizations. Today throughout the entire Reich there is only one youth organisation, the Hitler Youth and League of German Girls, comprising in 1937 over 7 million members, 59 regional and higher regional leaders, 1,365 district and girl leaders, 9,000 sub-district girl leaders, 550,500 subordinate leaders of both sexes serve this greatest of modern youth movements.

The number of participants in the Reich Apprentices Competition was:—

1934	500,000	boys and girls
1935	750,000	" " "
1936	1,036,000	" " "
1937	1,800,000	" " "

A similar picture is presented by the Reich Sport Competition:—

1932	1.6	million participants
1934	2.5	" "
1935	3.7	" "
1937	6.1	" "

The Naval Hitler Youth comprises 45,000 boys, the Motor Hitler Youth 60,000 boys. As part of the campaign for the encouragement of aviation 55,000 members of the German Jungvolk were trained in gliding for group activities. 74,000 boys of the Hitler Youth are organized in its flying units. 15,000 boys passed their gliding test in the year 1937 alone. Today 1,200,000 boys of the Hitler Youth receive regular instruction in small-bore rifle shooting from 7,000 instructors. At present for the Hitler Youth alone 1,400 homes and a large number of schools are under construction.

The Youth Hostels Organization has 2,000 youth hostels at its disposal; in 1937 some 8 million spent a night in the hostels, this figure being over eight times as large as that for all the other youth hostels in the world together.

In the interests of the health of these boys and girls 4,000 doctors are engaged in the Hitler Youth, 800 dentists, and some 500 chemists, who are assisted by 40,000 ambulance boys and 35,000 first-aid girls. Over 30,000 doctors nominated by the Public Health Department look after the health of the individual boys and girls. The whole German youth is medically examined once a year, i.e. over a million individuals being examined.

German winter relief work

The German Winter Help Organization is at the head of the great social institutions. It produced:

1933	350	million Reichsmark
1934-35	360	" "
1935-36	371	" "

making a total of approximately 1,490,000,000 since 1934.

This is over 300 million more in voluntary contributions than the famous Defence Contribution of 1912-13 produced. This vast social assistance organization is supplemented by the endowment "For Disabled Workers" with donations of over 10 million Reichsmark. The Actors and Musicians Relief Fund amounts to 3½ million Reichsmark, and the Goebbels Foundation to over one million Reichsmark.

Before the National-Socialist assumption of power there existed nothing which could even compare with these tremendous achievements.

Cultural development

Increasing share in cultural values

The extent to which the whole nation shares in this general recovery may be seen in the constantly increasing number of visitors to theatres and cinemas, and in the immense increase in the number of listeners-in. In 1937 alone 15 political exhibitions were held and were visited by more than 18 million people. The number of wireless licenses increased from 4.2 million in 1932 to 9,087,000 in 1937. The returns increased from 93 million to 204 million. The production of wireless receiving sets was as follows: 1932, 1,011,000; 1937 to 1,681,000 plus 475,000 People's Sets. Altogether since the beginning of the National-Socialist régime over 10 ½ million receiving sets have been produced.

The number of German theatres giving performances was 199 in 1932 and 263 in 1937. The number of those employed in the theatrical business increased from 22,000 to 30,730. I mention this in order to refute those assertions of some ill-intentioned foreign journalists to the effect that since our assumption of power cultural life in Germany has declined.

A complete picture of German cultural development may best be obtained from the esteem in which it is held by the rest of the world. Many important prizes, certificates of honour and gold medals seek to give expression to this esteem.

The total circulation of illustrated papers increased from 9.5 million to 15 million in 1937. Even the number of foreign journalists visiting Germany increased from 872 in 1932 to 2,973 in 1937 alone. Tourist traffic recorded in 1932 14,305,000 registrations and 49 million night's lodgings. This had increased by 1937 to 27 million registrations and 103 million night's lodgings. The number of foreign visitors increased from 1,114,000 registrations in 1932 to 2,400,000 registrations in 1937, and the number of night's lodgings from 2,673,000 to over 7 million. Cinema receipts amounted in 1932 to 176 million Reichsmark and in 1937 to 290 million Reichsmark.

If I now end this review of German recovery, which I wish to summarise only by a few illustrations and facts selected from a vast number, I can find no better conclusion than that provided by the increase in our birth rate. For in 1932 970,000 children were born in Germany. This number increased each year, in 1937 amounting to 1,270,000. Altogether since the National-Socialist assumption of power the German nation has been blessed with 1,160,000 children. These children not only give us cause to be proud of our German women, but also cause to be grateful to Providence. In five years, 1,160,000 children were born to the nation, who will later be able to help it in its peaceful work.

Gentlemen, I have endeavoured here, by means of a brief presentation of a few facts and figures, to offer you documentary proof of a work of reconstruction, which is unique in its extent and effects. I and all my collaborators, together with the entire German people, can be proud of the last five years, in which such gigantic achievements have been made in all spheres of our economic life. In contrast to this, how ridiculous is the criticism of all those people who can oppose to the National-Socialist work of reconstruction only their stupid or malicious incoherent babbling. We also know that, apart from professional loafers and trouble-makers, the entire German people believes in this work. So far as the lies invented by the pathological minds of lying foreign journalists are concerned, the tales they choose to tell their credulous readers could remain a matter of complete indifference to us Germans, if this constant campaign of hate did not threaten the peace of the world! For this campaign does not diminish our actual achievements. They remain; they can neither be talked nor lied out of existence. We have taken precautions and made sure that these international prophets of hatred and poison will not succeed in other ways as well.

THE REUNION OF GERMANY AND GERMAN AUSTRIA

A Documentary Report

I.

The Legal Accomplishment of the Anschluss on March 13th, 1938

The Federal Constitutional Law regarding the Reunion

Vienna, March 13th, 1938.

It is officially stated :

The following Federal Constitutional Law has today been promulgated :

In virtue of Article III, paragraph 2, of the Federal Constitutional Law regarding extraordinary measures in constitutional matters, B. G. Blatt I, No. 255, 1934, the Federal Government has decided as follows :

Article 1

Austria is a land of the German Reich.

Article 2

On Sunday, April 10th, 1938, a free and secret plebiscite of the German men and women of Austria over twenty years of age will be held with regard to the reunion with the German Reich.

Article 3

In the plebiscite the decision will be taken by a majority of the votes given.

Article 4

The necessary provisions for carrying out and supplementing Article 2 the present Federal Constitutional Law will be issued by decree.

Article 5

1. The present Federal Constitutional Law comes into force on the date of promulgation.

2. The Federal Government is entrusted with the execution of the present Federal Constitutional Law.

Seyss-Inquart, Glaise-Horstenau, Wolff, Hueber, Wenghin, Jury, Neumayer, Reinthaler, Fischböck.

The constitutional accomplishment of this Federal Constitutional Law is hereby attested.

Seyss-Inquart, Glaise-Horstenau, Wolff, Hueber, Wenghin, Jury, Neumayer, Reinthaler, Fischböck.

The Reich Law regarding the Reunion

Berlin, March 13th, 1938.

The Government of the Reich has decided upon the following "Law of March 13th on the Reunion of Austria with the German Reich" which is hereby promulgated :

Article I

The Federal Constitutional Law of March 13th, 1938, adopted by the Austrian Federal Government regarding the reunion of Austria with the German Reich, hereby becomes a law of the German Reich. (Here follows the text of the Federal Law which is reproduced in the opposite column.)

Article II.

The law at present in force in Austria shall remain in operation until further notice. The law of the Reich shall be introduced in Austria by the Führer and Chancellor of the Reich or by the Reich Minister authorised by him for the purpose.

Article III.

The Reich Minister of the Interior is authorised, in agreement with the Reich Ministers concerned, to issue the necessary legal and administrative provisions for carrying out and supplementing the present law.

Article IV.

The present law comes into force on the date of its promulgation.

Linz, March 13th, 1938.

Adolf Hitler,
Führer and Chancellor of the Reich.

Göring,
General Field-Marshal,
Reich Minister of Aviation.

Frick,
Reich Minister of the Interior.

von Ribbentrop,
Reich Minister for Foreign Affairs.

R. Hess,
Deputy of the Führer.

II.

THE RECENT PREVIOUS HISTORY OF THE MARCH 13TH, 1938

I. The Development of German-Austrian Relations from July 11th, 1936 to February 12th, 1938

(a) THE AGREEMENT OF JULY 11TH, 1936.

"Convinced that they are thereby rendering a valuable contribution towards the peaceful development of Europe, and believing that they are thereby doing the best service to the various common interests of the two German States, the Government of the German Reich and the Government of the Austrian Federal State have decided to restore normal and friendly mutual relations.

"It is therefore declared :

"(1) In the sense of the statement made by the Führer and Reich Chancellor on May 21st, 1935, the German Government recognizes the full sovereignty of the Federal State of Austria ;

"(2) Each of these two Governments shall regard the internal political conditions of the other country, including the question of Austrian National-Socialism, as a domestic concern of that country, upon which it will exert neither direct nor indirect influence.

"(3) The Austrian Federal State Government's general policy and its policy towards Germany in particular shall be constantly guided by the principle that Austria recognizes herself to be a German State. The Rome Protocol of 1934, together with its additional clauses of 1936, and the relations of Austria to Italy and Hungary as partners in the said Protocol are not hereby affected.

"Recognizing that the relaxation of tension desired by both parties can be brought about only if in addition certain preliminary conditions are established by the Governments of both countries, the Reich Government and the Austrian Federal Government shall in a series of detailed measures create these required preliminary conditions."

Exchange of Telegrams between the Führer and the Austrian Federal Chancellor, of July 12th, 1936.

The Austrian Federal Chancellor to the Führer :

"The conclusion of this agreement, the aim of which is to restore neighbourly relations between the two German States, affords me the welcome opportunity to greet your Excellency as Führer and Chancellor of the Reich, and, at the same time, to give expression to the conviction that the effect of this treaty will bring profit to Austria and the German Reich and thus prove a blessing to the entire German people. I believe myself to be of one mind with your Excellency that, beyond this, we have by the agreement between the two States rendered valuable service to the general peace.

v. Schuschnigg."

The Führer and Reich Chancellor to the Austrian Federal Chancellor :

"The greetings which your Excellency has transmitted to me on the occasion of the conclusion to-day of the Austro-German agreement are reciprocated sincerely. I join to it the wish that by this agreement the traditional relations resulting from a community of race and historic identity through hundreds of years may again be restored, in order to clear the way for a further common task to the advantage of the German people and for the consolidation of peace in Europe.

Adolf Hitler,
German Reich Chancellor."

Exchange of Telegrams between Schuschnigg and Mussolini, of July 12th, 1936.

Telegram from Schuschnigg to Mussolini :

"It gives me pleasure to inform Your Excellency that I have just signed an agreement with the German Minister, who was authorised for the purpose by the Leader and Chancellor of the German Reich, with the object of again shaping the relations between Austria and Germany in a normal and friendly fashion. In this connection I remember with pleasure the repeated and extremely valuable conversations with Your Excellency, in the last instance at Rocca delle Caminate. I am convinced that Your Excellency will share my satisfaction at the agreement reached, which represents a valuable contribution to the general work of peace. I would like to take this opportunity of again assuring Your Excellency of my sincere friendship and of my determination to continue to cooperate, in agreement with Your Excellency, with Italy under Your Excellency's strong and successful leadership, on the basis of the well-tried Rome protocols."

Telegram from Mussolini in reply to Schuschnigg :

"I thank Your Excellency for your kind telegram. The agreement signed by Your Excellency with the representative of the Führer and Reich Chancellor must be greeted with satisfaction by all who have the cause of peace at heart. The agreement marks a notable step towards the reconstruction of Europe and the Danube countries. In this spirit, as you will remember, the question was discussed at the meeting in Rocca delle Caminate and subsequently examined on the basis of the Italo-Austro-Hungarian agreement.

It is a particular pleasure for me to repeat the assurances of the perfect friendship and cooperation of Italy with the Federal Government in accordance with the Rome Protocol, which will continue to form the basis of the relations between Italy and Austria in the change in her relations with the Reich—a result that is greeted with sympathy by the Italian Government and people."

(b) THE CONVERSATION AT THE OBERSALZBERG ON FEBRUARY 12TH, 1938.

The Official Communiqué on Dr. Schuschnigg's Visit to the Führer and Reich Chancellor.

Berchtesgaden, February 12th. The Austrian Chancellor, Dr. Schuschnigg, accompanied by the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, Dr. Guido Schmidt, and Herrn von Papen, the German Ambassador to Austria, visited Herr Hitler, the German Chancellor, at Obersalzberg to-day. Herr von Ribbentrop, the German Foreign Minister, was present.

The visit was paid on Herr Hitler's invitation.

This informal meeting was occasioned by a mutual wish to confer on all questions concerning relations between the Reich and Austria.

The Joint Official Communiqué issued in Berlin and Vienna on February 15th, 1938 regarding the Result of the Conversation

In the conversation that took place on February 12th between the Federal Chancellor, Dr. Schuschnigg, and the Führer and Reich Chancellor at the Obersalzberg near Berchtesgaden, all questions of the relations between Austria and the German Reich underwent thorough discussion. The object of this conversation was to clear up difficulties which had arisen in the execution of the agreement of July 11th, 1936. It was agreed that both Parties were determined to keep to the principles of the agreement and to regard it as a point of departure for a satisfactory development of relations between the two States. In this sense, after the conversation of February 12th, both Parties decided to carry out immediately steps which guarantee the establishment of such a close and friendly relationship between the two States as is in accordance with the history and general interest of the German people. Both statesmen are convinced that the steps which they have decided upon form at the same time an effective contribution to the peaceful development of the European situation.

(c) THE MEANING OF THE AGREEMENT OF BERCHTESGADEN.

1. Statement by Adolf Hitler in his Reichstag Speech of February 20th, 1938.

"I am happy to be able to tell you, Gentlemen, that during the past few days a further understanding has been reached with a country that is particularly close to us for many reasons. The Reich and German Austria are bound together not only because they are the same people, but also because they share a long and common history, and a common culture.

Difficulties which have presented themselves since the agreement of the July 11th have brought about an attempt to clear away misunderstandings and hindrances on both sides, thus preparing for a final reconciliation. Had this not occurred it was clear that an intolerable situation might one day have developed, whether intentionally or otherwise, which might have brought about a serious catastrophe. It is then as a rule no longer within the power of man to stay the course of a destiny that first arose through negligence or stupidity! I am glad to be able to assure you that these considerations and their interpretation correspond with those of the Austrian Chancellor whom I invited to come to visit me. The idea and the intention were to bring about a relaxation of the tension in our relations with one another by giving under the existing legislation the same legal rights to citizens holding National-Socialist views as are enjoyed by the other citizens of German-Austria. In connection with this there should be a practical contribution toward peace by granting a general amnesty, and by creating a better understanding between the two States through a still closer friendly co-operation in as many different fields as possible, political, personal and economic. All this is a result of the Agreement of July 11th.

I want to express in this connection before the German people my sincere thanks to the Austrian Chancellor for his great understanding and the warm-hearted willingness with which he accepted my invitation and worked with me so that we might discover a way of serving the best interests of the two countries, for after all, they are interests of the whole German people, whose sons we all are, wherever we may have been born.

I believe that in reaching this mutual understanding we have also made a contribution to European peace.

2. Extract from the Speech by the Austrian Federal Chancellor, Dr. Schuschnigg, in the Bundestag at Vienna on February 24th, 1938.

The Reich Chancellor and Führer of the German Reich invited me to a verbal discussion, which took place on February 12th at the Obersalzberg. The famous agreement of July 11th, 1936, which was intended to safeguard and regulate the friendly relations between the two German States, had given rise in its execution to certain difficulties which, if they continued unsolved, represented a serious source of danger. The fact that this personal contact was regarded as a political sensation far beyond the frontiers of our country and of the German Reich is by itself enough to show that up till then the endeavour to resolve the tension which had existed for years between Germany and Austria had not been successful—a condition which we were firmly convinced was not our fault, but in the long run intolerable because abnormal.

Every abnormality signifies a contradiction, and every contradiction undoubtedly involves dangers.

Thus, on that day at Berchtesgaden, as I confidently hoped, the agreement with the Chancellor of the German Reich was a milestone which is intended to define, for all future time, the relations of our two States in the interests of all the German peoples and of our Austrian Fatherland in particular—a milestone of peace.

And there is now to be peace. A peace that does justice to both parties. An honourable peace which, if God wills, puts a definite end to a struggle; a struggle that was certainly not in the interest of the German people and of German territory, however ideal the aims.

This conclusion of peace after five years of fratricidal struggle was the aim and object of the meeting at Berchtesgaden on February 12th of this year.

The Reich Chancellor and Führer of the German Reich, in his great speech to the German nation on February 20th of this year, in dealing with the results of the agreements of Berchtesgaden, referred to them as a supplement within the framework of the agreement of July 11th, 1936, and said that difficulties which had arisen in the execution of that agreement of July 11th, 1936 made it essential to try to remove misunderstandings and obstacles to definite appeasement.

Since the events are past, it is superfluous to inquire in detail why the path taken did not in itself lead to the desired result. The new agreement is concluded, and it is our ardent wish that it should bring everything that both parties expect of it.

The agreement now concluded contains all the factors of success and all the prerequisites of a satisfactory development and a complete peace.

Those who mount the barricades out of idealism and not out of calculation, in the belief that they are doing their duty, have never been the real beneficiaries of the revolution; if fate remains kind to them, they have therefore always had a claim to reconciliation on the return of calmer times. This is the meaning of amnesties. The decisive factor is not whether in individual cases the amnesty is properly appreciated and is granted to those who are worthy, but it is the fact that a line can be drawn under everything that is past in order that a fresh start may be made.

We have given plenty of proofs of good will and confidence. We have invited those who were formerly bound to the Social Democratic Party to cooperate in the Fatherland Front; we have given the possibility of cooperation under absolutely equal conditions to those formerly bound to the National Socialist Party and to the adherents of other groups. The German Peace, as I should like to call the agreement reached, expressly opens up the way to those who profess National Socialist ideas to cooperate with all others, in so far as the principles which they profess are in open, clear and unequivocal harmony with the principles of the Constitution, which has created the independent German and Christian Austria divided into States and under authoritative guidance, and in so far as they are in harmony with the principles of the Fatherland Front at the side of which there can be no political party and no political organisation and within which attention is paid to the equality of rights of all while steadfastly maintaining its principles. This will be the task of the Front in the next few weeks.

The Reich at the same time repeated the assurance that it would take care not to interfere in the inner political affairs of Austria, and this is to be done by the Reich Government being prepared to take steps which preclude the interference of Reich departments in Austrian affairs; it is agreed and laid down that those who have hitherto been illegal in Austria can in no way count on protection by extra-State departments or on toleration by the Austrian Federal Government, but rather that any illegal activity will inevitably meet with the retribution laid down in the laws.

I have spoken of an honest peace. We are well aware that we could, and we did, go as far as that limit beyond which it is written: "Thus far and no farther". We have not been afraid to reach this limit because, trusting in the word and the personality of the Reich Chancellor, who is so successfully guiding the destiny of the great German Reich, we have resolved, in common with him, to strike out a path which, it is our firm conviction, is for the good of the Austrian Fatherland and the whole German people and in the interest of European peace.

I am anxious to state that, fully conscious of the responsibility and bearing fully in mind the vital interests and peaceful condition of our Fatherland, I am prepared without mental reservations and in absolute frankness to keep the word given by Austria. I and all of us shall be happy if a hard time which called for sacrifices and which reached its conclusion with a hard day on February 12th has led to a real German peace, a peace which the sacrifices would make it worth while to maintain and to extend.

3. Extract from the Speech by Dr. Seyss-Inquart, Austrian Minister of the Interior, at Linz, on March 6th, 1938.

In the sense of the Constitution, confirmed by the treaties of July 11th, 1936 and February 12th, 1938, Austria is free and independent. What does that mean? We do not base our independence on the peace treaties. Together with the front leader, the German nation in Austria unanimously rejects these treaties as a basis, even as a legal basis, for Austrian independence. For us, Austrian independence means free decision, free right of self-determination of our own strength, and responsibility borne here in the country. We are aware of the good friendships we have in the world, and we are determined to keep them.

Austrian independence is based on the guarantee of the German people. In the German people the State treaties of July 11th and February 12th and the statement by the Führer and Chancellor of the Reich make the position quite clear. The Austrians go their political way without interference from departments of party and Reich in the clear and unshakable certainty that the German people in Austria will only go a German way.

What this people creates in the way of social arrangements and spiritual and cultural values must be in accordance with its nature and have sprung from the soil of the homeland. This is the ultimate significance of our conviction, our national conviction, namely that our spiritual and physical values and forces rest and are based upon Germanism. This conviction gives us on the soil of this State the social obligation to use these forces and values for the national community. This fund of ideas has been gained above all from the experience of the frontier district and its bleeding national boundaries and is therefore Austrian.

Adolf Hitler, the Führer and Reich Chancellor, is a son of this Upper Austrian land. The Führer of the German Reich in his Austrian years of apprenticeship learned with suffering to know national distress and frontier distress. This knowledge was one of the factors in deciding his future path and the liberation of the German Reich and nation from the disgrace and compulsion of the so-called peace treaties. This liberation of the German nation after the most dreadful defeat in its history also helped Austria to regain her foreign political and military freedom. We Austrians therefore thank the Führer and Chancellor of the Reich.

The clear recognition of this fact leads to clear decisions and findings and to a clear division of responsibilities between the people and the State.

We stand in the frontier district. Here there can be only one watchword—the protection and development of the many-sided forces of the nationalism that is attached to the soil. The attitude may vary according to the temperament and nature of our people in Austria, but there is one question that is perfectly clear: the political conscience always demands the active consciousness of membership of the entire nation. He who forms part of a front against the entire nation cannot assert that he is thereby serving the German cause. That cause goes beyond the inner political sphere of which I will speak later and forms the whole of the German task in Austria. Since the Federal Chancellor and leader of the Front has stated that this principle is one of the principles of the Front, and that it is far from the intentions of the Front to abandon it, we can agree to cooperate in the Front without reservation and without giving up our ideas. The question of the State form is more frequently placed in the foreground of internal political discussions than is called for by the needs of the time and the nation. This question is not urgent at a time when the entire people is still struggling for its rights and its resurrection. It is certain that this question also can only be solved by the entire German destiny.

II. The Breach of the "German Peace" by Federal Chancellor Schuschnigg

THE ATTEMPT AT A "POPULAR CONSULTATION" WITH UNCONSTITUTIONAL MEANS

Proclamation by Dr. Schuschnigg, Leader of the Front, of March 9th, 1938.

For a free German Austria! People of Austria!

For the first time in the history of our Fatherland, the leadership of the State demands an open confession of adherence to the home country. Next Sunday, March 13th, is the day of the popular consultation. All men and women in Free Austria, whatever your profession or class, are called upon to make your confession before the whole world. You are called upon to state whether you are willing to go the way we are going which strives towards national concord and equality of rights, the ultimate victory over party division, the German peace inwards and outwards, the policy of work.

The watchword is: For a free, German, independent, social, Christian and united Austria; for peace and work and equality of rights for all who confess their adherence to nation and Fatherland.

People of Austria, therefore, arise as one man and vote "Yes". Greetings.

Dr. Kurt Schuschnigg, Federal Chancellor.

Extract from the Proclamation regarding the Plebiscite Regulations.

All members of the Fatherland Front, without regard to age, and also all members of the F. F. who are Austrian citizens and born not later than 1914, are entitled to vote. When the right to vote is proved, the document is stamped. The person concerned is then requested to place his voting paper in the urn. The paper can be given in open or folded. It is permitted to hand in the voting paper in an envelope. Envelopes are not supplied. A list of the persons who have voted must be posted at a place decided by the head of the province (Mayor of Vienna). The official voting paper is a paper of usual size of 5 by 8 cm. with the word "Yes" printed on one side. Such papers are under all circumstances considered as affirmative votes.

All members of the Plebiscite Commission must be members of the Fatherland Front and, if possible, be in office. The supply of clerical staff is regulated by instructions from the head of the province.

The beginning and end of the voting is fixed by the head of the province. The voting documents are the membership card of the Fatherland Front, the membership card of the Peasants' Union, the Austrian trade card and the trades union card or identity cards or certificates of residence or registration cards, in any case only documents which establish the identity. The document submitted is stamped to the effect that the person has voted. Anyone personally known to the Plebiscite Commission may be allowed to vote without producing a document. The persons entering the polling booths must submit their documents to the president.

Persons wishing to vote "No" must write the word "No" by hand on a paper of the same size. Papers containing the word "No" with any addition are invalid. Blank papers, i.e. papers which have neither the word "Yes" (written or printed) nor any remark in writing are considered as affirmative votes. All other papers are invalid.

The Federal Chancellor spoke as follows on the significance of the plebiscite in his speech at Innsbruck on March 9th:

"The Sunday which calls for the declaration of the adherence of this country to its principles, the unity of the people, peace and our programme of work, however simple and self-evident the watchword may be, is undoubtedly of special importance. I take the responsibility for this decision on myself alone. I stand and fall, with everything that I desire and think, with this declaration of adherence to be given by the Austrian people. But I believe that this responsibility could be and had to be assumed, because I cannot imagine there is a single man or woman who knows what is at stake who could be against this plan at the present time."

Protest against the Unconstitutional Plebiscite Conditions. An Article by Dr. Jury, of March 11th, 1938.

Dr. Jury, the deputy head of the "National Political Section", discussed the "popular consultation" from the point of view of the Austrian National Socialists in the "Wiener Neueste Nachrichten". The morning edition was confiscated on account of this article.

Dr. Jury wrote: By the agreements of July 11th, 1936 and February 12th, 1938 the two leaders of the German States have guaranteed the independence of our Austrian fatherland and have thus made this the basis of the brotherly community of combat and fate of the entire German people. We Austrian National Socialists have also recognised the principle of Austrian independence and have publicly undertaken to keep all legal provisions. By my entry into the legislative corporations I have become a co-guarantor of the Austrian May constitution to which I have sworn a sacred oath.

We National Socialists are accustomed to take our oaths seriously, and it is therefore our obvious duty to consider whether we will follow on roads which threaten to depart from the ground of the Austrian constitution.

The principles set up by the Federal Chancellor for the "popular consultation" have been placed outside discussion by all Austrians. All political groups that can be taken seriously in Austria have for a long time taken their stand on these principles. To reject them would be high treason to Austria and to the entire German people. But we refuse, by agreeing to what is self-evident, to reply "Yes" to what may be read between the lines in this watchword of the "popular consultation".

We Austrian National Socialists are fighting not only for a free and German, an independent and social, a Christian and united Austria, but we are fighting for the indivisibility of the principles of the Austrian constitution. We cannot and will not tolerate that, by omitting two of the most important principles of new Austria from the question put in the plebiscite, namely the authoritative leadership and the corporate organisation of our State, the way is opened up to the democratic form of State and thereby to the Popular Front and to the bolshevisation of our beloved fatherland. We Austrian National Socialists are at any time prepared to reply "Yes" to the Austrian May constitution.

But we must decisively decline to reply "Yes" to a departure from the sworn principles of our constitution under pressure of being branded as traitors to our people and country.

The third principle of the question put to the vote contains those demands which we Austrian National Socialists have always put forward and the fulfilment of which has been guaranteed to us by the Federal Chancellor on the basis of the Berchtesgaden agreement. But equality of rights has not yet been guaranteed to all Austrians who are true to their people and fatherland. The right guaranteed to us of a share in the decisions of the Governments of the "Länder" is simply rejected by the governors. The right to a share in the decisions within the framework of the Fatherland Front could hitherto only be achieved to a very small extent on account of the existing Front barrier. The cessation of discrimination against National Socialists, which was established at Berchtesgaden, has hitherto not been fulfilled.

This lack of equality of rights has been particularly shown in the last few days in the conditions for carrying out the "popular consultation", and the effect is that we National Socialists are given no possibilities whatever of controlling the freedom of the plebiscite, the secrecy of the ballot and the counting of the votes. In view of the absence of lists of voters and uniform voting identity papers, the door is opened wide to a forged vote, and in view of the lack of measures for securing the secrecy of the ballot and in view also of the preliminary voting provided for in public institutions, the way is opened up for terrorism, especially as even today any other vote than "Yes" is pilloried as treason to Austria.

For these three reasons, i.e. the unconstitutional tendency of the question put to the vote, the illegality of the form of plebiscite which endangers peace and work, and the absence of equality of rights in the execution of the "popular consultation", we Austrian National Socialists must decline to take part in this "popular consultation" which is not provided for in the Austrian constitution and must therefore be regarded as a purely private initiative the result of which cannot be controlled.

A "popular consultation" which has a political tinge, which departs from the principles of the Austrian constitution and which moreover in this form is not provided for by the constitution, not to mention the legislation, calls forth the dangers of internal disturbances and a change of course in foreign affairs. For these two reasons, we Austrian National Socialists decline to take part in an action which is not founded on the law and would bring about an unconstitutional position.

"Behind the Back of the Cabinet"

London, March 10th. Reuter reports from Vienna: In the office of Dr. Jury, deputy for Dr. Seyss-Inquart as head of the National Political Section, a spokesman gave Reuter the following authorised declaration:

"We are instructing our adherents to abstain from voting in the plebiscite on Sunday. We are in principle decided to keep to the agreements of July 11th, 1936 and February 12th, 1938. But we are not prepared to declare our decision in this form. In addition, the manner in which the plebiscite is brought about can only be characterised by an expression which I prefer not to use. It was decided without consultation with the Cabinet and behind its back. The entire manner in which the plebiscite is to be carried out makes it possible for the voters to vote several times and gives the officials of the Fatherland Front unrestricted control over the ballot, so that the door is open to all kinds of abuses.

The Postponement of the Plebiscite

Vienna, March 11th. About 7 p.m. the following announcement was made on the Austrian wireless:

"The Federal Chancellor and Front Leader, after reporting to the President of the Federation, has decided to postpone the plebiscite fixed for Sunday the 13th instant."

III. The Collapse of the Schuschnigg Government and the Elementary Irruption of the National Socialist Rising

(a) SCHUSCHNIGG'S WITHDRAWAL

The Broadcast Speech of the Federal Chancellor on March 11th, 1938

"This day has put before us a tragic and decisive situation. I have to give my Austrian fellow-countrymen the details of the events of the day.

"The German Government to-day handed to President Miklas an ultimatum, with a time-limit attached, ordering him to nominate as Chancellor a person to be designated by the German Government and to appoint members of a Cabinet on the orders of the German Government; otherwise, German troops would invade Austria.

"I declare before the world that the reports issued in Austria concerning disorders created by the workers and the shedding of streams of blood and the allegation that the situation had got out of the control of the Government were lies from A to Z.

"President Miklas asks me to tell the people of Austria that we have yielded to force, since we are not prepared in this terrible situation to shed blood, and we decided to order the troops to offer no serious—to offer no resistance.

"The Inspector-General of the Army, Gen. Schilharsky, has been placed in command of the troops. He will issue further orders to them.

"So I will take leave of the Austrian people with the German word of farewell, uttered from the depths of my heart. 'God protect Austria.'" and a Correction by the "Deutsche Nachrichtenbüro" of March 11th, 1938

The former Austrian Federal Chancellor Schuschnigg, in speaking on March 11th at about 7.50 p.m. from the Vienna broadcasting station, made a number of untrue statements.

He stated, inter alia, that the Government of the German Reich had sent an ultimatum with a time limit demanding the formation of a new Federal Government. This statement by Schuschnigg is untrue. Such an ultimatum was not issued by the Government of the Reich, but such demands were made to the Federal President by Austrian departments and Austrian Ministers in view of the position in Austria which was becoming constantly more critical and of the policy of the Federal Chancellor Schuschnigg which was steering towards a catastrophe.

Herr Schuschnigg further states that the Government of the German Reich demanded in the form of an ultimatum that the Federal President should "choose the Government according to the proposals of the Reich Government." This is also not in accordance with the facts, but Austrian Government circles, fully recognising the position in Austria, made such demands of the Federal President.

Thirdly, the former Austrian Federal Chancellor states that it is untrue that disturbances have broken out in Austria and that the Government is not master of the situation. Hundreds of reports sent from Austria all over the world prove that innumerable conflicts had already taken place, that Marxist disturbances had occurred in many places, that for instance Communist crowds had armed themselves in the Vienna Neustadt and that a number of attacks had been made when Schuschnigg read his untrue statements.

(b) THE PROVISIONAL ASSUMPTION OF POWER BY DR. SEYSS-INQUART, MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR

An Appeal by Dr. Seyss-Inquart.

Vienna, March 11th. Dr. Seyss-Inquart, Federal Minister for Internal Affairs and Defence, broadcast the following speech at about 8.20 p.m.:

"Men and women of Austria, German patriots: With reference to the happenings of to-day and with special reference to the events we are now expecting, I state that I am still in office as Minister of Defence and the Interior and that I feel myself responsible for the maintenance of order in this country.

"I demand that all of you keep the peace and order. During the next few days discipline must be especially strict.

"If there are any meetings they must not have the character of demonstrations. I demand that those formations of the National-Socialist party responsible for order and safety shall ensure that absolute peace and order are everywhere maintained. I am sure that the Government will have the unreserved support of all.

"I remind you especially that there must be no question of resistance either on the part of the populace or the executive against the German Army, which is now entering the country. It is most important that peace and order should be maintained everywhere.

"Keep your heads, remain calm and see to it that we advance towards a happy future."

Seyss-Inquart's Appeal for the Despatch of German Troops.

Telegram from Dr. Seyss-Inquart to the Führer and Reich Chancellor, on March 11th, 1938, at night.

"The Provisional Austrian Government," which, after the resignation of the Government of Schuschnigg, sees as its task the restoration of peace and order in Austria, addresses to the German Government the urgent request to support it in its task and to help it in preventing bloodshed.

For this purpose it asks the German Government for the dispatch of German troops at the earliest possible time."

Seyss-Inquart.

The Appointment of Seyss-Inquart as Federal Chancellor and the Formation of the Seyss-Inquart Government.

Vienna, March 12th 1.30. From the balcony of the Federal Chancellor's Palace, Dr. Jury announced the appointment of Dr. Seyss-Inquart who, after the resignation of the Schuschnigg Government, had been requested by the Federal President Miklas "under pressure of the internal political situation", to take over the office of the Federal Chancellor. At the same time he announced the new list of Ministers.

IV. The Proclamation by the Führer on March 12th, 1938

Germans,

We have witnessed the fate of our racial comrades in Austria with deep pain for many years. An eternal historical link, which was first broken in 1866, but which was further strengthened in the World War, has placed Austria ever since in community with the German people and their fate. The sorrow, which was first put upon this country from outside and then from inside, was felt by us to be our own in the same way as we know that for millions of German-Austrians the unhappiness of the Reich was the cause of a similar sorrow and sympathy.

When the nation in Germany once more found the way to the proud consciousness of being a great people, thanks to the victory of the National-Socialist idea, a new era of sorrow and of the sorest trial began in Austria. A régime lacking every legal mandate attempted to maintain its existence, which was denied by the overwhelming majority of the Austrian people, by the most brutal measure of terror, by bodily and economic chastisement and destruction.

Thus we, as a great people, had the experience that more than 6,000,000 of our own stock were oppressed by a numerically small minority which had simply seized the necessary power. The deprivation of political rights corresponded to an economic decay, which stood in fearful contrast to the blossoming of a new life in Germany.

Who can hold it against these unhappy racial comrades that their looks turn with longing towards Germany, towards that Germany with which their forefathers had been linked for so many centuries; that Germany with which they fought shoulder to shoulder in the hardest war of all time, whose culture was their culture, and to whose culture they had themselves contributed so much of great value in so many spheres? To restrain these opinions meant nothing more than to condemn hundreds of thousands of people to the greatest mental distress. If years ago this sorrow was borne with patience, the will to set aside this oppression became ever stronger with the growing prestige of the Reich.

Germans, I have attempted in the last year to warn the former rulers of Austria against this course; only a madman could believe that he could in the long run rob the people of their love for a nation of common stock by oppression and terror. European history proves that a stronger fanaticism results in such cases. This fanaticism forces the oppressor to resort to increasingly sharp methods of violation, and these in their turn increase the horror and hatred of those oppressed.

I therefore attempted to convince those who were then responsible that in the long run it would be impossible for a great nation, because it would be unworthy of it, continually to be compelled to see people of the same race, persecuted and imprisoned only on account of their origin or their adherence to this race. Over 40,000 refugees were compelled to enter Germany alone. Ten thousand are in prisons, dungeons, and concentration camps; hundreds of thousands have been reduced to beggary and impoverished. No nation in the world would tolerate in the long run such a state of affairs on its own frontiers. If it did it would only deserve to be despised.

In 1936 I tried to find some way which would offer the prospect of alleviating the tragic fate of this German brother nation in order thus, perhaps, to facilitate a genuine reconciliation. The Agreement of July 11th, however, was signed only to be broken again in the very next hour. The overwhelming majority remained outlawed. Their pariah position in this State was in no way alleviated. He who openly confessed that he belonged to the German nationhood continued to be persecuted, no matter whether he was a National-Socialist roadworker or a veteran army leader of the World War who had won recognition.

I then tried for a second time to bring about an understanding. I endeavoured to make the representative of this régime, who met and faced me—the leader chosen by the German people—without any legitimate mandate, I endeavoured to make him understand that this position would in the long run be untenable because the increasing indignation of the Austrian people could not eternally be held in check with increasing force. I endeavoured to make him understand that from a given moment it would also become unbearable for the Reich to look on silently while this oppression continued. For if to-day already colonial solutions are made dependent upon questions of the right of self-determination of the inferior nations concerned, then it is unbearable that 6,500,000 members of an old and great nation are virtually placed below these rights by its régime.

I, therefore, wanted to obtain by a new Agreement that all Germans in this country should receive the same rights and be given the same duties. This Agreement was to have been the fulfilment of the treaty of July 11th, 1936.

A few weeks later we saw unfortunately that the men of the then Austrian Government were not thinking of keeping the spirit of this Agreement. In order to procure an alibi for their continual assaults on the equal rights of Austrian Germans a "popular demand" was invented which was calculated to deprive the majority of the country of its rights for ever. This procedure was to be confined to one occasion only. A country, which for many years has had no elections, which has none of the machinery necessary to ascertain the views of the electors, suddenly ordered a plebiscite which had to take place within three and a half days. There were no lists of voters nor voting cards; there was no scrutiny of the rights of persons to vote; there was no undertaking to keep the vote secret; there was no guarantee of the impartial carrying out of the election; there was no security for the counting of the votes. If these were the methods adopted to give a régime the appearance of legality then we National-Socialists in the German Reich had been fools for 15 years. We went through hundreds of elections and with the greatest difficulty we gained the approval of the German nation.

When the late President of the Reich finally called on me to form a Government I was the leader of by far the largest party in the Reich. I have since always endeavoured to secure from the German people the legal approval of my position and my acts. If, however, the methods which Schuschnigg wanted to apply are the correct ones, then the plebiscite in the Saar was only a piece of chicanery which was intended to render more difficult the return of this territory to the Reich. In this matter we are of a different opinion. I believe we are all entitled to be proud of the fact that we secured the confidence of the Germans in the Saar plebiscite in such an incontestable manner.

The German population of Austria have at last risen against this attempt to carry out a deceptive election. The German Reich will not tolerate the persecution of Germans in this territory in future because of their attachment to our nation or adherence to certain views. The Reich wants peace and order.

I have therefore decided to place from now on the aid of the Reich at the disposal of the millions of Germans in Austria. Since this morning the soldiers of the German Armed Forces are marching over all the German-Austrian frontier. Tanks, infantry divisions, detachments of Storm Troopers are marching on the ground, while the German Air Force is in the blue sky—they were summoned by the new National-Socialist Government in Vienna. They are the guarantors that within the shortest possible time the Austrian people will at last be given an opportunity to decide their future and their fate by a real plebiscite. Behind these columns is the will and the determination of the entire German nation.

I myself as Führer and Chancellor of the German people will be happy once again to be able to enter this land which is also my home as a German and a free citizen. The world must realize that the German people in Austria these days are experiencing utmost bliss and joy. Austria sees in the brothers who have come to her help the saviours from their deepest misery.

Long live the National-Socialist German Reich! Long live National-Socialist German Austria!

V. The Achievement of the Anschluss by the Führer and Reich Chancellor Adolf Hitler and the Federal Chancellor Dr. Seyss-Inquart that Article 88 (Prohibition of Anschlusss) of the Treaty of St. Germain is invalid

The Declaration

(a) THE HISTORICAL EVENTS AT LINZ
ON MARCH 12TH, 1938.

Greeting of the Führer and Chancellor by Federal Chancellor Seyss-Inquart.

"My Führer! At a moment of the greatest significance for the German people and, in its more distant effects, for the shaping of European history, we greet you, my Führer and Reich Chancellor, for the first time again in Austria. The time has come when, in spite of the dictated Peace, compulsion, ill-will and incomprehension on the part of a whole world, Germans have finally found their way to each other. Today the German nation stands united and indivisible in order to bear any struggle and any suffering as one people. The way was difficult, hard and called for sacrifices. It led through the most terrible defeat of the German people, but from that very defeat arose the great and glorious idea of the indivisible community of destiny, the consciousness of one living nation, the idea of National Socialism.

You, my Führer, have felt the distress and suffering of the people as a son of this frontier district. Out of this determination arose in you the great thought of staking everything in order to lead the German people out of this, its most serious defeat.

You have achieved it. You are the Führer of the German nation in its struggle for honour, freedom and right. Now we Austrians have for all time freely and openly, proudly and independently, proclaimed our adherence to this Führer, while at the same time solemnly declaring that Article 88 of the Peace Treaty is ineffective.

The great forces of the Reich enter our country under the jubilation of Austria. Austria's soldiers greet the field-grey Germans who have come, not in spite of us, but in order to prove clearly and definitely that the German people has come in its entirety to safeguard German right before the whole world and to protect it for all time. The national German Reich of order, of peace and of the freedom of the peoples is our aim, we stand on the threshold of its dawn and Adolf Hitler is its Führer.

My Führer! We Austrians thank you. I can merely speak as a simple man, but I can say from the hearts of millions of Austrians: We thank you. We have always fought together with you. I believe we have fought a good fight to the end. But now we greet you with the joy of all German hearts:

Hail, my Führer!

Adolf Hitler's Speech.

"Germans!

German men and women!

Herr Chancellor, I thank you for your words of greeting. In particular I thank you who have come here to give your testimony that it is not the will and the wish of a few to found this great national German Reich but that it is the wish and will of the German people.

Some of our well-known international seekers after the truth will perhaps not only see the truth here to-night but also admit it afterwards.

When I left this town I carried with me the same faith which fills me to-day. Imagine my feelings now that I see my faith fulfilled after so many years.

Providence, in calling me forth from this city to the leadership of the Reich, must have bestowed a mission on me, and that mission can only be to restore my dear homeland to the German Reich. I have believed in this mission, have lived and fought for it, and I think I have now accomplished it. You are all witnesses and sureties of this.

I do not know on what day you will be called upon. I hope it will not be far distant. Then you will have to give your own confession of faith, and I believe that I shall then be able before the entire German people to point with pride to my home country.

This result must then show the world that any further attempt to tear this nation asunder will be vain.

Just as you will then be pledged to make your contribution to this German future, the whole of Germany is ready to make its contribution. It is already doing so today.

The German soldiers whom you see marching in from all parts of the Reich at the present time are champions ready and willing to make sacrifices for the unity of the entire great German people, for the power of the Reich, for its greatness and glory, now and for all time.

Germany, Sieg-Heil."

b) THE FÜHRER ON SCHUSCHNIGG'S BETRAYAL

A Conversation of Adolf Hitler with the English journalist, Mr. Ward Price at Linz.

Linz, March 13th.

I had a long talk with Herr Hitler in his room at the Hotel Weininger at Linz, in which he gave me a full and frank account of the reasons which had led him to send his troops into Austria.

"Will the developments of to-day have any effect upon the Anglo-German conversations that are beginning?" I asked Herr Hitler.

"On our side, none at all, and I hope none on the British side," he answered. "What harm have we done to any foreign country? Whose interests have we hurt by falling in with the will of the overwhelming majority of the Austrian people to become German?"

"What is your attitude towards the Anglo-French note of protest?" I asked.

"I cannot understand it," was the reply. "These people here are Germans. A protest note from other countries about my actions with regard to them has no more sense than a note from the German Government would have which protested against the relations of the British Government with Ireland."

"I assure you in all sincerity," he said, "that four days ago I had no idea at all that I should be here to-day or that Austria would have been embodied as she is from to-night with the rest of Germany on exactly the same basis as Bavaria or Saxony.

I have done this because I was deceived by Herr Schuschnigg, and to betray is something which I will not tolerate. When I give my hand and word on any matter I stand by it, and I expect anyone who enters into an agreement with me to do the same. I came to terms with Herr Schuschnigg by which he was to cease his oppression of the majority of the people of his country. I dealt quite fairly with him in my Reichstag speech. I gave him the chance to say: 'I have come to terms with the German Government, and I will loyally co-operate in carrying them out.' Instead Herr Schuschnigg tried to spring this plebiscite (the one on a 'free Austria' he had planned for yesterday) on his country.

At first I could not believe the news. I sent an emissary to Vienna to find out if it could possibly be true. He reported that it was true. So I determined to act at once, with the result that on the very day he was going to hold his plebiscite I have brought about the union of Austria and Germany. That union will be submitted to another national plebiscite, but you will see the result. It will be a sweeping majority like it was in the Saar.

This is my home, I have long grieved to see the people to whom I belong by birth oppressed and suffering. More than two thousand of them have lost their lives. Many have been in prison. Some have been hanged for their political opinions and their faithfulness to German ideals.

A minority of ten per cent. has oppressed a majority of ninety per cent. Well, I have put an end to all that. But I have done still more. I have prevented the majority from avenging itself on the oppressors. I hope the world will realise that it is a work of peace I have performed here. If I had not intervened and the Schuschnigg Government had tried to carry through its trick plebiscite there would have been bloody revolution here. Austria might well have become another Spain in the heart of Europe.

I am a realist. Look at my relations with Poland. I am naturally ready to admit that Poland—a land of 33 million inhabitants needs an outlet to the sea. It is a bitter thing to us that this has to be obtained at the expense of a corridor through German territory, but we realise what it means to the Poles. There are Germans living under the Polish Government and Poles living under the German Government.

If the two countries quarrelled each would oppress its minority. It was far better to settle our differences by agreement.

I hope that all nations will recognise from what has happened in Austria the folly of oppressing their national minorities.

Wait a little and see what I will do with Austria. Come back in four years' time, and you will find that the number of the Austrian unemployed has greatly fallen. You will see how much better off and happier the people of Austria will be."

c) EXCHANGE OF TELEGRAMS BETWEEN HITLER AND MUSSOLINI ON MARCH 12TH, 1938.

Hitler to Mussolini

To His Excellency the Italian Prime Minister and Duce of Fascist Italy, Benito Mussolini:

— Mussolini, I shall never forget it.

Mussolini to Hitler

"Hitler, Vienna. My attitude is determined by the friendship between our two countries, consecrated in the axis.

— Mussolini."

III.

GREATER GERMANY HAS ARISENAdolf Hitler's Entry into Vienna on March 14th, 1938

Immediately after his triumphal entry into Vienna, at a quarter past seven in the evening, the Führer addressed the Viennese people from the balcony of the Hotel Imperial:

"My German men and women compatriots! What you are experiencing I have myself experienced with you in the last five days. It is a great historical change that has come over our German people. What you are passing through in this moment the entire German people is passing through with you.

It is not only the two million people in this city but 75 millions of our people in one Reich. They are all deeply affected and moved by this historical turn of events, and they all make a solemn promise: whatever may happen, the German Reich as it stands today will never again be broken up or torn asunder by anyone."

WITHDRAWAL OF THE FEDERAL PRESIDENT MIKLAS AND THE APPOINTMENT OF SEYSS-INQUART AS REICH STATTHALTER

Vienna, March 13th. The official news agency reports:

"Federal President Miklas, in reply to a letter from the Federal Chancellor, Dr. Seyss-Inquart, of March 13th, 1938, has resigned his functions. His powers are transferred, in accordance with § 77, para. 1, of the Constitution of May 1934, to the Federal Chancellor, Dr. Seyss-Inquart."

Vienna, March 15th. The Führer and Reich Chancellor has appointed the Austrian Federal Chancellor, Dr. Seyss-Inquart, Reich Statthalter of Austria with seat in Vienna.

IV.

THE ANSCHLUSS DEMONSTRATIONS IN VIENNA AND BERLINI. The Liberation Festivities on the Heldenplatz in Vienna on March 14th, 1938*(a) SPEECH BY THE REICH STATTHALTER
DR. SEYSS-INQUART

My Leader, as the last supreme organ of the Federal State of Austria, I report to the Führer and Reich Chancellor the fulfilment of the legal decision in accordance with the will of the German people and its Führer. Austria is a "land" of the German Reich. I announce to the German nation and to the entire world that Adolf Hitler, as Führer and Reich Chancellor, has entered the stronghold of the old capital and guardian of the Reich. The aim for which centuries of German history have struggled, for which uncounted millions of the best Germans have bled and died, the ultimate aim in the fierce fight, the ultimate consolation in the bitterest hours—has now been achieved. The Ostmark has returned home. The Reich has again arisen; the national German Reich has been created.

My Leader, the forces of all the generations of the German people are concentrated in your will, and you, my Leader, created the achievement for all generations of the German future. Today all Germans from all eternity greet the Führer as the consumator, today the Führer greets the new eternal Germany.

My Leader, We have only one thing to say: we thank the Führer. We say thanks—the thanks which are unbounded love and unconditional loyalty. My Leader, wherever the way leads, will follow. Heil, my Leader.

(b) ADOLF HITLER'S SPEECH

German men and women.

Within a few days there has been a revolution in the community of the German people the extent of which we are able to see to-day, but the significance of which only later generations can measure.

In recent years those at the head of the régime which has been overthrown often spoke of the special mission which in their eyes this country had to fulfil. A leader of the Legitimists described them exactly in a memorandum. The role of the so-called independence of Austria which was founded in the Peace Treaties and was dependent on the grace of the foreigner was to hinder the creation of a truly great German Reich and to bar the way to the German people's future.

I now proclaim for this land its new mission. Its mission answers to the vocation which once called hither German settlers from all parts of the old Reich. The oldest East March of the German people is from now on to be the newest bastion of the German nation and so of the German Reich. For centuries in the unquiet times of the past the storms of the east broke on the frontiers of the old march. For centuries more, for all future she is to be again an iron guarantor of the security and freedom of the German Reich and so a surety for the happiness and peace of our great people. And I know this, the old East March of the German people will fulfil its new task just as the old task was solved and mastered.

I speak in the name of the millions of men, of this wonderfully beautiful German land, in the name of the Styrians, of the Lower Austrians and the Upper Austrians, of the Carinthians, the Salzburgers, the Tirolese, and, above all, in the name of the city of Vienna, when in this moment I assure the 68,000,000 of other fellow-Germans in our broad Reich: "This land is German."

It has understood its mission, it will fulfil it, and it will be surpassed by none in loyalty to the great German national community.

But our task will now be, by work, industry, common action, and cooperation, to solve the great social, cultural, and economic tasks, but above all to make Austria ever more a fortress of National-Socialist devotion and National-Socialist determination to develop and construct.

I cannot, however, finish this appeal without recalling those men who have made it possible for me to bring about this great turning-point in so short a time with the help of God. I thank the National-Socialist members of the Government, and at their head the new Reichs-Statthalter Dr. von Seyss-Inquart, I thank the innumerable party officials, but I thank, above all, the innumerable nameless idealists, the fighters in our formations, who, in long years of persecution, have proved that the German people, placed under pressure, only becomes still harder. These years of suffering have confirmed me in my conviction of the high value of the German-Austrian man, working within the framework of our great national community. The wonderful order and discipline of this mighty event is also evidence for the power of the idea inspiring these men.

So in this hour I can make before the German people the greatest report of my life of a task carried out. As Leader and Chancellor of the German nation and of the German Reich I report before German history that my homeland has now entered the German Reich.

Germany and her new member, the National-Socialist Party, the Army, our Reich, Victory Heil!

II. The Anschluss Demonstration in Berlin on March 16th, 1938

(a) GREETING OF THE FÜHRER BY FIELD-MARSHAL GÖRING.

My Leader!

I greet you today in the name of the entire people and of the capital of the Reich, and in the name of the armed forces. Words cannot express, my Leader, what each of us feels today.

You have brought us the whole of Germany. The brothers are liberated.

You have brought us your home country, not with violence but with your heart.

May I at this moment, my Leader, return into your hands the full powers which were accorded me by confidence in these days.

My Leader, in the name of all, I greet you.

(b) SPEECH BY REICH MINISTER DR. GOEBBELS.

My Leader!

Over there a festive city awaits you. Hundreds of thousands, even millions, have marched out as an advance detachment of your people to express their thanks.

It is only a few days since you left us on that Saturday morning. What a change has taken place in the meantime. In the last few days and nights we have witnessed your triumphal journey through our German Austria. We have all listened in with beating hearts when you, my Leader, made history, when you brought back your home country into the great union of our German Reich.

How often have we not seen in your Obersalzberg that Austrians, children and women, and even men, marched past you with tears in their eyes. These tears of national suffering have now become tears of national joy.

How often have we stood at your side on the terrace of your house when you looked longingly towards Salzburg. And now, my Leader, you have brought your home country back to the Reich.

For that not only our German compatriots in Austria thank you, but also the great German people, that great German people that now stands in its hundreds of thousands and millions in the streets of Berlin in order to greet you, my Leader, and give you their heartfelt and joyous thanks. I am proud to be the interpreter of these feelings.

Thus I greet you, and thus we all greet you on your return to Berlin, with our old cry:

Adolf Hitler, Sieg Heil! Sieg Heil! Sieg Heil!

(c) SPEECH BY ADOLF HITLER

My comrades!

You can imagine what feelings have been and are mine in these days. I am so happy that fate has chosen me to bring about this great union of the German people. And I am glad to know and to see that the entire German people today rejoices here and in all other German lands, and most of all in the land which was the most unhappy a few days ago and is today the happiest.

We have all the certainty that no one will ever again dissolve our union. Should any persons yet doubt it, they will obtain the final confirmation on April 10th.

Germany has become and will remain Greater Germany; the German people as a whole from east to west and now from south to Berlin will see to that. Heil!

THE DISSOLUTION OF THE AUSTRIAN MINISTRY OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS AND THE DIPLOMATIC NOTIFICATION OF THE ANSCHLUSS TO THE FOREIGN POWERS ON MARCH 14TH, 1938

Vienna, March 15th. The Federal Minister for Foreign Affairs, Dr. Wilhelm Wolf, yesterday evening handed over the duties of the Austrian Foreign Office to the Reich Foreign Minister, and stated, after Herr von Ribbentrop's arrival: "As the last Austrian Foreign Minister, I transfer with heartfelt joy the affairs of the Austrian Foreign Office into your hands. We Austrians have only one Fatherland. That is Germany."

Berlin, March 15th. The diplomatic representatives of the Reich yesterday received instructions to notify the foreign Governments of the Reich law of March 13th on the reunion of Austria with the German Reich, with the addition that the Austrian diplomatic representatives abroad have received orders to place themselves and their staff at the service of the German representatives.

V.

THE HISTORICAL REICHSTAG MEETING OF MARCH 18TH, 1938

Dissolution of the Last Small German Reichstag

I. Adolf Hitler's Speech

Deputies, Men of the German Reichstag!

I have convened you to this short meeting today in order from the bottom of my heart to give you a report on events the importance of which you will all appreciate.

In addition I must notify you of decisions which affect the German people and the German Reichstag itself.

When I spoke to you a few weeks ago I gave you an account of five years of reconstruction work in the National Socialist State, the total results of which may well be described as unprecedented.

From the deepest moral and political humiliation, from economic distress and social disintegration, our people has risen to a height which even the most optimistic adherents of our own movement would have found improbable in such a short time, and which all our opponents would have considered simply impossible.

In the course of that report, in speaking of political problems I also dealt with the question the danger of which could only be constantly neglected by certain European ignoramuses.

The Nationality Principle.

Even in the last century, the former State conception racially limited, subject to religious confessions and dynastically circumscribed, had given way to a new ideal which had a stronger hold on mankind. The principle of nationality fixed the aim of this period of our new history. It brought about the decay of State forms which had arisen out of former conditions and created the European national States in accordance with new aims. A number of nations had already succeeded by the beginning of the present century in giving the corresponding State expression to their national unity. Other nations were bearers of this ideal as the binding principle of their actions during the greatest war of all times right through to the final fulfilment. The only people in Europe to whom this most natural of rights, denied them earlier by fate, was still denied by the new events; was the German nation.

Racial differences, religious disunion and dynamic self-seeking had hitherto prevented the German nation from acquiring the State unity which generations had longed for. The War and its ultimate result increased the German disunion and appeared to add to all other misfortunes the perpetual evil of the national separation of most valuable parts of the nation from the mother country. Wilson's right of the nations to self-determination, which was one of the factors that caused our nation to lay down its arms, was replaced by the most brutal national violation of countless millions of our German compatriots. Rights which were granted as a matter of course to the most primitive colonial tribes were withheld from an old civilised nation of this world on grounds that were as untenable as they were offensive.

In my speech of February 20th I stated that there will hardly be a settlement of racial and territorial conditions in Europe that will be satisfactory to all. This means that it is not our view that the aim of a national State must be to put into effect on all sides, whether by protests or deeds, territorial demands which, though based on national needs, cannot ultimately lead to any general national justice. The countless national enclaves in Europe make it in some cases simply impossible to draw a frontier that is everywhere equally just to racial and State interests.

But there are State constructions which bear in themselves the character of conscious and deliberate national injustice to such an extent that they can only be maintained in the long run by the most brutal force.

The Violation of the Right of Self-Determination of the Austrian People.

For instance, the formation of the new Austrian rump State was a measure that implied the sheer violation of the right of self-determination of six and a half million people of the German race. This violation was admitted with cynical frankness.

It was of no importance to the well-known discoverer of the rights of self-determination, independence and freedom of the peoples, nor to other interested and pious rulers of the world who then were so much preoccupied with righteousness on the earth, that the free will of six and a half millions, should be strangled by this so-called Peace Treaty and that they should thus be compelled by force to acquiesce in the violation of their right of self-determination and to accept an unnatural separation from the great common motherland.

Indeed, when it was decided in Austria, in spite of this, to hold a plebiscite—I should like to remind democrats in London and Paris particularly of this point—and over 95 per cent. of voters were in favour of incorporation, then the apostles of the new rights forbade the result of this peaceful demonstration of the true will of those unhappy people separated from their parent nation with the help of brutal force.

The tragedy of this was that the State of Austria represented from the outset a State completely unable to live. Economic distress was correspondingly dreadful, and the people's mortality figures rose in the most fearful manner. In a town such as Vienna alone, last year there were twenty-four thousand deaths to ten thousand births. I do not say this in order to make an impression on the worthy democrats of the world, for I know that their hearts have no feeling whatever for such matters. They can look on calmly while half a million people are slaughtered in Spain, without being moved in the slightest. But they do not blush to simulate the deepest indignation when the business foundations are removed from a Jewish propagandist in Berlin or Vienna. No, I only mention this in order to point out in a perfectly detached manner that the crime of the dictated Peace Treaty pronounced for millions of persons the death-sentence, which has been gradually executed, by creating nations which could not live.

Pressure and Counter-Pressure.

That persons should be willing to secure for themselves positions in the Government at the expense of their people by personally supporting such sham sovereignty organized from the outside does not surprise anyone who has an insight into the moral and spiritual weaknesses of mankind. It is as little to be wondered at that among the mass of national-thinking people affected there began to spread slowly a disgusted bitterness and that there rose a fanatical determination to destroy one day such unnatural and disgusting maltreatment and to set up in place of a lying democratic violation of the people the more holy rights of the eternal racial life.

But as these oppressed people attempted to alter the lot which was forced upon them an increased power had to be employed against them, for only thus can the most natural of feelings and hopes be suppressed. This then leads to that mutual constantly increasing alternation between revolt and oppression. But he who knows any history can have no doubt that in the long run the stamina of racial maintenance is as a rule stronger than the efficacy of any oppression.

In addition, even the most brazen cannot in the long run speak of a "right" when injustice is so dreadfully and clearly in evidence that it is impossible arbitrarily to describe an action, according to whether it suits particular interests, at one time as the legal basis of national life and at another time as a diabolical attempt to disturb the peace of the nations. The plebiscite, carried out under international supervision, showed that the Saar territory is inhabited, apart from a few thousand people of French race, only by Germans. But the fact that this small percentage was nevertheless sufficient to compel a territory to undergo a plebiscite before its reunion with the Reich was permitted is in the grossest contrast with the attitude adopted when it is a matter of millions and millions of German people. In this case the fulfilment of the desire to return to the fatherland is simply rejected as being inopportune for the democracies and even the mere hope is branded as a real crime.

The Double Morality of the League of Nations.

Such a violation of right cannot be permanently embellished with the transparent morality of certain international institutions. Right must be right even where Germans are concerned. And who will be surprised that the people who have been so obstinately deprived of this right have been compelled to secure it for themselves? The nations are a creation of God's will and of everlasting duration, but the League of Nations is a highly dubious construction of human fallibility and of human greed and interests. This is certain—just as the nations have lived for innumerable centuries without the League of Nations, so there will soon be no more League of Nations. And, in spite of this fact, the nations will continue to live for centuries. This institution would only have a meaning if its ideas were reconciled with those higher ideas which correspond with a general and equal and thus better notion of justice.

It is therefore clear that a State moulded by force such as Austria, if prevented by force from joining the motherland and already condemned to death economically, can only be maintained by the permanent use of force. So long as Germany lay in the deepest distress, its attraction to our millions living outside was limited—although even they desired to unite themselves in spite of the misery then prevailing in the Reich.

But in so far as the German Reich again arose, in so far as the German people was again filled with a new national faith and was lifted up by a new confidence, it was natural that the gaze of the oppressed and ill-treated compatriots outside the boundaries of this Reich should be turned with ever increasing longing to the great mother country. Since finally the economic recovery of Germany began to show its effects more and more clearly from year to year, the mere instinct of self-preservation also propagated the idea of an "Anschluss" with a State which appeared to overcome even this distress despite all difficulties. On the other hand the indignation grew within the Reich in proportion as the constant prosecution of the Germans living on our frontiers was recognised.

Germany has now once more become a world Power. But which Power of the world would calmly tolerate in the long run that a host of its own members numbering millions should be most bitterly ill-treated before its very gates? There are moments when it is impossible for a proud nation to look on any longer.

The Conversation at Berchtesgaden.

The Last Attempt.

I therefore decided also for these reasons to bring about the conversations in Berchtesgaden known to you with the former Federal Chancellor Schuschnigg.

I explained to this man most solemnly that a régime lacking every kind of legality and which fundamentally ruled only by force must in the long run get into continually growing conflicts with that expression of public opinion which is diametrically opposed to its tendencies. I endeavoured to explain to him that this development must lead, on the one hand, to an ever-increasing rejection, on the other hand to an ever-increasing oppression, and that in view of the revived great power of the German Reich revolutionary upheavals were bound to take place in the long run.

The consequences could, in these circumstances, be a further increase of terror. Finally a state of affairs must arise which would make it impossible for a Great Power with a sense of honour patiently to continue to look on or declare itself disinterested.

I left Schuschnigg in no doubt on the matter that there was no German-born Austrian with a feeling of national decency and honour who did not at the bottom of his heart long for a union with the German people and would strive towards it. I begged him, a German Austrian, to spare himself and the German Reich a situation which sooner or later must lead to a grave dispute.

I proposed to him a way which might lead to a gradual internal détente and consequently to a slow reconciliation, not only between the people of Austria itself but between the two German States. I pointed out to Schuschnigg that this would be the last attempt on my part and that I was resolved in the event of a miscarriage of this attempt to protect the rights of the German people in my country with those means which, on this earth from earliest times, alone remained when human understanding declined to listen to the call of justice.

Not a single decent nation has died for the sake of democratic formalities; moreover, people think least about them in those democracies who talk most about them.

Schuschnigg Breaks his Word.

Deputies, men of the German Reichstag, on February 20th, in your presence I stretched out a hand to the former Chancellor Schuschnigg.

In his first answer he rejected this hand. He began to fulfil the obligations agreed upon with a hesitancy which marched side by side with the obviously hostile attitude of other States to those obligations. Moreover we are now in a position to know that a part of the lying campaign against Germany was inspired by the Press office of Herr von Schuschnigg himself.

There could no longer be any doubt that Herr von Schuschnigg, who possessed no legal right of existence and who violated German Austria with a dwindling minority, was determined to break this agreement. The first reports of a planned plebiscite appeared on Tuesday, March 8th. They seemed so fantastic that they were thought to be pure rumours. On Wednesday evening we received knowledge through a really astounding speech of an attempted attack not only against the agreement worked out between us but also, and principally, against the majority of the Austrian people.

In a country in which for years there had been no elections, in which there were neither election files or lists, it was laid down that there should be an election in exactly three days. The vote in question was put in such a way that a refusal appeared punishable according to the laws then in force. There were no lists of voters, and it was therefore impossible to examine such lists in advance; complaints were excluded; secrecy of the ballot was neither safeguarded nor desired; those who voted "No" were branded in advance; those, who voted "Yes" had every opportunity of falsifying the vote; in other words Herr Schuschnigg, who was well aware that he had only a minority of the people behind him, endeavoured by an unexampled election fraud to obtain a moral justification for the open breach of the undertakings which he had assumed. He desired a mandate for a further and even more brutal oppression of the overwhelming majority of the German-Austrian people. This breaking of his word and this measure could only lead to an insurrection. Only a crazy and blinded man would believe he could thus stop the mouth of the tremendous majority of the people in order to give a legal foundation in the eyes of the world to an illegal régime.

This insurrection, however, in the outbreak of which there could be no doubt and which showed itself immediately, would have led this time to a new and, on this occasion, terrible shedding of blood. For if the flames of passion once burst out from such a lasting injustice, all experience shows that they can only be extinguished with blood. That is proved clearly enough by historical examples.

I was determined to put an end to the further violation of my home country. I therefore immediately gave orders for those measures to be taken which appeared adequate to save Austria from the fate of Spain.

The Alleged Ultimatum.

The ultimatum about which the world suddenly began to complain consisted of nothing more than the hard assurance that Germany would no longer tolerate a further oppression of her German-Austrian compatriots, and therefore of a warning against adopting a course which would necessarily have led to bloodshed.

That this attitude was wise was proved by the fact that within three days of intervention my whole country rushed to meet me without a shot being fired and without a single victim, so far as I am aware, although to the sorrow of our international pacifists. If I had not complied with the wish of the Austrian people and its National Socialist Government, it is very certain that a position would have arisen which would have subsequently made our intervention necessary. I desired to spare that fine country infinite unhappiness and suffering. For if hate once begins to burn, reason begins to disappear. There is then no just appreciation of guilt and expiation. National fury, personal vengeance and the lower instincts of egoistic propensities combine to raise the torch, and in their rage seek for victims without regard to justice or the consequences.

Perhaps Herr Schuschnigg did not think it possible that I would decide to intervene. He and his supporters may thank God that I did so, for probably only my decisive action saved his life and the lives of thousands of others—lives which they no longer deserved on account of their complicity in the death of countless Austrian victims of the movement but which the National Socialist State, as sovereign victor, accords them.

The Fulfilment of the Highest Historical Task.

Moreover I am happy to have been the man who carried out the highest historical task.

What prouder satisfaction can there be in the world for a man than to have led the people of his own country into the greater national community. And you all realise my feeling of happiness that I did not need to conquer a heap of ruins and corpses for the German Reich, but that I was able to give it an unimpaired country with joyful people. I have acted in such a manner that I can take the responsibility as a German before the history of our people, before the dead and living witnesses of our national community, before the Holy German Reich and my beloved home country. The decision which I took is now backed by 75 million people and in front of them stand henceforward the German armed forces.

The Echo Abroad.

Thanks to Mussolini.

It is almost tragic that an event which at bottom merely removed a central European tension which would have been in the long run intolerable is met particularly by our democracies with discomfiture and lack of comprehension. Their reactions were either incomprehensible or offensive. It is true that a number of other States had expressed their disinterestedness in advance, or had declared their warm approval. These included not only most of the smaller European countries, but also a number of great States. I mention among them only the noble and understanding attitude of Poland, the friendly and cordial agreement of Hungary, the declarations of Yugo-Slavia which were dictated by heartfelt friendship and the assurances of the most sincere neutrality by a number of other States.

I cannot conclude the enumeration of these friendly expressions of feeling without dealing in greater detail with the attitude of Fascist Italy. I felt obliged to explain to the leader of that great Fascist country, who is such a great friend of mine, in a letter, my reasons for my action, and to assure him in particular after this event not only that nothing will change in the attitude of Germany towards Italy, but that Germany regards—just as in the case of France, so also in the case of Italy—the existing frontiers as given frontiers.

It should like to express from here to the great Italian statesman, in the name of the German people and in my own name, our warmest thanks.

We know what Mussolini's attitude meant for Germany in these days. If there could have been a strengthening of the relations between Italy and Germany it took place then. An ideological unity, a unity of interests has become for us Germans an indissoluble friendship. The land and the frontiers of this friend, however, are to us inviolable.

I repeat that I shall never forget Mussolini's attitude. The Italian people may know that the German nation stands at the back of my word.

In this case again, the axis which binds our two countries has done the greatest service to the peace of the world. For Germany only wants peace. She will not do any injury to other peoples. But she will herself in no circumstances tolerate an injury and, above all, she is prepared at all times to give her last man for her honour and her existence.

May it never be thought that this is a mere phrase and, in particular, may it be understood that a great nation with a sense of honour cannot permanently look on while millions of people of its own blood are constantly subject to oppression.

The Fulfilment of an Eternal German Dream.
The Confession of Faith of 75 Millions.

My Comrades! Deputies! Men of the Reichstag!

I believe that, in these great historical hours when, thanks to the force of the National Socialist idea and to the revived strength of the Reich to which it has given rise, an eternal dream of the German people has been realised, not only a single part of our people can be called upon to confirm by its agreement the great event of the final foundation of a really great German national Reich. On April 10th millions of German Austrians will make their confession before history of their adherence to the great community of the nation and destiny. On the first steps in this path they shall no longer be isolated in the new German Reich.

The whole of Germany will henceforward accompany them. For from March 13th of this year their path is the same as the path of all other men and women of our people. On April 10th therefore for the first time in history the entire German nation, so far as it is to be found in the great national Reich today, will come forward and give its solemn testimony. Not six and a half millions will be asked, but seventy five millions.

In the second place, I thus dissolve the Reichstag of the old German Reich and order the election of the new representation of Greater Germany. I also fix the date for April 10th.

I thus call upon nearly fifty million electors of our people and request them to give me that Reichstag with which it will be possible, by the gracious help of God, to accomplish the great new tasks. The German people must again consider in these days what I have achieved with my co-workers in the five years since the first election of the Reichstag in March 1933. It must find that a result unprecedented in history has been achieved.

I expect of my people that it will have the insight and the strength to take again an equally worthy decision.

Just as in 1933 I asked the German nation, in view of the vast work lying before us, to give me four years time to solve the great problems, I must now make a second request.

German people, give me another four years so that I can now exploit the accomplished union for the benefit of all. After the expiration of this period the new German peoples' Reich must have grown into an indissoluble unity, anchored in the will of its people, politically led by the National-Socialist party, protected by its young National-Socialist armed forces, and rich in the prosperity of its economic life.

When today we see the fulfilment of this, the boldest dream of many generations, we have a feeling of unlimited gratitude to all those who, by their work and also by their sacrifices, have helped to attain this supreme object. Every German stem and every German district have given their painful contributions towards the success of this work. But the last victims of German reunion to rise before us at this moment are those numerous fighters who were the faithful heralds of the union now achieved in the old Ostmark which has at last returned to the Reich, and who as blood witnesses and martyrs uttered with their last breath the words which henceforward will be sacred more than ever before:

One people—one Reich—Germany, Sieg Heil!

The Closing Speech by Hermann Göring, President of the Reichstag.

Deputies,

Before this old Reichstag dissolves to meet again as the Reichstag of the Greater German National Reich, permit me in the name of all of you to express thanks to the man who has just brought this vast national Reich into existence.

When at the last meeting of the Reichstag the Führer gave his report we listened to words of prophecy and warning. This unprecedented report left a tremendous impression upon us. These words of prophecy and warning went unheard. The word was broken. Our German brothers in Austria were subject to a threat. At that moment the representative of the Germans in Austria asked the German people and the German Führer for brotherly help. That brotherly help was accorded. German troops marched into Austria in order to prevent the worst.

Twenty years after Versailles the powerful revival of our Reich has been demonstrated before the eyes of us all. But when our troops entered Austria, they did not come as aggressors or conquerors, but were joyfully received as brothers of Greater Germany. And this unprecedented joy rose to a tempest wherever the dearly beloved Führer himself came to the Germans in Austria.

This joy of the liberated people was heard here in Germany. It penetrated throughout the world and convinced those who had been deceived as to the true wishes of the German people in Austria.

At the same time the troops and the Führer, on entering Austria, got the dreadful impression of distress and misery created by the Governments of Austria in the past. But, despite distress, misery and poverty, the spirit and attitude of the German people in Austria, who in their liberation joyfully welcomed the Führer, remained unbroken.

You all listened in to the moving scenes which occurred when all these sufferings gave way to liberation. But you, my Leader, entered your home country as a liberator. You were a liberator, just as you were a saviour to us in our deepest distress. You brought your home country back to the Reich as a country with fine people and rich treasures. Now, under your leadership, these treasures will be taken up and this country will develop and blossom, in the same way as you have led the former poor and tortured Germany to its highest unprecedented blossoming period. The Four Year Plan, which has hitherto signified the combination of all forces here will now be undertaken with the joyful support of the Germans in Austria.

But how, my Leader, did you win your home country? Not by oppression and violence but by the strength of your heart, by that confidence and that wonderful magnanimity and goodness which are your main characteristics.

Not a shot was fired. No court of vengeance gave judgments of blood. Goodness and pardon for the past, hope and unshakable confidence in the future; that is what you gave to your home country. You did not give wounds, but you healed wounds. This was accomplished by you in a few days.

A new wonderful future arises for Austria. When were there ever such revolutions in the history of the world? All give boundless thanks. We also thank you, my Leader, for maintaining the honour of Germany. How can I find words to express your actions? Has any mortal ever been so beloved as you, my Leader? Has any faith ever been so strong as the faith in your mission? You saved the German people from the deepest night, you led it forth from impotence and you created the Great Power Germany.

Whatever you demand, my Leader, we will do. But whatever we are able to do will not wipe out our debt of gratitude. May the Almighty keep you in strength and health.

Hail eternally to the dearly beloved Führer who has again made life worth living for us.

Deputies, in the name of Germany we all cry : Hail to our Führer, Adolf Hitler.

II. Plebiscite and Election to the Greater German Reichstag on April 10th, 1938

Field-Marshal Göring announced in the Reichstag the following ordinance of March 18th, 1938 issued by the Führer and Chancellor concerning a Plebiscite and the Dissolution and Re-election of the Reichstag :

1. In order to give the German people as a whole an opportunity of expressing its opinion with regard to the Greater German National Reich created by the reunion of Austria with the German Reich, I order that, in addition to the plebiscite in Austria, a plebiscite shall also take place in the remainder of the territory of the Reich regarding the reunion of Austria with the German Reich which was accomplished on March 18th, 1938. At the same time I dissolve the Reichstag as from April 9th, 1938 in order to grant to the German compatriots in Austria representation in the Greater German Reichstag.

2. The plebiscite and Reichstag elections of the Greater German National Reich will take place on Sunday, April 10th, 1938.

Berlin, March 18th, 1938.

Adolf Hitler, Führer and Reich Chancellor.
Frick, Reich Minister of the Interior.

VI.

END OF THE MEMBERSHIP OF AUSTRIA IN THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

Berlin, March 18th, 1938.

To the Secretary General.

Sir,

On behalf of the German Government I have the honour to bring to your notice the following law of March 13th, 1938 regarding the reunion of Austria with the German Reich.

On the date of the promulgation of this law, the former Federal State of Austria ceased to be a member of the League of Nations.

I have the honour, etc.

(Signed) v. Mackensen,
Secretary of State in the Ministry for Foreign Affairs.

I. Italy's Attitude ⁽¹⁾

1. Adolf Hitler's Letter to Mussolini.

The letter transmitted to Mussolini by Adolf Hitler through the Prince of Hessen is worded as follows (translation from the Italian):

Berlin, March 11th, 1938.

Your Excellency,

In an hour charged with destiny I write to your Excellency to inform you of a decision which appears to be imposed by circumstances and is now immutable. For years the Germans of Austria have been oppressed and ill-treated by a régime without any legal basis. There is no end to the sufferings of innumerable illused persons. Germany alone has sheltered so far more than 40,000 refugees who had to abandon their country, although the great majority of the inhabitants of Austria fully share their ideology and their political ideas.

With a view to removing the tension which was becoming steadily more unbearable I decided to make a final effort to conclude with Herr von Schuschnigg an agreement which would definitely establish complete equality under the law for all. At our conversation at Berchtesgaden I called the attention of Herr von Schuschnigg to the fact that Germany could no longer tolerate the ill-treatment in Austria by a feeble minority of the majority which has national ideas. I myself am a son of this land. Austria is my fatherland, and I know from my own family connexions all the tribulations and sufferings the immense majority of this people which fosters national ideas has to bear.

I drew his attention to the fact that a great Power—I may, indeed, say that this is the sole case of the kind in the world—could not tolerate that people of the same blood and with the same origin, with a common historical past, should for these very reasons be persecuted, ill-treated, and deprived of their rights. I also made it known to Herr von Schuschnigg that if equality of rights for all the Germans of Austria was not re-established, we should one day be compelled to take over the protection of these brothers abandoned by all.

The demands I made were more than moderate. In fact, according to all the principles of reason, right, and equity, and even according to those of a democratic formalism, Herr von Schuschnigg ought to have resigned with his Cabinet, so as to make room for a Government effectively supported by a people's confidence. I did not insist on this. I contented myself with a series of assurances that in the future, within the framework of the existing Austrian laws, unjust though their origin may be, all the inhabitants of this country should be treated equally—equally favoured or equally prejudiced—and that finally, a certain security should be created in the military sphere.

Herr von Schuschnigg gave me solemn assurances and concluded an agreement in this sense. From the very first he did not respect this agreement. To-day, too, he has struck a new

1. Il Führer al Duce

Roma 12 marzo

Alle 22 di stasera, mentre il Gran Consiglio del Fascismo tornava a riunirsi sotto la presidenza del Duce per la terza seduta della corrente sessione, oltre duecento giornalisti italiani e stranieri venivano convocati al Palazzo Venezia nel salone delle Battaglie.

Alle 23, mentre la seduta continuava, il ministro della Cultura Popolare, S. E. Alfieri, si è presentato ai giornalisti e ha comunicato la lettera del Führer portata ieri al Duce in volo da Berlino dal principe d'Assia, e della quale ecco il testo:

Berlino, 11 marzo 1938

Eccellenza,

In un'ora carica di destini mi rivolgo a Lei, Eccellenza, per darLe notizia di una decisione, la quale appare imposta dalle circostanze ed è ormai immutabile.

Da anni i Tedeschi dell'Austria vengono violentati e maltrattati da un regime privo di qualsiasi base legale. Le sofferenze di innumerevoli persone tormentate non hanno limiti.

La sola Germania ha accolto finora più di 40 mila fuggiaschi, i quali dovettero abbandonare il loro Paese sebbene la stragrande maggioranza degli abitanti dell'Austria condivida pienamente la loro ideologia e le loro concezioni politiche.

Allo scopo di rimuovere una tensione che diventa sempre più insopportabile, mi sono deciso a compiere un estremo tentativo col sig. Schuschnigg per raggiungere un accordo al fine di stabilire in modo definitivo la completa uguaglianza di tutti dinanzi alla legge.

In occasione del nostro colloquio di Berchtesgaden ho richiamato l'attenzione del sig. Schuschnigg sul fatto che la Germania non può più a lungo tollerare che in Austria una sparuta minoranza maltratti la maggioranza che ha idee nazionali. Io stesso sono un figlio di questa terra. L'Austria è il mio Paese e dagli ambienti dei miei propri familiari io so quali tribolazioni e quali sofferenze la stragrande maggioranza di questo popolo, che nutre idee nazionali, debba sopportare! Ho attirato la sua attenzione sul fatto che è per una grande Potenza impossibile, posso anzi dire essere l'unica cosa al mondo, tollerare che genti dello stesso sangue, della stessa origine e partecipi di un comune passato storico siano proprio per queste ragioni perseguitate, maltrattate e private dei loro diritti. Inoltre ho messo il sig. Schuschnigg al corrente che, nel caso non venisse ristabilita la parità di diritti di tutti i Tedeschi dell'Austria, un giorno noi saremo costretti ad assumere la protezione di questi fratelli abbandonati da tutti.

Le richieste da me avanzate erano più moderate. Infatti, secondo tutti i principî della ragione, del diritto e dell'equità e persino secondo i principî di una formalistica democratica, il sig. Schuschnigg avrebbe dovuto dare le dimissioni col suo Gabinetto, per cedere il posto a un Governo effettivamente sostenuto dalla fiducia di un popolo. Io non ho preteso ciò. Mi accontentai di una serie di assicurazioni che in avvenire, nel quadro delle leggi austriache (sia pure ingiustamente emanate, ma tuttavia esistenti nell'attuale momento), tutti gli abitanti di questo Paese venissero ugualmente favoriti o ugualmente svantaggiati, e che infine nel campo militare si creasse una certa sicurezza.

Il sig. Schuschnigg mi ha dato solenne assicurazione e ha concluso un accordo in tal senso.

Sin dal primo momento non ha rispettato questo accordo.

Oggi poi egli si è lasciato andare a una nuova colpa contro lo spirito di questo accordo con l'indiretta una cosiddetta consultazione popolare, la quale rappresenta una vera derisione di qualsiasi plebiscito.

Le conseguenze di questa nuova progettata violenza della maggioranza popolare sono quelle temute.

Il popolo austriaco insorge ora definitivamente contro la continuata oppressione, e da ciò risulta ineluttabilmente la necessità di nuove violenze.

blow against this agreement by decreeing a so-called consultation of the people which represents a very mockery of any plebiscite. The results of this new projected attack on the popular majority are those I feared. The Austrian people is now definitely revolting against the continued oppression, with fresh violence as the inevitable result. Hence the representatives of this oppressed people, both in the federal and provincial Governments, have resigned.

For the last two days the country has been rapidly declining into anarchy. As Führer and Chancellor of the German Reich, and also as a son of this land, I can no longer remain inactive in face of this development of events. I have decided to re-establish order in my fatherland, order and tranquillity, and to give to the popular will the possibility of settling its own fate in unmistakable fashion, openly and by its own decision. May the Austrian people, then, create by itself its own destiny.

However this wish may be fulfilled I would assure your Excellency, you who are the Duce of Fascist Italy, most solemnly of one thing. Do not see in this anything but an act of legitimate national defence, an action which any man of character in my place would perform in the same way. You, too, Excellency, could not act differently if the fate of Italians were at stake. I, as Führer and as a National-Socialist, cannot do otherwise.

In a critical hour for Italy I showed you the constancy of my feelings. Do not fear that there will be any change in this respect in the future. Whatever may be the result of coming events I have fixed a definite frontier for Germany towards France, and now I fix another, equally definite, towards Italy, the Brenner. This decision will never be subject to doubt, or alteration. It was not taken by me in the year 1938, but immediately after the end of the Great War, and I have never made any mystery of it.

I beg your Excellency to excuse me first for the haste of this letter and the form of this communication. Events have overtaken us all unexpectedly. Nobody had got wind of Herr von Schuschnigg's last step, not even his colleagues in the Government, and I had always hoped up till to-day that perhaps at the last moment another solution might be possible. I deeply regret that I cannot speak with you personally at this time to tell you all I feel. With unchanged friendship, yours (signed), Adolf Hitler.

2. Minutes of the meeting of the Fascist Grand Council of March 13th, 1938

The Minister for Foreign Affairs had been able to follow the development of the situation in Austria from day to day, thanks to the ample and constant reports he had received from the Italian representatives abroad.

The Austrian Government had informed the Italian Government only post factum of the results of the Berchtesgaden Agreement and of the measures which they had taken in consequence.

The Italian Government had decided, for obvious reasons, not to interfere in any way in Austria's internal politics and in the development of a national movement, the logical outcome of which could be easily foreseen.

The Austrian Chancellor's sudden decision to hold a plebiscite had not only not been suggested by the Italian Government, but Di conseguenza, i rappresentanti di questo popolo oppresso, tanto nel Governo federale quanto nelle altre corporazioni, si sono ritirati.

Dall'altro ieri questo Paese si avvicina in modo crescente all'anarchia.

Nella mia responsabilità di Führer e Cancelliere del Reich tedesco, e anche come figlio di questa terra, non posso assistere più a lungo inerte a questo sviluppo degli avvenimenti.

Sono deciso a ristabilire ormai nel mio Paese ordine e tranquillità e dare alla volontà popolare la possibilità di decidere del proprio destino in modo inequivocabile, chiaro e aperto al suo giudizio.

Che il popolo austriaco possa quindi forgiare da sé il proprio destino! Qualunque sia il modo in cui tale voto debba realizzarsi, una cosa ora io desidero assicurare a Lei, Eccellenza, in modo solenne, a

Lei, quale Duce dell'Italia fascista:

I. Non scorga in questo atto altro che un atto di legittima difesa nazionale e quindi un'azione, che ogni uomo di carattere al mio posto compirebbe nel medesimo modo. Anche Ella, Eccellenza, non potrebbe agire diversamente, se fosse in giuoco il destino di Italiani. E io, come Führer e come Nazional-socialista, non posso fare altrimenti.

II. In un'ora critica per l'Italia io Le ho dimostrato la fermezza dei miei sentimenti. Non dubiti che, anche nell'avvenire, nulla sarà mutato a questo riguardo.

III. Qualunque possa essere la conseguenza dei prossimi avvenimenti, io ho tracciato una netta frontiera tedesca verso la Francia e ne traccio ora una, altrettanto netta, verso l'Italia. È il Brennero.

Questa decisione non verrà mai né messa in dubbio né intaccata. Questa decisione non l'ho presa nell'anno 1938, ma subito dopo la fine della Grande Guerra, e non ne ho mai fatto un mistero.

Mi perdoni, La prego, Eccellenza, in primo luogo la fretta di questa lettera e la forma di questa comunicazione. Gli avvenimenti sono sopraggiunti inaspettati per tutti noi. Nessuno aveva sentore dell'ultimo passo sig. Schuschnigg, neppure i suoi colleghi di Governo; e io avevo sperato sempre fino a oggi che forse, all'ultimo momento, fosse possibile un'altra soluzione.

Mi rammarico profondamente di non poterLe parlare personalmente in questi momenti, per dirLe tutto ciò che sento.

Con sempre uguale amicizia Suo

ADOLFO HITLER

2. Le deliberazioni del Gran Consiglio

Roma 13 marzo

Il Grand Consiglio del Fascismo, sotto la Presidenza del Duce, ha tenuto la terza riunione dell'Anno XVI E. F. il 12 marzo, alle ore 22, nel Palazzo Venezia.

Il Gran Consiglio del Fascismo, dopo aver ascoltato la relazione fatta dal Ministro degli Affari Esteri sugli avvenimenti austriaci e aver preso conoscenza degli ampi, diligenti rapporti inviati dai nostri rappresentanti all'estero, in base ai quali ha potuto rendersi conto giorno per giorno dello sviluppo della situazione nei suoi più esatti particolari, rileva che il Governo federale austriaco non informò il Governo italiano dei risultati del convegno di Berchtesgaden e delle iniziative che lo hanno seguito, che a fatto compiuto.

Comunque, da parte sua, il Governo italiano era, per evidenti ragioni, deciso a non intervenire in nessuna forma nella politica interna austriaca e negli sviluppi di un movimento di carattere nazionale, di cui si poteva facilmente prevedere il logico epilogo.

Il Gran Consiglio rileva in maniera particolare che il plebiscito, convocato improvvisamente dal Cancelliere Schuschnigg, non solo non fu suggerito, ma fu nettamente sconsigliato dal Governo italiano, non appena avutane conoscenza, sia per il modo sia per la sostanza e per la forma.

Il Gran Consiglio considera quanto è avvenuto in Austria come il risultato di uno stato preesistente e l'aperta espressione dei sentimenti e della volontà del popolo austriaco, confermata in modo non equivocabile dall'imponenza delle manifestazioni pubbliche con le quali gli avvenimenti sono stati salutati.

Il Gran Consiglio prende atto col più profondo interesse di una lettera che, in data 11 marzo, il Führer ha diretto al had been contrary to the advice tendered by them as soon as they were made aware of the decision, both as regards the manner, substance, and form of the plebiscite proposed.

The Fascist Grand Council regarded the events in Austria as the outcome of a pro-existent state of affairs and as the free expression of the will of the Austrian people, plainly manifested by the imposing popular demonstrations which had followed them.

The Council had listened with profound interest to the letter regarding the events in Austria which Signor Mussolini had received from Herr Hitler.

The Fascist Government had declined a French invitation to take part in concerted action against Germany on the ground that it would have been groundless and purposeless and would merely have rendered the international situation more difficult.

3. Mussolini's Speech in the Chamber on March 16th, 1938

"In the last few days a great event has changed the political map of Europe. Austria has ceased to exist as a State. It has become a part of Germany. The plebiscite of April 10th will confirm this fact. The Austrian drama did not begin yesterday, but in 1848, when tiny Piedmont dared to defy the Hapsburg colossus of that time. The drama was accelerated after the War and has lasted twenty years. Its conclusion has taken place at a rapid rate under the influence of irresistible natural forces and has only surprised the absent-minded or the ignorant. A rapid review of the past twenty years clearly shows that what has occurred was necessarily bound to occur. In spite of the paper barriers of the Treaties, the river has reached its mouth.

The birth of the Austrian Federal State goes back to November 12th, 1918, a few days before the dissolution of the Hapsburg Empire. As first worded, the Austrian Federal Constitution, under the Socialist Government of Bauer-Renner, declared that Austria was an integral part of Germany with the name "German Austrian Republic". But it went still further. Many Austrian provinces voted immediately in spontaneous plebiscites for junction with Germany, with the exception of Vorarlberg which expressed itself in favour of union with Switzerland. The Weimar Constitution of the German Social Democratic Republic of August 1919 said: "The territory of the Reich comprizes the territory of the German 'Länder'. Other territories can combine with it if their populations express their wish to do so." Article 61 of the Constitution expressly stated that, after union with Germany, Austria had the right to take part in the Reichsrat with a number of deputies proportionate to her population. It is therefore established that at the beginning of Socialist rule the idea existed both in Weimar and Vienna that the union of the two countries into one country was a logical development.

Then came the Peace Treaties, first that of Versailles and then that of St. Germain which—it must be stated—imposed on Austria the maintenance of her independence. But this obligation appeared from the outset so absurd and at the same time so precarious that a door was left open for the future. Austria could abandon her independence—an unprecedented occurrence in the history of the nations—with the consent of the Council of the League of Nations.

The Social Democrats were followed by the Christian Socialists under Seipel, who was, however, also unable to improve the political and economic position of the country. Austria practically fell under the wheels of material and moral chaos and under the guardianship—and not only the financial guardianship—of the League of Nations. This lasted till October 1st, 1926 when Seipel again came into power with the formula: Austria is a German State; it is not against Germany. Three Duce, concernente gli avvenimenti austriaci, in relazione ai rapporti italo-germanici, lettera che sarà resa di pubblica ragione.

Il Grand Consiglio prende atto, inoltre, della ripulsa opposta dal Governo fascista all'invito francese per concertare un'azione che, per essere senza basi e senza scopo, sarebbe valsa soltanto a rendere più difficile la situazione internazionale, e approva la linea di condotta adottata dal Governo fascista di fronte agli avvenimenti austriaci, ispirata a una realistica valutazione della situazione in rapporto agli interessi nazionali.

3. Il discorso pronunciato da Mussolini alla Camera dei deputati a Roma il 16 marzo 1938

"In questi ultimi giorni un grande evento si è svolto che ha modificato la carta politica dell'Europa: l'Austria come Stato ha cessato di esistere: è diventata una parte della Germania. Il plebiscito del 10 aprile consacrerà il fatto compiuto. Il dramma austriaco non è cominciato ieri: cominciò nel 1848, quando il piccolo animoso Piemonte osò sfidare l'allora colosso asburgico; accelerò i suoi tempi dopo la guerra mondiale e durò venti anni. L'epilogo ha avuto il « ritmo » veloce delle forze irresistibili della natura e ha sorpreso soltanto i distratti o gli ignari.

Un rapido sguardo retrospettivo a questo ventennio ci dimostra in modo assolutamente chiaro che quanto è accaduto doveva fatalmente accadere e che il fiume — malgrado le dighe cartacee dei Trattati — sarebbe giunto alla sua foce.

L'atto di nascita della Stato Federale Austriaco risale al 12 novembre del 1918, pochi giorni dopo lo sfacelo dell'Impero. Ora, col suo primo voto, la Costituente nazionale austriaca, sotto il Governo socialista Bauer-Renner, dichiara l'Austria parte integrante del Reich tedesco, col nome di « Repubblica dell'Austria tedesca ». V'è di più. Molte provincie austriache votano senz'altro con spontanei plebisciti l'annessione alla Germania, meno una, il Vorarlberg, che si dichiara favorevole all'unione con la Svizzera. La costituzione di Weimar della repubblica social-democratica tedesca varata nell'agosto del 1919 all'art. 2 dice testualmente:

« Il territorio del Reich comprende il territorio dei Paesi tedeschi. Altri territori possono riunirsi se le rispettive popolazioni esprimano un siffatto desiderio ». E all'articolo 61 veniva specificatamente dichiarato che, dopo la sua unione con la Germania, l'Austria « avrà diritto di prendere parte al Reichsrat con un numero di deputati proporzionale alla popolazione ».

E' dunque stabilito che agli inizi di quella che può definirsi l'epoca socialdemocratica, tanto Vienna quanto Weimar ritenevano logica l'unione dei due Stati in uno solo.

Vennero i Trattati di pace; quello di Versaglia prima, quello di San Germano poi, che imposero, — questa è la parola — imposero all'Austria di rimanere indipendente. Ma la imposizione apparve fin da allora così assurda e al tempo stesso così precaria che si lasciò uno spiraglio aperto sull'avvenire.

L'Austria, caso mai visto nella storia dei popoli, avrebbe potuto « alienare la sua indipendenza » col consenso del Consiglio della Società delle Nazioni.

Passano i socialdemocratici, subentrano i cristiano-sociali con Seipel, ma questo non migliora la situazione politica ed economica.

L'Austria è praticamente in balia del caos materiale e morale e viene posta sotto la tutela — non soltanto finanziaria — della Società delle Nazioni. Ciò dura sino al 1° ottobre del 1926, quando Seipel ritorna al potere nell'ottobre del 1926 con questa formula: « L'Austria è uno Stato tedesco: niente contro la Germania ». Passano altri tre anni di disordini, di intrighi, di miserie, finché Schober nell'autunno del 1929 sale all potere. E' solo con l'avvento di Schober che comincia una politica italiana nei confronti dell'Austria, politica che viene consacrata in un Trattato di Amicizia e di Arbitrato firmato a Roma dallo Schober stesso il 6 febbraio del 1930.

Siamo all crisi economica mondiale che ha ripercussioni tremende sulla fragile economica austriaca. Ancora una volta years of misery and disorder followed until Schober assumed power in the autumn of 1929.

From this time begins Italy's policy in respect of Austria, a policy which was confirmed in a Treaty of Friendship and Arbitration signed at Rome by Schober on February 6th, 1930.

This brings us to the time of the world crisis which had tremendous effects on the fragile Austrian economy. The idea of the Anschluss again arises in the Curtius-Schober plan of an Austro-German Customs Union. This plan immediately encountered the opposition of France and Czechoslovakia. The Permanent Court at the Hague declared it to be incompatible with the independence of Austria and the plan therefore failed. The position of Austria did not improve and Italy then intervened by the conclusion of the Semmering agreement.

In January 1933 National Socialism came into power in Germany. In March 1933 Dollfuss formed a government and gave it an authoritarian form, while stating that Austria was an independent Christian State, but a German State. The struggle began between the Government and the National Socialist movement. Dollfuss energetically suppressed the Socialist revolt of February 1934, but a few months later came the National Socialist "Putsch" in Vienna. I gave orders for the four divisions of the Upper Adige to march to the Brenner as a mere precautionary measure in view of the sanguinary events which might arise. No Austrian asked us to do so and no Austrian thanked us. The years 1934 to 1936 were governed by the policy of the Rome Protocols. In the meantime, the general political situation of Europe and Austria were fundamentally changed. The diplomatic solidarity of Italy with the western Powers was broken by the sanctions and by the admitted attempt to "strangle the Italian people".

In October 1936 the Rome-Berlin axis was formed. In Austria, in spite of persecution, the National Socialist movement developed very rapidly, not only as a result of a community of ideas but also as a result of the growing political and military power of Germany. This was the moment when Italy advised Austria to approach closer to Germany, for a State that calls itself German cannot exist in an anti-German sense. That would be historical, political and moral nonsense. The German-Austrian agreement of July 1936 was reached with the approval of Italy, and in it Austria proclaimed herself to be a German State.

In spite of this agreement a period of tension began. In 1937 in Venice I made it perfectly clear to Federal Chancellor Schuschnigg that the independence of Austria was mainly an internal question and that the Rome-Berlin axis was the foundation of Italian foreign policy. The meeting of February 12th between the two Chancellors was the last attempt to arrive at a compromise which would have merely delayed the final solution, but would not have prevented it.

Hitler's speech of February 20th and Schuschnigg's speech of the 24th were followed by the sudden announcement of the plebiscite. On March 7th at midday, a representative of Schuschnigg asked me what I thought of this plebiscite. I replied quite categorically that I considered it a mistake and that this was a tool which would fly out of his hands. It would be in the worst taste for me to take any credit for this too simple prophecy.

More or less official quarters on the other side of the Alps ask us why we did not intervene in order to "save" the independence of Austria. Our reply is that we have not assumed either a direct or indirect, a written or a verbal obligation of this kind. The Austrians, it must be admitted, have always shown a natural hesitation in asking us for a strong gesture in defence of the independence of their country, for we should have replied that an independence which requires foreign military assistance against the great majority of the people is no longer independence. Anyone who is acquainted with the l'idea dell' « Anschluss » risorge sotto la specie di un progetto di unione doganale austro-tesdesca Curtius-Schober. Il progetto non va perchè incontra l'immediata opposizione della Francia e della Cecoslovacchia: viene presentato alla Corte dell'Aja per sapere se tale unione doganale sia compatibile o meno con l'indipendenza dell'Austria; la Corte dice che è incompatibile. Il progetto cade.

La situazione dell'Austria non migliora; è l'Italia che interviene ora direttamente a risollevarne l'economia con gli accordi del Semmering.

Nel gennaio 1933 il nazismo assume il potere in Germania; nel marzo dello stesso anno Dollfuss rinnova il suo Governo in senso autoritario, ma definisce nello stesso tempo l'Austria uno Stato indipendente a cristiano, ma tedesco.

Comincia la lotta tra il Governo e il movimento nazista. Dollfuss è costretto a domare energicamente una rivolta socialista nel febbraio 1934. Pochi mesi dopo scoppia il « putsch » nazista di Vienna. Ordino che le quattro Divisioni dell'Alto Adige si attestino al Brennero.

Fu un atto di elementare precauzione in vista di eventi sanguinosi e improvvisi e dei quali non era possibile misurare la portata.

Nessun austriaco ci domandò di farlo, nessun austriaco ci ha mai ringraziato di averlo fatto.

Segue dal 1934 al 1936 la politica dei Protocolli di Roma; nel frattempo le condizioni generali dell'Europa e dell'Austria sono profondamente mutate. La solidarietà diplomatica dell'Italia con le Potenze occidentali viene spezzata dalle sanzioni e dal tentativo confessato di « strangolare » il popolo italiano.

Nell'ottobre del 1936 si crea l'asse Roma-Berlino. In Austria il movimento, per quanto perseguitato dagli organi dell'esecutivo, si sviluppa con una impressionante velocità, dovuta non solo ad una comunità di idee, ma soprattutto al risorgere rapido della potenza politica e militare delle Germania.

E' il momento in cui l'Italia consiglia all'Austria di riavvicinarsi alla Germania perchè uno Stato che si proclama tedesco non può esistere in funzione antigermanica.

Questo era un assurdo storico, politico, morale. Nascono con l'approvazione dell'Italia gli accordi austro-germanici del luglio 1936 i quali anch'essi partono dalla pregiudiziale che l'Austria si professi come uno Stato tedesco. Malgrado gli accordi comincia un nuovo periodo di tensione.

Nell'incontro di Venezia dell'Aprile 1937 faccio chiaramente intendere al Cancelliere che l'indipendenza dell'Austria era una questione che riguardava in primo luogo gli Austriaci e che l'asse Roma-Berlino era il fondamento della politica estera italiana.

L'incontro del 12 febbraio tra i due Cancellieri rappresenta l'estremo tentativo per una soluzione di compromesso che avrebbe forse ritardata, non certo evitata, la soluzione finale. Discorso di Hitler il 20 febbraio, discorso di Schuschnigg il 24.

Sorge l'idea di un plebiscito improvviso.

Alle ore 12 del giorno 7 marzo, un fiduciario di Schuschnigg mi domanda il mio pensiero sul plebiscito e sulle sue modalità. Era la prima volta dopo molti mesi. Gli rispondo nella maniera più perentoria che si trattava di un errore; questo ordigno — dissi — vi scoppierà fra le mani. Sarebbe di pessimo gusto vantarmi di questa troppo facile previsione.

Ai circoli più o meno ufficiali d'Oltralpe, che si domandano perchè non siamo intervenuti per « salvare » l'indipendenza dell'Austria, rispondiamo che non avevamo mai assunto alcun impegno del genere nè diretto o indiretto, nè scritto o verbale.

Gli Austriaci — bisogna proclamarlo — hanno sempre avuto il comprensibile pudore di non domandarci dei gesti di forza per difendere l'indipendenza dell'Austria, perchè noi avremmo risposto che una indipendenza, la quale ha bisogno dell'aiuto militare straniero anche contro la maggior parte del proprio popolo, non è più tale.

Austrians will know that the first resistance against our intervention would come from themselves.

Italy's interest in the independence of the Austrian Federal State existed but was based on the proviso that the Austrians desired such independence, at any rate as far as the majority of them were concerned. But the events of the last few days in Austria have shown that the profound desire of the people was for the Anschluss.

To those who still aim at an outworn Machiavellism, which we reject, I would say that, if an event is unavoidable, it is better that it should occur with you than in spite of you or even against you. In reality it is a national revolution that has occurred. We Italians are best able to understand it in its historical requirements and also in its methods, which were unexpected, as is in the case with all revolutions."

Mussolini here referred to the measures taken by the Italian statesman Cavour in 1859-61 in order to bring about the union of Italy. He recalled the first military alliance of the young kingdom of Italy with Prussia in the year 1866 which resulted after Sadowa and Custoza in the cession of Venice.

"There are superficial and ignorant people who do not understand Fascist Italy and who think they can impress us with the total figure of the millions of Germans and their presence on our frontiers. In the first place, present-day Italy is not so easily impressed. During the African war, 52 States did not succeed in impressing us. Italy has an iron will and strong courage and takes a straight course. We are so little impressed that we calmly admit that in a few years—solely as a result of the natural increase in the population—while we shall have 50 millions there will be 80 million Germans, not only on one frontier but on ten frontiers; of these the Italo-German frontier is an inviolable frontier between two friendly nations. In this respect, the Führer has always been categorical, even before he came into power. This attitude caused him to be attacked by his opponents. For us Fascists all frontiers are sacred. We do not discuss them but we defend them.

While the fifth act of the Austrian drama was being played in the last few days, the opponents of Fascism hoped that the opportunity had come to set the two totalitarian States against each other and to destroy their solidarity by shocks which would be the prelude to a new World War. This calculation on the part of the democracies, of the free masons and of the Third International was false. The hope was simply puerile and it was also offensive because it cast doubt on our character and our political intelligence.

But why should we not state the fact? Millions of Germans were also in suspense when the hour came for the "testing of the axis". The Germans know today that the axis is not a diplomatic construction which only functions under normal conditions; they know that it has proved to be sound even in this exceptional hour of German and European history.

The two nations whose course ran parallel both in time and manner, united as they are in their conception of policy and life, can now march together in order to give our tortured continent a new equilibrium, which will ultimately permit of the peaceful and fruitful cooperation of all peoples."

Chi conosce gli Austriaci sa che le prime resistenze a un nostro intervento sarebbero venute da loro.

L'interesse dell'Italia all'indipendenza dello Stato federale austriaco esisteva, ma si basava evidentemente sulla pregiudiziale che gli Austriaci tale indipendenza volessero, almeno nella loro maggioranza; ma quanto accade in questi giorni nella terra austriaca dimostra che l'anelito profondo [del popolo era per l'«Anschluss».

Ai "superstiti cultori d'un machiavellismo deteriore che noi respingiamo, si può osservare che quando un evento è fatale, vale meglio si faccia con voi piuttosto che malgrado voi, o, peggio, contro di voi.

In realtà una rivoluzione nazionale è quella che si compie. E noi Italiani siamo i più indicati a comprenderla nelle sue esigenze storiche e anche nei suoi metodi, che sembrano sbrigati, come furono sempre quelli di tutte le rivoluzioni.

Vi sono nel mondo individui così superficiali, così opacamente ignoranti delle condizioni dell'Italia fascista che credono di impressionarci con la cifra globale dei milioni di Tedeschi e con la loro presenza ai nostri confini.

Anzitutto l'Italia, questa Italia non si lascia facilmente impressionare; non ci sono, durante la guerra d'Africa, riusciti cinquantadue Stati.

L'Italia ha una volontà dura, un'anima dura e marcia dritto. Siamo tanto poco impressionati che ammettiamo tranquillamente che fra qualche anno — per il solo fatto del movimento naturale delle popolazioni — mentre noi saremo 50 milioni i Tedeschi saranno 80 milioni, ma non su una sola, su dieci frontiere, fra le quali quella italiana è la frontiera di due popoli amici, una frontiera intangibile.

Il Führer su ciò è stato sempre categorico, anche prima che giungesse al potere, e tale atteggiamento gli valeva stolte accuse da parte dei suoi avversari. Per noi Fascisti le frontiere, tutte le frontiere, sono sacre, non si discutono, si difendono.

Quando il dramma austriaco giunse nei giorni scorsi al quinto atto, gli avversari mondiali del Fascismo spiarono se l'occasione buona non fosse finalmente venuta, per mettere l'uno di fronte all'altro i due Regimi totalitari, e frantumare la loro solidarietà attraverso un urto che sarebbe stato, tra l'altro, il preludio di una nuova guerra mondiale.

Questo calcolo delle democrazie, delle loggie, della Terza Internazionale era errato; la speranza semplicemente puerile, e offensiva altresì, perchè gettava un'ombra sul nostro carattere e sulla nostra intelligenza politica.

Ma perchè non dirlo? Anche milioni di Germanici stettero in ascolto: era giunta l'ora di quel che si poteva chiamare il «collaudo dell'asse».

Ora i Germanici sanno che l'asse non è una costruzione diplomatica efficiente soltanto per le occasioni normali, ma s'è dimostrata solida, soprattutto in quest'ora eccezionale nella storia del mondo germanico e dell'Europa.

Le due Nazioni, la cui formazione unitaria è stata parallela nel tempo e nei modi, unite come sono da una concezione annalogica della politica e della vita, possono marciare insieme per dare al nostro travagliato Continente un nuovo equilibrio, che permetta finalmente la pacifica e feconda collaborazione di tutti i popoli."

II. Speech by Field-Marshal Göring in Commemoration of the War Heroes, on March 13th, 1938

Comrades, German men and women,

On March 21st we celebrate for the twentieth time the day on which the German storm columns left the trenches of position warfare for the great battle in France. The days and weeks of that heroic struggle will never be forgotten by all those who took part in it. Every combatant knew that the outcome must decide the life and existence of Germany. This made the attack all the more violent and the will for victory all the more fierce. In those days the entire inner value of the German soldier at the front was again put to the test. Four years of hard struggle accompanied by deprivations and physical and moral effort had failed to break or even to diminish the will and power of the German national army for attack.

In spite of all courage and intrepidity, fate at that time decided against us. But the heroic courage which came to the fore in the great battle, the spirit of attack of the German combatant on land, at sea and in the air disputed the final victory.

When we today call to mind the great battle in France, our thoughts go back at the same time to all the German front-line soldiers in the Great War. For more than four years the fate of the German nation was borne on the shoulders of these soldiers. The War demanded from them tremendous efforts, they underwent almost superhuman hardships, and they gave their blood and their lives in the fight for people and fatherland.

In the west and in the east, in France and Belgium, in Russia and Serbia, in the Carpathian mountains, in the mud of Galicia, in the plains of Roumania, in the deserts and steppes of Asia and Africa, in the air and in all the seas of the world, German heroism shone forth, conquering and dying. The German combatant of 1914 who went to his death with the song of Germany on his lips has rightly become immortal. But also the German combatant of 1918 who, alone, in silence and almost without hope, died a heroic death in the scrupulous fulfilment of his duty will always remain in our memory as a lasting exhortation.

For years it seemed as if all the fighting, the outpouring of blood and death had been in vain. But now we know that it was not in vain. The spirit of the German combatant created the new Reich. It renewed the old, eternally young German people. It raised a monument to the soldiers of the Great War, which will for thousands of years bear witness to the glory of the German combatant, his exemplary military honour and his devoted brotherhood of arms. In one combatant, the experience of the War made the ideology of National Socialism an iron law. An unknown soldier, at that time lance-corporal and now the supreme commander of the German forces, set alight the sacred flame in the hearts of the German people and created the new Reich of the Germans. Comrades, it is our highest and most honoured duty to thank him constantly for his work, his determination and his effort, when we think of the heroism of our fallen soldiers.

Adolf Hitler, our beloved Führer, fulfilled the bequest of the two millions who gave their lives for Germany. It was only by his never-failing energy, his ardent faith in Germany and the remarkable power of his personality that the sacrifice of our fallen brothers became a blessing for the people and the Reich. The German nation thanks the Führer now and at all times for this act. And with the German nation, the dumb army of our dead heroes thanks the Führer.

In a great age a King of Prussia once inaugurated the memory day for heroes as a day of national introspection and thought of those who had fallen in the wars of liberation. A day was to be devoted to the heroism of these fighters for freedom. But in the course of years the day became rather a day of mourning than of national enthusiasm. On that day thoughts turned more and more to all the dead, and it became a Sunday of the dead. People borne down with sorrow, in mourning clothes, silently opened the gates of the cemeteries, with tears in their eyes and wreaths in their arms. It was only after the Great War that the real meaning of the day to commemorate heroes again came into honour.

For the fifth time today we remember with deep reverence the heroes of the severest of all wars. It is a beautiful symbol that this day of celebration falls in March, the month of the blossoming of nature. Just as March brings new life everywhere, it has become the month of blossoming in the life of the German nation. On a March day 125 years ago, Frederick William III called his Prussian people to arms, and the struggle began for the liberation of the nation from serfdom and exploitation. On a March day five years ago in the Garrison Church at Potsdam, the venerable Field-Marshal of the Great War sealed his union with the leader of the young generation. Everything that was great and lofty in a great age was united with the enthusiasm and vital force of a rising and aspiring epoch. Potsdam became the cradle of the Third Reich. And again on a March day, the Führer gave back to the German people its military freedom and broke the fetters of the dictated peace of Versailles. A year later, in March 1936, the new Reich for the first time showed the outer world that it had risen again from impotence and disarmament. When German troops marched over the Rhine, when the first squadrons of the young German air arm appeared over the liberated Rhineland, it was clear not only to every German but also to foreign countries that German had again once for all taken her fate into her own hands. And what was then perhaps for the first time clear to many has in the meantime become constantly clearer: Germany is again a World Power.

It is again the month of March that has brought to Germany her last and supreme fulfilment; Germany has again become united, again a nation inseparably bound up in distress and suffering, in joy and happiness. The German nation in Austria has arisen at this hour in wonderful enthusiasm to acknowledge its German spirit. In the fire of its national passion and its Germanism it has overcome the serfdom, the arbitrary action and the terrorism of a small clique.

An exultation, such as the world has perhaps never experienced, at present roars through German Austria.

World statesmen must recognise with astonishment that they have been deceived for years as to the real feelings of the Austrian people by the false statements of a despotic minority. The Führer has tried every means of giving internal peace to the German people in Austria. For this purpose he showed great moderation by reducing to a minimum the demands which he made of the former Austrian Chancellor Schuschnigg at the Berchtesgaden meeting. But after a very few days the latter broke the pledge which he had signed, and endeavoured to apply measures of violence which were a mockery of all justice and to deny the real significance of Austria, her German life, her German existence and her German image by means of an audacious false election and a forged plebiscite. What had become of the sacred right of self-determination of the nations? Was it not to apply to Germans?

The German people in Austria, hardened by fearful torture and violence, rose as one man and expelled its tormentors. The danger of civil war stood at the door of Germany if the tyrants had succeeded in using their power to bludgeon the Germans in Austria. In its profound distress the people called for the German brotherly help through the mouth of its present Federal Chancellor. To us it was the highest duty of honour to comply with this appeal. Units of the German army and air forces therefore entered Austrian territory. They did not come as conquerors or enemies, and they were not met by defence and fighting. Their fight was of a most remarkable nature. They were met with exultation and flowers were thrown on our young combatants. The disappointed world may now recognise that the people in Austria always were and always will be German. Germany rejects with indignation the lies which aim at desecrating this profound feeling. How can there be at present any talk of the violation and compulsion of the weak Austrian nation since it has hitherto been violated and compelled in an unheard-of-manner and its right to self-determination has been trampled underfoot. Who has the right to intervene when Germans wish to join with Germans? What State has been affected or injured? What other interests could be affected, since there was only one interest, the German interest?

Not a single person lives in Austria who is not German in blood and spirit; there is not one who speaks another language than our beloved mother-tongue. It is spirit of our spirit, flesh of our flesh and blood of our blood. Here it is for the German nation as a whole alone to decide.

Now for the first time since the dreadful peace treaties which appeared to kill all life the German people in Austria have an opportunity to confess to the world freely and frankly in complete openness how they wish to frame their lives. Whatever decision they may give, Germany will respect it. But what the result will be is already known to the world which hears this exultation and this sacred enthusiasm. Here also, March 1938 will be the beginning of a new life. The spring of our united Germany has come. May God grant that it be followed by an eternal summer.

Just as we remember today with deep emotion our dead heroes, we also call to mind in the same breath our dead brothers in arms from German Austria. We remain indissolubly bound together. No power in the world can divide us. It would be thinkable that Germany should go under. But it will be unthinkable that she should ever again be torn asunder.

But we will bear in mind that Germany has always been unconquerable and invincible so long as she united her sons and daughters in firm determination. But so long as she was a divided nation and exhausted herself without honour and without defence in sterile economic and political struggles, Germany was a plaything for other nations. A friendly hand was never stretched out to help her in her struggle against distress and misery. But the spiritual, economic and moral attack against a German Reich and nation wounded to death became ever fiercer.

But since that nation has again regained its health and the Reich has become great and powerful, it has again found friends in the outside world. Germany acclaimed the Duce of friendly Fascist Italy on his visit to Berlin with joyful enthusiasm. These acclamations contain more than spontaneous enthusiasm. The German nation no longer inclines to outbreaks of feeling. The feeling expressed was rather that of joy and preparedness for the common struggle for right and true freedom in the world. It was also an expression of satisfaction at having a confident and determined companion in the fight against the dark powers of the world. The German nation again felt itself bound to the Duce of Italy in sincere gratitude. It has put into brilliant action the words of fidelity and friendship which he spoke to us last year. His chivalrous attitude and his great understanding for Germany's honour which he has again proved in a decisive and solemn hour will never be forgotten. In this sense the German nation has also keenly welcomed the accession of Italy to the German-Japanese Anti-Comintern Agreement. The world political triangle Berlin-Rome-Tokio guarantees unity in the struggle against all-destroying Bolshevism, against which we carry on an unsparing fight with all its consequences. We greet in cordial union all fighters against bolshevism in the world. At the same time we remember the heroes who have fallen in this struggle, in particular those who have given their lives in Spain for the victory of culture over the subversive powers of the world revolution.

The Führer has always declared to the world that Germany, in spite of her internal attitude to the struggle against Bolshevism, sincerely desires peace. Germany desires a peace of honour and justice, in which all nations can live with equal rights and in equal freedom, in which all nations have a share of the good things of the world proportionate to their importance and their population. But we do not want the peace of the so-called status quo, of collective security and of the Geneva entente, which distinguishes between haves and have-nots and between victors and vanquished. To any one who wants true peace with us we hold out an honest hand of friendship.

The Führer has stated more than once that every new treaty concluded by Germany is solemnly sealed with the honour of the German Reich and nation. The German nation takes this statement in deadly earnest. In this connection we have already shown on various occasions that our desire for peace is not an empty phrase. This is proved by the clearing up of our relations with Poland and the new agreement concluded last year for dealing with the question of minorities in the spirit of mutual understanding, and also by the Anglo-German naval agreement of 1936 and the addition to it concluded in July 1937. We cordially greet the efforts of the organisations of former combatants to make connections beyond the frontiers in a spirit of peaceful understanding. We also greet the efforts of the youth of all nations and get to know and to understand each other. We are sincerely glad that our compatriots living abroad are becoming more and more connecting links between the nations in the sense of understanding and peace.

Germany does not desire and will not interfere in the affairs of any other country. But it must be pointed out that the German Reich regards itself in every way as the protector and defender of all Germans, including those outside the frontiers of the Reich. We have endeavoured by peaceful agreements with other countries to maintain the national characteristics and to improve the living conditions of the German minorities. We have used external means of force in the shape of our warships to protect Germans and German interests in Spain. If this action has been used by Bolshevik criminals to provoke Germany and other Great Powers, that is not our fault. The world has been informed that we are not prepared to accept threats or even attacks on German soldiers. Anyone who attacks Germans, and therewith Germany, comes up against German guns that are ready to fire. That is the lesson of the bombardment of the Red Spanish fortification of Almeria. But in this connection we have given the world a fresh example of our desire for peace. In spite of the cowardly attack of Ibiza we have continued to cooperate in the idea of non-intervention. But the renewed attacks of Bolshevik submarines on the cruiser "Leipzig" caused us to adopt a more reserved attitude.

While our programme is thus in every way directed towards peace, we are quite aware that this peace can only remain, or rather become, a reality, if it is guaranteed by strong, confident and equal parties. Germany is therefore resolved further to strengthen and maintain her forces as a guarantee of the peace of the world. These forces are aware of the task set by the Führer. They will do their best to emulate the old defensive force which once in the rain of steel of the Great War was described by the enemy as the best in the world. In this sense we greet the old glorious army.

The new armed force will always be aware that it has to protect the honour and peace of the nation. It will do everything to inculcate into every young German who passes through its school the spirit of our dead heroes as the supreme and ultimate aim. The armed force knows that in this it is at one with the party. Both will maintain for all future time the inheritance of our front-line soldiers, the party by training the German people in the soldierly spirit and in the spirit of National Socialism which has developed therefrom, and the armed force by being firmly rooted in National Socialist ideology and by covering and safeguarding the peaceful work of reconstruction. Both are joint supporters of the Reich as the living monument for the fallen heroes of the Great War.

The German armed force and with it the entire German people mourn their dead in pride. We remember the two millions who fell in the fight for the self-preservation of Germany. We remember those who were wounded in the War, the war widows and orphans, who are helped by our constant care to bear their heavy lot. We remember the leaders who led our army in a great time from victory to victory, the late Field-Marshal von Hindenburg, General Ludendorff who has recently gone home to the Great Army, Admiral Scheer and Captain Baron von Richthofen, the model air leader for all times.

We remember the dead heroes who stood at our side as faithful brothers in arms. But we also remember the brave opponents who opposed us and fell in the fight for their people. We remember all the brave German soldiers who in the post-War period have given their lives for Germany in the fight against Bolshevism at home and on the frontiers of the Reich.

We remember the dead of the National Socialist movement, who purchased with their lives the resurrection of the Reich. We know that their contribution opened up the way for our new greatness.

We remember the soldiers who met their death in working for the reconstruction of the new German forces, the army, the navy, and in particular the air force. We remember especially today the 31 dead and the 75 wounded comrades who fell victims to the cowardly Bolshevik attack on the armoured ship "Deutschland".

The spirit of our fallen heroes is revived in New Germany. It serves as a constant spur to work and struggle for the reconstruction of nation and Reich. In this sense, we promise to fulfil their bequest. The German defensive force, as the true representative of the German people, drops its colours before the heroism of those who went to their death for Germany. They all died that Germany might live.

THE ANSCHLUSS

Documents Dating from the Years 1919 and 1938

1919 : THE ANSCHLUSS PROHIBITION

Article 88 of the Treaty of St. Germain of September 10th, 1919

The independence of Austria is inalienable otherwise than with the consent of the Council of the League of Nations. Consequently Austria undertakes in the absence of the consent of the said Council to abstain from any act which might directly or indirectly or by any means whatever compromise her independence, particularly, and until her admission to membership of the League of Nations, by participation in the affairs of another Power.

Article 80 of the Treaty of Versailles of July 28th, 1919

Germany acknowledges and will respect strictly the independence of Austria, within the frontiers which may be fixed in a Treaty between that State and the Principal Allied and Associated Powers; she agrees that this independence shall be inalienable, except with consent of the Council of the League of Nations.

1938 : THE ACHIEVEMENT OF THE ANSCHLUSS

Article 1 of the Federal Constitutional Law of March 13th, 1938 regarding the Reunion

Austria is a land of the German Reich.

Article 1 of the Reich Law regarding the Reunion of March 13th, 1938

The Federal Constitutional Law of March 13th, 1938, adopted by the Austrian Federal Government regarding the reunion of Austria with the German Reich, hereby becomes a law of the German Reich.

Extract from the Speech by Federal Chancellor Seyss-Inquart at Linz, on March 12th, 1938

"Now we Austrians have for all time freely and openly, proudly and independently, proclaimed our adherence to this Führer, while at the same time solemnly declaring that Article 88 of the Peace Treaty is ineffective."

Extract from the speech by Adolph Hitler, at Vienna, on March 14th, 1938

"As Leader and Chancellor of the German nation and of the German Reich I report before German history that my homeland has now entered the German Reich."

Extract from Adolph Hitler's Speech at Frankfurt on March 31st, 1938

"For the past five years I have torn out one page after another of the Versailles Treaty from its bindings, not as a violator, but as an upholder, of law, not as a treaty-breaker but as a man who refuses to recognise a godless dictate as a sacred treaty. A few days ago destiny chose me to tear out another such page. This last page is the prohibition of the Anschluss. In three days we conquered a State by the force of an idea."

THE RETURN OF AUSTRIAN GERMANY TO THE GERMAN REICH

An Accomplished Desire

Austria is a "Land" of the German Reich.

This statement is made with monumental simplicity in the First Article of the Austrian Federal Constitutional Law of March 13th, 1938, which ushers in the great change that begins a new epoch in the many centuries of the history of the German community of destiny. The peaceful union of the Great German Reich and the rejoining of Germany and German Austria in accordance with the common desire of all Germans is an event of unique historical importance not only for the two countries but for the whole of Europe, both by the manner in which it was accomplished and the effects which it will produce on the future development of political thought and action in this Continent. The people of Austria now begin their march to a further common future shoulder to shoulder with the other stems of the German people. The German cause has conquered, without the drawing of swords or the shedding of blood, but merely by the force of a uniform national will. The right of self-determination has come into its own, even where the "peace-makers" of 1919 and the "peacemaintainers" of Geneva thought they had barred the route. Adolf Hitler has paved the way to this right, and the elementary force with which it made its appearance and was accomplished must give food for thought to all those who still hold that legal paragraphs can be placed above men and nations and that natural phenomena and natural rights can be combated, oppressed or even set aside in Conferences and negotiations and by dictated treaties and instruments.

Ernst Moritz Arndt once described the national idea in the following words:

"The history of the nations is not decided by constitutions and laws written on parchment, or by victories and defeats, but by the unwritten and indescribable laws, in the innermost heart, by the orders which proud souls give to themselves, by the victories which spiritual courage can win day by day, and if the people is to survive, which it must win day by day, and by the defeats which are suffered in the midst of triumphs as a result of softness and self-seeking. It is love and faith that make the nations."

It was reserved for National Socialism to help this idea to make itself felt, this idea of the eternal values of nationalism and of its natural rights. These values have again become the natural, spiritual, and even instinctive, possession of the German people. They attained their highest achievement in these historical March days when all the barriers that restricted these values and rights were swept away with the elementary force of a sudden natural phenomenon, when the longing of eleven centuries of German history was fulfilled in three days and the dams artificially erected against the feelings of national unity and solidarity were washed away. The revolution of the blood has removed all obstacles erected for decades and centuries by corporate, religious and dynastic State forms and interests, by lack of comprehension, hatred and narrow-mindedness, party disputes and arbitrary action, mistakes and misunderstandings. In three times 24 hours it attained what had hitherto appeared to be a remote object difficult of achievement. In three days a revolution unparalleled in history occurred on the age-old cultural soil of this German Eastern Reich. Events succeeded each other with extreme rapidity and the scenes changed as in a kaleidoscope. Those who experienced the downfall of the Danube monarchy are bound to have in mind the glaring contrast between then and now. In 1918 there were disturbances, paralysing fear, political and economic chaos, from which fragments were painfully saved in order to reconstruct German Austria. In 1938 there was flaming enthusiasm, strict discipline, exemplary order. No incidents, no conflicts, no bloodshed, not the slightest disharmony disturbed this memorable revolution, and thus clear proof was given of the unequivocal will of the vast majority of the population.

In our last issue we gave a documentary report of the course of these memorable days and of the immediate events which led up to them.

They began with the two agreements between Germany and German-Austria of July 11th, 1936 and February 12th, 1938. They were intended to put into effect the "German Peace" which had been so long desired and to liquidate the inheritance the core of which was to be found in the persecution of the Austrian National Socialists and in the obscure connection between the Fatherland Front and nationally minded circles. The first principle on which these two agreements were based was the establishment of the fact that German Austria was a German State. This meant that the mutual relations between the two States were, in the nature of things, i.e. in view of the common German blood and German destiny, governed by a totally different law than can possibly be the case with international relations in general. Even if the accidents of political development had led to the independence as a State of this German South Eastern Mark, this did not at any time in German history extinguish the inestimable factors which had left its mark on Germans and Germanism on both sides of the frontier.

Only an Austrian Government which had the will and the power to think only of Austria and her history independently of foreign influence and to act accordingly could free itself from diplomatic intrigue and return to the side of its natural friend. The possibility of those agreements yielding good fruit thus depended upon an understanding execution of the two agreements from these points of view, and on the abandonment of the fundamentally monstrous idea that an Austrian solution which would be contrary to the German view could be carried out and maintained by international support. These two conditions, however, made it essential primarily that the Austrian Germans with national socialist views should be given the same field of activity as those following other political ideologies, and that those who upheld an ideology which National Socialism had created and which the German Reich had proclaimed as its own since January 30th, 1933 should not be persecuted or regarded as second-class citizens. The Third Reich would have been untrue to itself if it had accepted a solution which took no account of its ideology, especially as the Reich and the German Austrian adherents of its ideas considered that the strict observance of the existing laws was just as natural as respect for the Austrian constitution.

The two agreements were therefore intended to bring to an end a period of tension which lay heavily on the hearts of all good Germans, and their results were felt with profound satisfaction in both countries as a liberation from heavy pressure in the relations of the two German countries. They were calculated not only gradually to close an open wound but also to remove the threat to peace which some Powers, whose toy Austria had been for so long, pretended was caused by the disturbance of the relations between the two countries from which they had hitherto drawn rich benefits.

When therefore on February 12th the "German Peace" was agreed upon at the Obersalzberg between the former Austrian Federal Chancellor von Schuschnigg and the Führer and Reich Chancellor, a construction was to be erected which, while allowing complete independence to the Austrian State, was to grant to National Socialism complete equality of rights and unrestricted cooperation in the work of the internal appeasement of Austria. The first measures taken by Vienna, the reforming of the Government and the announcement of a political amnesty, together with various administrative provisions as announced by the newly appointed Minister for Internal Affairs and Security, Dr. Seyss-Inquart, in his speech at Linz on March 6th, aroused the hope that serious work was being done in connection with the erection of this peace construction which aimed at healing old wounds and preventing new wounds in the interest of the national German common destiny; then came like a bombshell the announcement of a plebiscite. By this means the Federal Chancellor tried to go over the heads of the other members of the Government and, out of purely personal initiative, to force a decision which he hoped would nullify the grant of equality of rights to National Socialism. For this purpose he mobilised forces which were materially and spiritually attached to Marxism and Bolshevism and thus showed that he regarded the national movement as a worse enemy than the adherents of Moscow. This was soon apparent in the declarations of the Reds who, just as twenty years ago, thought they smelled the morning air, felt their time had come and gave an instructive example of Herr Schuschnigg's attempts at conciliation between the national opposition and the former Marxist circles which had entered the so-called Fatherland Front. He was finally compelled practically to declare the country in a state of disturbance.

But the entire preparation for this so-called consultation of the people shows that Schuschnigg did not, as the German nation was relieved to believe and hope, regard the agreement of Berchtesgaden as a magnanimous German act, but as a tactical manoeuvre or trick with which he again hoped to escape from historical necessities. The plebiscite was not only in contradiction with Article 65 of the Constitution under which such a plebiscite must be decided by a constitutional law and announced by the President of the Federation. Some members of the Austrian Government, including the representatives of the national socialist movement took no part whatever in the decision, and its announcement came as a surprise to them. The Federal Chancellor must, however, have known that he would never obtain the consent of these members of the Government to such a plebiscite which, in view of the regulations governing it, must necessarily turn the entire business into a farce in order to win a dishonest game by which he thought he could correct the agreements of Berchtesgaden. It would also have been in the spirit of those agreements to inform the Government of the Reich of his intentions in advance. In addition, Article 65 provided for the possibility of a plebiscite only on certain questions of the legislation. But the watchword given out by Schuschnigg referred to general principles and not to a concrete question of law. Thus the Federal Chancellor, by his wording of the question, called upon the German people in Austria to agree to an intended breach of the Constitution. As in previous phases of the post-War history of German Austria, in this case also the legality principle was intentionally and grossly overlooked both in the sense of the provisions of the Constitution and in the sense of discovering the true views of the people.

It was the last move in a policy of staking all, a disastrous policy, which, thanks to the rising of the Austrian people, the resistance of the new national Government and its request for the assistance of the Reich, did not lead to disaster. Schuschnigg's game was seen through at the very moment when he began it.

He wished to force a decision when he said at Innsbruck on March 9th: I stand or fall with this plebiscite. The decision has been given, but without his plebiscite and otherwise than he imagined. His decision brought a long suppressed crisis to an open outbreak which immediately and unexpectedly showed up the complete hollowness of his system and his authority which had only been kept alive by artificial means. His Fatherland Front in which the parties formerly dissolved had found refuge in so far as he wished to use them in order to close the path of the national socialist movement to power, turned out to be a piece of stage scenery with nothing behind it. It scattered without struggle in a few hours, as if it had never existed. This rapid disappearance was a proof not only of its inadequacy but also of the fact that it had never been in line with the will of the people. Presumably even many members of the Fatherland Front had at heart no relationship to this artificial construction. As soon as it was no longer supported by a State power that had already become fictitious, it proved to be a soulless illusion. The front that unjustly bore the name of "Fatherland" consisted mainly of compulsory members who merely adhered to it for the sake of their existence and their badge was therefore called the "Existenzklammer". In his Innsbruck speech Schuschnigg coined the further expression that the Fatherland Front would never allow itself to be beaten by the rear, i.e. by National Socialism. In fact this did not take place. What he thought to be the front was in reality the rear, and the real Fatherland Front consisted of the national socialist movement. But Schuschnigg commanded over a soulless apparatus. It stopped working and fell to pieces, as soon as it encountered a spiritual force. The consultation of the people which Schuschnigg wished to hold on March 13th took place one day earlier, but in a different and entirely opposite sense. The storm of enthusiasm which brought about the national socialist revolution in Austria became the unexampled expression of a desire of the people to join the Greater German Reich. "The 13th of May", said the Führer in his Leipzig speech on March 26th, "was to be a day of deception; it became a day of liberation". Austria no longer needed to be "conquered". The swastika banner was already waving over the whole country, when the troops began their march on the morning after the historical night of March 11/12th. Austria was already German and national socialist before the Führer moved a single man or a single gun. The avalanche of the people's will moved forward irresistibly and buried the leaders of the old decayed system under its weight. For this no ultimatum was required. Austria had returned to the Reich even before the governmental and constitutional decisions were taken on March 13th. These were merely the formal conclusion of a development that was already complete. Although the former régime, by its blunt challenge to the popular will, rendered the revolution possible, the time for this had long been ripe. In any case it would have taken place in a not too distant future because it was a physical necessity. It was nothing more than the conclusion of a logical and unavoidable development.

In a triumphal journey, the only obstacle to which was the enthusiasm of the German Austrians, Adolf Hitler again saw his own home. The unanimous exultation which greeted the German columns with their supreme commander as they marched through the country was a plebiscite which anticipated all formal decisions and created definite conditions. The cry: "One people, one Reich, one Führer!" which arose from the masses in the night from March 11th to 12th on the Ballhausplatz at Vienna and spread like wildfire in a new hours throughout the whole of Austria gave the Führer more right than Poincaré on a former occasion in German Alsace-Lorraine to say: "Le plébiscite est fait".

The plebiscite will nevertheless take place. Its object is not to prove to the country, but to foreign countries, that Austria has regained her German countenance and that the enthusiasm which took possession of the Austrian people was not merely a spontaneous transport, but a reality that makes it impossible to continue to maintain the fiction of an independent State.

The 10th of April will merely add the acclamation of a people of 75 millions to the great act of the Führer. The Anschluss brought about by the events of March 11th to 14th, and in the meantime sealed by law, will receive its solemn confirmation symbolically and formally by the plebiscite.

The fact that made the strongest impression on foreign countries was undoubtedly the recognition that people had been mistaken about Austria, about the internal conditions in the country, the strength of National Socialism and the weakness of the so-called Fatherland Front. They deluded themselves and stubbornly closed their eyes to the self-evident facts that became obvious during these days, namely that the natural rights of nationality cannot be simply dismissed by dictates and legal paragraphs, that the patriotism of a nation cannot be bought with money and that two nations related by blood cannot be kept separate or turned against each other by threats or promises.

At the end of April 1934 the Greater German deputy Foppa, in criticising the new Constitution, gave the following warning: "We declare solemnly before the whole world that it is the inviolable natural right of our people to shape its relations with the German Reich as intimately as is compatible with its national aims and its national right of self-determination... We promise to persevere at our national outpost until the vital demand of the Austrian nation is fulfilled, i.e. no solution of the Austrian question without the German Reich, no solution of the Central European problem without Germany."

Such warnings passed unheard. The Powers that thought they had determined German destiny for all time at Versailles and St. Germain in several hundred articles had for twenty years become too much accustomed to the idea that, by means of the independence imposed on Austria, they could drive a permanent wedge of discord between the two peoples. And the Geneva League in whose hands Wilson's gospel of the right of self-determination of the nations had been placed, not only did nothing to prevent this action, but even lowered itself to the role of a willing tool.

It is therefore quite natural that the criticisms of statesmen and of the press make no reference to the right of self-determination.

These Powers in particular have the least right to criticise the "methods" by which the German nation in the Reich and in Austria seized its right after they had done everything they could for twenty years to prevent its accomplishment. No one who carefully reviews this period will seriously affirm that negotiations in Paris, London or Geneva would have led within the next twenty years to the grant of the right to the Austrian people to return to their German home country. A method which, with the enthusiastic approval of the people concerned, has prevented Austria from becoming a second Spain is still infinitely better than that by which the seed of such a development has been sown for two decades.

We are told by André Tardieu, one of the most important "peacemakers" of Versailles, that treaties are scraps of paper if the aims of a policy of power stand behind their clauses. He openly admitted in his book "La Paix" that the prohibition of the Anschluss was made mainly in conjunction with France's endeavour, which had till then been unsuccessful, to obtain the guarantees demanded. The grotesque extent to which the hypocritical phrase of the "sanctity of treaties" was distorted in reality is finally shown by a footnote on page 428. This footnote refers to the German reply of September 5th 1919 to the allied ultimatum of September 2nd in which the Allies demanded the omission of the idea of the Anschluss from Article 61 of the Weimar Constitution. Tardieu quotes from the German note the sentence in which the Reich Government of that time declares Article 61 to be null and void and admits that a change is only possible with the consent of the Council of the League of Nations. The footnote reads: "As the League Council in this case can only bring about a change by a unanimous vote, France's consent is also necessary." Germany never took any other view of this unanimity principle of the League of Nations and regarded it as nothing more than an instrument for preventing any revision in the interest of the French policy of hegemony.

Anschluss means war. This was always the meaning of the vote which certain Powers, and with them the Geneva League, constantly opposed to the right of self-determination of the Austrian people in connection with such matters as the prohibitions of plebiscites in the Austrian "Länder" from 1918 to 1921, the provisions of St. Germain of 1919, the Geneva Loan Protocol of 1922, the policy of France and the Little Entente in the Danube Basin, the European plans of Briand or the Danube plans of Tardieu and Hodza, the prevention of the German-Austrian customs union in 1931, the new edition of the Geneva Protocols in 1932, the Stresa agreements of 1935 or, finally, the support given to the anti-German policy of Dollfuss and Schuschnigg.

In the League protocols, which "saved Austria from downfall", the Austrian Governments of that time sold the right of self-determination of their people for money and purchased for it the "independence" or "autonomy" of their country. "Independent" Austria was bound with chains, which were not even "golden" but economic gratuities which were paid for by new anti-Anschluss obligations. Austria became a show piece of the Geneva League, and sank to the level of a mandated territory of the League, an object of the so-called policy of equilibrium as understood by certain Powers.

When on December 29th, 1918, M. Pichon, then French Foreign Minister, rejected the idea of the Anschluss in the Chamber, he was interrupted by the deputy Renaudel with the words: "And what if the Austrians sincerely desire union with Germany?" M. Pichon's reply was: "Do you think that victory gives us no rights over the defeated?" By this brutal rejection of the right of self-determination of the nations, the then Foreign Minister again confirmed what the present Colonial Minister Moutet stated in the French Chamber on December 27th, 1917 when the war aims of the Allies were taking shape: The right of self-determination of the nations will be only a façade for the Allies.

In the case of Austria, however, this façade was at the same time a political construction in the interest of the French policy of power. "If Austria did not exist, it would be necessary to create her." These words were spoken by Charles Seymour, member of the American delegation at the Peace Conference and writer on the Austro-Hungarian question in the book: "What Really Happened in Paris", published jointly with Colonel House. After describing the case of Austria, as handled in Paris, as legally incompatible, he concludes with the words:

"It would have been natural in view of the purely German character of its population, to have permitted union with Germany. This was, on the whole, approved by the American delegates, as it was requested by the Austrians themselves. The French however, set their face firmly against any acquisition of territory by the secular enemy across the Rhine. Certainly union would tend toward the economic rehabilitation of those regions which is so essential to political tranquillity."

"No honest student of European conditions, however, can be blind to the new dangers which have been created. It is undeniable that a considerable stretch of territory has been Balkanized. Occasion for friction between the different states will unfortunately, not be lacking. Each state includes something of a nationalistic minority, which will look for support to its kinsmen, who form the majority in the neighbouring states. We must also expect that difficulties will develop from economic quarrels. Austria is perhaps in the worst plight."

Wilson's own Secretary of State, M. Lansing, in his memoirs, severely censures the deception practised at that time in Paris (The Peace Negotiations):

"There could hardly be a more open repudiation of the alleged right of 'self-determination' than this refusal to permit Austria to unite with Germany however unanimous the wish of the Austrian people for such union."

At the time when the Allies threatened to raise the armistice if Vienna refused to sign, William Martin wrote as follows in the Journal de Genève of September 5th, 1919:

"The Conference has fallen into a curious contradiction. Under the pretext that the present frontiers are based on injustice, it has restored to the fullest extent the historical frontiers which were no longer of much value; in order to repair present injustices it has restored the old injustices. The map of Europe of tomorrow will bear a striking resemblance to that of the sixteenth century."

In short, it may be stated that Austria has been deprived of all territories which were necessary for its existence. The result is an Austria of which no reasonable and intelligent man can assume that it will be capable of existence. 'Austria' said an Austrian recently, 'will only be able to live under a colonial régime. We shall be a colony of the Allies'.

Austria, deprived of frontiers, finances, raw materials and food supplies, will be at the mercy of her neighbours. It is only against Germany that she will have no feeling of revenge or irredentism. This fact indicates sufficiently the future development. The Allies can insist as much as they like, by threatening ultimatums, that Austria should be left outside Germany. Threats pass away, but the will of the people remains, especially when it can take its stand on the nature of things and on the secret wishes of a great neighbour. Those who did not want Austria to be capable of existence—there can be no doubt—knew what they were doing and for whom they were working."

Paris has, therefore, the least right of all to criticise the "method" and to base itself on "right".

The French Senator Bérenger, on December 20th, 1932, when he was Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, and rapporteur of the Law under which France was to guarantee a tranche of the Austrian loan, made the following remarks about the Austria of that time:

"Thus in 1920, for a 'European reason' that was imposed, new Austria was erected as an independent republic in the midst of Europe. Certain difficulties immediately made themselves felt: too great a capital for too small a body, since Vienna contains nearly a third of the total population; conflict between the two million town-dwellers and the four million peasants; an excess of old administrative bodies as compared with the reduced number of agricultural and industrial enterprises; a budget, the preparation and maintenance of which is scarcely possible in view of the disproportion between producers and consumers. This resulted in misery, great material and spiritual misery, for new Austria, namely civil war, that scourge of divided States and weakened peoples."

M. Bérenger then went on to confirm again what this "European reason" involved:

"After the Czechoslovak, Yugoslav, Polish and Hungarian nationalities had again arisen in the centre of Europe, the object was to maintain a balance of power that would prevent Germany from being established at the same time in Berlin and Vienna, on the Danube and on the Elbe, 150 kilometres from Trieste and at the gates of Belgrade and Budapest, while holding the new Czechoslovak State within the two arms of a pair of pincers."

And lastly: "Austria, although German in spirit and race, will thus remain an autonomous State as desired by the Powers during and since the peace negotiations. These Powers, among which France has been one of the first and has shown special activity, bear a great measure of responsibility for the present situation of Austria."

Adolf Hitler, in his great speech at Königsberg on March 26th, was rightly able to state for the world and for future history:

"It was not out of love for German Austria that it was given so-called 'sovereignty' at that time. No, this was done in the special interest of foreign countries; Germany was to be weakened. She was to be torn asunder and then to remain powerless as in past times. This was the object of this 'sovereignty'. This was also the meaning of the prohibition of the Anschluss. The cause was not love for the German people or love for the German Austrians, but exclusively the idea of weakening Germany and thereby the entire German people. This sovereignty only existed for the benefit of foreign countries."

"In an age when it is regarded as self-evident that all nations in the world should be granted the right of self-determination, the members of a great civilised nation were denied and deprived of this right."

"World conscience and world justice for the first time shine out of the peace treaties to us. When have nations been more shamelessly oppressed as since the time that people began to speak of world conscience and world justice? When have economic territories been more unscrupulously torn asunder than since the time when a 'League of Nations' was founded with the alleged object of serving the interests of the nations?"

German territory and German nationality have been torn asunder and violated without mercy, but also without intelligence. And since that time a deaf ear has been turned to all representations, all protests, warnings and remonstrances."

* * *

That is now all past. There is no longer an Austrian question. Austria is no longer an irresolute and helpless object of international policy.

Today the national right of self-determination has celebrated its greatest triumph, but against the will of those who announced that right while in the same moment doing violence to it.

What has happened in these days has merely made amends for the disastrous mistakes of Versailles and has corrected the political errors which have since been committed under the fateful influence of that dictated Peace. The act of the Paris peacemakers has broken down before the elementary force of the popular will, and the system of the peace treaties, which, with all its divisions of territories and peoples, was at bottom directed against the idea of the nation, has received a decisive blow with the formation of the Greater German Reich. The twenty years' silent war which was inaugurated by the two dictates of Versailles and St. Germain and which called for no fewer victims than the great struggle of the peoples itself, is now at an end. No statesman in Europe could set himself a higher aim than to put an end to this war.

The change of balance in Europe is not slight, but it offers a threat to no one of good will. In the heart of Europe a cell of order has been created which offers a guarantee that in future this centre will not be a nervous bundle of conflicting interests, but an elements of stability firmly anchored in itself, from which no disturbing effect can again be felt in Europe. The roads to understanding are open, and the Führer and Reich Chancellor has again and again solemnly declared his willingness for an understanding, though unfortunately he has not been listened to. But it must be an understanding which can no longer be based on the Versailles methods. A new era has dawned. It demands an attitude different from that which was born of a peace of hatred, mistrust and violence, which brought Europe to the edge of the abyss.

Against their will the dictators of Versailles and St. Germain have become the instruments of history and of fate. An old dream of all German stems has come true, and a deep longing has been fulfilled: one German nation in a single German Reich. Though wars and revolutions were powerless to accomplish it for centuries, Adolf Hitler in the space of three bare days has brought about the peaceful Anschluss. The Austrian constitutional law of March 13th, 1938, again provides, like that of March 12th, 1919: Austria is a "Land" of the German Reich.

A DOCUMENT FROM THE YEAR 1848

Communicated by Reich Minister Dr. Goebbels in his Speech in Vienna on March 29th, 1938

A Dream has Come True

"We have found in the Reich Archives the original of a proclamation made in the year 1848. This proclamation is drawn up by citizens of Vienna called Johannes Höflich, Klopff and Eurich. This proclamation develops the programme of the Greater German Reich in ten commandments. I think I should not refrain from communicating this ninety year old programme to the German people in Vienna. It is as if this programme had been written today by us. It is called the ten commandments of the time:

1st Commandment. Germans everywhere! Only under the pinions of the united powerful country may freedom be strengthened and may that order prevail which arises out of respect for the law that is inspired by freedom.

Virgin Austria! Only in the united Reich dost thou live the immovable period for which thy people is eternally intended.

2nd Commandment. May the joyful fulfilment of duty be our most passionate thought. Self-sacrifice must be a State principle for each one, for without this no community can live.

3rd Commandment. By the union of all States that have been German from the beginning and by their fusion, equal right for all will be established, and the States that have been shaken by so much injustice will again arise finer and freer under a single roof.

4th Commandment. May he who has no possessions today not be incited to hatred against the possessor. Whoever does so helps to bring about the stoppage of work and to close the sources of nourishment of the people, and he sins against the inheritance of his fathers. Diligence and sparingness will in future be the only conditions of happiness and respect.

The idle and the spendthrifts have no longer any room in Greater Germany.

5th Commandment. Our Germany will be more beautiful than all other countries, better in its foundations and greater in its successes. May the citizens demand constancy in their customs and habits.—A united Germany will grant this to them better than a disunited people divided into two States.

6th Commandment. Our Reich of the united people and all its stems will implant German integrity in all. Equality of rights and—let it not be forgotten—equality of duties. They shall grant concord and security to all and also that self-consciousness which is necessary for every German.

7th Commandment. The concord of the Reich shall have its roots in every citizen. Not by the formulas of a political catechism that is to be learnt by heart, but by the blessed effects of concord itself.

There is only people and only one class, whether the people are landlords, merchants, officials, clergymen, teachers, scientists, artists or soldiers. And the poorer any one of them is, the more certain is he of solicitous protection.

8th Commandment. Our union of both nations shall simplify the Government and not make it more burdensome, it shall cheapen our country and not make it dearer, it shall raise and not lower our standard of education, it shall increase and not reduce our strength.

9th Commandment. The Government of the united German people is called upon to create the new work. It will not build on foundations that are rotten, corrupt or decayed. The Government will rule with new ideas. It will not administer old methods.

10th Commandment. Austria! Austria!
Germany! Germany!

Think of the hour. Take thought firmly and unitedly at times of the greatest danger.

Firmly and unitedly procure the help which you need at no time more than now, by joining together one with another.

That our country may not build a hollow roof of vain know-alls, houses of deputies, official chambers which fall a prey to one self-interest or another, a foundation must be laid on which at all times the power and prosperity of the State may rest firmly and safely. Not a foundation stone of shameless and shocking mutual incitation which will ultimately bring government and people into opposition, but a foundation stone on which the house is built in which the real life of the nation as the bearer of a united people can develop.

We will for ever banish perfidious conservatism, that proved disturber of the State, from this joint house; otherwise the great work of union of the German nation must come to grief on the fanatical ambition of a small number—and this at a time when we are all threatened by our enemy, by the hordes of Russia.

Therefore, Austria! Therefore, Germany! Think of the hour!

This was written by Vienna citizens in 1848, and I now ask you, German men and women in Austria and in the Reich: Is that what we want or not? Is it not as if our fathers had risen from their graves and marched with their Greater German flags in the van of our young revolution? Is it not that the dream which our fathers at that time dreamed in vain has now been gloriously realised by our Führer, that what they as good Germans desired and longed for, what their hearts beat for, what they fought, struggled and sacrificed for, what hecatombs of dead were heaped up for, what the best Germans have for years and until our times been imprisoned for,—is it not as if all this had by a miracle come true?

GERMAN AUSTRIA'S VAIN STRUGGLE FOR HER RIGHT TO SELF-DETERMINATION

The Dictated Peace of St. Germain A Sad Chapter of Deluded Power Policy

1. THE LEGAL BASIS OF THE AUSTRIAN RIGHT OF SELF-DETERMINATION

After the dissolution of the old monarchy of Austria-Hungary had become a historical fact towards the end of 1918 by the secession of the Czechs, Slovaks and Southern Slavs, all the representatives of the German portions of the population of the overthrown State had met within a period of three weeks at a provisional National Assembly. Even before this, namely on October 4th, 1918, the Government of the Monarchy had sent the following note to the United States:

From the Minister of Sweden to the Secretary of State Legation of Sweden, Washington DC

October 7th, 1918.

Excellency,

By order of my Government, I have the honour confidentially to transmit herewith to you the following communication of the Imperial and Royal Government of Austro-Hungary to the President of the United States of America:—

The Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, which has waged war always and solely as a defensive war and repeatedly given documentary evidence of its readiness to stop the shedding of blood and to arrive at a just and honourable peace, hereby addresses itself to his Lordship the President of the United States of America, and offers to conclude with him and his allies an armistice on every front, on land, at sea, and in the air, and to enter immediately upon negotiations for a peace for which the fourteen points in the Message of President Wilson to Congress of January 8th, 1918, and the four points contained in President Wilson's Address of February 12th, 1916, should serve as a foundation, and in which the view-points declared by President Wilson in his address of September 27th, 1918, will also be taken into account.

Be pleased to accept, etc.

(Signed) W. A. F. Ekengren.

In his message of January 8th, 1918, which is mentioned in this note, Mr. Wilson had announced the basis of the Peace in his famous fourteen points, and the Secretary of State Lansing, in his note of November 5th, 1918 to the German Reich, stated that the Allied Governments had declared their readiness to conclude peace on the basis of the message to Congress of January 8th, 1918.

Wilson's fourteen points, which thus formed the legal basis of the peace negotiations, included point 10, which was worded as follows:

"The people of Austria-Hungary, whose place among the nations we wish to see safeguarded and assured, should be accorded the freest opportunity of autonomous development."

In the meantime, however, the dissolution of the old Monarchy had taken place, and the United States gave the reply of October 18th, 1918 reproduced below, extending point 10 in recognition of the right of self-determination of the Czech and Southern Slav populations:

The President deems it his duty to say to the Austro-Hungarian Government that he cannot entertain the present suggestions of that Government because of certain events of the utmost importance which, occurring since the delivery of his address of the 8th January last, have necessarily altered the attitude and responsibility of the Government of the United States.

Among the fourteen terms of peace which the President formulated at that time occurred the following:—

"X. The peoples of Austria-Hungary, whose place among the nations we wish to see safeguarded and assured, should be accorded the freest opportunity of autonomous development."

Since that sentence was written and uttered to the Congress of the United States, the Government of the United States has recognised that a state of belligerency exists between the Czecho-Slovaks and the German and Austro-Hungarian Empires, and that the Czecho-Slovak National Council is a de facto belligerent Government, clothed with proper authority to direct military and political affairs of the Czecho-Slovaks.

It has also recognised in the fullest manner the justice of their nationalistic aspirations of the Jugo-Slavs for freedom.

The President is therefore no longer at liberty to accept a mere "autonomy" of these peoples as a basis of peace, but is obliged to insist that they, and not he, shall be the judges of what action on the part of the Austro-Hungarian Government will satisfy their aspirations and the conception of their rights and destiny as members of the family of nations.

October 18th, 1918.

This note in no case annulled the principle of the right of self-determination. While it recognised autonomous development for certain populations of the former Monarchy, this merely signified an amendment resting on a legal basis which was due to changes which had taken place in the meantime. By the recognition of the rights of others, the German populations had all the more right to expect their own unrestricted autonomous development.

2. THE DEMONSTRATIONS OF LOYALTY OF THE GERMAN STEMS OF AUSTRIA

The first claim put forward by the National Assembly on October 21st, 1918 (First Meeting) was the claim to self-determination. It was expressed in a decision that was adopted unanimously:

"The German nation in Austria is resolved to determine itself its future State order, to form an independent German-Austrian State and to regulate its relations with the other nations by free agreements."

The German-Austrian State claims sovereignty over the entire territory of German settlement, in particular also in the Sudeten territories. Any annexation by other nations of German territories that are inhabited by German farmers, workers and citizens will be resisted by the German-Austrian State. It will endeavour to secure access to the Adriatic Sea by agreements with the other nations.

The German nation in Austria will elect a constituent national assembly. The constituent national assembly, elected on the basis of general and equal suffrage, will determine the constitution of the German-Austrian State."

At the second meeting of the provisional National Assembly this desire was brought before world public opinion in the shape of a claim in the note of October 30th, 1918 to President Wilson. This note contains a truthful, unexaggerated statement, based on figures, of the German populations and connected districts of German settlement that belonged to the German nation. The particulars must be regarded as accurate for the very reason that the representatives at that time must have been aware that they could only represent and claim what could not be contested by anyone. The notes exchanged on the subject later at the Peace Conference give further details, but the particulars in the replies of the Austrian delegation show rather those German portions which were afterwards taken away without regard to population or settlement conditions. In forming a judgment of the German populations of the former Monarchy, therefore, this note should be regarded as authoritative. The following is the complete text:

"Mr. President, We have the honour to inform you that the German nation in Austria has resolved to form an independent German-Austrian State. On October 21st, the deputies of all German constituencies in Austria, elected by general and equal suffrage, met at Vienna and decided: 1. to form an independent German-Austrian State; 2. to constitute itself as the provisional National Assembly of this new State and to take upon itself the task of representing this State until the new constituent National Assembly to be elected by general, equal and direct suffrage is able to meet; 3. to elect an executive committee which will have to represent this State as against foreign countries and to prepare and organise the taking over of the internal administration until the Government of the German-Austrian State is formed. The Germans in Austria are a people of 9.7 million persons; hitherto they have been citizens of the Austrian State, but at present, when the other nations are proceeding to form their independent States, the German nation in Austria is also constituting itself into an independent national State. The new State claims sovereignty over all territories of former Austria in which the Germans form the majority of the population. It claims the right of an entity under international law. It recognises the unrestricted right of the other nations of the Monarchy to determine their position within the community of nations in perfect freedom, and it demands the same right for the German nation. It demands that its representatives should be admitted to the peace negotiations as the representatives of an independent State in order to negotiate with the representatives of the other nations regarding the peace conditions. It reserves the right for its Government to conclude peace.

The Executive Committee states that no one is entitled to negotiate regarding the peace and to conclude peace in the name of German-Austria except the executive authority appointed by the German-Austrian National Assembly. The undersigned Executive Committee of the provisional German-Austrian National Assembly therefore requests you, Mr. President, to give it an opportunity of entering into direct negotiations with the representatives of all belligerent Powers regarding a general peace. The Executive Committee undertakes to accept the following principles: 1. The Executive Committee accepts unreservedly the principles which you, Mr. President, laid down in your Message of January 8th, 1918 and in your addresses of February 12th and July 4th, 1918. 2. The Executive Committee, fully agreeing with the note from the Secretary of State of the United States of October 18th, 1918 to the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, regards the Czechoslovak and Southern Slav nations as completely independent States, and is prepared to regulate the relations of the German-Austrian State with the Czech and Southern Slav States by free agreements with those States. The Executive Committee proposes that all disputes between the German-Austrian State on the one hand and the Czech and Southern Slav States on the other hand, in so far as they cannot be settled by free agreements, should be submitted for decision by a Court of Arbitration to be set up in accordance with the provisions of the Hague Conferences. 3. The Executive Committee requests you, Mr. President, to turn your attention to the question of the German territories of the Sudeten lands. In Bohemia there are about 134 districts in which the Czechs form the majority of the population, and 83 districts in which the majority of the population is of German nationality and speaks the German language. These 93 districts represent a territory of 18,385 square kilometres. According to the census in 1910—the previous one being in 1900—2,395,541 persons lived in this territory in connected settlements and spoke the German language in daily intercourse, being mixed with a scattered population of 80,143 persons who used the Czech language. There is, therefore, in Bohemia a connected territory of which the vast majority of the population is German. Similarly, the western part of Austrian Silesia and the northern part of Moravia which borders upon it form a connected territory of German settlement, and the southern districts of Moravia bordering on German Lower Austria are also German. The total number of Germans living in Bohemia, Moravia and Silesia, according to the last census, is 3,512,682. It is obvious that the new German-Austrian State also claims the German territories of Bohemia, Moravia and Silesia.

We are convinced, Mr. President, that, in accordance with the principles you have proclaimed, you will, after carefully examining this question, refuse to subject 3 ½ million Germans to the Czech State against their will and to force them into a desperate struggle against the foreign rule with which they are threatened. The age of democracy in Central Europe cannot begin by a people of 3 ½ millions being made subject by force of arms to a people of 6.3 millions. Lasting peace in Europe cannot be based on the creation in the new Czechoslovak State of a German irredenta whose constant appeals to Berlin and Vienna for help would endanger the peace of Europe. Moreover, such an oppression of the Germans would be in contradiction with the principle which you, Mr. President, laid down in point 2 of your address of February 12th last "that peoples and provinces cannot be moved about from one sovereignty to another, as if they were merely objects or pawns in a game", and also with the third and fourth of the principles you laid down that

"Third, every territorial settlement involved in this war must be made in the interest and for the benefit of the populations concerned, and not as a part of any mere adjustment or compromise of claims amongst rival states; and Forth, that all well defined national aspirations shall be accorded them without introducing new or perpetuating old elements of discord and antagonism that would be likely in time to break the peace of Europe and consequently of the world."

We therefore demand that the German districts of Bohemia, Moravia and Silesia should be recognised as a component part of the German-Austrian State and should freely determine their future adherence in conjunction with that State. We are prepared to negotiate with the competent representatives of the Czechoslovak nation regarding the delimitation of our territories. Should it, however, prove impossible to determine the frontiers by agreement, we propose that the population of the contested territories should be called upon themselves to decide by a general plebiscite to which State they wish to belong.

We are agreed that this plebiscite should be carried out under the control of the League of Nations by officials of neutral Powers and that all detailed conditions of this plebiscite should be determined by the Peace Congress or by a court of arbitration in such manner that any violation of the voters and any artificial influence on the result of the vote should be precluded. The protection of the national minorities still remaining in foreign territories can be settled by mutual agreement.

These principles would have to be applied in a similar manner to the districts of German settlement in the south and to the determination of the State frontiers against Italy and the Southern Slav States. You have stated, Mr. President, that you are waging war against the Governments of the Central Powers but not against the German nation. You have stated that you wish to achieve equal justice for all nations, including the German nation. We therefore appeal to you to use your authority for the right of self-determination of our nations. As we also take our stand on the principles which you, Mr. President, have proclaimed, any prolongation of the war would be tantamount to the meaningless murder of many people.

We therefore request you, Mr. President, to use your authority to bring about an immediate general armistice on all fronts and to grant us the possibility of entering into direct negotiations with all nations at a general Peace Conference which may result in a Peace that will give each nation its complete freedom and unite all nations into a lasting league of peace.

We have the honour, etc."

On the day when this note was addressed to President Wilson, the representatives of Sudetenland, German Bohemia, German South Moravia, Lower Austria, Upper Austria, Styria, Carinthia, Tyrol, Salzburg and Vorarlberg solemnly announced in the National Assembly their adhesion to the new State, which they recognised as their supreme legislative body. On the same day petitions for admission to German Austria were received from the various German language enclaves, so that State Chancellor Dr. Renner was able to make the following declaration at the third meeting of the provisional National Assembly on November 2nd, 1918:

"Deputies of the National Assembly! The basis of our State activity consists of the provinces and districts which, by their free decision, have carried out their accession to German-Austria. One after another, the provinces of Lower Austria, Upper Austria, Salzburg, Styria, Carinthia, Tyrol and Vorarlberg have completed their accession, have subjected themselves to the decisions of the provisional National Assembly and stated that they submit to the authorities and the official decrees of the State of German Austria. In addition, however, the provinces of German Bohemia and Sudetenland have already been constituted. These "Länder" or provinces have sent their constituent documents to the provisional National Assembly. In addition the district of Southern Moravia with its capital Znaim has proclaimed its independence and has of its own authority decided to accede to the "Land" of Lower Austria. The Böhmerwaldgau has also proclaimed its independence and decided to join the "Land" of Austria. On the basis of these declarations, the Government of the State has prepared and in part carried out all the legal measures which are to put into effect the incorporation of the "Länder" in German Austrian State territory and the union of German South Moravia and the Böhmerwaldgau with Lower Austria and Upper Austria respectively. Today it is therefore for the provisional National Assembly to take note of these declarations of union and by so doing to decide in administrative matters to take account of the desires of these "Länder"."

By a decision of the same date the above-mentioned "Länder" and districts were declared to be territory of the Austrian State and placed under its protection. There could be no doubt as to the legality of this spontaneous procedure, which represented a unique historical attempt to rise above the profound distress of the German people at that time.

3. THE DESIRE FOR ANSCHLUSS WITH THE REICH

While the self-determination of the individual populations to belong to the new State of German Austria ranked first, the second decision of the State, which was adopted unanimously by the National Assembly, was the determination of Article 2 of the Constitution of November 12th, 1918 in the following terms:

German Austria is a part of the German Republic. Special laws govern the participation of German Austria in the legislation and administration of the German Republic and the extension of the application of laws and arrangements of the German Republic to German Austria.

This decision which was subsequently, namely on March 12th, 1919, raised to a law in the shortened form "German Austria is a part of the German Reich" as Article 2 of the Constitution, was expressed on February 4th, 1919 before the meeting of the German National Assembly in the form of a parliamentary proclamation by the National Assembly of German Austria in the following manner:

The day after tomorrow, February 6th, the newly elected constituent National Assembly of the German Republic meets at Weimar. Conditions have not yet progressed so far or been created for us to take part in it as members with full rights. Nevertheless we must not pass over this great and significant event without consideration. The greater German idea has not died out with us Germans in these districts and has never been dead. Like a glittering star out of the dark clouds, the joyful hope of the realisation of our longing shines upon us in all the grief and anxiety by which we are surrounded—the hope of permanent reunion with our old mother country. With surging enthusiasm, therefore, we greet the German brothers in the Reich. We greet them with cries of joy. The German people in its entirety, inseparably united, no longer divided by the jealousy of the rulers, shall and must again become our home.

For these reasons the plenipotentiaries of the parties of this High House have submitted the following proposal:

"The German Austrian Provisional National Assembly sends its greetings to the Constituent National Assembly of the German Republic at its meeting in Weimar, a place dear to all Germans, and expresses the hope and conviction that the German Constituent National Assembly, in conjunction with the German Austrian representatives of the people, will succeed in again joining the link that was torn asunder by force in 1866, in realising the unity and freedom of the German people and in uniting German Austria with the German mother country for all time."

4. THE SUPPRESSION OF THE WILL OF THE AUSTRIAN PEOPLE

With brute force, with cannons and machine-guns and by political arrests, the new State was attacked and its repartition accomplished in the weeks that followed as a result of the new elections that were prescribed for the German Austrian National Assembly; this was borne in silence and was carried out in part by military assistance from the Allies. Instead of a long description, we will quote the Austrian protests as documentary evidence.

Protest and Complaint of the National Assembly of March 5th, 1919

"The Constituent National Assembly raises a solemn protest against the occupation by force of the "Länder" of German Bohemia and Sudetenland, the Böhmerwaldgau, the districts of Brünn, Iglau and Olmütz, and the southern frontier districts of Styria and Carinthia; it declares these territories and districts together with that part of German South Tyrol which is occupied by the Kingdom of Italy under the armistice agreement as an inviolable part of the Republic of German Austria, on the basis of the right of self-determination of the nations and of the free declaration of accession made by these territories.

In the meantime the dispute has broken out regarding these territories. We call the entire world to witness that we leave the decision regarding the ownership of these territories primarily to the Peace Congress and that we have scorned to use force.

Meanwhile, however, the Czechoslovak Republic, on the basis of old and obsolete imperialistic views, has occupied these territories with armed forces, and in the south of the State also territories have been occupied by another neighbouring republic. They have not awaited the judgment of the Peace Congress but have placed might before right.

At this moment we must also think of the occupied territories in the south. Districts of Styria and Carinthia have also been occupied by enemy forces. The position is somewhat different as regards Southern Tyrol which was occupied in pursuance of the armistice agreement, since the occupation is not illegal so long as the armistice agreement lasts. But we maintain that the occupying power had not the right under the Hague Agreement on belligerent rights in land warfare to hinder or restrict civil activity in the occupied territory; we consider that the population should have been given the right of voting. We therefore include this territory in our protest.

We further declare that these "Länder" and territories, in view of the right of self-determination of the nations and of their free declaration of accession, must be considered as inviolable parts of the Republic of German Austria. In Article 3 the Constituent Assembly protests against the fact that these territories were prevented from free voting and were thereby deprived by illegal force of their representation in the Constituent National Assembly, and reserves the right provided for in §40 of the election regulations to convene representatives of these occupied territories."

Law of March 12th, 1919 on the Occupied State Territories.

The Constituent National Assembly has decided as follows:

Article 1.

The Constituent National Assembly makes a solemn protest against the occupation by force of the "Länder" of German Bohemia and Sudetenland, the district of Znaim and the Böhmerwaldgau, the districts of Brünn, Iglau and Olmütz, and the southern frontier districts of Styria and Carinthia; it declares these "Länder" and territories and that part of Southern Tyrol which is occupied by the Kingdom of Italy under the armistice agreement as an inviolable part of the Republic of German Austria in virtue of the right of self-determination of the nations and of the free declarations of accession made by these territories.

Article 2.

The Constituent National Assembly categorically protests against the fact that these territories were prevented from free voting and were therefore deprived by illegal force from their representation in the Constituent National Assembly and reserves the right provided for in §40 of the election regulations to convene representatives of these occupied territories. The constitutional activity of the Constituent National Assembly is not impaired by the illegal prevention by force of the election of a part of their representatives.

Proclamation of the Sudetenland against the Prevention of Voting, communicated to the National Assembly on March 5th, 1919

"Sudetenland, being prevented by forcible measures of the Czechoslovak State from exercising the right to vote, sends its most cordial brotherly greetings to the German Austrian National Assembly at Vienna on the date of its first meeting. As a sign of protest against the prevention of the election, a general strike is declared today, March 4th, throughout German Bohemia and Sudetenland. Conscious of our indissoluble connection with the German national community, we are today with you, German Austrians, in spirit. Do not forget us. From the bottom of our hearts we long for the day of our liberation from the intolerable yoke of Czechoslovak foreign rule. All political parties of Sudetenland."

5. THE VIOLATION OF THE RIGHT OF SELF-DETERMINATION BY THE PARIS "PEACE CONFERENCE"

"The new Governments of Austria and Hungary had a right to expect that the Peace Conference would allot them the territories in the spirit of the fourteen points. To say the least, there was a great moral obligation on the part of the Allies to treat Austria and Hungary with that justice which was so eloquently expressed by President Wilson."

The way in which this right was handled by the Peace Conference is then shown by Charles Seymour in the book quoted above.

"The perplexity of the leading statesmen can be easily imagined when they had to listen to the contradictory claims. Negotiations were carried on about districts of which they had scarcely heard, if at all. How could just decisions be taken in such a case, and how could time be found for a detailed study. The American delegates demanded in vain that statistical data should be furnished."

Mr. Seymour might have added that these negotiations were carried on without those whose fate was at stake. When the German Austrian delegation, which had arrived in Paris on March 13th, 1919, submitted its full powers to the Conference on the 19th, it was met by the "claw of the tiger" with a refusal on the grounds that there would be no dealings whatever with a "German Austria". Nothing is more characteristic of the spirit of the Allies than the way in which they rejected everything connected with the word "German", or than their arbitrary determination of the name under which the German Austrian people must live in future; this is shown by the following note:

Paris, May 29th, 1919.

Mr. President:

I have the honor of returning enclosed to Your Excellency the full powers which you were kind enough to deliver to me on May 19th, 1919, and concerning which I have received instructions to address to you the following notification.

The Allied and Associated Powers have decided to recognise the new Republic under the name of "Republic of Austria". They therefore declare their willingness to recognize the full powers which were delivered on May 19th, as authorizing the delegates named therein to negotiate in the name of the Republic of Austria.

Please accept, etc.

The President of the Committee on Credentials (Signed) Jules Cambon.

That there could, however, be no question whatever of normal negotiations with the German Austrian delegation is shown by the following note from Clemenceau of May 31st, 1919, which may be described as a remarkable historical document of blind hatred and force:

Sir:

In your letter of 30th May you expressed the wish to be received by the Supreme Council to present verbally your observations.

According to the rules set out by the Conference for negotiations, the exchange of views must take place only in writing. Therefore, if the Austrian Delegation wishes to present observations it will have all liberty to do so in memorandums addressed to the President of the Conference. These memorandums will be strictly confidential and will be communicated only to the members of the Supreme Council.

Please accept...

(Signed) Clemenceau.

Stenographic Report of the Eight Plenary Session (Secret) of the Peace Conference at the Quai d'Orsay on Saturday May 31st, 1919.

(Note by the Editor: At the decisive moment, after the representatives of the Little Entente countries had put forward their claims at this meeting, President Wilson again uttered a warning against the violation of the right of self-determination of the nations. Below we reproduce the extract from President Wilson's speech from the minutes of the meeting.)

"We are trying to make a peaceful settlement, that is to say, to eliminate those elements of disturbances, so far as possible, which may interfere with the peace of the world, and we are trying to make an equitable distribution of territories according to the race, the ethnographical character of the peoples inhabiting those territories.

And back of that lies this fundamentally important fact that when the decisions are made, the Allied and Associated Powers guarantee to maintain them. It is perfectly evident, upon a moment's reflexion, that the chief burden of this maintenance will fall upon the great powers. The chief burden of the war fell upon the great powers and if it had not been for their action, their military action, we would not be here to settle these questions.

In those circumstances is it unreasonable and unjust that not as dictators but as friends the great powers should say to their associated: "We cannot afford to guarantee territorial settlements which we do not believe to be right and we cannot agree to leave elements of disturbance unremoved, which we believe will disturb the peace of the world."

The provisional reply of the delegation was handed in on June 10th, 1919. It read as follows :

Delegation of the Republic of German-Austria.
No. 229.

St. Germain-en-Laye.
June 10th, 1919.

Mr. President :

The German-Austrian Delegation to the Peace Conference devoted itself with all expedition to a study of the draft Treaties which the Representatives of the Allied and Associated Powers were so good as to hand to it, Treaties which aim at the establishment of a durable peace.

Now, notwithstanding the desire of German-Austria to attain this peace as swiftly as possible, despite the absolute necessity of putting an end both to the present conditions of existence in German-Austria and to the distress of a people exhausted by the miseries of the war and its consequences, the German-Austrian Delegation is compelled, while reserving the right to bring forward any needful arguments in its final reply, to point out forthwith to the Allied and Associated Powers that the conditions which it is sought to impose on the German people of Austria would deprive it of the factors indispensable for its material existence as well as for the maintenance of both political and social order.

Every State, if it is to live, requires sufficient territory and the necessary material resources. Now, by the terms of the draft neither its native soil nor the things which are indispensably necessary for its existence are to be granted to German-Austria.

She is to be deprived of her richest and most fertile districts. Against their will, their national feeling and their economic interests, more than four out of ten million German-Austrians are to be placed under a domination which, besides being foreign, is not well disposed towards our nation. It is thus that the German districts of Bohemia, as well as of Silesia, and the German areas of Moravia, are to be incorporated in the Czecho-Slovak State. Here you have coherent areas, inhabited by nearly three million Germans in compact masses, without mentioning considerable isolated districts in Bohemia and Moravia which are likewise, in the view of their populations, portions of Austrian territory. This question, moreover, having regard to its special importance, will form the subject of a separate statement. We cannot understand from what point of view such measures are reconcilable with the principles of equity proclaimed by the Great Powers as the only fruits obtained from the war at the cost of bloody sacrifices. It is proposed to separate, among other districts, the Böhmerwaldgau, including the areas of Neubistritz and the district of Znaim, from German-Austrian territories. It is proposed to enslave thousands of the inhabitants of Lower Austria for the sole reason that their land is well adapted to the industrial undertakings of a neighbor who is anxious to deprive us of our last sugar refinery as well as of the railway junctions most important for our commercial existence. While adducing on the one hand, the alleged argument of historical frontiers, there is no hesitation, on the other hand, in trampling underfoot the historical rights of Lower Austria. Furthermore, the desire repeatedly manifested by the German population of the districts of Western Hungary to be allowed a plebiscite on the question of its adjunction to German-Austria, has been passed over in discouraging silence. After all the sufferings and distress which have been borne by an heroic people, proud of its glorious past, it is sought to dismember the country of Andreas Hofer and definitely to place the Southern Tyrol under an alien domination, even those portions of it which, at the time of the Armistice, escaped occupation. The result would be to deprive extensive German areas in Styria, as well as the basin of Carinthia to half way up its northern slope, both of their liberty and their material resources, without paying heed to the question whether existence is possible for the inhabitants of the strip of territory which would remain between an uncrossable range of mountains and the frontier of a State. The whole block of our native soil, which forms an ethnical and economic unit, is to be parcelled out, and the pieces torn from the live body of a people divided up among rich neighbors who merely seek to crush it under the weight of their material superiority.

These are the general impressions which the conditions of peace as communicated, have produced on us at first sight.

The consequences entailed by these conditions, that is, the parcelling out of German-Austria and the destruction of its economic existence, could not be in harmony with the intentions of the Powers which, at the present time, govern the destinies of peoples and have accepted the responsibility for so doing.

One might be tempted to explain these conditions, on the one hand by the fact that we have not been heard; on the other, by the fact that stipulations which are inapplicable to the conditions in States formed out of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, have been merely transplanted into the present draft.

We are unaware whether the Powers realize that the consequences of splitting up our territory and of our economic ruin could not, even supposing that they corresponded to their intentions, be confined to the frontiers of German-Austria; for the collapse of our economic existence must perforce destroy all public authority in a territory situated in the heart of the continent and also bring about the dismemberment of the State and political and social anarchy, while our neighbors would inevitably be involved in this catastrophe of which it is impossible to forecast the after-effects and disastrous results.

We wish to make it absolutely plain that the Government of German-Austria now in power, which has been able, during six months, and only thanks to the utmost tenacity, to preserve order at home and peace abroad, could not assume responsibility for the consequences of such conditions of peace.

Please to accept, etc.,

Renner.

In the days that followed, the delegation submitted to the Conference successive notes on conditions in German Bohemia, Sudetenland, Ostrau, Styria, Carinthia and Tyrol. The representatives of Sudetenland had at the same time sent a memorandum direct to the Conference.

In a note of June 25th, 1919 the delegation then submitted counter-proposals in the form of a treaty text. A whole month of uncertainty passed. The reason for this will be found in the complete report of the German Austrian Peace Delegation regarding these "negotiations". It says :

"On July 20th, at noon, M. Dutasta, the Secretary General of the Peace Conference, appeared at the Villa occupied by Chancellor Renner, accompanied by one officer from each of the English, French, and Italian Military Mission in St. Germain-en-Laye, and delivered to the Chancellor without further formulation the complete conditions of peace with a letter from the President of the Peace Conference dated July 20th.

In this accompanying letter these peace conditions were designated as the "Final Text of the Peace Conditions", and a term of ten days was granted to the Delegation in which to turn in its written rejoinders."

While the Austrian provinces were visited by revolutionary disturbances, while famine claimed a terrible number of victims, this Austrian peace delegation had sat since May 13th, 1919 in Saint-Germain with nothing to do but merely to await what the high Powers vouchsafed to decide regarding the fate of the former Monarchy. The repeated inquiries of the delegation remained unanswered because, as the report points out, the Allies were themselves quarrelling about the booty which was to be distributed. The delegation was intentionally left in uncertainty and then a time limit of ten days was allowed in order to prevent any serious or objective discussion or the preparation of counter-observations by the Austrians. In view of French traffic conditions at that time, as is shown by a note from the delegation to M. Clemenceau, three days were required to reach Vienna in order to obtain the necessary personal contact with the National Assembly. If everything went well, the delegation had four days at its disposal to take up an attitude to a document of 371 articles. "You have ten days time!" The laconic handing-over of the peace conditions by the officers was the symbolic framework of the Allies and showed to the outer world that this was an act, not of right, but of violence.

In so far as the Allies in their observations went into the Austrian counter-proposals, their "reply" may be summarised as stating on one point after another that the delegation had brought forward no new point of view. The Austrian Delegation was thus given on July 20th the last possibility of combating the terrible conditions. On the same day, therefore, a protest demonstration by the National Assembly took place. The "liberal" conditions of the great democracies were again brought appealingly before world public opinion.

The people of German Austria is unanimously of the opinion that what is here offered to us is not a peace of conciliation but a peace of destruction. This peace does not mean for us release from the horrors of war, it merely means the prolongation of war, famine, distress, misery and destruction; in view of the peculiar nature of our conditions of production, it means a slow decline, the dying off of large masses of the people, more terrible and cruel than even rapid physical death. We are torn away from the great Reich of the German nation, our brothers in Bohemia and in the Sudeten territories are torn away from us, together with our brothers in South Tyrol, Carinthia, South Styria, and even in the mother country Lower Austria.

Anyone who believes that these conditions will acquire definite force must despair of mankind. We hope that these conditions have been put forward in ignorance of the peculiarities of our economic, financial and political position. We hope that our Peace Delegation will succeed in enlightening our opponents as to what our position is and what the results of this peace would be.

The last counter-proposals of the Austrian delegation were transmitted to the Conference on August 6th, 1919; they relate mainly to the delimitation of the frontiers. The covering note to these proposals read as follows:

Delegation of German Austria
No. 914

St. Germain-en-Laye
August 6th, 1919

Covering Letter

From: Mr. Renner
To: President Clemenceau
Mr. President:

By the Note of July 20th, Your Excellency was kind enough to deliver to me, in the name of the Supreme Council of the Allied and Associated Powers, the Text of the Peace Conditions with German Austria.

Referring to that letter, I hasten to send to Your Excellency the remarks presented by the Delegation of German Austria on the Ensemble of the Treaty. In order to facilitate the examination of these remarks and to make them clear, I take the liberty of adding the drafts of the various parts of the Treaty in the form which would result from the adoption of our proposals.

In examining our point of view, the Supreme Council will be kind enough to recognise that the German Austrian Delegation has, in the present state of the negotiations, scrupulously limited itself to ask only the attenuations indispensable to the existence of the German Austrian People and the refusal of which would expose it to anarchy and misery.

According to the Text of the "Conditions" a formal refusal is opposed to the desire of the German Austrian people to remain free and to remain united. Vast German territories of northern Bohemia, of the Sudetes Country, of Bohemia and of southern Moravia, of Styria, of Carinthia as well as of the Tyrol beyond the Brenner, should be delivered to other States and subjected to other peoples. The Germans of the Alps and of the Sudetes, since 1526 Nationals of the sole and same Empire, united together by the ties of blood, by relationship and alliances united and intermingled so as to form effectively only one family, should be assigned to two different States, States which on account of the opposing interests suggested to them shall become natural opponents in the future. This decision of the Powers, who at present dispose of and are responsible for the future of humanity, fills the German Austrian populations with the most poignant bitterness. The economic, political and social reasons proving the necessity of the union of the German Countries of the former monarchy to one and the same State have been clearly proved by the undersigned Delegation in its previous communications. But it was in vain that we invoked the principle of the independence of Nations, a principle proclaimed by the Powers themselves as their war aim, it was in vain that we put forth the right of self-determination. Can it be the over-whelming burden of the disaster which prevents us from seeing clearly through the intentions of the said decision and from being able to recognise the predominant rights which oppose themselves to the liberty of our People? It is not for us to make reproaches, we can only make use of the right to complain and decline the responsibility and to abandon the consequences to historic evolution.

It has been proved that German Austria could not live within the restricted frontiers which are imposed upon her and that the subjection of her nationals by the neighboring States would bring about a serious ferment and a latent danger for peace and social order in the centre of Europe. We are told, however, that we shall be allowed to live nevertheless; we are willing therefore to persuade ourselves that it shall be so, supposing, evidently, that justice shall be made to our territorial aspirations within that measure, reduced to a minimum, upon which we insist in the Appended proposals. We shall therefore bring all our forces and all our efforts into play to brave resolutely the enormous dangers and troubles which are awaiting us. In this moment of distress, we warmly greet the Constitution of the League of Nations and we hope to be able to count on the interest which it shall lend us as well as on the reception which it shall extend to us. That is the only reservation we make.

However, we must declare, right now, that it was in vain that we tried until now to convince ourselves of the possibility of an hypothesis in which we never could be in a position to effectively stand all the burdens which the Treaty imposes upon us. It is our duty to proclaim in advance that, unless the said burdens are essentially alleviated, we shall inevitably succumb under their weight.

Let the High Powers receive this solemn declaration with as much seriousness and interest as it is made with loyalty and frankness. It is incumbent upon us to ask that this burden be made bearable. The German-Austrian People only wishes to live; give him the assurance that it will be possible!...

We know that, as defeated, we are bound to carry out all the demands of the victors. But, while submitting to the conditions imposed by the powers with which the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy was at war, in what concerns the assign states of the said Empire, we must firmly maintain the point of view that the liquidation between the latter can be effected only upon the basis of the right of peace, or at least, on that of indispensable consideration between neighbors. In settling the relations existing between us and the other states formed on the territory of the Monarchy, we must insist that our material existence not be rendered impossible. Our downfall, furthermore, would open an abyss for them. Our firm conviction, therefore, is that the provisions, as we have just pointed out, which are absolutely impossible of execution and each one of which, in itself, is fatal for our economic organism, must be eliminated from the Peace Treaty. The discussion of these questions, however, should not prolong the deliberations of the Peace Conference; no other solution, therefore, remains than to abandon to the Commission on Reparations the task of effecting the settlement of them.

In order to show, definitely and prove clearly that the proposed modifications, reduced, as they are, to a most modest measure, do not, in any point, exceed the elementary demands of our viability, it would, in my opinion, be of unquestionable value for all the parties concerned to hear the members of the German Austrian Delegation and to ask them for all the desired explanations, verbally, in the competent committees.

German Austria does not wish to admit that it would answer the intentions of the Great Powers to make it sign engagements which, by the force of facts, cannot be carried out, or the execution of which would put an end to the social and economic life of the state obligated. Furthermore, German Austria—fully aware of its situation—is ready to accept all charges, to make all sacrifices and to sign all conditions which it can carry out and support and which it, therefore, conscientiously and in good faith, can assume without compromising the existence of the people which it represents.

Accept, etc.

(Signed) Renner.

Shortly afterwards the delegation transmitted to M. Clemenceau the following decision of the National Assembly of August 8th, 1918:

"The Main Committee, on behalf of the entire country, again protests against the attempt of the Peace Treaty to falsify the facts by simulating a mutual state of war which never existed between the nations of the old Danube Monarchy and by abolishing by means of a dictate the clear legal position of the common succession of all nationalities. No instrument of international law, however solemn, can decide that right is not right and that what has never happened is a fact. But, in addition, no such instrument can permanently prejudice the right of national self-determination which is to be violated on all our frontiers, or dissolve the bonds of blood relationship which bind us to our threatened compatriots."

The opponents did not make the slightest effort to give an objective reply to the Austrian counter-proposals and observations. On the contrary, they admitted openly in their reply that German populations were placed under foreign rule. The reply contains the following passage:

"If the Austrian people had during the years which preceded the war made efforts to repress the spirit of militarism and of domination which had animated the governants of the monarchy, if it had raised an effective protest against war, if they had refused to aid and support its rulers in the design to pursue it, one might accord some attention to the defence at the present day. But the Austrian people have been from beginning to end its ardent partisan, it has done nothing to separate itself from the politics of its government and of its allies until their defeat on the field of battle, proof sufficient that conformably to the sacred rules of justice Austria should be held to assume its entire share of responsibility for the crime which has enchained upon the world such a calamity."

What a pretext for trampling underfoot the most primitive principles of the solemnly promised right of self-determination of the nations and for covering express compulsion by the phrase "the sacred rules of justice".

On September 2nd, 1919, when the final text of the peace conditions was handed to the delegation, the entire dictatorial character of the treaty was again intentionally demonstrated by the fact that the demand for signature within five days was accompanied by the observation:

"In default of such declaration within the time specified above, the armistice concluded November 3rd, 1918 shall be considered at an end and the Allied and Associated Powers shall take all measures judged necessary to impose these conditions."

In the correspondence published in the report of the German Austrian delegation, there is perhaps nothing so disgracefully humiliating as the petition of the head of the delegation to Clemenceau to extend the time limit for two days on the grounds that, as already mentioned, traffic conditions did not permit of such a rapid journey to Vienna. The Supreme Council magnanimously accorded this extension after a decision had been taken by the meeting.

The demand for the right of self-determination was at that time the cry of distress of the entire Austrian people. Let us return to the mother country! On every hand your arbitrary will has decided that three millions of our brothers and sisters are placed under foreign rule. You have founded States which are to act as policemen in watching over our impotence in foreign affairs; you have left an Austria which is condemned in this form to political and social death. This cannot be right, and to state that it is right is an injustice.

On the day of the final reunion of Austria with the mother country, it is well to read again these cries of distress. They are documents which prove convincingly who laid the foundation in Europe of permanent discord and who was responsible for the fact that, more than twenty years after a terrible world war, bloodstained boundaries placed this continent permanently before the danger of a new war. These documents show that the Austrian nation at the very time of its deepest humiliation earnestly and sincerely demanded the Anschluss and they finally refute the statement that the great historical events of the last few days represent an act of violence.

The German Austrian delegation enclosed two protests in the letter to Clemenceau accepting the peace thus imposed, i.e. the decision of the National Assembly of September 6th, 1919 and the protest of the "Länder" of German Austria of September 5th, 1919. They read as follows:

Protest of the «Länder» of German Austria.

St. Germain-en-Laye, September 6th, 1919.

Sir,

With reference to the note of the 2nd inst. in which Your Excellency was kind enough to forward to the German-Austrian Delegation the final text of the Peace Treaty with Austria, I have the honour to inform you that the National Assembly of German-Austria, by a vote taken the 6th instant, has appointed the State Chancellor Mr. Renner, to sign the Peace Treaty.

I am taking the liberty to annex to this communication the text of the declaration voted concerning this subject by the National Assembly as well as a resolution pronounced by the representatives of German Bohemia, Carinthia, Lower Austria, Upper Austria, Styria, the Country of the Sudetes, of the Tyrols, and of the Government of the arrondissement of German Southern Moravia, resolution in which the said representatives protest against the subjection of three million and half German-Austrians to foreign domination.

Decision of the National Assembly of September 6th, 1919

The National Assembly solemnly protests before the entire world against the provisions of the Peace Treaty which,—under the pretext of protecting the independence of German Austria—deprives the German

Austrian nation of its right of self-determination, and refuses it the right to realize its ardent desire for union with the mother-country Germany, a desire constituting a vital, economic, intellectual and political necessity. The National Assembly expresses the hope that, as soon as peace shall have dissipated the spirit of animosity and national rancor provoked by the war, the Powers will not continue, thanks to the intervention of the League of Nations, to refuse to the German people its right to unity and its national liberty, a right accorded to all other nations.

It is with the utmost profound bitterness that the National Assembly protests against the decree of the Allied and Associated Powers, a decree unfortunately irrevocable, by virtue of which three million and a half Germans of the Country of the Sudetes are violently separated from the Germans of the Alps, with whom they have formed for centuries a political and economic unity. By this decree they are deprived of their national liberty and subjected to the foreign domination of a nation which in this very Peace Treaty recognizes itself as their enemy.

Deprived of all power to avert this disaster and to spare Europe the troubles that will inevitably result from this offense against the most sacred rights of a nation, the National Assembly of German Austria, before the bar of history, charges with the responsibility for this decision the conscience of the Powers who put it into execution in spite of our most solemn warning.

The National Assembly must unfortunately take this constraint into account, although it considers the Peace of St. Germain as unjust nationally, fatal politically and inexecutable economically. From the political and national point of view, it must throw the responsibility on the Powers; as to the economic point of view, it can only wait until it knows the plans of the Powers as to the execution of the economic and financial clauses. The National Assembly expects that the promises made by the Powers in their reply will be accomplished; it considers the League of Nations as the jurisdiction called upon to do justice to our Republic and to assure it in future; and it instructs the Chancellor to sign the Peace Treaty.

Protest by the German-Austrian countries

Vienna, September 5th, 1919.

To the General Commission of the German-Austrian National Assembly at Vienna

Today the Government and the representation of the German-Austrian people are to decide if they can agree to sign the Peace Treaty imposed by the Powers of the Entente, a treaty by which the German Countries of the Sudetes, of the Southern Tyrol, the German territories in Carinthia, in Styria, and in Lower Austria would be delivered to foreign domination.

The representatives of the German countries of the Sudetes, of the Tyrol, of Carinthia, of Styria, and of Upper and Lower Austria confirm, in this fatal hour, that the territorial clauses of the Peace Treaty violate the elementary right of nations to self-determination and also seriously violate the principles which served as a base in concluding the armistice.

The national representations therefore renew, before the entire world, their solemn protest against this forced peace; unanimously, they refuse to recognize the distinction established by the treaty classifying the peoples in two categories: free nations and slave nations.

They declare that the three million and a half Germans, forced by such a peace treaty to submit to foreign domination, will insist to the end of time to affirm their right to self-determination, a right which forms the only possible basis for national constitutions. In the name of the countries represented.

For German Bohemia . . . , for Carinthia . . . , for Upper Austria . . . , for Lower Austria . . . , for Styria . . . , for the Sudetes . . . , for Tyrol . . .

6. THE IDEA OF THE ANSCHLUSS WITH THE REICH IS SUPPRESSED BY A THREAT OF OCCUPATION OF THE RIGHT BANK OF THE RHINE

It is clear from the above documents with what enthusiasm and longing the Austrian people desired Anschluss with the Reich at the hour when the new State was born, and that this desire was legally established in Article 2 of the Constitution of the State.

The Allies, with France at the head, attempted to represent this desire so spontaneously expressed by the German populations of the former Monarchy at the end of 1918 as if it were an intrigue of the German Reich. Leading American historians, experts in international law and delegates to the Peace Conference, such as House, Seymour, Lansing, Hunter Miller and Temperley, regarded this Anschluss as the most natural and proper course. In their case any ignorance of European conditions might have been pardoned since they lived in another continent. But it was reserved for the European "victors", in some cases deliberately, to set aside all reason and to use the most evil means of attaining their objects.

What can better illustrate the spirit of St. Germain than the fact that on September 2nd, 1919 representatives of the French army and diplomacy in a theatrical setting handed over Clemenceau's peace conditions to the Austrian delegation and gave an ultimatum with a limit of five days for signature, while at the same time issuing a demand to the German Reich, with a threat of the occupation of the right bank of the Rhine, that it should remove from its Constitution the article that stated that German Austria was a German Land.

The ultimatum to Germany of September 2nd, 1919 was worded as follows :

September 2nd, 1919.

To : The President of the German Delegation
From : The President of the Peace Conference

The Allied and Associated Powers have noted the German constitution of August 11th, 1919. They note that the provisions of the second paragraph of Article 61 constitute a formal violation of Article 80 of the Peace Treaty signed at Versailles on June 28th, 1919.

This violation is double :

(1) Article 61, by stipulating the admission of Austria to the Reichsrat, assimilates this republic to the German lands (Deutsche Lander) which compose the German Empire, an assimilation which is incompatible with the independence of Austria.

(2) By admitting and regulating the participation of Austria in the Imperial Council, Article 61 creates a political bond and a political action common to Germany and Austria, in absolute contradiction with the independence of the latter.

Consequently, the Allied and Associated Powers, after having reminded the German Government that Article 178 of the German constitution declares that "the provisions of the Treaty of Versailles can not be affected by the constitution," request the German Government to take due measures to suppress this violation immediately by declaring the second paragraph of Article 61 null and void.

Without pledging themselves not to take further measures, in case of refusal, and by virtue of the Treaty (notably of Article 428), the Allied and Associated Powers declare to the German Government that this violation of its pledges, on an essential point, will constrain them, if their just demand is not complied with, within fifteen days from the present time, to order at once the extension of their occupation of the right bank of the Rhine.

There was no difficulty in Paris in fiding legal subtleties to deceive world public opinion and to camouflage the aims of a policy of power.

The German Government gave the following reply on September 5th, 1919 to the threat of September 2nd :

The German Delegation to the President of the Peace Conference.

The President of the German Peace Delegation

Versailles, September 5th, 1919

To His Excellency

Mr. Clemenceau, President of the Peace Conference
Mr. President :

According to their note of September 2nd, 1919, the Allied and Associated Powers are of the opinion that section 2 of Article 61 of the German Constitution, dealing with German Austria's right to participate in the (German) Reichsrat, is a formal violation of Article 80 of the Peace Treaty, and they demand therefore that the German Government take the necessary steps within 14 days to eliminate this violation by canceling section 2 of Article 61.

In connection herewith the German Government declares the following :

In discussing Article 80 of the (Peace) Conditions, the German Peace Delegation at Versailles pointed out in its observations on the Peace Conditions, which were presented to the representatives of the Allied and Associated Governments on May 29th, 1919, that Germany never has had and never will have the intention to change the German Austrian boundary line by force, but that it could hardly assume the responsibility of opposing a possible future wish of the population of Austria for a re-establishment of the political union with the German mother country. The Allied and Associated Governments, in their reply of June 16th, 1919, acknowledged receiving notice 190 that Germany would forgo any change by force of the German Austrian boundary lines. The Germans therefore assumed that it would not be in contradiction of Article 80 of the Peace Conditions, which in its last sentence specifically points towards a future possibility of a change in Austria's political independence with the assent of the League of Nations, if the road to this possibility were paved by an amicable approach between the two countries in accordance with the principles of the right of self-determination of peoples. For this reason Article 61, section 2, has been incorporated in the German Constitution. In its first sentence it regulates German Austria's right to vote in the German Reichsrat merely in case the union of that country with Germany should take place but it does not anticipate the events upon which such a union would depend. In the second sentence of the Section a deliberative voice in the Reichsrat is granted to the representatives of German Austria until the time of a definite union. By this regulation it was intended neither to touch upon German Austria's independence nor upon the conditions which might lead towards a change of this independence which had been recognized by Germany in the Peace Treaty ; for this Section leaves it to Austria's free discretion whether she wishes to avail herself of the right of participation in the sessions of the Reichsrat, and binds that country neither by public nor by international law.

In spite of these facts, the Allied and Associated Governments consider the admission of German Austrian delegates to the Reichsrat as incompatible with the national independence of the country as guaranteed by Article 80 of the Treaty of Peace, for this admission would (in their opinion) put German Austria on a par with the States forming the German Reich, since it would create a political tie between Germany and Austria and would be attended by joint political activity in the two countries. This point of view of the Allied and Associated Governments indicates an interpretation of Article 80 of the Peace Treaty which differs from the interpretation held till now by Germany. Germany, faced by the Note of the Allied and Associated Powers, is unable to uphold her point of view in this question. But this does not necessitate a change of the text of the German Constitution. The Allied and Associated Governments, in their Note, have already pointed to Article 178 of the Constitution, which plainly prescribes that the stipulations of the Peace Treaty are not affected by the Constitution. This article was included in the endeavor to eliminate a priori any contradictions which might possibly arise between the regulations of the Constitution and the stipulations of the Peace Treaty, which latter are often rather vague as to meaning. The proviso (of Article 178) affects all regulations of the Constitution, therefore also the above mentioned regulation in Article 61, section 2. If therefore Article 61, section 2, considered separately is at variance with a stipulation of the Peace Treaty, then this Section automatically becomes ineffective.

The German Government declares, therefore, that the regulation of Article 61, section 2, of the Constitution remains ineffective, that specifically the admission of German Austrian delegates to the German Reichsrat can not take place as long as the Council of the League of Nations does not give its consent to a change in German Austria's international status.

Political Clauses for Europe

Although the matter is herewith settled, by the above declaration, in accordance with the wishes of the Allied and Associated Governments, the German Government finds itself obliged to make the following fundamental remarks : The German Government believes itself to have given no occasion for the rough and blunt form of the Note of the Allied and Associated Governments in which they demanded a clarification of supposed contradictions between the German Constitution and the Peace Treaty. If these governments threaten to extend the occupation in case of a refusal of their demand, and try to justify (such threat) by referring to Article 429 of the Peace Treaty, attention must be called to the fact that the Peace Treaty could not possibly support such a measure, not to mention the fact that the Allied and Associated Governments have not even ratified the Treaty and therefore cannot legally base their demands upon it. Article 429 provides for a longer period of occupation under certain circumstances but never for an extension of the territory under occupation. The German Government considers therefore the threat of such a measure as nothing but a deeply regrettable act of violence.

Please accept, Mr. President, the expression of my highest esteem.
In absence of Baron Lersner Schmitt.

German Declaration Concerning the Cancelling of Article 61 of the German Constitution. Versailles, September 22nd, 1919.

The undersigned, duly authorised and acting in the name of the German Government, admits and declares that all the provisions of the German Constitution of the August 11th, 1919, which are in contradiction with the terms of the Treaty of Peace signed at Versailles on the June 28th, 1919, are null and void.

The German Government admits and declares that the second paragraph of Article 61 of the said Constitution is therefore null and void, and in particular that Austrian representatives cannot be admitted to the Reichsrat, except so far as the Council of the League of Nations, in accordance with Article 80 of the Treaty of Peace, should consent to such a change in the international status of Austria.

The present Declaration will be approved by the competent German legislative authority within fifteen days from the coming into force of the Treaty of Peace.

Done at Versailles the 22nd day of September 1919, in the presence of the undersigned representatives of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers.

7. THE LAST ULTIMATUM

The end of the year 1919 coincides with the most tragical days in the destiny of the greater German idea, namely the disregard and destruction of German national rights. The Clemenceaus, Barthous, Tardieus and Lloyd Georges obstructed the natural source of life of a population of seven millions in the selfish interest of an opportunist policy of violence; by threatening a military advance into Germany they compelled the renunciation of the Anschluss in Berlin and Vienna. The nature of the treaties that were claimed to be valid and sacred is shown finally by the ultimatum of the Allies to the German Austrian Government of December 16th, 1919:

"The attention of the Allied and Associated Powers has been drawn to certain actions that threaten in various ways the unity and territorial inviolability of the Republic of Austria. (The Note then gives particulars of the attempts to hold plebiscites for the Anschluss.)

The Allied and Associated Powers are of opinion that, if the subversive forces in one of these cases were crowned with success, such a preparation would mean the complete collapse of the Austrian State and of equilibrium in Central Europe.

They therefore wish to leave no doubt as to their desire to maintain the territorial provisions of the Treaty of St. Germain in their entirety and to insist on their strict application. In this spirit the Supreme Council has today taken the following decision which I have the honour to transmit to you on its behalf:

The Allied and Associated Powers, inspired by the desire to secure the existence of Austria within the frontiers allotted to it, and determined to ensure respect for the provisions of the Treaty of St. Germain, declare that they will oppose any attempt which calls into question the inviolability of Austrian territory or which would have the result, contrary to the provisions of Article 88 of the above Treaty, in any way, directly or indirectly, of compromising the political and economic independence of Austria."

Even three months after the compulsory signature of St. Germain, the Allies were compelled again to safeguard their bungling by threats against the Austrians; subsequently, as we have pointed out above, this task of sabotaging the right of self-determination was handed over to the Geneva League.

Truth must be sought on the basis of the texts. But those texts must be ignored which, according to this bungled peace treaty, were declared as a sacred principle of international law by those who in 1919 infringed the right of self-determination of the nations and condemned entire peoples to subjection. Such an international law is immoral. But the higher moral exists when the right of self-determination of the nations breaks out from national distress and irresistible necessity at times when the spiritual tensions of these suppressed peoples have only the one outlet, which Schiller in his William Tell ascribes to inalienable national feeling as the idea and spiritual weapon of humanity, namely the right which is assumed when others desire to withhold it.

From this point of view the representative of Great Germany, in the National Assembly on December 20th, 1919, shortly after the threatening note of December 16th, spoke the truth regarding the historical consequences of the act of violence of St. Germain and his words met with the applause of all; today they have a prophetic character:

"The right of self-determination of the nations is on the march, the right of self-determination which the western democracies have proclaimed hundreds and thousands of times and which they have trampled underfoot in the peace treaties of Versailles and St. Germain. But these treaties are merely the works of man. The national right of self-determination will come into its own in spite of them. This we hope and confidently believe. For this reason we, representatives of Great Germany, do not regard the future as entirely tragic and hopeless. And when we see how wretched our position really is in the interior of the State, we have nevertheless a hope for the future and a task for the coming years.

We representatives of Great Germany may be an object of ridicule, but that is a matter of indifference to us. Our guiding principle will always be the song of the old Burschenschaft which arose in the time of Germany's greatest humiliation: 'If all become untrue, we shall nevertheless remain true.' And likewise we accept the oath: 'We will not break our word, we will not become knaves, we will preach and speak of the Holy German Empire.' With this confidence we shall overcome even the worst."

This confidence was not misplaced and it was fulfilled on March 13th, 1938. It was perhaps a presentiment of future destiny that, as mentioned in the final sentence of the two-volume report of the German Austrian delegation to the Peace Conference, the delegation bearing the terrible document of St. Germain to Vienna made a short stay at Linz on September 12th, 1919, the same place where, nineteen years later, on March 12th, 1938, Adolf Hitler on his triumphal journey to Vienna also stayed and where in the last few days Article 88 of this document was declared null and void.

I. Solemn Adherence of the Austrian Bishops to the German Reich

The following solemn declaration of the Austrian Bishops was sent to Gauleiter Bürckel, the Führer's representative for the plebiscite in Austria, with the following note :

The Archbishop of Vienna. Vienna, March 18th, 1938.

To the Gauleiter.

Dear Sir,

I transmit herewith the enclosed declaration by the Bishops. You will observe that we Bishops have fulfilled our national duty freely and without compulsion. I know that this declaration will be followed by good cooperation.

With the expression of my great respect.

Heil Hitler.

Th. Cardinal Innitzer,
Archbishop.

The solemn declaration is preceded by the following introduction :

Introduction to the Solemn Declaration of the Austrian Bishops with regard to the Plebiscite.

After thorough discussion, we Bishops of Austria, in view of the great historical hours through which the Austrian people are passing, and in the knowledge that in our time the thousand years' longing of our people for union in a great Reich of the Germans is being achieved, have decided to address the following proclamation to all our faithful. We can do so with all the less hesitation as the representative of the Führer for the plebiscite in Austria, Gauleiter Bürckel, has announced his honest line of policy which is to be placed under the motto : "Render unto God the things that are God's, and unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's."

Vienna, March 21st, 1938.

For the Vienna Church District :
Th. Cardinal Innitzer,
Archbishop.

For the Salzburg Church District :
S. Waitz
Prince Archbishop.

The solemn declaration is worded as follows :

Solemn Declaration.

From our innermost conviction and of our free will, we, the undersigned Bishops of the Austrian church province, make the following declaration in view of the great historical events in German Austria. We gladly recognise that the National Socialist movement has done, and is doing, excellent work in the sphere of national and economic reconstruction and social policy for the German Reich and people and particularly for the poorest classes of the population. We are also convinced that, through the effect of the National Socialist movement, the danger of all-disintegrating godless Bolshevism has been warded off.

The Bishops give their blessings to this activity for the future and will also exhort the faithful in this sense. On the day of the plebiscite it is an obvious national duty for us Bishops to confess our adherence as Germans to the German Reich, and we expect of all believing Christians that they should know what they owe to their people.

A Second Note from Cardinal Innitzer to Gauleiter Bürckel.

Against Foreign False Reports.

The Archbishop of Vienna.

Vienna, March 31st, 1938.

To the Gauleiter.

Dear Sir,

I feel impelled to send you some observations in order to clear up and correct a report which has come to my notice and which was published on March 28th by the Berlin Havas representative regarding the proclamation of the Austrian bishops.

The Havas representative writes that this proclamation may be brought into connection with the visit paid by the Papal Nuncio in Berlin to the Reich Foreign Minister von Ribbentrop two days ago.

In reply I wish to state that the solemn declaration of the Bishops is in no way connected with the visit of the Papal Nuncio in Berlin. On the contrary it was a spontaneous action in view of the important historical hour of the reunion of Austria with the German Reich. This is clear from the introduction with which the Bishops prefaced their declaration.

I must also reject the statement by the Havas representative in the same report that the proclamation is to be regarded as a gesture of détente on the part of the Bishops, for I should consider it beneath my dignity to make gestures in such an important historical situation.

I again declare that the statement of the Bishops and our attitude to the plebiscite in general are to be considered solely as a confession arising out of the call of our common German blood.

In addition, I should like to announce to you quite frankly my most sincere wish in these historical days that the declaration of the Bishops may mark a turning point in the religious and cultural life of our entire nation and that it may inaugurate a period of the greatest inner appeasement and reconciliation between the Church, the State and the Party.

I hope that this letter is calculated from the outset to disarm any false and erroneous statements in future, whether spoken or written, from whatever source they may come.

With the expression of my great respect.

Heil Hitler.

II. The Evangelical Church of Austria's Attitude to the April 10th, 1938

Vienna, April 1st, 1938.

The Evangelical Supreme Church Council has decided upon the following declaration regarding the plebiscite of April 10th, 1938 ; it will be read in all evangelical churches on Sunday, April 3rd, 1938 :

"On April 10th the German people of Austria is called upon, in a frank and free plebiscite, to announce to the whole world that the return to the Reich and thereby the political reorganisation of our home country is in accordance with the profoundest longing and desire of our people. Our evangelical church in Austria has always been united in this longing, without regard to the favour or disfavour of former rulers. The Evangelical Supreme Church Council, therefore, in turning today to the members of the Evangelical Church, does so not out of anxiety lest anyone should not know what he has to do on this decisive day. The Evangelical Church in Austria on March 12th and on repeated later occasions has already given expression to its undisguised joy at the historical turn of events. Our church, in its capacity as consoler and helper of many struggling Germans in Austria in the past few years—and that far beyond the members of the church—sympathises with the great joy of these days and accepts it gratefully as a gift of God.

We stand by the saving act of the Führer. The unreserved "Yes" of Evangelical Austria as the reply which the people owe to the Führer is for us merely a self-evident national duty of which we need to remind no one. This "Yes" is an expression of sincere thanks to our gracious God for the salvation and liberation of our home country from that oppression which appeared to bring us back to the times of the counter-reformation.

Evangelical Supreme Church Council
Signed : Dr. Kauer."

THE PLEBISCITE OF APRIL 10TH, 1938

Over 99 % in Favour of the Anschluss and of Adolf Hitler's Policy

"In a few days we have won more than could formerly be achieved after victorious wars. This time, therefore, it must be a sacred election. The whole of Germany must take part. The whole of Germany must proclaim its faith."

(Extract from Adolf Hitler's Speech at Königsberg on March 25th, 1938.)

"The question is often raised as to why a plebiscite must be held regarding the Anschluss. If we had not held an election, certain seekers after truth in Paris, London and Moscow would have gone on for years trying to convince the world that we had violated Austria. But it will now be brought drastically before the eyes of the world that we did not need to use force. We will show the world that Austria came to the Reich not only voluntarily but gladly. Germany thus preserves Wilson's right of self-determination so bombastically announced but subsequently withheld. If the nations are themselves to decide their fate, Austria must also reply Yes or No. We are convinced that the Austrian people will vote with an overwhelming majority for the Reich and against the principles of the dictate of Versailles. But when it is asked why not Austria alone but the entire Reich is to vote, the answer is: We do not want Austria to go to the polls alone. From now onwards German Austria is to have everything in common with the Reich, even its confession of adherence to the Reich. This election will thus be a truly historical election. Germany votes regarding the Reich and at the same time regarding a five-year period of constructive work of the National Socialist regime."

(Extract from Dr. Goebbels' Speech in Berlin on March 24th, 1938.)

In these two statements by the Führer and Chancellor and by the Reich Minister of National Enlightenment and Propaganda, the significance and profound meaning of the plebiscite is clearly set forth.

A sacred, historical election. Sacred, because in a late hour of world history the supreme vital right of a nation is realised, namely the right to live and work together for everything that belongs together by blood and language, inheritance and past history. The action of Adolf Hitler, who brought back his home country to the Reich without shedding a drop of blood was to receive a confirmation which arose not so much out of a great political act as out of the language of the heart. The confession of the 50 millions was to come from the feeling of unity of all Germans in the Reich and in the South Eastern March. Nature was to regain a right that had been withheld. The German people in Austria were to declare: We wish to return to the Reich. The German people within the old frontiers of the Reich were to declare: Welcome to the German Fatherland.

Never in history has such a declaration been made by a great nation with more power, joy and pride: of a total of 49,493,028 persons entitled to vote in Greater Germany, 49,279,104, i.e.

99.57 %, went to the polls. Of these, 48,751,587, or 99.08 %, voted Yes, and 452,170, or 0.92 %, voted No. In Austria alone, out of 4,474,138 entitled to vote, 4,461,778 went to the polls, and of these 4,443,208, or 99.75 %, voted Yes, and 11,807 voted No. In the old Reich, out of a total of 44,749,227, 44,545,586 went to the polls and 44,039,567, or 99.02 %, voted Yes, while 437,252 voted No.

Over 99 % of all voters, therefore, voted in a general, free and secret plebiscite in favour of the Anschluss and of the leadership of Adolf Hitler. 99 %, that is a figure which can no longer be twisted or tampered with. It must obviously appear quite superfluous to apply election arithmetic to this figure or to calculate decimal places or proportions. The same applies to reflections as to whether such a result can be obtained by external pressure or arts of governments.

But this election was also a historical one. A thousand years of struggle, brought by Adolf Hitler in a bold decision to a victorious conclusion, has now become a part of history by the signature of an entire nation. The voice of the German nation in Austria, which was called upon to take part in a free and honest vote, has placed the seal of the free determination of the nation under the laws of March 13th. The German people in the old Reich and in the Land of Austria have confirmed the great historical fact and thus annulled the „Anschluss prohibition" laid down in the dictates of Versailles and St. Germain against the right of self-determination of the nations and at the same time helped that right of self-determination again to conquer. They have legalised the events of March 13th in a form which democracy cannot object to or cast doubt upon. The democracy of the western countries was beaten in Austria on April 10th with its own weapons. Never has an act of world history been accomplished with such general and profound enthusiasm by an entire nation, and never has such an act been approved and confirmed with such unanimity by a whole people. After such a proclamation, how is it possible honestly to speak of a dictatorship, of an act of violence or of an injustice, when all that was done was to remove a dictate imposed nearly twenty years ago, to correct an act of violence and to make good an injustice done. Those who still think they should criticise the methods should rather, in view of the elementary force which was here displayed, reflect what a dangerous game it was to erect these artificial limits, and what a criminal game was played at Versailles and St. Germain when, under the pressure of the bayonets and the hunger blockade, those articles were compulsorily signed which divided the world in unequal parts and thereby prevented concord among the nations. At the present time not only have an injustice and a violation been annulled, but a great national and European evil has been prevented. For if Austria had become a second Spain, almost all the key positions of Europe would have become the subject of warlike debate. To that extent a pacified Europe will be able some day to celebrate the 10th of April 1938 as the date when its consolidation began.

THE ANGLO-ITALIAN AGREEMENT

of April 16th, 1938

L'accordo italo-britannico firmato il 16 aprile 1938

A. PROTOCOL

The Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the Italian Government, animated by the desire to place the relations between the two countries on a solid and lasting basis and to contribute to the general cause of peace and security, have decided to undertake conversations in order to reach agreement on questions of mutual concern; and the said conversations having taken place;

The Earl of Perth, G.C.M.G., C.B., his Majesty's Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary at Rome, and Count Galeazzo Ciano di Cortellazzo, Minister for Foreign Affairs, duly authorised for that purpose by their respective Governments, have drawn up the present Protocol and have signed the Agreements and Declarations annexed hereto, each of which shall be regarded as a separate and self-contained instrument:

1. Reaffirmation of the Declaration of January 1st, 1937, regarding the Mediterranean, and of the Notes exchanged on December 31st, 1936.

2. Agreement regarding the Exchange of Military Information.

3. Agreement regarding certain Areas in the Middle East.

4. Declaration regarding Propaganda.

5. Declaration regarding Lake Tsana.

6. Declaration regarding the Military Duties of Natives of Italian East Africa.

7. Declaration regarding the free Exercise of Religion and the Treatment of British Religious Bodies in Italian East Africa.

8. Declaration regarding the Suez Canal.

The said instruments shall take effect on such date as the two Governments shall together determine.

Except in so far as any of them contain provisions with regard to their revision or duration, each of the said instruments shall remain in force indefinitely, but should either Government at any time consider that a change of circumstances renders the revision of any of these instruments necessary, the two Governments will consult together with a view to such a revision.

The two Governments agree that, immediately after the taking effect of the said instruments, negotiations will be opened, in which the Egyptian Government will be invited to participate so far as all questions affecting Egypt or the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan are concerned, with a view to a definitive agreement on the boundaries between the Sudan, Kenya and British Somaliland on the one side and Italian East Africa on the other; and with regard to other questions affecting reciprocally:

(a) Italian interests on the one hand and British, Egyptian or Sudan interests on the other hand in the above-mentioned territories; and

(b) the relations between those territories

These negotiations will also include the question of commercial relations between the Sudan and Italian East Africa.

It is also agreed that negotiations between the Government of the United Kingdom and the Italian Government will take place as soon as possible on the subject of commercial relations between Italian East Africa and the United Kingdom, India and British colonies, overseas territories, protectorates and man-

A. PROTOCOLLO

Il Governo Italiano e il Governo del Regno Unito di Gran Bretagna e dell'Irlanda del Nord, animati dal desiderio di porre su una base solida e duratura le relazioni tra i due Paesi e di contribuire alla causa generale della pace e della sicurezza, hanno deciso di entrare in conversazioni allo scopo di raggiungere un accordo sulle questioni di mutuo interesse; e le dette conversazioni avendo avuto luogo, Sua Eccellenza il conte Galeazzo Ciano di Cortellazzo, Ministro degli Affari Esteri, e Sua Eccellenza il molto onorevole conte di Perth, G. C. M. G., C. B., Ambasciatore straordinario e plenipotenziario di Sua Maestà Britannica a Roma, debitamente autorizzati all'uopo dai loro rispettivi Governi, hanno redatto il presente Protocollo ed hanno firmato gli Accordi e Dichiarazioni che vi sono annessi, ciascuno dei quali dovrà essere considerato come un atto separato e per sé stante:

1° Conferma della dichiarazione del 2 gennaio 1937, relativa al Mediterraneo, e delle note scambiate il 31 dicembre 1936.

2° Accordo relativo allo scambio di informazioni militari.

3° Accordo relativo a talune zone del Medio Oriente.

4° Dichiarazione relativa alla propaganda.

5° Dichiarazione relativa al Lago Tana.

6° Dichiarazione relativa agli obblighi militari degli indigeni dell'Africa Orientale Italiana.

7° Dichiarazione relativa al libero esercizio della religione e al trattamento degli Enti religiosi britannici in Africa Orientale Italiana.

8° Dichiarazione relativa al Canale di Suez.

Tali atti entreranno in vigore alla data che i due Governi firseranno d'accordo. Ciascuno di essi, a meno che non contenga disposizioni relativamente alla sua revisione o durata, rimarrà in vigore senza limiti di tempo; ma qualora uno dei due Governi in qualunque momento, ritenga che un mutamento di circostanze renda necessaria la revisione di taluno di questi atti, i due Governi si consulteranno allo scopo di procedere a una tale revisione.

I due Governi convengono che, immediatamente dopo l'entrata in vigore dei detti atti, saranno aperti negoziati ai quali il Governo Egiziano sarà invitato a partecipare per quel che riguarda tutte le questioni interessanti l'Egitto o il Sudan anglo-egiziano. In vista di un accordo definitivo sulle frontiere fra il Sudan, il Kenia e la Somalia britannica, da un lato, e l'Africa Orientale Italiana, dall'altro, nonché in relazione ad altre questioni che riguardano reciprocamente: a) interessi italiani, da un lato, e interessi britannici, egiziani e sudanesi, dall'altro, nei territori sopra menzionati, e b) i rapporti fra detti territori, questi negoziati includeranno altresì la questione dei rapporti commerciali tra il Sudan e l'Africa Orientale Italiana.

I due Governi convengono, inoltre, che avranno luogo al più presto possibile negoziati tra il Governo del Regno Unito e il Governo Italiano sulla questione dei rapporti commerciali tra l'A. O. I. e il Regno Unito, l'India, le colonie britanniche, i Territori d'oltremare, i Protettorati ed i Territori sottoposti a mandato amministrati dal Governo del Regno Unito; compresa la questione dell'applicazione, in base a condizioni da stabilirsi, del trattato di commercio e navigazione firmato a Roma il 15 giugno 1883 a tutta l'Africa Orientale Italiana.

Questi negoziati saranno ispirati al comune desiderio di sviluppare i rapporti commerciali tra i predetti territori e di assicurare adeguate facilitazioni al commercio.

dated territories administered by the Government of the United Kingdom, including the subject of the application, on conditions to be established, to the whole of Italian East Africa of the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation signed at Rome on June 15th, 1883.

These negotiations will be inspired by the common desire to further commercial relations between these territories and to ensure adequate facilities for trade.

Done at Rome, in duplicate, April 16th, 1938, in the English and Italian languages, both of which shall have equal force.
Perth,
Ciano.

ANNEX 1

Reaffirmation of the Declaration of January 2nd, 1937, Regarding the Mediterranean, and of the Notes Exchanged on December 31st, 1936.

The Government of the United Kingdom and the Italian Government hereby reaffirm the Declaration signed in Rome on January 2nd, 1937, regarding the Mediterranean, and the Notes exchanged between the two Governments on December 31st, 1936, regarding the status quo in the Western Mediterranean.

Done at Rome, in duplicate, April 16th, 1938, in the English and Italian languages, both of which shall have equal force,
Perth,
Ciano.

ANNEX 2

Agreement Regarding the Exchange of Military Information.

The Government of the United Kingdom and the Italian Government agree that in the month of January each year a reciprocal exchange of information shall take place through the Naval, Military and Air Attachés in London and Rome regarding any major prospective administrative movements or redistribution of their respective naval, military and air forces.

This exchange of information will take place in respect of such forces stationed in or based on:

(1) Overseas possessions of either Party, which phrase shall for this purpose be deemed to include protectorates and mandated territories, in or with a seaboard on the Mediterranean, the Red Sea or the Gulf of Aden; and

(2) Territories in Africa other than those referred to in paragraph (1) above and lying in an area bounded on the west by longitude 20 deg. east and on the south by latitude 7 deg. south.

Such an exchange of information will not necessarily preclude the occasional communication of supplementary military information should either Party consider that the political circumstances of the moment make it desirable.

The two Government further agree to notify each other in advance of any decision to provide new naval or air bases in the Mediterranean east of longitude 19deg east and in the Red Sea or approaches thereto.

Done at Rome, in duplicate, April 16th, 1938, in the English and Italian languages, both of which shall have equal force.
Perth,
Ciano.

Allegato II

Accordo relativo allo scambio di informazioni militari.

Il Governo Italiano e il Governo del Regno Unito conven-gono che nel mese di gennaio di ciascun anno avrà luogo, per tramite degli Addetti militari, navali e aerei, a Londra e a Roma, uno scambio reciproco di informazioni riguardanti qualsiasi rilevante progettato movimento amministrativo o ridistribuzione delle rispettive Forze militari, navali ed aeree.

Questo scambio di informazioni avrà luogo nei riguardi di dette Forze che hanno stanza o base: 1° nei Possedimenti d'oltremare di ciascuna delle due parti (questa frase, ai fini del presente Accordo, sarà considerata come comprendente i Protettorati e i Territori sotto mandato) che si trovano o che hanno coste sul Mediterraneo, il Mar Rosso, o il Golfo di Aden e 2° nei Territori in Africa non nominati nel precedente paragrafo 1° e situati in una zona delimitata all'Ovest dal 20° grado di longitudine Est ed a Sud dal 7° grado di latitudine Sud.

Tale scambio di informazioni non escluderà necessariamente la comunicazione occasionale di informazioni militari supplementari qualora una delle due parti consideri che le circostanze politiche del momento la rendano desiderabile.

I due Governi concordano, inoltre, di notificarsi reciprocamente in anticipo qualsiasi decisione relativa alla istituzione di nuove basi navali od aeree nel Mediterraneo, ad Oriente del 19° grado di longitudine Est, e nel Mar Rosso nei relativi accessi.

Allegato III

Accordo italo-britannico relativo ad alcune zone del Medio Oriente.

Il Governo Italiano ed il Governo del Regno Unito di Gran Bretagna e dell'Irlanda del Nord, essendo desiderosi di assicurare che non vi sarà conflitto tra le loro rispettive politiche in riguardo alle zone del Medio Oriente a cui si riferisce il presente accordo, essendo anzi desiderosi che lo stesso amichevole spirito che ha presieduto alla firma dell'odierno Protocollo e dei documenti a questo annessi abbia anche, ad ispirare le loro relazioni in riguardo a tale zone, hanno convenuto quanto segue:

Art. 1. — Nessuna delle due parti concluderà alcun accordo o intraprenderà alcuna azione che possa in qualsiasi modo compromettere l'indipendenza o l'integrità dell'Arabia saudiana e dello Yemen.

Art. 2. — Nessuna delle due parti opporrà o cercherà di ottenere una posizione privilegiata di carattere politico in qualsiasi territorio che attualmente appartiene all'Arabia saudiana, o allo Yemen, o in qualsiasi territorio che ciascuno di questi Stati potrà in seguito acquistare.

ous of ensuring that there shall be no conflict between their respective policies [in regard to the areas in the Middle East referred to in the present agreement, being desirous, moreover, that the same friendly spirit which has attended the signing of to-day's Protocol, and of the documents annexed thereto, should also animate their relations in regard to those areas, have agreed as follows :

Article 1. — Neither Party will conclude any agreement or take any action which might in any way impair the independence or integrity of Saudi Arabia or of the Yemen.

Article 2. — Neither Party will obtain or seek to obtain a privileged position of a political character in any territory which at present belongs to Saudi Arabia or to the Yemen or in any territory which either of those States may hereafter acquire.

Article 3. — The two Parties recognise that, in addition to the obligations incumbent on each of them in virtue of Articles 1 and 2 hereof, it is in the common interest of both of them that no other Power should acquire or seek to acquire sovereignty or any privileged position of a political character in any territory which at present belongs to Saudi Arabia or to the Yemen or which either of those States may hereafter acquire, including any islands in the Red Sea belonging to either of those States, or in any other islands in the Red Sea to which Turkey renounced her rights by Article 16 of the Treaty of Peace signed at Lausanne on July 24th, 1923.

In particular they regard it as an essential interest of each of them that no other Power should acquire sovereignty or any privileged position on any part of the coast of the Red Sea which at present belongs to Saudi Arabia or to the Yemen or in any of the aforesaid islands.

Article 4. — (1) As regards those islands in the Red Sea to which Turkey renounced her rights by Article 16 of the Treaty of Peace signed at Lausanne on July 24th, 1923, and which are not comprised in the territory of Saudi Arabia or of the Yemen, neither party will in or in regard to any such island :

- (a) establish its sovereignty, or
- (b) erect fortifications or defences.

(2) It is agreed that neither Party will object to :

(a) the presence of British officials at Kamaran for the purpose of securing the sanitary service of the pilgrimage to Mecca in accordance with the provisions of the Agreement concluded at Paris on June 19th, 1926, between the Governments of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and of India, on the one part, and the Government of the Netherlands, on the other part ; it is also understood that the Italian Government may appoint an Italian Medical Officer to be stationed there on the same conditions as the Netherlands Medical Officer under the said Agreement ;

(b) the presence of Italian officials at Great Hanish, Little Hanish and Jebel Zukur for the purpose of protecting the fishermen who resort to those islands ;

(c) the presence at Abu Ail, Centre Peak and Jebel Teir of such persons as are required for the maintenance of the lights on those islands.

Article 5. — (1) The two Parties agree that it is in the common interest of both of them that there shall be peace between Saudi Arabia and the Yemen and within the territories of those States. But, while they will at all times exert their good offices in the cause of peace, they will not intervene in any conflict which, despite their good offices, may break out between or within those States.

(2) The two Parties also recognise that it is in the common interest of both of them that no other Power should intervene in any such conflict.

Art. 3. — Le due parti riconoscono che, in aggiunta agli obblighi che a ciascuna di esse incombono in virtù degli art. 1° e 2° di cui sopra, è nel loro comune interesse che nessuna altra Potenza acquisti o cerchi di acquistare sovranità o qualsiasi posizione privilegiata di carattere politico in qualsiasi territorio che attualmente appartiene all'Arabia saudiana o allo Yemen, o che ciascuno di questi Stati potrà in seguito acquistare, compresa qualsiasi isola del Mar Rosso appartenente all'uno o all'altro di questi Stati, o in qualsiasi altra isola nel Mar Rosso su cui la Turchia ha rinunciato ai suoi diritti con l'art. 16 del Trattato di pace firmato a Losanna il 24 luglio 1923. In particolare esse considerano come un interesse essenziale di ciascuna di esse che nessuna altra Potenza acquisti sovranità o qualsiasi posizione privilegiata su qualsiasi parte della costa del Mar Rosso che attualmente appartiene all'Arabia saudiana o allo Yemen in qualsiasi delle anzidette isole.

Art. 4. — (1) Per quanto si riferisce a quelle Isole del Mar Rosso sulle quali la Turchia ha rinunciato ai suoi diritti con l'art. 16 del Trattato di pace firmato a Losanna il 24 luglio 1923, e che non sono comprese nel territorio dell'Arabia saudiana o dello Yemen, nessuna delle due parti : a) stabilirà la propria sovranità ; b) erigerà fortificazioni o difese su nessuna di dette isole o nei riguardi di esse.

(2) E' convenuto che nessuna delle due parti farà obiezioni : a) alla presenza di funzionari britannici a Camaran allo scopo di assicurare il servizio sanitario del pellegrinaggio alla Mecca, in conformità delle disposizioni nell'accordo concluso a Parigi il 19 giugno 1926 fra il Governo di Gran Bretagna e dell'Irlanda del Nord e il Governo dell'India, da una parte, ed il Governo dei Paesi Bassi, dall'altra parte ; è anche inteso che il Governo Italiano potrà nominare un ufficiale sanitario italiano che vi risiederà nelle stesse condizioni dell'ufficiale sanitario olandese, secondo il detto accordo ; b) alla presenza di funzionari italiani nella Grande Hanish, nella Piccola Hanish e nel Gebel Zukur, allo scopo di proteggere i pescatori che frequentano queste isole ; c) alla presenza ad Abu Ail, Centre Peak e Gebel Tair delle persone che sono necessarie per il mantenimento dei fari in queste isole.

Art. 5. — (1) Le due parti convengono che è nel loro interesse che vi sia pace fra l'Arabia saudiana e lo Yemen ed entro i territori di questi Stati. Tuttavia, pur esercitando in ogni tempo i loro buoni uffici per la causa della pace, esse non interverranno in alcun conflitto che, malgrado i loro buoni uffici, avesse a verificarsi fra questi Stati o entro loro territori.

(2) Le due parti riconoscono anche che è nel loro comune interesse che nessun'altra Potenza intervenga in tali conflitti.

Art. 6. — Per quanto riguarda la zona dell'Arabia situata ad Est ed a Sud degli attuali confini dell'Arabia saudiana e dello Yemen, o di qualsiasi futuro confine che potrà essere stabilito d'accordo tra il Governo del Regno Unito, da una parte, e i Governi dell'Arabia saudiana o dello Yemen, dall'altra :

(1) Il Governo del Regno Unito dichiara che nei territori dei capi arabi sotto la sua protezione entro tale zona : a) nessuna azione sarà intrapresa dal Governo del Regno Unito che possa essere di natura da pregiudicare in qualsiasi modo l'indipendenza o l'integrità dell'Arabia saudiana o dello Yemen (che entrambi le parti si sono impegnate a rispettare nell'art. 1° di cui sopra), in qualsiasi territorio che attualmente appartiene a questi Stati o in ogni altro territorio che potrà essere riconosciuto dal Governo del Regno Unito come appartenente all'uno o all'altro di questi Stati, come risultato di qualsiasi accordo che potrà in seguito essere concluso tra il Governo del Regno Unito e il Governo dell'uno o l'altro di essi ; b) il Governo del Regno Unito non intraprenderà, nè farà in modo che sia intrapreso alcun apprestamento od opera militare all'infuori degli apprestamenti od opere militari di puro carattere difensivo per la difesa dei detti territori o delle comunicazioni fra le differenti parti dell'Impero britannico ; inoltre, il Governo del Regno Unito non arruolerà gli

Article 6. — As regards the zone of Arabia lying to the east and south of the present boundaries of Saudi Arabia and of the Yemen or of any future boundaries which may be established by agreement between the Government of the United Kingdom, on the one hand, and the Governments of Saudi Arabia or of the Yemen, on the other ;

(1) The Government of the United Kingdom declare that in the territories of the Arab rulers under their protection within this zone :

(a) No action shall be taken by the Government of the United Kingdom which shall be such as to prejudice in any way the independence or integrity of Saudi Arabia or of the Yemen—which both Parties have undertaken to respect in Article 1 hereof—within any territory at present belonging to those States or within any additional territory which may be recognised by the Government of the United Kingdom as belonging to either of those States as a result of any agreement which may hereafter be concluded between the Government of the United Kingdom and the Government of either of them.

(b) The Government of the United Kingdom will not undertake, or cause to be undertaken, any military preparations or works other than military preparations or works of a purely defensive character for the defence of the said territories or of the communications between different parts of the British Empire.

Furthermore, the Government of the United Kingdom will not enrol the inhabitants of any of these territories, or cause them to be enrolled, in any military forces other than forces designed and suited solely for the preservation of order and for local defence ;

(c) While the Government of the United Kingdom reserve the liberty to take in these territories such steps as may be necessary for the preservation of order and the development of the country, they intend to maintain the autonomy of the Arab rulers under their protection.

(2) The Italian Government declare that they will not seek to acquire any political influence in this zone.

Article 7. — The Government of the United Kingdom declare that within the limits of the Aden Protectorate as defined in the Aden Protectorate Order, 1937, Italian citizens and subjects—including Italian companies—shall have liberty to come, with their ships and goods, to all places and ports, and they shall have freedom of entry, travel and residence, and the right to exercise there any description of business, profession occupation or industry, so long as they satisfy and observe the conditions and regulations from time to time applicable in the Protectorate to the citizens and subjects and ships of any country not being a territory under the sovereignty, suzerainty, protection or mandate of his Majesty the King of Great Britain, Ireland and the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India.

Article 8. — (1) Should either Party at any time give notice to the other that they consider that a change has taken place in the circumstances obtaining at the time of the entry into force of the present Agreement, such as to necessitate a modification of the provisions of the Agreement, the two Parties will enter into negotiations with a view to the revision or amendment of any of the provisions of the Agreement.

(2) At any time after the expiration of a period of 10 years from the entry into force of this Agreement either Party may notify the other of its intention to determine the Agreement. Any such notification shall take effect three months after the date on which it is made.

abitanti di alcuno di questi territori, nè farà in modo che essi siano arruolati in alcuna forza militare all'infuori delle forze destinate e atte esclusivamente al mantenimento dell'ordine ed alla difesa locale ; c) mentre il Governo del Regno Unito si riserva la libertà di prendere in questi territori quelle disposizioni che potranno essere necessarie per il mantenimento dell'ordine e per lo sviluppo del Paese, esso intende di mantenere l'autonomia dei capi arabi sotto la sua protezione.

(2) Il Governo Italiano dichiara che non cercherà di acquistare alcuna influenza politica in questa zona.

Art. 7. — Il Governo del Regno Unito dichiara che entro i limiti del Protettorato di Aden, come definito nell'Aden protectorate Order 1937, i cittadini e sudditi italiani (comprese le Società italiane) avranno libertà di recarsi, con le loro navi e merci, in tutte le località e porti, e avranno libertà di entrare, viaggiare e risiedere ed il diritto di esercitarvi ogni genere di affari, professioni, occupazioni o industrie, in quanto si conformino ed osservino le condizioni e i regolamenti che sono o saranno applicabili nel Protettorato ai cittadini e sudditi e alle navi di qualsiasi Paese che non sia un territorio sotto la Sovranità, Suzeraineté, Protettorato o Mandato di Sua Maestà il Re di Gran Bretagna, Irlanda e dei Domini britannici al di là dei mari, Imperatore delle Indie.

Art. 8. — 1) Se in qualsiasi momento una delle due parti notificasse all'altra che essa considera che un cambiamento ha avuto luogo nelle circostanze esistenti al momento dell'entrata in vigore del presente Accordo, tale da rendere necessaria una modificazione delle disposizioni dell'Accordo stesso, le due parti entreranno in trattative allo scopo di rivedere o emendare qualsiasi disposizione dell'Accordo.

2) In qualunque momento, dopo spirato il periodo di dieci anni dall'entrata in vigore di questo Accordo, ciascuna delle parti potrà notificare all'altra la sua intenzione di porre fine all'Accordo. Tale notifica avrà effetto tre mesi dopo la data alla quale è stata fatta.

Allegato IV

Dichiarazione relativa alla propaganda.

I due Governi colgono con soddisfazione l'opportunità che fornisce loro la presente occasione di registrare il loro Accordo nel senso che qualsiasi tentativo da parte di uno di essi di impiegare i metodi di pubblicità o propaganda a sua disposizione allo scopo di arrecare danno agli interessi dell'altro sarebbe incompatibile con le buone relazioni che il presente Accordo mira a stabilire e mantenere fra i due Governi ed i popoli dei loro rispettivi Paesi.

Allegato V

Dichiarazione relativa al Lago Tana.

Il Governo Italiano conferma al Governo del Regno Unito l'assicurazione da esso data al Governo del Regno Unito il 3 aprile 1936, e ripetuta dal Ministro italiano degli Affari Esteri all'Ambasciatore di Sua Maestà Britannica a Roma il 31 dicembre 1936, nel senso che il Governo Italiano era pienamente consapevole delle sue obbligazioni verso il Governo del Regno Unito nella questione del Lago Tana e non aveva la benchè minima intenzione di ignorarle o ripudiarle.

Declaration Regarding Propaganda.

The two Governments welcome the opportunity afforded by the present occasion to place on record their agreement that any attempt by either of them to employ the methods of publicity or propaganda at its disposal in order to injure the interests of the other would be inconsistent with the good relations which it is the object of the present Agreement to establish and maintain between the two Governments and the peoples of their respective countries.

Roma, 16 aprile 1938-XVI

Eccellenza,

Nel corso delle nostre recenti conversazioni, V. E. ha menzionato la questione dell'ammontare delle Forze italiane in Libia. Ho l'onore di informare V. E. che il Capo del Governo ha disposto una diminuzione di tali Forze. I ritiri sono già incominciati, in ragione di mille uomini alla settimana, e saranno continuati in ragione non inferiore a tale cifra, finchè gli effettivi italiani between Count Ciano, the Italian Minister of Foreign Affairs, and the Earl of Perth, British Ambassador at Rome, regarding the Question of the Strength of the Italian Forces in Libya, the Policy of the Italian Government in connection with Spain, the Recognition of Italian Sovereignty over Ethiopia and the Accession of the Italian Government to the Naval Treaty of March 25th, 1936.

B. AGREEMENTS

SIGNED IN THE FORM OF AN EXCHANGE OF NOTES

Ministry for Foreign Affairs.

Rome, April 16th, 1938.

To His Excellency the Most Honourable Earl of Perth,
Ambassador of His British Majesty at Rome.

Your Excellency,—During our recent conversations Your Excellency has referred to the question of the strength of the Italian forces in Libya.

I have the honour to inform Your Excellency that the Head of the Government has given orders for a diminution of these forces. Withdrawals have already begun at the rate of 1,000 a week and will be continued at not less than this rate until the Italian Libyan effectives reach peace strength.

This will constitute an ultimate diminution of these effectives by not less than half the numbers present in Libya when our conversations commenced.

I avail myself of this opportunity to convey to Your Excellency the expression of my highest consideration.

Rome, April 16th, 1938.

To His Excellency Count Galeazzo Ciano, Minister for Foreign Affairs at Rome.

Your Excellency,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of Your Excellency's Note of to-day's date in which Your Excellency informed me of the intentions of the Head of the Italian Government with regard to the progressive diminution of the Italian forces in Libya.

I shall have pleasure in communicating this information to his Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom.

I avail myself of this opportunity to convey to Your Excellency the expression of my highest consideration.

Eccellenza,

Vostra Eccellenza ricorderà che nel corso delle nostre recenti conversazioni io detti a V. E. alcune assicurazioni relative alla politica del Governo Italiano in connessione con la Spagna. Desidero ora di confermare queste assicurazioni e darne formalmente atto.

In primo luogo, il Governo Italiano ha l'onore di confermare la sua piena adesione alla formula del Governo del Regno Unito per l'evacuazione proporzionale dei volontari stranieri dalla Spagna e si impegna a dare pratica e leale esecuzione a tale evacuazione nel momento e alle condizioni che saranno determinate dal Comitato di nonintervento, sulla base della formula suddetta.

In secondo luogo, desidero confermare che se tale evacuazione non è stata completata al momento in cui avrà termine la guerra civile in Spagna, tutti i restanti volontari italiani lasceranno immediatamente il territorio spagnolo e tutto il materiale da guerra italiano sarà ritirato contemporaneamente.

In terzo luogo, desidero ripetere la mia precedente assicurazione che il Governo Italiano non ha alcuna mira territoriale o politica e non cerca alcuna posizione economica privilegiata nella Spagna metropolitana, nelle isole Baleari, in alcuno dei Possedimenti spagnoli di oltremare, o nella zona spagnola del Marocco, o nei riguardi dei suddetti territori, e che non ha alcuna intenzione di mantenere qualsiasi Forza armata in alcuno dei territori suddetti.

Eccellenza,

In risposta alla nota odierna n. 3515 di V. E., ho l'onore di prendere nota della conferma in essa contenuta delle assicurazioni che V. E. mi ha dato nel corso delle nostre recenti conversazioni circa la politica del Governo Italiano in connessione con la Spagna. Il Governo di Sua Maestà Britannica nel Regno Unito, al quale non mancherò di trasmettere tale comunicazione, proverà, ne sono sicuro, soddisfazione per il contenuto di essa. A questo proposito occorre appena che io ricordi a V. E. che il Governo di Sua Maestà Britannica considera il regolamento della

Ministry for Foreign Affairs.

Rome, April 16th, 1938.

To His Excellency the Most Honourable Earl of Perth,
Ambassador of His British Majesty at Rome.

Your Excellency,—Your Excellency will remember that, in the course of our recent conversations, I gave Your Excellency certain assurances regarding the policy of the Italian Government in connection with Spain. I now wish to reaffirm those assurances and to place them on record.

First, the Italian Government have the honour to confirm their full adherence to the United Kingdom formula for the proportional evacuation of the foreign volunteers from Spain, and pledge themselves to give practical and real application to such an evacuation at the moment and on the conditions which shall be determined by the Non-Intervention Committee on the basis of the above-mentioned formula.

I desire secondly to reaffirm that if this evacuation has not been completed at the moment of the termination of the Spanish civil war, all remaining Italian volunteers will forthwith leave Spanish territory and all Italian war-material will simultaneously be withdrawn.

I wish thirdly to repeat my previous assurance that the Italian Government have no territorial or political aims, and seek no privileged economic position, in or with regard to either Metropolitan Spain, the Balearic Islands, any of the Spanish possessions overseas, or the Spanish zone of Morocco, and that they have no intention whatever of keeping any armed forces in any of the said territories.

I avail myself of this opportunity to convey to Your Excellency the expression of my highest consideration.

Your Excellency,—In reply to Your Excellency's Note of to-day's date, I have the honour to take note of the reaffirmation contained therein of the assurances which Your Excellency has already given me, during the course of our recent conversations, regarding the policy of the Italian Government in connection with Spain.

His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, to whom I shall not fail to transmit this communication, will, I feel sure, be gratified at its contents. In this connection I hardly need to remind Your Excellency that his Majesty's Government regard a settlement of the Spanish question as a prerequisite of the entry into force of the agreement between our two Governments.

I have further the honour to inform Your Excellency that his Majesty's Government, being desirous that such obstacles as may at present be held to impede the freedom of member States as regards recognition of Italian sovereignty over Ethiopia should be removed, intend to take steps at the forthcoming meeting of the Council of the League of Nations for the purpose of clarifying the situation of member States in this regard.

C. ACCORDO DI BUON VICINATO

fra il Governo Italiano, il Governo del Regno Unito e il Governo Egiziano.

Il Governo Italiano, da una parte, e, dall'altra, il Governo del Regno Unito di Gran Bretagna e dell'Irlanda del Nord per il Kenia e la Somalia britannica ed il Governo del Regno Unito e il Governo Egiziano per il Sudan;

desiderosi di assicurare relazioni amichevoli nell'Africa Orientale;

si impegnano, oltre che a procedere a tempo debito alla discussione delle questioni particolareggiate connesse con le frontiere tra l'Africa Orientale Italiana e il Sudan, il Kenia e la Somalia britannica, come stabilito nel Protocollo firmato in data odierna dal Governo Italiano e dal Governo del Regno Unito, a cooperare in ogni tempo al mantenimento di relazioni di buon vicinato fra i detti territori e di cercare con ogni mezzo in loro potere di impedire che vengano effettuate incursioni o altri atti illegali di violenza attraverso le frontiere di ognuno dei suddetti territori;

convengono che, tenuto conto che, in virtù del decreto italiano del 12 aprile 1936, la schiavitù fu abolita in Etiopia, così come essa era già stata abolita negli altri territori sopra menzionati, nelle relazioni di buon vicinato di cui al paragrafo

Naval Treaty signed in London on March 25th, 1936, in accordance with the procedure laid down in Article 31 of that Treaty.

This accession will take place so soon as the instruments annexed to the Protocol signed this day come into force.

In advising Your Excellency of the foregoing I desire to add that the Italian Government intend in the meantime to act in conformity with the provisions of the aforesaid Treaty.

I avail myself of this opportunity to convey to Your Excellency the expression of my highest consideration.

C. GOOD NEIGHBOURLY RELATIONS

Between the Government of the United Kingdom, the Egyptian Government, and the Italian Government.

The Italian Government on the one hand and, on the other hand, in respect of Kenya and British Somaliland, the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and, in respect of the Sudan, the Government of the United Kingdom and the Egyptian Government, desiring to provide for friendly relations in East Africa ;

Undertake, in addition to proceeding in due course to the discussion of detailed questions connected with the frontiers between Italian East Africa and the Sudan, Kenya and British Somaliland as provided in the Protocol signed to-day by the Government of the United Kingdom and the Italian Government, at all times to co-operate for the preservation of good neighbourly relations between the said territories and to endeavour by every means in their power to prevent raids or other unlawful acts of violence being carried out across the frontiers of any of the above-mentioned territories ;

Agree that in view of the fact that by virtue of the Italian Decree of April 12th, 1936, slavery was prohibited in Ethiopia, as it had already been abolished in the other above-mentioned territories, the good neighbourly relations referred to above shall include co-operation to prevent the evasion of the anti-slavery laws of the respective territories ;

Agree that nationals of the other Party shall not be enrolled in the native troops, bands or formations of a military nature maintained in the above-mentioned territories, including in particular any such nationals who are deserters from the troops, bands or formations maintained in, or refugees from, the territories of the other Party.

In witness whereof, the undersigned, duly authorised thereto by their respective Governments, have signed the present Agreement.

D. EXCHANGE OF TELEGRAMS

between Neville Chamberlain, British Prime Minister, and and Signor Mussolini, Head of the Italian Government, April 16th, 1938.

Mr. Chamberlain to Signor Mussolini:

I am delighted to learn from Lord Perth of the successful outcome of the conversations between our two Governments, and I would like to say how much I and my colleagues have appreciated the spirit of good will and cooperation which has been applied to our discussions by your Excellency, Count Ciano, and all concerned upon the Italian side.

It is a matter of sincere satisfaction to me, as I am sure it is also to your Excellency, that such a comprehensive agreement has been reached between us. I hope that this agreement, when it comes into full operation, will dispose of all outstanding points of difference between us, and I confidently expect that thereafter the relations between our two countries will once again be found firmly based on the confidence and friendship which so long existed in the past.

Signor Mussolini to Mr. Chamberlain:

I thank you warmly for your message.

I am indeed glad that Anglo-Italian conversations have so happily ended and that the agreement reached gives you as it does me full satisfaction both as regards its scope and the spirit underlying it. It is a pleasure to me to assure you that I have sincerely appreciated the good will and cordial spirit of understanding which your Excellency has shown. I have equally appreciated work done by Lord Perth and by all those who have contributed to realization of agreement.

To have settled in so frank and full a fashion questions outstanding between us places the relations between England and Italy on a solid and durable basis.

I am convinced that there can now be opened between the two countries a new period of confidence and friendship which is what you and I desire and which accords with our traditional relationship.

Ho inoltre l'onore di informare l'E. V. che il Governo di S. M. Britannica da parte sua dichiara che è d'accordo che le assicurazioni ad esso date nella sopra trascritta Dichiarazione, relative al Lago Tana, si applicano ugualmente al Governo Egiziano.

Mi valgo della presente occasione per inviare a V. E. l'espressione della mia alta considerazione. Perth.

Légation de S.M. le Roi d'Egyte. à Rome, a S.E. il Molto Onorevole Conte di Perth G.C.M.G., G.B., Ambasciatore di S.M. Britannica, Roma. Roma, 16 aprile 1938.

Eccellenza,

Ho l'onore di accusare ricevuta della lettera di V. E., in data odierna, del seguente tenore:

« Ho l'onore d'informare l'E. V. che è stata firmata oggi dal Ministro italiano degli Affari Esteri e da me la seguente dichiarazione relativa al Lago Tana, che costituisce l'allegato cinque al Protocollo che il conte Ciano ed io abbiamo pure firmato oggi: « Il Governo Italiano conferma al Governo del Regno Unito l'assicurazione da esso data al Governo del Regno Unito il 3 aprile 1936 e ripetuta dal Ministro italiano degli Affari Esteri all'Ambasciatore di S. M. Britannica a Roma il 31 dicembre 1936 nel senso che il Governo Italiano era pienamente consapevole delle sue obbligazioni verso il Governo del Regno Unito nella questione del Lago Tana e non aveva la benchè minima intenzione d'ignorarle o ripudiarle ».

Ho inoltre l'onore d'informare l'E. V. che il Governo di S. M. Britannica da parte sua dichiara che è d'accordo che le assicurazioni ad esso date nella sopra trascritta Dichiarazione, relative al Lago Tana, si applicano ugualmente al Governo Egiziano ».

Sarò lieto di comunicare questa informazione al Governo Egiziano.

Mi valgo della presente occasione per rinnovare all'E. V. l'espressione della mia più alta considerazione.

D. LO SCAMBIO TELEGRAFICO DI MESSAGGI fra Mussolini, il Capo di Governo italiano e Chamberlain, il Presidente del ministero britannico

Roma, 16 aprile, notte

Chamberlain al Duce:

« Sono molto lieto del felice risultato delle conversazioni fra i nostri due Governi e desidero dirVi quanto sia stato apprezzato da me e dai miei colleghi lo spirito di buona volontà e di collaborazione che è stato portato nelle nostre discussioni da V. E., dal conte Ciano e da tutti coloro che dal lato italiano vi hanno preso parte.

« E' per me ragione di sincera soddisfazione, come, ne sono sicuro, lo è anche per V. E., che un accordo di così ampia portata sia stato raggiunto fra noi. Spero che quando quest'accordo avrà la sua piena applicazione, scompariranno fra noi tutti i punti di divergenza e confido che d'ora innanzi le relazioni fra i nostri due Paesi saranno di nuovo saldamente basate sulla fiducia e sull'amicizia che per tanto tempo sono esistite nel passato. »

Il Duce a Chamberlain:

« Vi ringrazio cordialmente del Vostro messaggio. Sono lieto che le conversazioni anglo-italiane si siano felicemente concluse e che l'accordo raggiunto, per la sua portata e i suoi intendimenti, sia di piena soddisfazione per Voi come lo è per me. Mi è grato di aggiungerVi che ho sinceramente apprezzato la buona volontà e il cordiale spirito di intesa di V. E. e l'opera svolta da lord Perth e da tutti coloro che hanno contribuito alla realizzazione dell'accordo.

« L'aver regolato in maniera così franca e così ampia le questioni che erano aperte tra noi pone i rapporti fra l'Inghilterra e l'Italia sopra una base ferma e duratura. Sono convinto che potrà aversi fra i due Paesi un nuovo periodo di fiduciosa amicizia quale Voi e io auspichiamo e quale è nelle tradizioni dei nostri rapporti. »

For the sake of completeness, we also reproduce the text of the Mediterranean Agreement of January 2nd, 1937 and the exchange of notes between Count Ciano and Sir Eric Drummond (now Earl of Perth) of December 31st, 1936, to which reference is made in Annex I of the Protocol.

E. THE MEDITERRANEAN AGREEMENT
(Gentlemen's Agreement between the United Kingdom and Italy of January 2nd, 1937.)

Rome, January 2nd, 1937.

His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom and the Italian Government :

Animated by the desire to contribute increasingly, in the interests of the general cause of peace and security, to the betterment of relations between them and between all the Mediterranean Powers, and resolved to respect the rights and interests of those Powers.

Recognise that the freedom of entry into, exit from, and transit through the Mediterranean is a vital interest both to the different parts of the British Empire and to Italy, and that these interests are in no way inconsistent with each other ;

Disclaim any desire to modify, or, so far as they are concerned, to see modified, the status quo as regards national sovereignty of territory in the Mediterranean area ;

Undertake to respect each other's rights and interests in the said area ;

Agree to use their best endeavours to discourage any activities liable to impair the good relations which it is the object of the present declaration to consolidate.

This declaration is designed to further the ends of peace, and is not directed against any other Power.

Text of the Notes exchanged in Rome on December 31st, 1936, between his Majesty's Ambassador and the Italian Minister for Foreign Affairs.

(a) Note of the British Ambassador, Sir Eric Drummond, to Count Ciano, the Italian Minister for Foreign Affairs :

Your Excellency,—The Royal Italian Government may perhaps be aware that the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was asked in the House of Commons on December 16 whether he would lay upon the table of the House the precise terms of the guarantee given to his Majesty's Government by the Government of Italy concerning occupation of the Balearic Islands by Italian subjects.

To this question Mr. Eden replied that the assurances to which reference was made were given verbally. He proceeded to state that his Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires in Rome, acting on instructions, informed the Italian Minister for Foreign Affairs on September 12th that "any alteration of the status quo in the Western Mediterranean would be a matter of the closest concern to his Majesty's Government."

Mr. Eden continued that, taking note of this communication, the Italian Minister for Foreign Affairs had assured Mr. Ingram that the Italian Government had not, either before or since the revolution in Spain, engaged in any negotiations with General Franco whereby the status quo in the Western Mediterranean would be altered, nor would they engage in any such negotiations in the future. This assurance, the Secretary of State added, was subsequently reaffirmed spontaneously to the British Naval Attaché in Rome by the Italian Ministry of Marine, and the Italian Ambassador in London had on several occasions given to the Secretary of State similar verbal assurances.

In view of these assurances, his Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom assume that, so far as Italy is concerned, the integrity of the present territories of Spain shall in all circumstances remain intact and unmodified. They would, however, be grateful if your Excellency saw your way formally to confirm the accuracy of this assumption, and I have accordingly the honour to inquire whether your Excellency could supply me with such confirmation.

I avail myself of the opportunity to convey to your Excellency the expression of my highest consideration.

(b) Note of Count Ciano, Minister for Foreign Affairs, to Sir Eric Drummond, British Ambassador :

Your Excellency,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Excellency's Note of to-day's date in which you draw my attention to a question asked in the House of Commons on December 16th last, and the reply given, by Mr. Eden, on the subject of the assurances given verbally by the Royal Italian Government concerning the status quo in the Western Mediterranean.

You reminded me that in taking note of the communication made by his Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires on September 12th I assured Mr. Ingram that the Italian Government had not, either before or since the revolution in Spain, engaged in any negotiations with General Franco whereby the status quo in the Western Mediterranean would be altered, nor would they engage in any such negotiations in the future.

I have, consequently, no difficulty, on behalf of the Royal Italian Government, in confirming the accuracy of his Majesty's Government's assumption—namely, that, so far as Italy is concerned, the integrity of the present territories of Spain shall in all circumstances remain intact and unmodified.

I avail myself of this opportunity to convey to your Excellency the expression of my highest consideration.

THE PREVIOUS HISTORY OF THE AGREEMENT of April 16th, 1938

Retirement of Mr. Eden, Britain Foreign Secretary, on February 20th, 1938, and the Change in Mr. Chamberlain's Italian Policy.

Extract from Mr. Eden's Speech in the House of Commons on February 21st, 1938.

I stand before the House to-day to give the House in a few brief sentences an account of my reasons for having resigned the office of Foreign Secretary.

First, let me make plain the ultimate aim of us all. The objective of the foreign policy of this country is and must always be the maintenance of peace. If, however, peace is to be enduring it must rest on foundations of frank reciprocity and mutual respect. If we accept this basis for our foreign policy, it follows that we must be ready to negotiate with all countries, whatever their form of government, in order to promote international understanding. But we must also be watchful that in our conception of such negotiations and in the method by which we seek to further them, we are in fact strengthening, not undermining, the foundations upon which international confidence rests.

So I come, with that introduction, to the immediate issue which unhappily divides me from my colleagues. It will be known to the House that certain exchanges of view have been taking place between the Italian Government and his Majesty's Government in respect of the opening of conversations between the two Governments. Indeed, his Majesty's Government have been committed to the principle of such conversations ever since the Prime Minister himself exchanged letters with Signor Mussolini last summer. There is no dispute anywhere about that.

The immediate issue is as to whether such official conversations should be opened in Rome now. It is my conviction that the attitude of the Italian Government to international problems in general, and to this country in particular, is not yet such as to justify this course. The ground has been in no respect prepared. Propaganda against this country by the Italian Government is rife throughout the world. I am myself pledged to this House not to open conversations with Italy until this hostile propaganda ceases. I do not want to stress the personal position, which is relatively unimportant, but I might mention in passing the difficult position in which I must have been placed had I to announce in existing conditions to this House the opening of such conversations.

Moreover, little progress in fact, though much in promise, has yet been made with the solution of the Spanish problem. Let me make it plain. I do not suggest, and I would not advocate, that the Government should refuse conversations with the Italian Government, or indeed with any other Government which shows any disposition to conversations with us for the betterment of international understandings; yet we must be convinced that the conditions in which these conversations take place are such as to make for the likelihood, if not for the certainty, of their success. In my judgment those conditions do not exist to-day.

I am compelled for a few moments, if the House will allow me, to review the past, for this situation has a background. We have made—while I was privileged to be Foreign Secretary I was responsible for—several attempts in the past 18 months to better our relations with Italy. They have all failed in the main, though not wholly, because of the Spanish problem. In January of last year, after difficult negotiations, we signed the Anglo-Italian Agreement. Within a very few days, indeed almost simultaneously, the first considerable consignment of Italians left for Spain. It may be held that this was not a breach of the letter of our understanding, but no one, I think, surely will contend that it did not run counter to its spirit.

That same agreement contained a specific clause dealing with the cessation of propaganda, yet propaganda was scarcely dimmed for an instant. Again, last summer, the Prime Minister and Signor Mussolini exchanged letters, and after that in a few days the relations between our two countries took a marked turn for the better. Of that there can be no doubt.

Then what happened? Then ensued the incidents in the Mediterranean with which the House is familiar and the glorification by the head of the Italian Government of the victories of Italian forces in Spain. My submission is that we cannot risk a further repetition of these experiences. Therefore, it is my contention that before his Majesty's Government open official conversations in Rome with the Italian Government, conversations which have, and rightly have, as an objective not only an improvement of Anglo-Italian relations, but appeasement in the Mediterranean as a whole—before that can be done we must make further progress with the Spanish problem; we must agree not only on the need for withdrawal and on the conditions of withdrawal. We have had assurances enough of that in the past. We must go farther and show the world not only promise, but achievement. The withdrawal must have begun in earnest before those conversations in Rome can be held on a really solid basis of good will, which is essential to success.

In the light—my judgment may well be wrong—of the present international situation this is a moment for this country to stand firm and not to plunge into negotiations unprepared with the full knowledge that the chief obstacle to their success has not been resolved.

The programme which I have outlined seems to me a not unreasonable programme. Indeed, if the desire of the two parties be to reach agreement on all subjects outstanding between them, including Spain, I am quite confident that it is the best method to pursue. It is the traditional method of diplomacy to prepare for conversations before they are formally opened. It is seldom right to depart from that traditional method, which has been tested by time and experience.

It is certainly never right to do so because one party to the negotiations intimates that it is now or never. Agreements that are worth while are never made on the basis of a threat. Nor in the past has this country been willing to negotiate in such conditions. I repeat that if our objective is to promote a Mediterranean agreement, to promote lasting appeasement, then the method which I have described is not only the best, but the only one possible, and the only one consonant with our position in the world.

I may be told that by insisting that positive progress must be made with the Spanish question before formal conversations are opened between his Majesty's Government and the Italian Government in Rome, I am asking one party to the negotiations to yield in advance certain advantages that that party now enjoys. I shall not for one moment seek to argue whether those advantages, if indeed they be advantages, are legitimate ones. But it has never entered into my conception to suggest that the Italian forces should be withdrawn from Spain alone, but only that the Italian Government should agree and carry out with others a fair scheme for the proportionate withdrawal of all foreigners from Spain.

I am conscious—that is, of course, why I stand here—that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and my colleagues take another view. They believe in their policy, and they believe in their method, and they may be right. But if they are right their chances of success will certainly be enhanced if their policy is pursued by another Foreign Secretary, one who has complete conviction in the methods which he is being asked to employ. It may even be that my resignation will facilitate the course of those negotiations. If so, nobody will be more pleased than I.

I have spoken to the House of the immediate difference that has divided me from my colleagues. Moreover, it has recently become clear to me, and I think to the Prime Minister, that there is between us a real difference of outlook and method.

My right hon. friend has strong views on foreign policy, and I respect him for it. And I have strong views, too. Since we are, as I know, both of us conscious that those views have resulted in a divergence, not of aim, but of outlook, and of approach, it is clearly in the national interest that unity should be restored at the earlier possible moment.

Mr. Chamberlain's Reply

In order that the House may have before it as complete a picture as possible of the events which have led up to the present situation I must ask for their indulgence while I endeavour to state once again my own views upon certain aspects of foreign policy—views which have never altered and which have been shared by all my colleagues. On a former occasion I described that policy as being based upon three principles. First, on the protection of British interests and the lives of British nationals. Secondly, on the maintenance of peace and so far as we can impose it the settlement of differences by peaceful means and not by force; and, thirdly, the promotion of friendly relations with other nations who are willing to reciprocate our friendly feelings and who will keep those rules of international conduct without which there can be neither security nor stability.

It is not enough to lay down general principles. If we truly desire peace it is, in my opinion, necessary to make a sustained effort to ascertain and if possible to remove the causes which threaten peace and which now for many months have kept Europe in a state of tension and anxiety.

I cannot believe that with a little good will and determination it is not possible to remove genuine grievances and to clear away suspicions which may be entirely unfounded. For these reasons then my colleagues and I have been anxious to find some opportunity of entering upon conversations with the two European countries with which we have been at variance—namely, Germany and Italy—in order that we might find out whether there was any common ground on which we might build up a general scheme of appeasement in Europe.

It is not necessary now to enter upon a discussion upon our relations with Germany because it is not over those that this difference has arisen. I would only observe that the visit of the Lord President of the Council to Germany marked the first attempt to explore the ground and that we hope in the light of the information which we then obtained to pursue that matter further at a convenient opportunity.

In the case of Italy there has been what my right hon. friend alluded to as a gentleman's agreement of January, 1937, an agreement which it was hoped was going to be the first step in the clearing up of the situation between ourselves and the Italian Government. Unfortunately there intervened the events to which my right hon. friend has alluded in Spain. Nevertheless there remained good reason for continuing to watch to see whether a suitable opportunity might arise in order to improve relations.

Towards the end of July, after a speech which was made by the Foreign Secretary in the House of Commons on the 19th of that month, the Italian Ambassador (Count Grandi) informed my right hon. friend that that speech had made an excellent impression in Italy and that the situation seemed to be so much easier that he was encouraged to deliver to me as Prime Minister a message which Signor Mussolini had authorized him to make use of when he thought that the moment was propitious.

Accordingly, I arranged for Count Grandi to come to see me on July 27th. The message which he brought me from Signor Mussolini was of a friendly character. I felt that we were presented with an opportunity for improving our relations which ought not to be missed. Accordingly, I decided to take what I considered then and what I consider now to be the course which was best calculated to serve the purpose—namely, to put aside ordinary diplomatic formalities and to send a personal reply in cordial terms by way of response.

I was glad to receive from Signor Mussolini immediately a reply in which he expressed his own sincere wish to restore good relations between our two countries, and his agreement with the suggestion that conversations should be entered upon in order to ensure the desired understanding between the two countries. This latter was followed up by instructions to our ambassador in Rome to inform the Italian Government that it was hoped that conversations might begin in September.

Unfortunately, certain incidents took place in the Mediterranean which in our opinion rendered it impossible that conversations at that time could have any chance of success. Nevertheless, it is well to remember something which my right hon. friend omitted to mention in his account of past history—namely, that he was successful at Nyon in arriving at an agreement with the Italian Government about the patrolling of the Mediterranean.

Once more I hoped that this agreement might be followed by further discussions upon the Spanish situation, which in turn would open up the way for those conversations which had been the subject of the correspondence between Signor Mussolini and myself. There once again I was disappointed and the situation became clouded by the difficulties experienced in the Non-Intervention Committee over the withdrawal of volunteers, difficulties which did not arise in one quarter only—and when Italy later gave notice of her intention to leave the League it was difficult to see how the conversations could proceed.

I think it is well to consider how these successive obstacles to conversations affected the situation as between Italy and ourselves. It cannot be denied that during all those months which have elapsed since the original interchange of letters between Signor Mussolini and myself the state of Anglo-Italian relations had seriously and steadily deteriorated. It has always seemed to me that in dealing with foreign countries we do not give ourselves a chance of success unless we try to understand their mentality, which is not always the same as our own.

It was in these circumstances, in a steadily worsening atmosphere overhanging our relations with Italy, that a fresh opportunity arose to break out of this vicious circle. It arose on the 10th of this month. Following on some amiable conversations between the Italian Ambassador and my right hon. friend, the Ambassador called at the Foreign Office and stated that these conversations had been sincerely welcomed in Rome and that he had been instructed to report that the Italian Government was ready at any time to open conversations with us. He added that he desired the conversations to be as wide as possible, embracing, of course, the question of the formal recognition of the Abyssinian conquest but also not excluding Spain.

In reply, the Foreign Secretary pointed out that we in this country were bound to act as loyal members of the League, but, he added, that it seemed to him that the attitude of the League, and especially that of the Mediterranean Powers, would no doubt be considerably influenced by the fact, if fact it came to be, that we and the Italian Government had come to an agreement which was a real contribution to the general appeasement. My right hon. friend emphasized that this was a factor which would have great weight with public opinion, not only in this country but also in France and in the other Mediterranean States, and, which is important, in the United States of America also.

In all this my right hon. friend was not merely expressing his own personal opinion; he was speaking for the Government as a whole, and those views which he expressed to the Italian Ambassador were particularly co-incidental with the views that I hold myself. I have always taken the view, for instance, that the question of the formal recognition of the Italian position in Abyssinia was one that could only be morally justified if it was found to be a factor—and an essential factor—in a general appeasement.

That was the view of all of us, including my right hon. friend, and it will be seen that the trend of this conversation, which I have just reported, was definitely favourable to a further discussion which would include all outstanding questions, including the question of Abyssinia. All outstanding questions, it is important to realize, did include the question of Abyssinia, and I emphasize this because of the point of view that has been expressed by my noble friend. I am sure the House will not have failed to notice that in his view the issue is one quite different from that which was put forward by my right hon. friend.

Let me remind the House that my right hon. friend said quite clearly—I took his words down at the time—that the issue is “Should conversations be opened in Rome now”? That is not the attitude of my noble friend. He says that this is not a question of detail; this is a question of fundamental principle. He went on to say that that fundamental principle was the principle of international good faith.

If that is the principle upon which my noble friend found it necessary to separate himself from us now, what has happened to alter the position since this conversation which I have described to the House? There was no reason why we should not proceed in due course to discuss with Italy upon all outstanding questions.

A week later our Ambassador in Rome reported a conversation with the Italian Foreign Minister at which the latter had told him he had instructed Count Grandi to urge earnestly that an early start should be made with the conversations. On the same day I suggested to my right hon. friend that it would be useful if he and I had a talk with Count Grandi. My right hon. friend in his statement was anxious to put the situation as objectively as he possibly could, but I must ask him to forgive me if I say that at one point he was not quite fair. He represented to the House that the Italian Government had called on us to enter on conversations now or never, and that we were being asked to submit to a threat. There is nothing in any of the communications which passed between us and the Italian Government which, in my judgment, would justify that description.

I repeat that in my judgment, and I am sure I can say in the judgment of my colleagues—with the exception of my right hon. friend—nothing that has been said on behalf of the Italian Government would justify anybody in saying that they have used threats. It is therefore not fair to the House to suggest that they are being asked to submit to demands from another Government to which it would be derogatory to our dignity to submit.

I have stated that they informed us of their earnest desire that conversations should start as soon as possible, and it was on the expression of that desire that the conversation between the Italian Ambassador, the Foreign Secretary, and myself took place. The Foreign Secretary concurred in my suggestion, but later in the day sent me a note asking me not to commit the Government to anything specific during the conversation. As a matter of fact I did abstain from anything of the kind. When the conversation was over the Foreign Secretary and I discussed what were the conclusions that should be drawn from it. It was then, as it seemed to me, that for the first time our differences became acute. This was on Friday. I was convinced that a rebuff to the Italian expression of their desire that conversations should start at once would be taken by them as a confirmation of those suspicions which I have described—suspicions that we had never really been in earnest about the conversations at all.

I thought that if that were the effect the result would be disastrous. It would be followed by an intensification of anti-British feeling in Italy, rising to a point at which ultimately war between us might become inevitable. Moreover, I was equally convinced that once the conversations had started we should find good effects of the new atmosphere in many places, and notably in Spain, where the chief difficulty between us had lain for so long.

The Foreign Secretary, on the other hand, was unable to agree to any immediate decision. He wished to say in reply that in the opinion of his Majesty's Government the moment for the official opening of conversations was not appropriate, and that we wished to wait until a substantial withdrawal of volunteers had taken place. In particular, he insisted that we ought to have some indication from the Italian Government, such as their acceptance of the British formula for the withdrawal of volunteers from Spain—which he pointed out had been waiting for Italian acceptance for some considerable time—before we committed ourselves even to conversations. But when I asked him whether, if such acceptance could be obtained from the Italians, he would then be able to agree to the commencement of the conversations, he made it clear that his objections would still remain.

In these circumstances, with the full concurrence, and at the desire, of the Foreign Secretary I decided to summon the Cabinet for Saturday afternoon, the next day. I informed Count Grandi that I could not give him our final decision until to-day but that in the meantime it would be helpful if he could obtain from his Government such an assurance as the Foreign Secretary had spoken of. I need not recite in detail the subsequent events of Saturday and Sunday. I think the House already knows that when the Cabinet had heard the views of my right hon. friend and myself their views leaned to my side rather than to his.

That is the end of my account of the differences between my right hon. friend on the one hand and my colleagues and me on the other on this particular issue.

There remains a further brief chapter of history which I must now relate. This morning I received a call from the Italian Ambassador in accordance with the arrangement made when we parted on Friday last. He had been in communication with his Government over the week-end, and he began by informing me that he had received from them a communication which I think I had better read to the House. It is as follows :

"The Italian Ambassador informs the Prime Minister that he has submitted to the Italian Government the proposals suggested at their meeting of last Friday and is glad to convey to him the Italian Government's acceptance of the British formula concerning the withdrawal of foreign volunteers and the granting of belligerent rights."

I have not the formula with me but I think the House is familiar with it. I think I can say that in handing me this communication the Italian Ambassador intimated that I was to regard it as a gesture on the part of his Government indicating the spirit of good will and good feeling in which they would wish to begin our conversations.

The hon. member for Plaistow says : "When they knew that the Foreign Secretary had gone." I asked the Italian Ambassador when he received this communication, and he informed me that he had received it on Sunday morning. I then informed the Ambassador, following on the meeting of the Cabinet, that I was happy to say we were ready to begin conversations and that the Italian Government would be so informed at once.

At the same time I told the Ambassador that I wished to impress upon him certain points. First of all, I told him that the British Government regarded a settlement of the Spanish question as an essential feature of any agreement at which we might arise. No agreement could be considered complete unless it contained a settlement of the Spanish question.

Secondly, I repeated that as he had been already told by my right hon. friend we were loyal members of the League, and that if we came to an agreement we should desire to obtain the approval of the League for it. I said it was essential, that it should not be possible, if we went to the League to recommend the approval of the agreement, to say that the situation in Spain during the conversations had been materially altered by Italy, either by sending fresh reinforcements to Franco or by failing to implement the arrangements contemplated by the British formula. I added that I did not believe that these intimations would occasion his Government a moment's anxiety, since I was confident that his Government would approach the negotiations in the same spirit as we should do—namely, in perfect good faith and with a sincere desire to reach agreement.

I know very well that the decision of the Government is going to be misrepresented, has been misrepresented already.

Let me make it plain that there is no question at this moment of what the terms of the agreement are to be. The question is whether we are to enter upon negotiations or to refuse even to contemplate them, and if there be anybody here who really wishes to obtain peace, do they think they can ever obtain peace by continuing a vendetta and refusing even to talk about their differences ?

I have never been more completely convinced of the rightness of any course that I have had to take than I am to-day of the rightness of the decision to which the Cabinet came yesterday. What we are seeking to do is to get a general appeasement throughout Europe which will give us peace. The peace of Europe must depend upon the attitude of the four major Powers—Germany, Italy, France, and ourselves.

For ourselves we are linked to France by common ideas of democracy, of liberty, and Parliamentary government. France need not fear that the resignation of my right hon. friend upon this issue signifies any departure from the policy of the closest friendship with France of which he has been such a distinguished exponent. I count myself as firm a friend of France as my right hon. friend. The difference between him and me will never mean that there is any difference between us about our relations with France.

On the other side we find Italy and Germany also linked by affinities of outlook and in the forms of their government. The question that we have to think of is this: Are we to allow these two pairs of nations to go on glowering at one another across the frontier, allowing the feeling between the two sides to become more and more embittered, until at last the barriers are broken down and the conflict begins which many think would mark the end of civilization? Or can we bring them to an understanding of one another's aims and objects and to such discussion as may lead to their final settlement?

If we can do that, if we can bring these four nations into friendly discussion, into a settling of their differences, we shall have saved the peace of Europe for a generation.

Extract from Mr. Chamberlain's Speech in the House of Commons on February 22nd, 1938

What my argument is leading to is this, that no business can be possible on the lines which I have just been describing. No nation with any self-respect would accept conditions of that kind before entering into conversations. If you really mean to have conversations you cannot lay down conditions beforehand.

The choice then simply comes down to this. Are we prepared, do we desire, to have conversations or not? If we do, then it seems to me that the sooner we have them the better.

There is another argument which has been prominent in the discussion, an argument certainly well calculated to arouse strong feelings in this House and in the country. It is suggested that to enter into conversations is a humiliation for us. There has been talk about sacrifices to the dictators. The Leader of the Opposition said that I was going whining to Signor Mussolini. Jibes and taunts of that kind leave me absolutely unmoved. They convince me only of one thing, that those who make them do not realise the greatness of this country. It is a great country, it is a strong country, it is a country that is the head and centre of a great Empire, it is a country to which countless millions of people look up for leadership because they respect it. It is for a great country to do what a small or a weak country cannot always afford to do, to show magnanimity.

It is suggested that in what we have done we have had to go behind the backs of our friends. Who speaks with knowledge of what we have done, and whether we have gone behind the backs of our friends? (Hon. members: "Eden.") My right hon. friend never said anything of the kind. On the 25th of last month my right hon. friend had a conversation with the French Ministers, including the French Prime Minister, in which he informed them that we contemplated opening conversations with Italy.

We did tell our friends what we intended to do. The conversations went further than that. Not only were the French informed of our intentions, or of our contemplated opening of conversations with the Italians, but there was considerable discussion on the subjects which might be discussed when we came to open those conversations.

Without going into details, which perhaps it would be going too far to enter upon now, I think I may say that there appeared to be complete agreement between the French and ourselves on the subject which would then be discussed. I remember one thing in particular, which was reported as having been specially insisted on by the French, and that was that the discussions should include a settlement of the Spanish question.

I altogether repudiate any suggestion on the part of hon. and right hon. members opposite that we have done anything behind the backs of our friends or that we have not acted in full consultation with them.

It has been observed I had said nothing about the League or about collective security. I have often expressed the view that the party opposite allow themselves to be governed by phrases the actual meaning of which they never take the trouble to think out. Among those phrases is "collective security."

If I am right, as I am confident I am, in saying that the League as constituted to-day is unable to provide collective security for anybody, then I say we must not try to delude ourselves, and still more we must not try to delude small, weak nations into thinking that they will be protected by the League against aggression and acting accordingly when we know that nothing of the kind can be expected. To-day you will not find anywhere in the League any conviction that collective security can be provided by the League as now constituted. What is the conclusion to be drawn from that? I am staying in because I still have faith that the League may be reconstituted and because I still believe that there is important and valuable work for the League to do.

I doubt very much whether the League will ever do its best work so long as its members are nominally bound to impose sanctions or to use force in support of obligations. I would not change an article in the Covenant. I would leave the Covenant as it is. I would not tear up a single article of it, not even Article XVI, in the hope that some day it might be reconstituted in such a form that we might rely upon being able to use its powers for the functions for which they were originally intended. I would have it clearly understood to-day that the League cannot use and cannot be expected to use them, and that the nations which remain in the League must be saddled neither with liabilities nor with risks which they are not prepared to undertake; nor must other nations expect that the League will provide that security which it was once hoped it would provide.

I believe that if the League would throw off shams and pretences, which every one sees through, if it would come out with a declaration of what it is prepared to do, and can do, as a moral force to focus public opinion throughout the world, it would justify itself and if would be a real thing. It might draw unto itself again some of those who have lost faith in it in the past, and the future of the League might be assured for the benefit and salvation of mankind.

The party opposite have been asked what they would do in these circumstances. You may take the view that you are not prepared even to talk with those who differ from you or whose standards of public conduct you do not approve. That has been, I will not say our intention, but actually what has happened up to now. Can anybody say that we have approached nearer to peace by pursuing a policy of that kind? Can anybody say that we have taken fear out of the hearts of men? Can anybody say that we have lightened the menace that has been hanging over us? Must not everybody admit that month after month we have seemed to be getting nearer and nearer to war? I believe that the policy of the party opposite, if persisted in—this policy of holding their hands and turning their backs, of making speeches and of doing nothing—is a policy which must presently lead us to war.

There may come a time again as there have been times in the past when someone who occupies the position I hold to-day will have to face again the awful responsibility of answering the question: "Will you plunge your country into war?" I pray that that responsibility may not fall upon me, but does not an almost equally heavy responsibility lie upon the man who feels as I do that if we do not take action we may presently be faced with that frightful question, who feels that by taking action we may do something to avert it? I feel that I should fail in my duty if I failed to take that action now, as I have done.

THE HISTORIC STATE VISIT OF THE FÜHRER TO ITALY

The Rome festivities are over. The various stages in Rome, Naples and Florence have been followed by the whole world with tension and curiosity, with feeling, expectation and criticism, and with interpretations and prophecies of the most various kinds. The vast interest raised by the Führer's visit to Italy far beyond diplomatic, political and journalistic circles immediately concerned proved that this was not a State visit, a cold representative or conventional ceremony, or a well thought-out political and tactical meeting of diplomats and statesmen, but a manifestation of two nations. The wave of enthusiasm which met the Führer throughout Italy and the cordial interest taken by the entire people in these festive days showed that, as in the case of the Duce's visit to Germany, this visit represented the proclamation of a friendship and community of sentiments between two nations and their two leaders, a community of ideas greatly exceeding in importance a coldly calculated community of interests. No compulsion and no orders could have brought together such vast crowds or caused them to make such obviously spontaneous demonstrations. This community has been more firmly welded above all by the fact that Germany and Italy, National Socialism and Fascism, have had a hard struggle to defend themselves against a flood of enmity, suspicion and abuse in order to gain what they considered to be vital necessities in the face of the stubborn resistance of a hostile world.

This demonstration also embodies the political fact and the essential political significance of these days, the result of which may be regarded as a further reinforcement and strengthening of the Rome-Berlin axis. The durability of this axis requires no alliances or treaties and no General Staff discussions. But it is based on the securest possible foundation, namely on mutual confidence, on the common ideology of two nations and on the friendship of their two leaders who require no document cupboards full of treaties but in whom, apart from a practical view and estimation of matters, there is something which extends to human and personal spheres and which grips the heart and mind.

In this respect the days in Italy were a continuation of Mussolini's visit to Germany at the end of September 1937. In the meantime the return of German-Austria to the Reich had taken place, of which so many people feared and still more people hoped that it would break the axis. But this very event proved the firmness of the axis and the deep significance of Mussolini's words—which have since come true—at the demonstration on the May Field in Berlin: "Speak clearly and frankly, and when one has a friend march with him to the end". Mussolini has kept the word which he spoke at that time in thinking of the sanctions war and Germany's neutrality: "We will never forget this". These words were almost identical with those used by the Führer on March 12th at Linz when he thanked the Duce for Italy's attitude in those eventful days and which he further underlined in Rome with the sentence: "Just as you and your people maintained your friendship with Germany in decisive days, I and my people will show the same friendship to Italy in a difficult hour". These words are of greater weight than treaties and paragraphs.

The axis has again stood the test. The Duce and the Führer have not fulfilled the hope of a certain part of the surrounding world that was on the watch to undermine or destroy it. On the contrary, they have strengthened the axis at that very Alp frontier which, according to Adolf Hitler's bequest to the German people, is in future regarded as for ever inviolable. The Brenner, which was regarded by so many as the last hope of the estrangement of the two States, will in future no longer be a line of separation but will "serve as a bridge for mutual support and assistance". The inflammable matter which was deliberately placed between the two nations on this frontier by the treaties of Versailles and St. Germain has been definitely removed by the Anschluss. Instead of a permanent position of enmity desired by certain democracies, the two countries now stand shoulder to shoulder in Europe. The connecting link has been broken out of the ring with which in particular France has always endeavoured to encircle and suppress Germany. The connecting trench running from France to the Little Entente and thence to Eastern Europe has been destroyed, and an end has thus been put to century-old aims of the French policy of hegemony and intervention which from the time of Richelieu and Napoleon to the policy of the Third Republic has so often brought Europe to the edge of the abyss. The Berlin-Rome axis now runs from the North Sea to the Mediterranean; it was erected by National Socialism and Fascism in Berlin and has again been strengthened in Rome.

The time is now past when the European policy of certain Powers constantly aimed at preventing, first Italy, then Germany, from engaging in German-Italian cooperation. Mussolini's realistic discernment to which he gave such convincing expression in his great speech in the Chamber on March 16th, 1938 and which was the basis of his prolonged and stubborn struggle to release Europe from the terrible mortgage placed upon it by Versailles, also prevented him from hindering the German Reich from its constant historical development into a great national Reich, as against the view of French statesmen and diplomats that this should be the main task of Italian policy. It was on account of this that the first meeting of Hitler and Mussolini at Stra near Venice in June 1934 failed. Moreover the meaning of the Franco-Italian Befana treaty of January 7th, 1935 was to make Italy the guardian of French interests in the Danube basin and at the same time, under the watchword of "Austrian independence", to erect fortifications against Germany under Italian command. The front set up shortly afterwards at Stresa on April 14th, 1935 also mentioned Austria as a factor in a joint policy of England, France and Italy. But on the other hand the two world Powers did not desire that Italy, which had recently become a Great Power, should strengthen her position too much in the Danube basin which—without there being the slightest economic or cultural necessity—might have damaged the French position of supremacy, or in the Mediterranean where France and Great Britain foresaw a danger to their means of communication. Italy thus had her best political forces and energies tied up on the Brenner without being able to obtain definite advantages in Central Europe, while at the same time this prevented the release of Italian forces and energies for her plans of expansion in the Mediterranean and North Africa. This extremely complicated position ultimately formed a Gordian knot which could no longer be untied, but could only be cut through. Mussolini cut it through with the Abyssinian sword in his great speech in the Chamber on May 26th, 1935 with the historical words: "It is however not out of place to devote a few words to those who would gladly see us held up at the Brenner in order to prevent us from moving in other directions. The problem of Austrian independence is not an exclusively Italian problem. Fascist Italy is not thinking of limiting her historical mission to a single political problem or to a single military section such as the defence of a frontier, even one so important as that of the Brenner."

This speech, in which Mussolini showed himself to be a far-sighted and practical statesman with a deep insight into the essence of historical and national connections and necessities, was a hard blow for the peacemakers of Versailles and St. Germain and for all who thought it their duty to defend this evil inheritance.

Germany has never forgotten that Mussolini, on the basis of this attitude, at an early date and as the first of all statesmen in the camp of the former parties to the War, recognised and condemned the unnaturalness of that "order" which is connected with the name of Versailles. It is also remembered that it was Fascist Italy who, after the War, not only claimed and carried through the claim to the fulfilment of her vital rights, but also showed comprehension and respect for the justified and natural vital claims of the German nation in Germany's hard struggle towards a higher plane, and was always in favour of the abolition of reparations, the earlier evacuation of the Rhineland, the return of the Saar Territory, the revision of the treaties and Germany's military equality of rights. The vehemence with which Mussolini declined to be forced into an anti-German position on account of certain interests and described this as a misconstruction of Italy's power of judgment speaks a sufficiently clear language.

Those words were a bridge of thought between the Austrian and the Abyssinian question. The one question fell into the background for Italy, while the other became constantly more important and more energetically pursued. With the Abyssinian campaign Italy again struck out on her path of destiny which had led her to North Africa as far back as the eighties, turned from European to Mediterranean policy and, in order that she might again breathe the free air of the sea, broke the fetters imposed on her since the end of the War.

As from this time the axis soon assumed more definite outlines; in the first place in the agreement reached with Mussolini's cooperation on July 11th, 1936 and then in the Berlin discussions and the Berchtesgaden agreement in connection with Count Ciano's visit to Germany at the end of October 1936. A few days later, on November 1st, 1936, Mussolini delivered his great political speech on the Milan Cathedral square, which culminated in the words: "The vertical line from Rome to Berlin is not a line of separation, but rather an axis in which all European States can cooperate that are animated by a desire for cooperation and peace". The slogan of the axis was thus coined for the first time for the new kind of German-Italian relations. Its parallelism came sharply to the fore in the treatment of the Spanish problem, in the struggle against communism, in the colonial question, in the confirmation of the vital claims of "nations without living room" and lastly in the rejection of the Geneva ideologies. In the Spanish problem this parallelism was shown by the joint recognition of National Spain on November 18th, 1936 and in the policy in the London Non-Intervention Committee. The common struggle against Bolshevism led on November 6th, 1937 to Italy's accession to the German-Japanese Anti-Comintern Agreement. Shortly before, on October 28th, 1937, on the anniversary of the march on Rome, Mussolini declared Germany's imprescriptible right to a place in the African sun, and on December 11th, 1937, in one of his historical speeches from the Palazzo Venezia, with bitter words he drew the line of demarcation between Rome and Geneva. He thus transferred to the field of practical politics what he had declared in his speech at Palermo on August 20th, 1937 after the conclusion of the manœuvres in Sicily to be the second reality of Italian policy after that of the Empire, namely that the way to Rome leads through Berlin and the way to Berlin through Rome. Then came, from September 24th to 29th the grandiose reception of the Duce in Berlin with historical speeches of the two Leaders on the Berlin May Field on September 28th. The result of this journey was expressed by Mussolini after his return in a speech from the balcony of the Palazzo Venezia in the following words: "The German-Italian friendship, consecrated through the Berlin-Rome axis, has in these days entered the hearts of the two nations and will remain there".

Such a historical development, which arose out of a practical political and just appreciation of matters, was not affected by the events of March 1938. The Anschluss of Austria was regarded as a release from the tension which had troubled the relations between the two nations for the past twenty years. Moreover, the "Austrian drama" became a European crisis of clarification of the first order.

The axis has now been crowned for the second time by the Führer's visit to Italy. It is to be regarded irrevocably and immutably as a fixed component part of European policy that has to be reckoned with and accepted. It can, however, be readily accepted for its policy is always directed towards the same aim that Mussolini and Adolf Hitler put before the world in Berlin and Rome, namely peace. "Nothing will be planned here to divide a Europe which is already divided enough. There are no secret intentions and the solemn confirmation of the fact and stability of the Rome-Berlin axis is not directed against any other States". These sentiments expressed in the Duce's speech on the May Field are also to be heard in the speeches in the Palazzo Venezia regarding the aim and condition of the axis policy. The aim is to seek a system of international action which is in a position to provide effective guarantees of justice, security and peace for all. The condition is loyal acceptance of the elementary rights of every nation to life and defence and the creation of an equilibrium based on the reality of historical forces which must form its foundation and decisive factor. Who could possibly find a threat in these words of Mussolini or in his conviction "that the peoples of Europe will in this way find tranquility and peace which are essential in order to maintain the foundation of European culture"? Or in the Führer's words that "Germany and Italy are resolved to maintain their eternal vital rights and to defend themselves against all forces desiring to oppose their natural development"? If the statesmen at the Paris Conference had acted on these principles and views when they remade the map of Europe, it would have been better for this continent at the present time.

"It is a fact that after the statements of May 7th, the last hopes must be lost that Fascism and National Socialism can be separated and played off one against the other."

With these few words the deputy of the Führer, Reich Minister Hess, in an interview with the "Popolo d'Italia" on May 9th most happily characterised the significance and scope of the historical speeches in the Palazzo Venezia.

This is the essential factor of this cooperation; the guess-work that has been going in in foreign countries as to what one party demands and what another has given misses the essence of the matter. In Rome there was no question of "giving" or "taking", or of claims and demands that had to be bargained against each other or set forth in paragraphs.

But it nevertheless makes a curious impression when newspapers such as the "Temps" find that the speeches have a definitely different undertone and proceed to draw particular conclusions from this view. The official Polish "Gazeta Polska" very rightly remarked that just as Mussolini's speech on the Berlin May Field was given a stronger political accent, the host on this occasion yielded the preference to his guest.

It may moreover be assumed that the Duce at Genoa again found the "right" tone. In this speech he clearly destroyed the hopes of those who thought that the Anglo-Italian Treaty had loosened or would loosen the relations with Germany on the grounds that the axis has now been deprived of its foundation since the agreement has put an end to Anglo-Italian rivalry in the Mediterranean and in the Near East.

It is astonishing how little sense of reality is shown by these quarters who are constantly seeking for pacts and constantly thinking of the past. A fitting reply was given to them by the "Temps" on May 4th and 9th—despite a few illogical arguments and hopes for the "subsequent effects of a solution of the complex Central and Eastern European problems".

"It has been frequently stated that the Italo-German agreement is mainly based on the maintenance of the independence of Austria. This independence of Austria now no longer exists. But the agreement between Rome and Berlin continues to exist as the framework of a political system in Europe. This is the fact of which account must be taken in judging the position created in the centre of the Continent.

The real bond that unites Germany and Italy consists in the parallelism of the National Socialist and Fascist revolutions. For both dictators it is a question of defending, securing and reinforcing what they have created."

This is very true. The speeches in the Palazzo Venezia should not be understood from the limited point of view of the next few weeks or months, but as the declaration of thoughts and desires for the near and distant future that have arisen out of pre-war and post-war experiences which had the same aims and a common nature.

It is a sign of dangerous aberrations in pre-war and post-war mentality that the French General Niessel or Winston Churchill, for instance, immediately take up their pencils in order to calculate what alliance would be strong enough to have the greatest possible prospect of overcoming Germany and Italy.

As regards the expectations of differences of opinion which might be caused as a result of the Anschluss by the Danube and Balkan policy of the two countries, we would refer to the views expressed below by authoritative Italian organs.

The Cassandra warnings of Count d'Ormesson in the "Figaro" are wide of the mark and show a complete misunderstanding of the radical change in German-Italian relations, since he endeavours by digging up old worn-out reminiscences of the time before the War to prove that "Italy's greatest enemy is her ally". It is not worth while to go into this question further. In other French papers and in British Liberal and Labour quarters an attempt is naturally made to disturb the German-Italian understanding or to represent it as a danger to peace.

A more practical attitude is adopted by the leading articles in the "Times" and "Daily Telegraph" of May 9th, as follows:

"The speeches were notable for their restraint. They held the language of statemanship. They certainly did not bear out predictions of intransigence and ferocity. They contained no threats... In the light of that declaration it is evident that there is nothing incompatible between the Rome-Berlin axis and the Anglo-Italian agreement... From this historic event—which was anticipated with uneasiness in some capitals—it is possible to say that Europe may find good grounds for reassurance rather than alarm. All hopes may not have been fulfilled, but some fears have been decidedly abated."

The speeches in the Palazzo Venezia, which were so well adapted to each other, have once more indicated the foundations and conditions on which a new order of European policy is possible in the sense of the axis, namely not to make artificial calculations, but to create a new situation of mutual respect and friendship and of loyal cooperation between the nations in order to take a far-sighted view and to find ways and means of improving the political and economic position by removing all the points of friction that have proved or may in the near or distant future prove dangerous to peace.

It is true that the axis is primarily the symbol of the solidarity of two nations and States that are mindful of their vital rights but do not thereby desire to hinder cooperation with all nations of European culture, for the proction of whom the axis has become, in accordance with the will of the parties to it, a bulwark against the disintegrating forces of Communism and Bolshevism.

THE TOASTS OF HIS MAJESTY THE KING AND EMPEROR AND OF THE FUHRER AT THE BANQUET IN THE QUIRINAL ON MAY 4TH, 1938

Lo scambio di brindisi tra S. M. il Re Imperatore e il Führer, durante il pranzo di gala al Quirinale

His Majesty, the King and Emperor, addressed the following toast to the Führer :

“ Führer !

It gives us special pleasure to offer to you, our most honoured guest, a most sincere and cordial welcome.

In your person Italy greets the head of the great friendly nation, the leader who has restored to Germany her greatness and her cultural mission. Numerous and deep are the affinities of spirit and works that bind the new Italy to the new Germany and that render the friendship of the two peoples intimate and secure. This friendship is and will be in future an instrument in the service of European peace for which the Government of the Reich and our Government are cooperating so faithfully.

From the enthusiasm which greeted your journey from the Italian frontier to Rome and from the reception that our capital gave you on your arrival, you have been able to note how deeply rooted are the feelings which Italy cherishes for your person and your country.

We know that these sentiments are fully reciprocated by the German people. For this people that has made such great contributions to the civilisation and achievements of Europe and which you are leading with a firm hand to its glorious destiny, we express our keenest hopes.

We raise our glass to your health, to the success of your work to the prosperity and happiness of the great German nations.”

The Führer replied in the following words :

“ Your Majesty !

For the extremely cordial greetings just extended to me I would offer my deeply felt thanks. Your Majesty's friendly words explain the expression of sympathy with which I have been met in such a cordial manner by the Italian people in the course of my journey through Italy and in Rome itself. This was more than a merely external expression of cordial hospitality. It was a proof of the firm and intimate connection of our two nations in their ideals and aspirations. I may therefore consider myself fortunate at this moment to be the interpreter of my own people which is animated by a sincere inclination and profound friendship for Your Majesty and the Italian people. The entire German people join with me in admiring the extraordinary successes fought for and gained by Italy under the wise rule of Your Majesty and under the guidance of a reorganiser and Prime Minister of genius in all the spheres of national life in the face of a world of opposition.

Your Majesty has spoken of the close connections that bind new Italy with new Germany. The grandiose reception which I have found in this country is a proof that Fascist Italy feels that she has a sincere and permanent friend in National Socialist Germany. This mutual friendship is not only a pledge of the security of the two nations, but is also a strong guarantee of general peace.

In this spirit I raise my glass and drink to the health of Your Royal and Imperial Majesty, to the health of Her Majesty the Queen and Empress and of the Royal House, and also to the prosperity and happiness of the great Italian nation.”

Il Sovrano ha detto :

Führer !

Siamo particolarmente lieti di poter rivolgere a Voi, ospite graditissimo, il benvenuto più sincero e più cordiale.

Nella Vostra persona l'Italia saluta il Capo della grande Nazione amica, il Condottiere che ha restituito la Germania alla sua grandezza e alla missione di civiltà.

Numerose e profonde sono le affinità di spirito e di opere che legano la nuova Italia alla nuova Germania e che rendono l'amicizia dei due popoli intima e sicura. Questa amicizia è, e sarà nell'avvenire, uno strumento al servizio della pace europea, per la quale il Governo del Reich e il nostro Governo così fiduciosamente collaborano.

Nell'entusiasmo che ha salutato il Vostro passaggio dal confine italiano a Roma, e nell'accoglienza che la nostra Capitale vi ha fatta al Vostro arrivo, Voi avete potuto constatare quanto profondi siano i sentimenti che l'Italia nutre per la Vostra persona e per la Vostra Patria.

Noi sappiamo che tali sentimenti sono pienamente contraccambiati dal popolo tedesco.

Per questo popolo che ha dato all'Europa così grandi contributi di civiltà e di lavoro e che Voi guidate con mano ferma verso il suo glorioso avvenire, noi formuliamo i nostri voti più vivi.

Alziamo il calice alla Vostra salute, al successo della Vostra opera, alla prosperità e alla fortuna della grande Nazione tedesca.

Il Führer ha così risposto :

Maestà !

Per il benvenuto tanto cordiale a me espresso, prego di voler gradire il mio ringraziamento profondamente sentito.

Le amichevoli parole di Vostra Maestà spiegano le manifestazioni di simpatia con la quale, nel corso del mio viaggio attraverso l'Italia e in Roma stessa, il popolo italiano mi ha accolto in maniera così lusinghiera. Tutto ciò, infatti, era ben più che un'espressione esteriore di cordiale ospitalità ; era la prova dei saldi e intimi legami che uniscono i nostri due popoli nei loro ideali e nelle loro aspirazioni. Posso pertanto stimarmi felice di essere in questo momento l'interprete del mio popolo, il quale è animato da una sincera inclinazione e profonda amicizia per la Maestà Vostra e per il popolo italiano.

Tutto il popolo tedesco ammira con me gli straordinari successi che l'Italia, lottando contro un mondo di ostacoli, in tutti i campi della vita nazionale, ha conquistati sotto il Regno illuminato Vostra Maestà e la guida del suo geniale riorganizzatore e Primo Ministro.

Vostra Maestà stessa ha parlato dei profondi legami che uniscono la nuova Italia alla nuova Germania.

L'accoglienza grandiosa e commovente che ho trovata in questo Paese è la prova che l'Italia fascista sente di possedere nella Germania nazional-socialista un'amica sincera e indefettibile.

E questa amicizia reciproca non è soltanto un pegno di sicurezza per i due popoli, ma costituisce pure una forte garanzia per la pace generale.

In questo spirito levo il mio bicchiere e bevo alla salute di Vostra Maestà Reale e Imperiale, alla salute di Sua Maestà la Regina e Imperatrice, e della Casa Reale, come pure alla prosperità e alle fortune della grande Nazione italiana.

SPEECHES BY THE DUCE AND THE FUHRER AT THE PALAZZO VENEZIA ON MAY 7TH, 1938

Il discorsi del Duce e del Führer al Palazzo Venezia

Signor Mussolini's Speech.

Führer, it is with the most cordial joy that I, the Government, and the Italian people welcome you in this Rome which to-day receives you in the twofold glory of her tradition and her power.

Your visit to Rome fulfils and seals the understanding between our two countries. This understanding, which we have firmly desired and tenaciously constructed, has its roots in our two Revolutions, its strength in the ideal fellowship which binds our two peoples, and its historical function in the permanent interests of our two nations.

One hundred years of history—from the time when first Germany and Italy raised themselves by Revolutions and by arms to claim their right to national unity—bear witness to the parallel nature of these positions and the solidarity of these interests. In the same faith and with the same will Germany and Italy have fought to build their unity, have worked to make it sound and compact, and have redeemed themselves in recent times from the corruption of destructive ideologies in order to create the new régime of the people which is the characteristic of this century.

Along this path, traced by history, our two peoples are marching, united with loyal intentions and with that convinced trust which has been tested by the events of these years of peace and understanding between the two nations. Fascist Italy knows only a single ethical law in friendship: that which I recalled before the German people on the Maifeld. It is this law which the collaboration between Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy has obeyed, obeys, and will obey.

The premises and the objectives of this collaboration, consecrated in the Rome-Berlin Axis, have been repeatedly and openly affirmed by us. Germany and Italy have turned their backs on the Utopias to which Europe had blindly entrusted her fate in order to seek between them and with others a régime of international comity which may restore equally for all more effective guarantees of justice, security, and peace.

This goal can only be reached when the elementary rights of our people to live, work, and defend itself are loyally recognized and the political equilibrium corresponds to the reality of the historical sources which constitute and determine it. We are convinced that it is along this path that the European nations will find that tranquillity and peace which are indispensable for the preservation of the very foundations of European civilization.

Führer, I still retain a deep impression of the admirable spectacle of work, peace, and strength which last autumn was offered me by your country, refreshed by you in those fundamental virtues of discipline, courage, and tenacity which create the greatness of peoples. I have not forgotten, nor will I forget, the reception that was accorded to me by yourself, by the authorities, and by the people. The most fervent wishes of myself and of Fascist Italy are extended to your mighty work of reconstruction. I raise my glass to your health, Führer, and I drink to the prosperity of the German nation and the unchangeable friendship of our two peoples.

The Führer's Reply.

Herr Hitler replied in the following words:

Duce, with deep emotion I thank you for the moving words of the greeting you have addressed to me in the name both of the Italian Government and of the Italian people. I am happy to be here in Rome, in which the powerful manifestations of young

Il discorso di Benito Mussolini:

Führer!

È con la più cordiale gioia che io Vi do il benvenuto mio, del Governo e del popolo italiano, in questa Roma che oggi Vi accoglie nella duplice gloria della sua tradizione e della sua potenza.

La Vostra visita a Roma compie e suggella l'intesa tra i nostri due Paesi. Questa intesa, che abbiamo fermamente voluta e tenacemente costruita, ha le sue radici nella Vostra e nella nostra Rivoluzione, ha la sua forza nella comunanza ideale che lega i nostri due popoli, ha la sua funzione storica negli interessi permanenti delle nostre due Nazioni.

Cento anni di storia — da quando prima la Germania e l'Italia si alzarono a rivendicare con le rivoluzioni e con le armi il loro diritto all'unità nazionale — testimoniano il parallelismo di queste posizioni e la solidarietà di questi interessi.

E nella stessa fede e con la stessa volontà che la Germania e l'Italia hanno combattuto per costituire la loro unità; hanno operato per farla salda e compatta; si sono riscattate in questi ultimi tempi dalla corruzione di ideologie dissolvitrici per creare quel regime nuovo di popolo, che è il segno di questo secolo.

Su questo cammino, tracciato dalla Storia, i nostri due popoli marciano uniti, con lealtà di propositi e con quella convinta fiducia provata dagli eventi di questi anni di pace e di intesa fra le due Nazioni.

L'Italia fascista non conosce che una sola legge etica nell'amicizia: quella che io ricordai davanti al popolo tedesco al Campo di Maggio. A questa legge ha obbedito, obbedisce e obbedirà la collaborazione tra la Germania nazista e l'Italia fascista.

Le premesse e gli obiettivi di questa collaborazione — consacrata nell'Asse Roma-Berlino — noi li abbiamo costantemente e apertamente affermati. La Germania e l'Italia hanno lasciato dietro di sé le utopie, alle quali l'Europa aveva ciecamente affidato le sue sorti, per cercare tra loro e per cercare con gli altri un regime di convivenza internazionale, che possa instaurare equamente per tutti garanzie più effettive di giustizia, di sicurezza e di pace. A questo si può giungere soltanto quando gli elementari diritti di ciascun popolo a vivere, a lavorare e a difendersi siano lealmente riconosciuti, e quando l'equilibrio politico corrisponda alla realtà delle forze storiche che lo costituiscono e lo determinano.

Noi siamo convinti che è su questa via che le Nazioni d'Europa troveranno quella tranquillità e quella pace che sono indispensabili a preservare le basi stesse della civiltà europea.

Führer! Io ho ancora vivo nell'animo lo spettacolo mirabile di lavoro, di pace e di forza che, l'autunno dell'anno scorso, mi ha offerto il Vostro Paese, rinnovato da Voi, in quelle fondamentali virtù della disciplina, del coraggio e della tenacia, che fanno la grandezza dei popoli. Non ho dimenticato né dimenticherò le accoglienze che mi furono tributate da Voi, dalle autorità, dal popolo.

Alla Vostra potente opera di ricostruzione vanno i voti più fervidi miei e dell'Italia fascista.

Alla Vostra salute, io alzo, Führer, il mio bicchiere e bevo alla prosperità della Nazione tedesca all'inalterabile amicizia dei nostri due popoli.

La risposta di Adolf Hitler:

Duce!

Profondamente commosso, Vi ringrazio per le cordiali parole di benvenuto che avete voluto indirizzarmi, a nome sia del Governo che del popolo italiano. Sono felice di trovarmi qui a Roma, città che ai ricordi del suo passato incomparabilmente glorioso unisce i segni potenti della giovane Italia fascista.

Dal momento in cui ho messo piede sul suolo italiano ho trovato dovunque un'atmosfera di amicizia e di simpatia, che mi rende profondamente felice.

Fascist Italy are united with the evidence of its incomparably glorious past.

Since the moment when I first set foot on Italian soil I have been conscious everywhere of an atmosphere of friendship and sympathy which rejoices me deeply. With the same heartfelt emotion the German people greeted last August in your person the creator of Fascist Italy, the founder of a new Empire, and at the same time a great friend of Germany.

The National-Socialist Movement and the Fascist Revolution have created two new and powerful States which to-day stand for order and healthy progress in a world of unrest and decay. Germany and Italy have thus similar interests and are closely bound to one another by their common ideology. In this way there has been created in Europe a bloc of 120,000,000 people who are resolved to safeguard their eternal right to live and to defend themselves against all forces which might venture to oppose their natural development.

Out of this fight against a world of misunderstanding and opposition which Germany and Italy have had to wage shoulder to shoulder a hearty friendship has gradually grown up between the two peoples. This friendship has proved its strength during the events of the last few years, which have also shown the world that it is necessary to take some account of the rightful and vital interests of great nations.

It is therefore quite natural that our two peoples should in the future continue to develop and extend in constant collaboration this friendship, which in these last years has repeatedly proved its value.

Duce, last August on the Maifeld in Berlin you quoted as an ethical principle, sacred to you and Fascist Italy, these words: "Speak plainly and frankly, and if you have a friend march with him right to the end." In the name of National-Socialist Germany I, too, acknowledge this rule. To-day I give you this answer. Two thousand years have now passed since Romans and Germans met for the first time in history as we know it. Standing here on this, the most glorious spot known to humanity, I feel it was a tragedy of fate that for a time no clear frontier was drawn between these great and gifted races. It caused untold suffering for generations. Now, after almost 2,000 years, thanks to your historic efforts, Benito Mussolini, the Roman State rises from its remote traditions to new life.

To the north of you a new German State has grown up from countless tribes. Now that we have become immediate neighbours, taught by the experience of 2,000 years we both acknowledge those natural frontiers which Providence and history have visibly drawn between our two peoples. They will give Italy and Germany not only the possibility of peaceful and permanent collaboration through a clear division of their spheres of activity, but will provide a bridge for mutual help and support. It is my irrevocable will and my bequest to the German people that the frontier of the Alps, which Nature has erected between us, shall be regarded for ever as unchangeable. I know that thus a great and prosperous future will ensue for Rome and Germany.

Duce, just as you and your people kept friendship for Germany in a moment of crisis, so I and my people are ready to show Italy the same friendship in times of stress.

The magnificent impressions I have just received of the youthful strength, the will to work, and the proud spirit of the new Italy will remain imperishable in my memory. Unforgettable, too, was the sight of your soldiers and Blackshirts, fresh from their recent victories, your well-tried Fleet, and the prowess of your magnificent Air Force. They give me certainty that your admirable constructive work, which I follow with sincerest good wishes, will lead to further great results.

I raise my glass and drink to your health, to the good fortune and greatness of the Italian people, and to our unchangeable friendship.

Con la stessa intima commozione, il popolo tedesco ha salutato nello scorso autunno nella Vostra persona il creatore dell'Italia fascista, il fondatore di un nuovo Impero e nello stesso tempo il grande amico della Germania.

Il movimento nazionalsocialista e la Rivoluzione fascista hanno creato due nuovi potenti Stati, i quali oggi, in un mondo irrequieto e disgregato, costituiscono un esempio d'ordine e di sano progresso. La Germania e l'Italia hanno uguali interessi e, per la loro comunanza di ideologie, sono l'una all'altra strettamente legate.

È sorto ora in Europa un blocco di 120 milioni di uomini decisi a salvaguardare i loro eterni, vitali diritti e a resistere a tutte le forze che tentassero di opporsi al loro naturale sviluppo.

Da questa lotta contro un mondo di incomprensione e di opposizione, che la Germana e l'Italia hanno dovuto sostenere spalla a spalla, si è sviluppata a poco a poco tra i due popoli una cordiale amicizia. Questa amicizia ha dato prova della sua solidità durante gli avvenimenti degli ultimi anni, i quali hanno pure dimostrato al mondo che degli interessi legittimi e vitali delle grandi Nazioni è necessario in ogni caso tenere conto.

È perciò più che naturale che i nostri due popoli continuino a sviluppare e ad approfondire in istretta collaborazione per l'avvenire l'amicizia che in questi ultimi anni è divenuta sempre più salda.

Duce! L'autunno scorso, sul Campo di Maggio di Berlino, Voi avete proclamato come legge etica, sacra a Voi e all'Italia fascista, il principio: « Parlare chiaro e franco e quando si ha un amico, marciare con lui sino alla fine ».

Anch'io mi associo, in nome della Germania nazionalsocialista, a questo principio e vi rispondo oggi: Da quando Romani e Germani si sono incontrati nella storia, per quanto ci consta, per la prima volta, sono ormai passati due millenni. Trovandomi qui, sul suolo più glorioso della storia dell'umanità, sento la fatalità di un destino che già un tempo non aveva tracciato chiari confini fra queste due razze di così alte virtù e di così grande valore; sofferenze indicibili di molte generazioni ne sono state le conseguenze. Orbene oggi, dopo circa 2000 anni, in virtù della storica opera da Voi, Benito Mussolini, compiuta, lo Stato romano risorge da remote tradizioni a nuova vita.

A settentrione del Vostro Paese, numerose stirpi formarono un nuovo Impero germanico. Ora Voi ed io, divenuti vicini immediati e ammaestrati dall'esperienza di due millenni, intendiamo riconoscere la frontiera naturale che la provvidenza e la storia hanno palesemente tracciato ai nostri due popoli. All'Italia e alla Germania, essa — con la netta separazione dell'ambito aperto alla vita delle due Nazioni — consentirà non soltanto la fortuna di una collaborazione pacifica, sicura e duratura, ma offrirà anche un ponte per la reciproca assistenza e cooperazione.

È mia incrollabile volontà, ed è anche mio testamento politico al popolo tedesco, che consideri intangibile per sempre la frontiera delle Alpi eretta tra noi dalla natura. Sono certo che per Roma e per la Germania ne risulterà un avvenire glorioso e prospero.

Duce! Così come Voi e il Vostro popolo vi siete mantenuti fedeli all'amicizia della Germania in giornate decisive, del pari io e il mio popolo siamo pronti a dimostrare la stessa amicizia all'Italia in un'ora difficile.

Rimarrà indelebile nella mia memoria la grandiosa impressione lasciata a tutt'oggi in me dalla forza giovanile, dalla volontà di lavoro e dal fiero spirito della nuova Italia. Indimenticabile anche l'aspetto dei Vostri soldati e delle Camicie Nere coperti di gloria recente, della Vostra flotta messa vittoriosamente alla prova e dello slancio dell'imponente vostra Arma aerea. Ne traggio la certezza che la Vostra ammirevole opera costruttiva, che seguo coi più sinceri auguri, condurrà anche in seguito a grandi successi.

Levo così il mio bicchiere e bevo alla Vostra salute, alla felicità e alla grandezza del popolo italiano e alla nostra immutabile amicizia.

MUSSOLINI'S SPEECH AT GENOA ON MAY 14TH, 1938

Comrades of Genoa !

It is with the greatest joy that as I came here today from the sea I again saw the stupendous lines of your city which has never more than at present earned the title of ruler. No less profound is my joy, after twelve years, at again coming into immediate contact with you. It is with emotion that I speak to you in front of the triumphal arch which you have dedicated to Victory and to the memory of those heroes who gained it with their pure blood and have transmitted it to us and to all future generations as a sacred and immortal inheritance. You will not be surprised if, as almost always has happened at the memorable meetings of the Fascist people, I speak to you of some questions of an international character.

On March 11th at 6 p.m. Italy again stood at the crossways and had to take a decision. From her choice might depend disorder, peace or war, and also the destiny of Europe. But as these events did not come as a surprise to us, we replied immediately and clearly "No!" to a diplomatic step which in this particular case would have been much more useless than many others.

The enemies of Italy and the anti-Fascists of all kinds were greatly disappointed and gave themselves up to an outbreak of genuine and repulsive fury. They evidently desired a collision between the two totalitarian States and even worse complications, not excluding war, even if this had opened wide the gates of Europe to the triumph of Bolshevism. Our attitude was not, as was affirmed, dictated by necessity, but by our will, and everything that has since occurred has shown that it was inspired by wisdom.

To those on the other side of the mountains who still feel disingenuous regret when they remember the events of 1934, we reply once more before you and before the entire Italian people that from that time till March 1938 much water has flowed under the bridges of the Tiber, the Danube, the Spree, the Thames and also the Seine. And while this water flowed more or less tumultuously, Italy, which was in the midst of a sanguinary and gigantic effort, was subject to those sanctions which we have not yet forgotten.

In the meantime, everything that occurred in diplomacy and politics under the general name of Stresa was dead and buried, and, as far as we are concerned, will never arise again. Italy also could afford the really extravagant luxury to mobilise regularly every four years in order to prevent the fatal conclusion of a national revolution.

Fascist Italy could not indefinitely assume the odious and useless task of the former Austria of the Hapsburgs and Metternich, namely to oppose the course of the nation towards its unity.

We have therefore not acted in this way out of fear of complications, for such fear has never found a place in our hearts. But it was rather our conscience, the sense of honour and loyal friendship towards Germany that urged us to do what we did.

At present the two worlds, the German world and the Roman world, are in direct contact. Their friendship is durable. The cooperation between the two revolutions, which is destined to place its imprint upon our century, can only be fruitful. The Italian people, in welcoming the German Chancellor, desired to give expression to this.

The words uttered in the night of May 7th in the Palazzo Venezia were listened to with sincere enthusiasm by the two nations. They do not represent a diplomatic or political declaration but they are a solemn and definite event in history.

Il discorso pronunciato dal Duce a Genova il 14 maggio 1938

Camerati genovesi !

E' con grandissima gioia che stamane, venendo dal mare, ho riveduto i lineamenti stupendi della vostra città, che non mai come in questa epoca merita il titolo di Dominante.

Non meno profonda è la mia gioia di riprendere, dopo trascorsi dodici anni, un immediato diretto contatto con voi.

Ed è con emozione che io parlo a voi, dinanzi all'Arco che voi avete dedicato alla Vittoria e al ricordo degli Eroi che, con il loro purissimo sangue, la conquistarono e l'hanno tramandata a noi e alle venture generazioni come un retaggio sacro e immortale.

Non vi stupirete, o camerati, se, come quasi sempre è avvenuto nelle memorabili adunate del popolo fascista, io parlerò a voi di talune questioni di carattere internazionale.

Alle ore 18 del giorno 11 marzo, l'Italia si trovò ancora una volta innanzi a un bivio che imponeva una decisione. Dalla scelta poteva dipendere il disordine, la pace o la guerra, quindi il destino d'Europa. Ma poichè gli avvenimenti non venivano a noi di sorpresa ed erano stati previsti nel loro logico sviluppo, noi rispondemmo immediatamente e nettissimamente: no!, dinanzi ad un passo diplomatico che nel caso concreto era assolutamente più inutile di molti altri.

I nemici dell'Italia, gli antifascisti di tutte le risme, rimasero tremendamente delusi e si abbandonarono ad uno scoppio di autentico, per quanto imbecille, furore. Essi avrebbero evidentemente desiderato l'urto fra i due Stati totalitari, e peggiori complicazioni non esclusa la guerra, anche e se, soprattutto, avesse spalancato le porte al trionfo del bolscevismo in Europa.

Non dunque la necessità, come fu detto, ma la nostra volontà ci guidò nel nostro atteggiamento; e tutto quanto è accaduto da allora in poi dimostra che esso fu ispirato dalla saggezza.

A coloro i quali, oltre i monti, hanno ancora la non ingenua malinconia di ricordarci quanto facemmo nel 1934, noi rispondiamo ancora una volta, dinanzi a voi e dinanzi a tutto il popolo italiano in ascolto, che da allora al marzo del '38 molta acqua era passata sotto i ponti del Tevere, del Danubio, della Sprea, del Tamigi ed anche della Senna.

E mentre quest'acqua più o meno tumultuosamente fluiva, all'Italia, impegnata in uno sforzo sanguinoso e gigantesco, venivano applicate quelle sanzioni che noi non abbiamo ancora dimenticato.

Nel frattempo tutto ciò che di diplomatico e di politico passava sotto il nome globale di Stresa era morto e sepolto e, per conto nostro, non risusciterà mai più. N'è l'Italia poteva permettersi il lusso, veramente eccessivo, di mobilitare, allo scadere regolare di ogni quadriennio, per impedire l'epilogo fatale di una rivoluzione nazionale.

L'Italia fascista non poteva assumersi indefinitamente quello che fu il compito odioso e inutile della vecchia Austria degli Abshurghi e dei Metternich: contrastare il moto delle Nazioni verso la loro unità.

Non è dunque per la tema di complicazioni che noi abbiamo così agito; perchè questa tema, quando è necessario, non ha mai albergato, non alberga e non albergherà mai nell'animo nostro.

Ma era la nostra coscienza, il senso dell'onore e l'amicizia leale verso la Germania che ci consigliava di fare quanto abbiamo fatto.

Ora i due mondi, il mondo germanico e il mondo romano, sono in immediato contatto. La loro amicizia è duratura. La collaborazione fra le due Rivoluzioni destinate a dare l'impronta a questo secolo non può essere che feconda. Questo ha voluto significare il popolo italiano, accogliendo il Cancelliere germanico.

Le parole che furono pronunciate nella notte del 7 maggio al Palazzo Venezia sono state accolte dall'entusiasmo consapevole

The axis, to which we remain faithful, has not prevented us from pursuing a policy of agreements with those who sincerely desire such agreements. Thus, in March last year, we reached the agreement with Yugoslavia, and since then peace has reigned supreme over the waters of the Adriatic. We have also recently reached the agreement with Great Britain. In the depth of the dissession which represented a serious danger for the relations of the two nations, there was much misunderstanding and, we may state openly, ignorance in the pure sense of the word.

For too many foreigners Italy is the country that is badly depicted by a mediocre literature. It is high time that the Italy of arms and labour should be known; it is high time to know the Italian people who have in twenty years furnished formidable proofs of their will, culminating in the achievement of the Empire.

The last speech of the British Prime Minister is an attempt to get out of the confusion of these views and to recognise the Italy of Fascism and of the revolution of the blackshirts in all their majesty and force.

The agreement between London and Rome is an agreement between two Empires and extends from the Mediterranean to the Red Sea and to the Indian Ocean. Since it is our will to keep strictly to this agreement, and since we believe that the Government of Great Britain will do the same, it may be considered that the agreement will be durable. The approval which it has found in all countries of the world is a proof of its intrinsic historical importance.

You will permit me to be circumspect as regards the conversations with France, because they are still going on. I do not know whether they will reach a conclusion, for one reason because, in an extremely important matter, the war in Spain, we are on opposite sides of the barricade. They desire the victory of Barcelona; we on the other hand desire and wish for the victory of Franco.

Comrades of Genoa!

In the last ten years Italy and Genoa have gone rapidly forward. But what we have achieved can only be considered as a stage. In the struggle of the nations and continents there is no standing still; he who stands still is lost. That is why the Fascist regime will do everything necessary to promote your sea traffic and your industrial initiative. Those who think that the struggle for autarchy, which we shall continue with the utmost force, will diminish trade are in the wrong. It cannot reduce either the quality or the volume. It is equally wrong to affirm that the regime desires to sacrifice the medium and small industrial and commercial undertakings. The contrary is the case.

The guiding rules of our policy are clear: we desire peace, peace with all. And we can state that National Socialist Germany desires European peace no less ardently than ourselves. But the peace, in order to be secure, must be an armed peace. It is for that reason that I desired that the entire fleet should assemble at Genoa, in order to show you and the Italians of Piedmont and Lombardy what is our effective force at sea. We desire peace, but we must be prepared with all our forces to defend it, especially when we hear speeches, even if they come from overseas, which give us cause for reflection.

It is perhaps not true that the so-called great democracies are really preparing a war of doctrines. But it is nevertheless well that it should be known that in such a case the totalitarian States will immediately form a bloc and will march together to the end.

dei due popoli. Esse non rappresentano una dichiarazione diplomatica e politica. Esse sono qualche cosa di solenne e di definitivo nella storia.

L'Asse, al quale resteremo fedeli, non ci ha impedito di fare una politica di accordi con colore i quali tali accordi sinceramente vogliono. Così, nel marzo dell'anno scorso, abbiamo realizzato l'intesa con la Jugoslavia. E da allora la pace regna sovrana sulle sponde dell'Adriatico.

Così recentemente abbiamo realizzato gli accordi con la Gran Bretagna. Al fondo del dissidio che pose a severo repentaglio il rapporti fra le due Nazioni, v'era molta incomprensione, e, diciamo pure, ignoranza nel senso che a questa parola si deve dare: « ignorare ».

Per troppi stranieri l'Italia è il Paese malamente dipinto da una mediocre letteratura coloristica. E' tempo, è gran tempo di conoscere l'Italia delle armi e del lavoro; è tempo, è gran tempo, di conoscere questo popolo che, in venti anni, ha fornito prove formidabili, culminate tutte nella volontà e nella conquista dell'Impero.

L'ultimo discorso pronunciato dal Primo Ministro inglese è un tentativo per uscire dal ginepraio dei luoghi comuni e riconoscere, in tutta la sua maestà e la sua forza, questa che è la nostra Italia, l'Italia del Fascismo e della Rivoluzione delle Camicie nere.

L'accordo tra Londra e Roma è l'accordo di due Imperi, e si estende dal Mediterraneo al Mar Rosso, all'Oceano Indiano. Poichè è nella nostra volontà il proposito di rispettare questo accordo scrupolosamente, e poichè pensiamo che altrettanto faranno i governanti della Gran Bretagna, si può pensare che questo accordo sia duraturo. Il consenso con il quale è stato accolto in tutti i Paesi del mondo è la riprova della sua intrinseca portata storica.

Voi mi consentirete di essere circospetto per quanto concerne le conversazioni con la Francia, perchè esse sono in corso. Non so se arriveranno a una conclusione, anche perchè, in un fatto estremamente attuale, cioè la guerra di Spagna, noi siamo ai lati opposti della barricata. Essi desiderano la vittoria di Barcelona; noi, viceversa, desideriamo e vogliamo la vittoria di Franco.

Camerati genovesi!

Durante questi dodici anni l'Italia ha velocemente camminato e Genova del pari. Ma quello che abbiamo fatto non può essere considerato che come una tappa. Nella lotta delle Nazioni e dei Continenti, non ci si può fermare: chi si ferma è perduto. Ecco perchè il Regime fascista farà tutto quanto è necessario per potenziare i vostri traffici marittimi e le vostre iniziative industriali.

Sono in errore colore i quali credono che la lotta per l'autarchia, che noi continueremo con estremo vigore, diminuisca i traffici. Ne può variare la qualità, non ne altera nel complesso il volume. Altrettanto falso è il ritenere che il Regime voglia sacrificare le medie e piccole attività industriali e commerciali. E' esattamente vero il contrario.

Le direttive della nostra politica sono chiare: noi vogliamo la pace, la pace con tutti. E vi posso dire che la Germania nazionalsocialista non desidera meno ardentemente di noi la pace europea.

Ma la pace, per essere sicura, deve essere armata. Ecco perchè io ho voluto che a Genova si raccogliesse tutta la flotta, per mostrare a voi ed agli Italiani delle due regioni più continentali, che sono il Piemonte e la Lombardia, quale è la nostra effettiva forza sul mare. Noi vogliamo la pace, ma dobbiamo essere pronti con tutte le nostre forze di difenderla, specie quando si odono discorsi, sia pure di oltreoceano, sui quali dobbiamo riflettere.

E' forse da escludere che le cosiddette grandi democrazie si preparino veramente a una guerra di dottrine. Comunque è bene che si sappia che, in questo caso, gli Stati totalitari faranno immediatamente blocco e marceranno fino in fondo.

THE EVENTS AT ROME IN THE OPINION OF THE ITALIAN PRESS

Virginio Gayda in the "Giornale d'Italia" of May 5th, 1938

The world press speaks of the "triumphal march" of Hitler through the streets of Rome and of the feverish reception given to him by the entire Italian nation from the Brenner to Rome and by the King and Queen, the Duce and the highest representatives of the Government and Party. This reception confirms for the second time in the profound consciousness of the nations those facts in contemporary history which are represented by the solidarity between Germany and Italy. With clear expression it draws aside the thick veil which those French newspapers that vainly attempt even today to stress any possible points of spiritual or political disunion between the two great associated nations again tried to draw over the frank meeting between Rome and Berlin.

Italy, that has definitely left behind her political childhood, thinks, judges and reaches conclusions solely from the point of view of her own ideas and inclinations. She no longer leaves to foreigners the representation of her interests or the expression of her real feelings. It is now established that the journey of the Führer to Italy is not only a formal act of courtesy in return for the Duce's visit to Germany, but the convinced expression of a lofty feeling and of a resolute common political desire of the Italy of Mussolini and the Germany of Hitler.

Four important reasons draw Italy to the friendly nation and its great Führer. The first of these is admiration for the Führer and his work. No other nation but the Italian can have this feeling, for no other nation but the Italian has had the same hard, bold and victorious experiences. There is also the cordial respect for the greatness of resurrected Germany, to which Italy has freely cooperated since the darkest years. In addition there is the consciousness of the affinities of the motives and objects of the two national revolutions and the vision of the snares still laid about them which can only be overcome by the solidarity of their spirit and action. Lastly, there is the concrete valuation of the common political interests which have been revealed in the course of the troublous history of Europe in the past ten years and which became definite in the system of diplomatic understanding concluded in October 1936 at Berlin on the occasion of Count Ciano's visit who, in giving formal expression to the instructions of the Duce, inaugurated the new epoch of the unity of the Italo-German front.

These four reasons are not improvised and can therefore not be altered by vain polemic attempts on the part of third parties. They are the logical consequence of the policy constantly pursued by Mussolini and Hitler. They are the natural expression of their revolutions and the result of the position produced by the course of foreign policy and the party movements of the other Great Powers.

Political discussions have taken place between Mussolini and Hitler. Active contacts have been maintained between the two Foreign Ministers. The policy of the Rome-Berlin axis continues to develop and become more deeply rooted in its functions in accordance with the new position and the joint interests of the two Powers.

Two new events of great importance have occurred on the European stage since Mussolini's visit to Germany: the Anschluss of Austria with Germany and the signature of the agreement between Italy and Great Britain. It is unnecessary to repeat that these two events cannot affect the foundations and functions of the axis. It is equally unnecessary to repeat that they are in no way connected with each other.

The Italian view of the Anschluss was expressed with crystalline clearness and definite precision by Mussolini in his great speech in the Chamber on March 16th, 1938 and there is nothing to add to it. The Anschluss was immediately recognised in Italy as the inevitable parabola of the German policy of unification which is now approaching its conclusion. This attitude of rapid comprehension on the part of Italy, which made European policy the crystallisation point of the Austrian question, immediately removed the dramatic elements from the Anschluss and surrounded it with an atmosphere of general tranquility and diplomatic adhesion.

The axis has not been shaken. The position and the relationship of the two parties have on the contrary become clearer by the solution of that problem, in which European polemics desired to discover a subject of unavoidable collision. Certain European quarters, however, would like to think that the results of the new situation in Central Europe created by Greater Germany represents a danger for Italy. Italy does not follow these vain speculations but remains true and faithful to the essential principles of the axis. These principles which have imparted a vital force to this system are based on the solidarity of the revolutions, on the common views and proposals for the constructive settlement of the problem of European peace, namely on justice and equality of rights, on mutual understanding and mutual respect for the interests and rights of the two nations and on their deliberate cooperation.

All this is perfectly clear. Equally clear are the attitude and interests of Italy and Germany as recognised by the two Governments. In Berlin they know that Italy, although she is interested in all great European problems, bases her European foreign policy mainly on her vital interests and on the two poles of that policy: the Mediterranean and the Danube and Balkan areas. In Rome they know that Germany, as a European Great Power of importance in any case, has fundamental interests in the North Sea, in Eastern Europe on the Danube and in the Balkans. These are the guiding principles for mutual respect and cooperation. They have been, moreover, laid down in the Berlin Protocols. In fact they provide for the harmony of interests and measures in the Danube basin and therefore also in Balkan Europe, where economic and cultural tasks are only to be solved in frank cooperation between free, civilised and strong nations bound together by friendship. For this reason the system of the Italo-British agreement of April 16th can be confirmed without offending or affecting the spirit and premises of the Rome-Berlin axis. It deals with the Mediterranean and comprises problems which do not lie within the sphere of the Italo-German agreements. It tends towards clarification and peace in the relations between two great European Powers and is therefore in complete harmony with the functions of the axis. The political rapprochement with England is also one of the intentions of Germany.

The lines of Italian and German foreign policy and the conditions for their constant cooperation are, therefore, firm, clear, mutually understood and cordial. They are far from those tendencies which the peculiar speculative and manœuvring fantasy on the other side of the Alps puts forward in such expressions as "offers", "concessions" or "distribution of zones of influence and power", as the subjects of the conversations between Mussolini and Hitler.

Italy and Germany have a profound respect for each other but still maintain the respect for the just rights and interests of all other nations in Europe, great or small. Their policy aims at construction and is guided by the idea of a better, healthier, more enlightened and more harmonious Europe which will, ultimately be capable of resuming its civilising mission in the world, to which each nation can and must contribute.

Extract from the Leading Article in the "Gazzetta del Popolo" of May 5th, 1938.

While the Duce received an enthusiastic welcome in Germany, and particularly in Berlin, Hitler has been received, particularly in Rome, with no less warm manifestations of sympathy and satisfaction.

No order and no pressure can bring enormous masses of people together and cause them to demonstrate with such obvious spontaneity and fervour. It is necessary to point this out because, between the visit in Berlin and the visit in Rome, two events occurred which, according to tendentious interpretations in foreign countries, must or could have affected Italo-German relations, namely the Anschluss and the Anglo-Italian agreement.

But there has been no change, and the people have shown their approval. The Anschluss was disposed of in the Duce's speech in the Chamber on March 16th. That this event was to be foreseen and that certain accidental circumstances hastened its occurrence is now a matter of general conviction. The firm and loyal attitude of Italy prevented any tendency towards complications, and the accomplished fact was thus recognised by England and France.

The agreement between Italy and England admits of no anti-German interpretations for two substantial and exhaustive reasons: 1. because Germany herself desires an agreement with England, and the German Government at a time when the axis between Rome and Berlin did not yet exist but was only a subject of discussion gave it to be understood that it would be glad to see a rapprochement between Italy and England; 2. because the Italo-British agreement relates mainly to the Mediterranean and Africa, two areas of predominant concern for Italy in which Germany is not directly interested.

But some quarters insist on prophesying that Italian and German interests after the Anschluss will unavoidably come into conflict in the Danube basin. Such suppositions are obviously dictated by the desire so frequently expressed in the French press of weakening or destroying the axis. They have at most the value of insinuations.

The Italo-German agreement is neither improvised nor decrepit, for it is based on mutual psychological and political understanding, on mutual respect for sound State and military organisation, on the spiritual affinities between the two revolutions and the two régimes and on the concordant valuation of the common political and economic interests.

The axis was not an improvisation, and before Count Ciano placed his signature under the agreements which gave it legal sanction, it was clear and agreed upon that Italy, an imperial Great Power, though participating in all the great European and world questions, was particularly interested in questions relating to the Mediterranean, and to the Danube and Balkans. In the Mediterranean Italy has a vital interest, and in the Danube and Balkan area a market that is not only economic. It was equally clear and agreed upon that Germany, a great European Power, has fundamental interests in the North Sea, in Eastern Europe and in the Danube and Balkan area.

The recognition and guarantee of these reciprocal interests is naturally an essential part of the agreements. The fact that both Italy and Germany have great interests in the Danube and Balkan zones in no way implies that they must be in conflict. It is for this very reason that they came to an agreement in order to cooperate both in the political and economic sphere.

The insinuations, therefore, which aimed at raising difficulties in order to prepare for a weakening of the axis are devoid of all foundation. But there are other important reasons which guarantee the firmness of the axis, namely the defence of the common ideals against disorder and Bolshevism, the common will to save European culture in a peaceful manner, an identical decision not to divide Europe into opposing groups and thus to encourage and assist the reconstitution of European unity and cooperation with the western democracies. The conversations between the Duce and the Führer, together with those between Count Ciano and von Ribbentrop dealt with all these questions and will undoubtedly lead to the reinforcement of the agreement which has already been so beneficial to the two countries. Political reality recognises in the soundness of the Berlin-Rome axis a fundamental element in the restoration of order and the maintenance of Europe.

Extract from the Leading Article in the "Popolo d'Italia" of May 8th, 1938.

The speeches by the two great leaders represent a decisive stage in the history of Romanism and Germanism. The two mighty Powers, fundamental elements of European civilisation, have confirmed their solidarity in a manifestation which makes history.

The statements by Mussolini and Hitler on the Berlin May Field were of the greatest political significance. The statements in the Palazzo Venezia arise out of the existence of two great peoples and are carved in indelible letters in history. This was deeply felt in the solemn tone of Hitler's words, when he stated that his political testament to the German people was to consider the frontier of the Alps, erected by nature between the two nations, as intangible for all time.

These words, though written on the paper or parchment of the protocols, deserve to be carved in bronze or marble.

An understanding of honour was reached between two great nations who met in the struggle of the revolution and the force of the restoration, who knew each other in the manly and resolute will of a new life and who respect each other in a mutual proud valuation of their forces.

Romanism and Germanism which, after two thousand years, meet in pacific, firm and durable cooperation, owe profound thanks to the two men of genius who lead them. The event in the Palazzo Venezia would have been neither possible nor thinkable on the basis of common diplomacy or in the sphere of ordinary treaties of temporary scope. If it has been possible to conclude the understanding of peace and the treaty of honour between the two nations, this is due to the greatness of mind of the two leaders, whose stature will arise above the centuries.

Just as it is difficult to summarise the meaning of great poetry, it is equally difficult to outline shortly the scope of decisive historical events. The words of Mussolini and Hitler cannot be summarised. They will become rooted in the thoughts of the people and will be transmitted as a spiritual testament to future generations.

The Duce demanded for all equal conditions of justice, security and peace which can only be achieved if the elementary rights of every nation to live, to work and to defend itself are loyally recognised and if the political equilibrium is in accordance with the facts of historical forces by which it is constituted and determined.

In these sentences lies the mighty synthesis of a loyally understood international justice. By laying down these guiding rules Mussolini has indicated the course of a new history in Europe.

Extract from the Leading Article in the "Corriere della Sera" of May 8th, 1938

We consider it unnecessary to emphasise still further the importance of the two speeches pronounced in the Palazzo Venezia. Their unusual length, the undiplomatic clearness of their style, the vibrant tone in which they were pronounced and, in particular, the precision of their contents on which it will be difficult to cavil, are so many elements that characterise their great value. In fact they are two documents of high policy, which take their value directly from history. The entire world, that was anxiously awaiting them, will take note of them and must base itself on them in order to appreciate realistically the significance of this Rome meeting.

As had been foreseen this meeting resulted in a strengthening of the axis. The problems of common interest, examined with cordial reciprocal comprehension, were dealt with in a friendly manner and settled. A programme of joint action was examined and will be applied in cases which may appear suitable for the work of the two Governments. The friendship between the two countries has been not only confirmed, but deepened, by the conversations. It may almost be said that the axis has in a certain sense been exceeded.

Mussolini spoke of understanding: a word that translates the symbolism of the axis into precise political terms. But without wishing to quibble about words, it is above all necessary to keep to realities. These consist in the explicit statement by the Duce that Italo-German relations are placed under the sign of cooperation. To what end is this cooperation directed? It is to this that the expectations of the common adversaries—wavering between fear and malice—were directed, and it was on this point that the Duce wished to speak with particular emphasis. The Italo-German cooperation tends towards peace, but it must be that "just peace" which is based on the concrete, and not purely verbal, recognition of the rights of all, and that "secure peace" which can come only from direct discussions and sincere mutual agreements but not from the true or false acceptance of pacifist and collective ideologies.

To have removed the conception of peace from the utopian fields which are open to all hypocritical manoeuvres, into the field of reality and good will is the great and incomparable merit of the diplomacy of Mussolini, to which national socialist policy, by its adhesion, today corresponds and agrees.

The common character of the two speeches lies in their tone of great frankness and personal sympathy. The personal element is only of importance when such exceptional figures of rulers appear on the stage. In the present case, more than in any other, it may be stated that the humanity of these two great personalities is the expression of the historical laws which govern the lot of their respective peoples. Indeed, two "men of providence" spoke yesterday evening to the innumerable listeners in Italy, Germany and the world. Their work is in agreement inasmuch as it does not exclude any cooperation that may bring a period of laborious peace and healthy reconstruction to a Europe that is threatened not by one, but by several crises.

From the Leading Article in the "Gazzetta del Popolo" of May 8th, 1938

The German-Italian friendship has received a new, solemn and decisive confirmation. The statements by the two leaders have a dual substantial value: sincerity and perfect adherence to reality. After two thousand years Romans and Germans have again met and have become neighbours at their natural, geographical, ethnical and political frontier, and have concluded a pact of friendship and cooperation based on mutual understanding, on mutual respect and on common interests.

Particularly in view of all these psychological and political, historical and economic, cultural and military reasons, it may be said that the German-Italian friendship is founded on granite and is therefore destined to guard the future with proud security.

Mention has been made of a block of 120 million people. That is neither an exaggeration nor a boast, but in fact the result that the two great leaders have desired and the two nations have sanctioned.

The results of the visit are clearly indicated in the two speeches, without its being necessary to follow the arbitrary conjectures of the foreign press: sincere and profound friendship and close cooperation in all fields. Even in foreign countries no other result was to be expected. All prophecies of new pacts, of the exchange of supports, of divisions of spheres of influence, and all the suggestions of alleged threats on one hand or another such as have been voiced in these days by certain irresponsible newspapers, have collapsed, together with the insinuations of those who spoke of a weakening of the axis and a cooling of the friendship.

In foreign countries the impression of the two speeches cannot be unfavourable. For there is nothing alarming in them. Italy and Germany are prepared to fight only against the disintegrating forces, just as they are decided to reject any attempt to hinder the natural development of the two countries.

The work of clearing up the European situation and the rapprochement, which has been so happily initiated by Mussolini with the agreement with England, will receive fresh impulses for continuation and extension from the visit of the Führer. Italy and Germany demand nothing more than comprehension and respect for their elementary rights.

THE EASTER ROME PEACE ⁽¹⁾

Reflections on the Anglo-Italian Agreement of April 16th, 1938

Rome, April 16th, 1938.

The Stefani Agency reports :

"The Minister of Foreign Affairs, Count Ciano, and the British Ambassador, Lord Perth, signed the Anglo-Italian Agreement to-day at 6.30 p.m. in the Palazzo Chigi. After the signature, Count Ciano proceeded to the Palazzo Venezia to report to the Duce."

With these brief words the public was informed on the Saturday before Easter of the conclusion of an understanding by which a three-year conflict between London and Rome was brought to an end, thus removing a source of danger of the first importance for European peace.

The marble tablets with the proud verdict against the 52 sanctionist States are still hanging on all Italian town halls. Though peace has in the meantime been restored and 34 of these States have up to the present recognised de jure the Roman Empire, the Italian people still retain the memory of those dark days when the Geneva sanctions machinery was used under the leadership of the British mechanic Eden with a view to "strangling" that people. "We have not yet forgotten this", cried the Duce again in his recent Genoa speech. Nevertheless, in order to remove a still greater danger to peace, he did not hesitate, after the path had been cleared by the retirement of Eden, to grasp the hand of understanding held out to him by the British Prime Minister, Mr. Chamberlain, who, it will be remembered, on June 10th, 1936, at the time when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his speech in the 1900 Club in London made the proposal to remove the sanctions which had become a form of madness.

The unreal position of Anglo-Italian relations, covered by the mists of League ideals and a policy of self-interest, which had been brought about by the former Foreign Secretary, Mr. Eden, after the fall of his predecessor, Sir Samuel Hoare, with his realistic ideas and actions, in December 1935, is shown mainly by the fact that, immediately after his retirement on February 20th, negotiations, for which in the first place feelers had been put out, were seriously started on March 9th in Rome and, after the short space of six weeks, led to one of the most comprehensive agreements that have ever been concluded. The view taken by Chamberlain and Mussolini that the real background of the apparently deep-rooted differences between London and Rome were based rather on intangible and psychological than on material grounds proved to be correct. England had allowed herself to be driven by her League fanatics and by rabid anti-Fascist agitation into an anti-Italian feeling against which Mussolini used every political, military and propagandist means in order to maintain his position. Constant crises arose, in which a single premature step might have led to war. But he avoided such a step and, on the contrary, constantly stated in his numerous speeches that the conquest of Abyssinia involved no threat to British interests in the Sudan or Arabia, nor was the Italian support of Nationalist Spain in her fight against Bolshevism and Communism inspired by any egoistic, territorial or economic interests or aspirations. On the other hand he left no doubt that Italy, as a young and growing great nation, would not rest in advancing her claims to living room and living possibilities—which had moreover been promised by Italy's former allies though they had been forgotten after the victory—and would secure these claims by founding a new Empire and by obtaining its recognition by the other Powers.

On May 9th, 1936, after the unexpectedly rapid subjection of Abyssinia, this Empire was proclaimed by Mussolini in Rome. But, after an attempt had been made with inadequate and unsuitable means in the Anglo-Italian Mediterranean Agreement of January 2nd, 1937 and the Nyon arrangements on September 1937 which showed a certain turn in British policy, the removal of Eden from the post of Foreign Secretary was needed in order to bring about the change of course which finds expression in this Agreement.

This change of course means no more and no less than that Great Britain now recognises the Roman Empire as possessing fully equal rights. When therefore the phrase regarding the "renewal of the traditional friendship" between the two Powers is so often used, the historical fact underlying this expression entirely overlooks the present position.

This difference cannot be better formulated than was done by the "Gazzetta del Popolo" on April 17th. It writes :

"The famous 'traditional Italo-British friendship' was really a euphemistic expression signifying the obsequious dependence of Italian on British policy. The British Liberals, with Lord Palmerston at their head, regarded Italy as a kind of larger Portugal, as the great pawn in the Mediterranean that was to play its part on the great imperialist chessboard against France. And the Italian statesmen and politicians, in order to obtain British support for their efforts at unity, became entirely accustomed to regarding Italy as the decisive factor in the British game in the Mediterranean. It is true that, in the shadow of this 'traditional friendship', Italy was able to start her first Mediterranean policy and to put into effect her first African acquisitions, though naturally on condition that she did not exceed the extremely narrow limits set by London to her freedom of action. It is true that, in the shadow of this 'traditional friendship', Italy's first ships were able to put to sea, since it was natural that, in case of a European crisis, they would be used as auxiliary ships of the British navy. And the brave battalions of Saletta were able to land on the coast of Erythrea since they were very useful in holding up Abyssinians and dervishes from the Sudan while Gordon and Kitchener advanced. The 'traditional friendship' was nothing more than a formula which characterised the position between the two countries for fifty years, namely the supremacy of England and the dependence of Italy. This 'traditional friendship' has now come to an end. It was liquidated by the unanimous will of Italy which has by means of Fascism reached its complete political and military majority. Anyone who today is still accustomed to believe in or express the views of the last century is behind the times.

What at present exists between Italy and England and is expressed in the Rome agreements is something quite different. It is no longer a traditional, but a quite new, friendship, in which England expressly recognises the position attained by Italy in the world and abandons the sort of moral protectorate which it maintained during the risorgimento and which lasted for fifty years. In respect of the Italy of 1938, the ruler of Abyssinia and the victor in Spain, England has recognised that the old positions can no longer be maintained. With the unprejudiced objectivity which is peculiar to her and which has characterised British policy for centuries, she has noted that it is in her interest to deal with Italy on other terms, namely on the basis of cooperation between the two countries."

(1) See No. 14, 1938, of this Journal.

The decisive importance of the agreement itself lies therefore, as is indicated by the remarks of the heads of the two Governments, not so much in its individual provisions as rather in the atmosphere which it created. It is therefore idle to calculate, as is the habit in certain quarters, which of the two Powers has made the better bargain. England and Italy can both expect nothing but advantages from the end of the previous position of tension. Moreover, the new friendship on which the agreement is based may also be a bridge for a new agreement with other States if they desire it sincerely and without ulterior motives.

It is also a fact of fundamental importance that the work of agreement has been brought about by two representatives of different views and ideologies, the democratic and the authoritarian. The view taken for a long time past by Hitler and Mussolini that the direct method of bilateral negotiations is the only one which will give satisfactory results to both parties has again proved to be correct. The agreement therefore makes no reference to the League of Nations. This is moreover not affected by the fact that the British Foreign Secretary, Lord Halifax, brought it to the knowledge of the League Council at its meeting on May 10th. The discussion which followed, however, showed that, with the exception of the Soviet representative Litvinov and the Red Spanish Foreign Minister del Vayo, both the result and the method that led to it were approved and welcomed by all other Members of the Council.

Another characteristic of the agreement is the fact that steps are taken for its bilateral revision. In this connection the "Times" makes the following interesting remark:

"Half the troubles of Europe arise from the failure of the peacemakers to devise a workable arrangement for the adjustment of their decisions to changing circumstances. It is true that Article XIX was inserted into the covenant, but the machinery was so clumsy and ill-defined that its utilization was hardly ever attempted. There are also specific arrangements for the reconsideration of certain Articles. The lesson has been learned and it may be hoped that it will never be forgotten."

We do not need to go into the details of the agreement in view of the clear and unequivocal text which deals minutely with every particular. But even a cursory glance shows immediately that there is an essential difference between this and the Gentlemen's Agreement of January 2nd. That agreement dealt solely with a limited geographical area, namely the Mediterranean, and the academic declaration which it contained did not penetrate deeply into political problems. The new agreement goes far beyond the confines of the Mediterranean and extends from the Canary Islands to the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb, from Palestine to Kenya, that is to say from the Atlantic to the Indian Ocean and from Asia Minor to East Africa. The old British Empire and the new Italian Empire have thus for the first time agreed on the basis of moral, political and military equality of rights. In the agreement no condition is imposed on Italy which does not find its counterpart in a condition imposed on England. The individual agreements are a classical example of do ut des, and are typical of the British expression give and take. They have not therefore the character of an armistice, but of the conclusion of political peace.

Of the two great problems that occupied the first rank in Italian policy, the first, which had been artificially nourished by the Austrian buffer State, namely the safeguarding of the Alp frontier, has been removed by the guarantee of the Führer. There is now no uncleanness or doubt in the relations of the two countries. The second problem, namely expansion in the Mediterranean, which is based on geopolitical conditions, and the expansion in North Africa which is necessary on demographic grounds, was solved by the foundation of the new Empire on May 9th, 1936 and by its recognition in the Anglo-Italian agreement of April 16th, 1938.

In order to bring about and stabilise real peace in Europe, two new stages have been reached, thanks to the Rome-Berlin axis and the policy of the Chamberlain-Halifax Government, which takes its stand on realities and abandons fictions and illusions. It is now only to be hoped that the two sources of danger which may still menace this peace, namely the civil war in Spain and the problem of the Sudeten Germans in Czechoslovakia, may be brought as rapidly and fundamentally to an adequate solution.

THE ANGLO-ITALIAN AGREEMENT OF APRIL 16TH, 1938 BEFORE THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

On April 16th the Easter Agreement was the subject of a detailed debate in the House of Commons, in which the Government moved that the House should approve the results of the recent Anglo-Italian negotiations as contained in the Rome agreement of April 16th, 1938.

In the course of this discussion, the Prime Minister, Mr. Chamberlain, gave a detailed account of the contents of the agreement and its previous history; in view of the fundamental importance of this speech, we give the following extracts from the text.

The British Foreign Secretary, Lord Halifax, made similar statements in the session of the League Council on May 10th in notifying the conclusion of the agreement.

After the conclusion of the discussion in the House of Commons, the Government motion was adopted by 316 to 108 votes, i.e. a majority of 208.

Extract from Mr. Chamberlain's Speech.

"I do not think it will be necessary for me this afternoon to delve very deeply into past history but at the same time if we are to obtain a proper consideration of the agreement I think it is an essential preliminary that I should say something about the conditions which prevailed before it was signed."

Mr. Chamberlain again gave an account of the development of Anglo-Italian relations from the Abyssinian conflict until April 16th, 1938, and then proceeded as follows:

"Before I come to examine the details of the agreement, I should like to say one or two words about its place in the general scheme of the Government's foreign policy. As the House has been informed on numerous occasions, the purpose of their general foreign policy is not only to establish peace but, if possible, to restore the general confidence that peace can and will be maintained, because without that confidence no progress is possible in international affairs. We can only obtain that confidence if we can succeed in removing grievances, differences, and suspicions which may, if unchecked, lead to war. That is not a task which can be accomplished in a moment or all at once, but if we can remove the danger spots one by one we may in time find ourselves in a position to arrive at the goal at which we are aiming.

No one can doubt, I think, that before the signing of this agreement the relations between Italy and this country and between Italy and France constituted one of those danger spots. His Majesty's Government believe that that danger could be eliminated by the application of good will and common sense to problems which arose, as we believe, very largely out of want of trust and confidence between us. But to accomplish that it was necessary to face facts, however unpalatable those facts may be. It is in our willingness to face realities which we cannot change and to make the best of them.

This agreement has been designed to cover comprehensively the whole ground of relations between ourselves and Italy in certain areas of the world, and it paves the way for our future cooperation and understanding in those areas in which our interests are found to be parallel. The areas in question are the Mediterranean, the North East corner of Africa, and the Middle East. It deals with the future. It lays down certain guiding principles which should be taken to inspire our policy, not only to one another but also the policy of both of us to other Powers, and it contains, as right hon. and hon. members will have seen, four separate but correlated sections.

First of all, there is the protocol itself, signed by Lord Perth and Count Ciano, to which are attached eight annexes. Then comes an exchange of Notes between the two negotiators, and, thirdly, there is a bon voisinage agreement to which Egypt is a party so far as her interests are affected, and finally there is an exchange of Notes between Lord Perth and Count Ciano on the one hand and the Egyptian Minister in Rome on the other, the effect of which is to associate Egypt with two declarations in the main agreement."

The question of Palestine was not directly mentioned in the agreement and this gave rise to discussions in the British press and questions in the House of Commons. Mr. Chamberlain made the following statement on this subject:

"In case anybody should think that Palestine is purposely left out, I should like to mention that the subject of Palestine was also discussed between Lord Perth and Count Ciano, and that as a result the Italian Minister for Foreign Affairs has given our Ambassador an oral assurance that the Italian Government will abstain from creating difficulties or embarrassment for his Majesty's Government in the administration of Palestine and our Ambassador has given similar oral assurances that his Majesty's Government for their part intend to preserve and protect legitimate Italian interests in that country.

Mr. Dalton.—Why was this left oral and not included in the document?

Mr. Chamberlain.—I have some difficulty in saying what the reason was, but at any rate the matter was not considered to be quite of the same order as the other matters which are made the subject of written exchanges, but we ourselves are perfectly satisfied with the oral declarations which we have received, and on the other hand I think I can say that the Italian Government are perfectly satisfied with the oral declarations we have given in return."

With regard to the agreements on Spain, Mr. Chamberlain added:

"Those are important declarations. They are what I suppose are alluded to by the Opposition in their amendment as illusory promises. I wish to state on the other hand that his Majesty's Government accept them as being given in good faith, and believe that the Italian Government intend to keep them in the spirit as well as in the letter. If you are to come to an agreement with another party with whom you have had differences, it is essential that you should approach the negotiations in a spirit of trust. Just as mistrust breeds mistrust, so does trust breed trust. I have no doubt that time will show who is right on that matter and at present we had better leave it at that."

With regard to the British attitude towards the question of Abyssinia, Mr. Chamberlain said:

"With regard to the question of the recognition of the Italian conquest of Ethiopia I would like to remind the House that a number of different States members of the League whose loyalty to the League cannot be questioned have taken a different view on this matter from that held by his Majesty's Government. They have taken the view that collective obligations in this matter were discharged on July 4, 1936, when the Assembly of the League passed a resolution abolishing the sanctions. It is their view, therefore, that States members were consequently free to take whatever action seemed good to them in the light of their own situation, and what they considered to be their own obligations.

That is a perfectly comprehensible view, and a good number of powerful and convincing arguments can be brought forward in support of it. His Majesty's Government do not desire to criticize any States who have taken that view, but so far as they are concerned they, in common with many others, have held that this is not a question which concerns ourselves alone, but that it is one which requires consideration by the appropriate organ, the League.

The result of this difference of opinion is that some of those who took part in collective action have already recognized the Italian position in Ethiopia. Others again have taken action which implies recognition or seems to imply recognition. Others again have taken no action at all. The result of that is a confused and anomalous situation, a situation which does require clearing up. His Majesty's Government have taken the first step towards clarification by asking the Secretary-General to place an item dealing with this question on the agenda of the forthcoming meeting of the Council, which they consider to be the appropriate organ.

Let me make one or two points clear. First of all our action does not mean that we condone or that we approve the methods by which Italy obtained control of Abyssinia. Secondly, it does not mean that we are going to ask the League to modify any resolution or any decision which it took during the period of the conquest. The League has expressed its judgment on the whole affair in the plainest possible terms, and there will be no going back on that. In the third place, we do not intend to ask any other State to take any action which they might deem incompatible with their obligations.

There is something further. Neither any action which we have taken, nor any action which we may ask the Council to take, in itself constitutes recognition. It neither binds us nor anyone else to recognition. The act of recognition remains within the sovereign rights of each individual State. In other words, in so far as this country is concerned the time and circumstances of recognition remain within our own discretion. I have always maintained myself, and many I think agree with me, that the only circumstances in which recognition could be morally justified would be if it was shown to be an essential feature of a general appeasement. That is the position of the Government to-day.

The Mediterranean agreement is a step towards a general appeasement.

Mr. Bellenger (Bassetlaw, Lab.).—What is the exact legal position? Is it de facto or de jure?

Mr. Chamberlain.—It is not de jure anyway, if the hon. member means at the present moment. On coming into force it will certainly be de jure. What I was saying was that the justification for recognition de jure would be that it was an essential factor in getting back to a general appeasement. I do not think we could feel that we had got back, or that we were taking steps towards general appeasement, unless at the same time we could see that a Spanish settlement was within reach. That is the reason why we have made this Spanish settlement a pre-requisite of the entry into force of this instrument, and a pre-requisite therefore of the recognition of the Italian conquest.

Mr. Attlee (Limehouse, Lab.).—What does the right hon. gentleman mean by a settlement?

Mr. Chamberlain.—I prefer not to give a definition of it. At this stage it would be wrong to try to define the circumstances in which one could say that a settlement had been arrived at. It may be that later on we shall get nearer the time when we can give a definition.

I cannot tell the House even when this protocol and annex will come into force. No doubt, the situation will clear itself up as time goes on."

After explaining the details of the agreement, Mr. Chamberlain said:

"I think that is all I need say on the question of recognition but I would like to tell the House that all through these negotiations we have been in the closest touch with the Dominions, who have been advised of the progress of them from the very beginning.

Then, of course, our special relations with France have naturally led us to keep her informed of our general intentions, and I think the House knows that the French Government have expressed their warm approval of our action. Not only do they approve what we have done, but they have paid us the sincerest flattery by deciding themselves to enter into conversations with the Italian Government, in the hope of concluding an agreement which, I understand, they expect to be of a similar character; and if they should be successful in that end one may say that a further step will have been taken towards the clearing of the European horizon. France is not alone in approving of this agreement, for we have had a message from the Balkan Entente, through their Chairman, of warm congratulation upon the result. I think I may say that the Press of Europe, with hardly an exception, has given a sincere welcome to this agreement; and it will not have escaped the attention of hon. members that the President of the United States has signified his sympathetic interest, and considers that this affords proof of the value of peaceful negotiations.

In this almost universal chorus of approval is it not strange to find only the two parties opposite regretting and opposing an agreement which has done so much to lighten the tension in Europe and to avert the danger of war?

For my own part I repudiate the idea that it is impossible for democracies to come to terms and to understandings with States where authoritarian ideas prevail.

This agreement proves the contrary. I myself am encouraged by what has happened to hope that we have taken only the first step towards a healthier and a saner state of things in Europe. I believe that for Italy and ourselves this agreement marks the beginnings of a new era."

After violent criticism by the two opposition parties, Mr. Butler, Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, replied.

He said the debate had made it clear that among Opposition members there were perplexity and muddle. Their paucity of argument had obliged them to indulge in personal criticism of the Prime Minister. That really needed no answer because the leadership of his right hon. friend was clear both to the House and to the country. The effect of his policy of constructive conciliation had been eminently successful.

He (Mr. Butler) entirely repudiated the suggestion that it had been necessary to trump up this agreement to save the Prime Minister's reputation. In fact this agreement coincided with the settlement of the age-long dispute with the Irish Free State, it coincided with successful talks with the French Minister, so that the entente with France had never been more real, and it coincided with the moment when the Government was working for a trade agreement with America. It was not surprising that the Prime Minister was being known throughout the country as the man of agreement.

When Mr. Lloyd George said that the agreement would not ensure permanent peace, could he say that the Treaty of Versailles, on which so many hopes were rested, ensured permanent peace? Did the Holy Alliance ensure permanent peace? Did even the Treaty of Locarno, conceived as it was in a spirit of the highest idealism, ensure permanent peace? It was surely demanding from any treaty or agreement an extremely high standard to demand that, at the moment of signature, it should ensure permanent peace.

There had been a tendency in the parties opposite to distrust all assurances that came from the head of a Dictator State. They did not seem to envisage it as possible that an agreement could be made with the head of a State with whose internal politics they did not agree. They seemed to believe that the best way to get peace and conciliation in our time was to disbelieve, to distrust, and to malign the intentions of the heads of foreign States.

He had hoped that there would have been some expressions of hope from the parties opposite that the agreement with Italy would succeed; instead there had been long and sustained political attacks.

If we were not to have a pact because it meant alliances, what were we to have? If the three Great Powers—Italy, Germany, and Japan—were eliminated from a possible collective peace system and if the other 20 Powers were also eliminated for the same reason, it would be difficult to pick an international team. If this agreement did anything at all, it smoothed difficulties and lessened potential tension between our two great countries over a vast area.

Far from being an alliance, this pact was not directed against any other Power. Rather than increase it should tend to diminish armament rivalry.

This debate had revealed fundamental differences of spirit in the conduct of our foreign policy. The Government's wish was to clear away all disagreements and clear the ground so that the plant of peace might grow. No one wanted war, but hate—and derogatory remarks such as they had heard to-day bred hate—would never cast it from the peoples of the earth. He was reminded of some words of the younger Pitt when he had to deal with a foreign situation as difficult as the one the Government were dealing with to-day, that difficulties when they are faced with a noble and manly vigour are more than half redressed.

THE SESSION OF THE LEAGUE COUNCIL

101st Session from May 9th to 14th, 1938

One country that has been extinguished from the political map of the world, a second country that compromises with the powerlessness of the League, a third country that frees itself from dangerous collective obligations, a fourth country that announces its withdrawal—these were the main themes of discussion in this session of the Council. It must be specially stressed that they were subjects of debate. There was no question of proceedings which might have led to practical political decisions. These debates had one common denominator: the League cannot help.

In his farewell speech on May 14th, the Chilean representative, M. Edwards, gave the reason for the decline of the League which has occurred: "Out of 42 political disputes that have been dealt with by the League since it has existed, 11 merely related to the liquidation by the Council of matters arising out of the War. The other 31 disputes were settled by direct negotiations between the Parties or by other international organs, or they brought about a withdrawal from the League or were abandoned or left in suspense".

The Member States could not overlook this result. There are only two Members of the League that show conspicuous fanaticism in retaining the juridical status quo of the League Covenant, i.e. Soviet Russia and Red Spain.

This is the cause of the confused position which may result in every possible harmful effect, but not in such a safeguard of world peace by this institution as would inspire confidence. There are at present those who have formal right on their side under the Covenant of whom everyone knows that they pursue their own ideals and political objects. Those who are formally wrong under the Covenant today are on the one hand its founders and on the other hand its most loyal Members, who are compelled to place peace higher than the maintenance of antiquated theoretical principles.

This abnormal position is further aggravated by the desire that it should continue. Whatever may happen, whether Bolshevism gets this Geneva apparatus entirely under its influence or however often the Members pursue their own policy against the Covenant, this League must continue to exist as an organisation whose meetings are attended out of tradition and custom.

The correspondent of a Swiss daily newspaper coined the right expression for this session of the Council: a t m o s p h e r e of u n r e a l i t y.

Thirty-four States, almost all Members of the League of Nations, recognise the Italian Empire. Great Britain, in agreement with France, takes the decisive step in Geneva in order to put an end to an abnormal position. The advisors of the Negus cause him to appear. In spite of fine speeches it is decided by a majority of the Council that every Member of the League must draw its own conclusions from political facts. This is the end of the Abyssinian question. But the Council as such has not the courage or the logic to bring to its conclusion from the point of view of League law a conquest recognised by the majority of its own Members. As a result, Abyssinia will remain a paper Member of the League of Nations probably until its end. Atmosphere of unreality.

Atmosphere of unreality! That is also the case with China. The League of Nations passes a resolution expressing sympathy for China. While in this case China is urged on by League circles of whom it is known that they again intend to set collectivity in motion for their own ends, the theoretical adherent of this principle, the Chinese representative Wellington Koo, points out the powerlessness of the League which cannot help—apart from financial support, which in practice would amount to the remittance of arrears of contributions to the League—and his speech indicates resignation at the lack of assistance from Geneva.

Atmosphere of unreality! The National Spanish victory appears before the eyes of all as a fact which will shortly occur. The Red Spanish representative, del Vayo, has nothing behind him but a certificate that he belongs incidentally to the Government against which the Spanish people have risen. In virtue of this certificate, the Red Spanish representative is permitted on this League tribune to pronounce the most offensive speeches against two of the greatest European nations. Everyone is aware of the intentions of these tribunes which act under the command of M. Litvinov, namely to extend this civil war into a European war. This is the only hope from which they can expect salvation. The establishment of Bolshevism in Spain is the last trump card in Litvinov's foreign policy. It is already clear that he has played it and lost. It is only in Geneva that it is still possible to reshuffle the cards by misleading methods of procedure, and this session of the Council presents the spectacle of M. del Vayo speaking for hours with the object of maintaining Red Spain for ever as a paper member of the League.

Atmosphere of unreality! A country that was a member of the League for eighteen years, Chile, whose representatives at Geneva were at the same time great exponents of international laws, takes up the hard struggle of conscience with a view to making the League something better than it has hitherto been. "In our view a coercive League of Nations such as we now have must inevitably be universal. If it is not, the States which are Members of it do not constitute a League of Nations but an alliance. The ideal embodied in the Covenant was the ideal of a universal and coercive League. But the developments and experiences of eighteen years are there to show that the ideal is unattainable for a long time to come. In presence of this political reality we believe the moment has come to remodel the Covenant and to make the League de jure what it is de facto. My Government regards the maintenance of the juridical status quo of the Covenant as fatal to peace. Chile therefore considers it impossible to continue to be a member of the League of Nations if articles of the Covenant which are not and cannot be applied remain in theory in the political structure of the League as it exists".

The "idealists" of the League gained the victory over Chile. They achieved the adjournment of the Reform Committee sine die. They have finally got rid of an awkward "realist" after openly maligning him as the tool of Germany and Italy.

Atmosphere of unreality! One country, Switzerland, after the failure of the sanctionist campaign against Italy, realises that her return to complete neutrality has become a political necessity, for even economic sanctions have proved to be military sanctions. Out of loyalty Switzerland brings her decisions in this connection to the knowledge of the League Council. Only the 150 % League Member, Soviet Russia, does not recognise the point of view of Switzerland and abstains from voting. Litvinov, in the tone of a schoolmaster, hides behind gracious phrases his threats and aspersions against other Members of the League. He makes such remarks as these: in case of an aggression Switzerland has now no right to count on the help of Members of the League; a dangerous precedent has been created for "deserters", and the consequence of such "releases" and unilateral declarations is ultimately to undermine certain obligations under the Covenant and to lead to the destruction of the League. Soviet Russia as an advocate of morality! Atmosphere of unreality!

A further case of the atmosphere of unreality. Has it ever happened in the world, is there any historical proof, or can such proof be found that there is any private club, even a sports club, whose members make such statements as the following at their meetings? We have set up fine rules. When we are at home we must unfortunately apply other rules. Should this be contrary to our statutes—and we openly admit that it is—we will nevertheless give each other a certificate that we are faithful members.

We do not propose to enter into the deeper meaning of such a "democratic procedure". As far as the League of Nations is concerned, it should merely be pointed out that the Great Powers belonging to it pursue their own international policy even against the League. Consequently the loyal members still remaining are mostly the small States. But they can perhaps be glad that in their future League work they have at their disposal that "immense value of procedure" to which a Soviet newspaper recently referred when, for instance, M. del Vayo succeeded unexpectedly by means of this procedure in again bringing the Council into complete confusion, so that even the British representative, who is not so easily upset, put an end to this procedure by simply stating that M. del Vayo's draft resolution was contrary to the policy of his Government.

As it may be assumed that high policy will always be carried on elsewhere than at Geneva, the small States have perhaps only one small interesting pastime left, namely to meditate on idealistic and realistic policy. As the cases dealt with by this session of the Council—Abysinia, China, Spain and Switzerland—have already come under the heading of a dispute between "idealists" and "realists", the preparatory work of the experts will undoubtedly be of use to them. The plan is already established. Let us take the concrete case of the Anglo-Italian agreement as an example. The Member of the Council, the United Kingdom, makes a statement to the effect that it has reached an agreement with an outside party, Italy, which must be regarded as a contribution to general peace. One Member of the Council after another rises to confirm this. One Member is even so bold as to take this agreement as an example of the usefulness of the method of bilateral negotiations, upon which M. Litvinov automatically throws suspicion on the bilateral method. Then the Council passes to its agenda. Until the year 2000 the agenda will be somewhat as follows: 1. Consequences arising out of the denunciation of the Locarno agreement; 2. Fixing of the date of the next meeting of the Bureau of the Disarmament Conference; 3. Consequences arising out of Italy's "action" in East Africa; 4. Proposal by the former Red Spanish Government in respect of payment by the present Government of Spain of pensions etc. The final resolution will end somewhat as follows: the debates in these meetings have again shown the value of the League system of collective security, so that an appeal is addressed to the members to revive these methods by every means in their power.

The small States must now bear the burden which the founders of this institution placed upon it and upon the world. And today when there is so much talk of idealism and realism the Geneva atmosphere of unreality should be recognised by what was left of Wilson's first draft of the Covenant in 1920, when the League was first instituted.

In the meantime, times have greatly changed, so that at this 101st session of the Council, the Representative of the United Kingdom had to say:

"Two ideals are in conflict—on the one hand, the ideal of devotion, unflinching but unpractical, to some high purpose; on the other, the ideal of a practical victory for peace. In an imperfect world, the indefinite maintenance of a principle, evolved to safeguard international order, without regard to the circumstances in which it has to be applied, may have the effect of increasing international discord."

But what heavy guns have been brought up by the "neo-idealists" against such an attitude! Triumph of baseness! Short-sighted collective spirit! Violated right remains right! Diplomacy against the Covenant is diplomacy against peace! Outside the Covenant is War!

The present front of the "League idealists" is indeed a most remarkable community. One thing cannot be denied it, namely the cleverness of its propaganda which is successful in suppressing historical facts.

The League Covenant is a part of the Treaty of Versailles. It is the re-insurance treaty of satiated victors as regards reciprocity in the defence of their advantage. In the name of collective security, the authors of this Covenant—and that is why the United States did not accept it—desired to draw a line under world history. This object is served principally by the fact that in the pro-League press Article 10 of the Covenant, in conjunction with Article 16, is advanced as one of its most important pillars. In the year 1938 these "idealists" take up the same position as in 1919. Article 10 still signifies for them at the present time nothing more than the sanctioning of their territorial conquests together with a demarcation of frontiers that was foolish and immoral from the point of view of the principle of nationality. It is therefore also foolish and immoral that other States, which were not so much invited as forced into the League, should be compelled under Article 16 to defend with economic and military means conquests and decisions of 1919 in which they took no part.

The sincere attempts to make something better of the League should not be denied. But they have failed and the position remains unchanged. To the surprise of many a sincere Member, it has become clearer with each fresh session that the League has served and still serves special interests, and that its prescribed duty is to place fetters on the natural development of the nations. The exclusion of Article 19 (Revision) has been in the course of years the real barometer for ascertaining who exclusively ruled this political union.

As regards this category of "idealists", historical events in recent years have shown that, in spite of everything, they have suffered shipwreck. A higher truth has come to the fore. It finds expression in the fact that the obligations towards an artificial and apparently legal construction have been found insupportable for statesmen who place peace higher than the League of Nations.

But this community of "idealists" which arranges to meet on the day of every League session in the "Rassemblement universel pour la paix" and set up watchwords for humanity and whose President is Lord Cecil and Honorary President M. Herriot, may be called remarkable for another reason. In the last few years it has acquired a fresh adherent. At one time he made them world-wide competition. But after he had started to come to Geneva and put on evening clothes, things were not so bad. But the fact that evening clothes may also be a war strategy—a sort of "Trojan horse"—is best shown by an enumeration of the speakers in the Executive Committee of the "Rassemblement universel pour la paix" which met on this occasion. The former French Air Minister, Pierre Cot, who became particularly notorious as a result of the Spanish civil war, was in the chair. The speakers at the meeting included the French socialist and permanent League delegate, M. Gumbach, the Spanish woman communist Nelken, the French communist Cachin, the Red Spanish delegate Lopez, the Soviet Russian League delegate Shverning and the Czechoslovak deputy Kosak. The resolutions regarding Spain, Abyssinia, China and Czechoslovakia were solemnly handed over to the League of Nations. They contained the well-known aspersions against Germany and Italy and the challenges to "fascism and dictatorships". The arguments were literally the same as those advanced by Litvinov and del Vayo in the Council. "It is quite clear who is pulling the strings which have unfortunately a tragic background for the whole world. M. Litvinov, moreover, takes no trouble to hide the fact." This is the judgment given by the "Neue Zürcher Zeitung" of May 12th, 1938 on the attempts of the "Rassemblement universel pour la paix" to influence the League of Nations.

Since the admission of Soviet Russia to the League, there has not been a single session at Geneva without offensive speeches against Germany and Italy. These two countries were described at the last Assembly by the Red Spanish delegate del Vayo as "hors la loi". This fact is also one of the reasons for the decline of the League of Nations which is today so obvious. Instead of discussing abnormal circumstances which the case of Abyssinia involves for the troubled spirits of the League of Nations, it would be better and more in the interest of peace for once to establish the reason why communism puts itself forward as the defender of an instrument formerly created by the victors of the "capitalist" countries and their "corrupt bourgeois" Governments. It is obvious that no one will think of this. But there is no object in insisting on the fact. For the cleaning up of the Europe created in 1919 and the securing of world peace is already being done without the help of Geneva. The chancelleries in most of the capitals of Europe have already decided upon what this session of the Council was merely able to record, namely the application of direct methods of understanding. They have won a victory over the labyrinth of the collective security system for the simple reason that the game of hide-and-seek with its hypocritical forms was bound in the long run to be disastrous to all. The Great Powers that possess the main influence in the League of Nations have themselves caused the political Geneva institute to be superfluous. For eighteen years of Geneva are eighteen years of unceasing efforts to put into force a collective security that is solely in the interest of a few States. The time was bound to come when most of the States would be faced by the alternative as to whether the only States to count in Europe would be France and her allies and also whether they could in their own interest admit that the interference of Moscow in European affairs should become more unrestrained from day to day. The founders of the League have also become its destroyers. "Collective security" has cut itself out, and that is a good thing. In this connection only is this session of the Council of any importance; in the recommendation by the majority of the Council that account should be taken of "Realpolitik" in so far as onesided decisions in certain cases are in accordance with reason and in the interests of the States themselves, some Members have at any rate seen that it is wise not to come into hostile relations with Germany and Italy by means of those unreal League theories the egoistic application of which brought about their withdrawal. Thus the "disavowing" of the principles of the Covenant is perhaps the first ray of hope of the restoration of normal relations in particular between European countries. But the hope that peace in Europe can still be established through the intermediary of the League of Nations has become more than ever an illusion.

The "Independence Belge" of April 20th, after reviewing the position, reached the following conclusion: "A policy of peace is also possible outside the League of Nations; in fact it is at present only possible outside the League. In recent times the greatest threat to peace has been that the idea of peace has been bound up with the idea of Geneva and that peace has been regarded as the equivalent of an ideological system which, as it did not work, only led to an irksome and purely negative rigidity and immovability."

Though on this occasion, apart from the obstruction to be expected from the Soviet Union and Red Spain, in which the enfant terrible of the League, the representative of New Zealand, joined, it was clear from the statements of the other speakers that they had learned something from previous mistakes, most of them stated that they continued to adhere to the ideals of the League. In this connection some of them probably thought less of the maintenance of the ideals than of the maintenance of the institution which was created to put those ideals into effect but which in practice in the past twenty years has grossly abused those principles.

This failure to recognise all the demands of practical politics since the War and especially in the immediate present has led to a further withdrawal from the League. The reasons given by the representative of Chile have again shown how lightly it is overlooked in all the pleadings for the League and the accusations against its opponents that these charges are by no means directed against the idea of a peaceful and healthy community of nations such as was embodied in President Wilson's points, but against the distortion in practice which is solely adapted to certain one-sided interests in which the small nations are thought good enough to be used behind the mask of a brilliant ideal in favour of the definite egoistic special interests of the other Great Powers.

If Germany and Italy have finally reached the conviction that useful work in the interest of peace can only be performed by means of direct contact between the parties concerned, not the last reason for this is the bitter experience that in the Geneva sphere of bargaining and intrigue an atmosphere of a proper sense of community and loyal comradeship is impossible.

THE "LIQUIDATION" OF THE QUESTION OF ABYSSINIA

Speech by the British Foreign Secretary, Lord Halifax

His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom have taken the initiative in placing on the agenda of this meeting of the Council the consequences arising out of the existing situation in Ethiopia. In the letter which has been circulated to members of the Council they have drawn attention to the anomalous situation arising from the fact that certain Members of the League recognise that the Italian government exercises sovereignty over Ethiopia or have taken action which might be held to imply such recognition while other States members of the League have not done so.

His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom have desired to take an opportunity for consultation between members of the League before they, as an individual member, took a decision as to the question of the formal recognition of the Italian position.

Accordingly, I think it right plainly to state the view of His Majesty's Government that the situation is one in which members of the League may, without disloyalty, take such action at such time as may seem to them appropriate.

In raising this question at this meeting, His Majesty's Government have in view a strictly limited objective. It is far from their purpose to suggest that the Council or any member of the League should condone the action by which the Italian Government have acquired their present position in Ethiopia, and which the League in corporate action thought it right to condemn. Nor do they propose that any organ of the League should modify the resolutions and decisions which it took in the earlier stages of the dispute. On this issue we have declared our judgment in plain terms, and we cannot go back upon it. His Majesty's Government hope, however, that other members of the Council will share their opinion that the question of the recognition of Italy's position in Ethiopia is one which every member of the League must be held entitled to decide for itself in the light of its own situation and obligations.

This would not of itself impose any obligation upon member States to take steps in the direction of recognition, and His Majesty's Government would in no way wish to interfere with the freedom of choice of States in this matter. The action of His Majesty's Government themselves will, as those who are here to-day are well aware, be dependent upon the progress made in the solution of another large and difficult question, and the acceptance of the opinion held by His Majesty's Government would, in fact, merely confirm the correctness of the attitude taken by a number of States by no means unmindful of their obligations to the League, that with the adoption of the Assembly's resolution of July 4th, 1936, their collective obligations in the matter of the Italo-Ethiopian conflict were discharged.

It follows that His Majesty's Government have no desire to embark on a discussion of legal points, such as the distinction between de facto and de jure recognition, and what action in a particular case be held to amount to one or the other. There may be room for argument on these points, but His Majesty's Government would not regard such argument as relevant to the particular proposal which they desire to make, and in any case the importance of such matters clearly resides less in precise legal definitions than the political significance which is attached to such action by the interested Parties.

In approaching this problem, His Majesty's Government are themselves influenced by considerations of more general character.

Nearly two years have now elapsed since the Assembly, in its Resolution of July 4th, 1936, took the decision which resulted in the discontinuance of the action taken by the Members of the League to apply Article 16 of the Covenant. The Assembly recognised on that occasion that various circumstances prevented the full application of the Covenant, and instituted an enquiry with the object of adapting the application of the principles of the Covenant to the results of experience. Since this Resolution was passed the situation of fact with which Members of the League were then confronted has become more definitive and more stable.

I have compared the description of the situation contained in the communication from His Majesty Haile Selassie, circulated yesterday to Members of the Council, with the information on the subject at the disposal of His Majesty's Government.

This situation according to our information is that the Italian Government has obtained control of virtually all the former territory of Ethiopia, and while resistance is still continuing in certain parts of the country, there is no organised native authority and no central native administration with the slightest prospect of reconquering the country.

The conclusion follows that the only means by which the Italian position could be challenged by League Members would be by concerted military action, in other words by going to war. Such action is unthinkable, and would be proposed by no responsible person in any country. It was indeed by implication deliberately excluded by the Assembly Resolution of July 4th, 1936, and nowhere now is there any desire on the part of any Member of the League to reverse the decision which the Assembly then took, and to revert to a policy of full sanctions against the Italian Government.

I do not overlook the fact that there are many in my own country, as perhaps in others, who feel that none the less any action designed to facilitate recognition of the Italian conquest does impinge on principle, and who would, therefore, deplore the adoption of such a course. I respect, but I cannot share, their view.

Such anxiety arises in great part from the Resolution adopted by the League in 1932 in the case of Manchukuo upon the subject of non-recognition of the results of aggressive action. In that Resolution, it was agreed by all Members of the League that they would not recognise any situation, treaty, or agreement, which was brought about by means contrary to the Covenant, and if we desire to be honest with ourselves and with our fellow-Members of the League, we must not be afraid squarely to face the facts in the light of that expression of opinion.

Those who seek to establish a better world upon the basis of universal acknowledgment of League principles are clearly right to feel reluctance to countenance action, however desirable on other grounds, by which these may appear to be infringed. But when, as here, two ideals are in conflict—on the one hand, the ideal of devotion, unflinching but unpractical, to some high purpose; on the other, the ideal of a practical victory for peace—I cannot doubt that the stronger claim is that of peace.

That is the position which His Majesty's Government feel bound to adopt in the case of Ethiopia.

It is the considered opinion of His Majesty's Government that, for practical purposes, Italian control over virtually the whole of Ethiopia has become an established fact, and that sooner or later, unless we are prepared by force to alter it, or unless for ever we are to live in an unreal world, that fact, whatever be our judgment on it, will have to be acknowledged.

In expressing their view His Majesty's Government in no way condone or approve the methods by which the Italian position in Ethiopia has been obtained, nor do they abandon in any respect the principles of the Covenant or their determination to do their utmost to secure that disputes arising between nations shall be resolved by peaceful methods and not by force. But no cause is served by vain lamentations over the past, when it is to the attempt to shape the future that the resources of constructive minds should be directed.

Meanwhile nothing is gained and much may be lost by a refusal to face facts. Great as is the League of Nations, the ends that it exists to serve are greater than itself, and the greatest of those ends is peace.

It is for these reasons, Mr. President, that His Majesty's Government have thought it right to bring this matter before the Council and to express their views upon it.

They do not, as I have said, ask for decisions on questions of principle nor do they suggest that the Council should impose on any Member of the League a particular course of action.

They hope, however, that Members of the Council will share their opinion, that the question of the recognition of Italy's position in Ethiopia is one for each Member of the League to decide for itself in the light of its own situation and its own obligations.

Speech by the French Foreign Minister, M. Bonnet

Mr. President: When it asked the Council of the League of Nations to place upon its Agenda the question of the consequences that should be drawn from the existing situation in Ethiopia, the British Government was acting under the impulse of an anxiety to which I am sure every Member of the Council, as I myself, would like to pay tribute. The British Government indeed felt that in order to re-establish in Europe an atmosphere of confidence in international co-operation (and that is our unanimous hope) it was necessary to deal boldly with a situation which for a long time had constituted a threat to the peace of the world. We are all grateful to Lord Halifax for the frankness with which he has reminded us of the facts of the problem and the reasons for the action that his Government took. This problem indeed was not one that could be solved by silence. Certain Powers, whose fidelity to the principles of the Covenant could not be doubted, had already felt that they were able to recognise the state of affairs that had been created in Ethiopia since 1936. France took the view that these initiatives taken individually were not sufficient to remove the dangers which the situation in Ethiopia entailed for peace and that it was proper that the League of Nations should once more have the matter brought before it.

I will not attempt to conceal the feelings of profound sadness with which all Members of the Council have taken up and will conclude this discussion. The presence amongst us of His Majesty the Emperor Haile Selassie indeed, so far as it is possible to do so, increases the emotion that we feel. But there is another feeling by which we are animated and by which the Members of the Council must be animated. There is one consideration which in our view entirely justifies the position which the United Kingdom representative invites us to take up. It is the feeling that everything possible has been attempted. It is the feeling that everything possible has been accomplished.

The Resolution of July 4th, 1936, solemnly proclaimed our devotion to those principles. At the same time, however, it recognised that in the face of facts and owing to circumstances the League of Nations found it impossible to ensure the integral application of the principles of the Covenant. This observation, which put an end to the measures adopted by common agreement, from that very moment restored to Members of the League of Nations their liberty to appreciate whether in the case of the Ethiopian conflict they had discharged all the obligations following from the Covenant.

At various dates certain Powers considered the circumstances which these facts seemed to them to involve. France for its part has not hitherto felt herself justified in deducing any conclusion; but to-day she thinks that it is proper and fitting to obey above all that will for peace which is the very foundation and the very soul of the League. It is to maintain peace that the League was created. The French Government is as animated by the same will for peace as the United Kingdom Government. It associates itself with the latter Government in expressing to the Council the desire that there should be recognition of the fact that circumstances henceforth make it possible for each State Member to appreciate for itself the decisions that should be taken.

Statements were then made by the representatives of Roumania, Poland, Sweden, Belgium, Peru, Ecuador and Iran, which, in contrast with the statements by the Soviet Russian, Chinese, Bolivian and New Zealand representatives, endorsed the British point of view.

The last speaker was the President of the Council, the Latvian Foreign Minister, M. Munters. He stated first on behalf of the Latvian Government that, since sanctions against Italy had been abandoned for nearly two years, every Government must now take an independent decision regarding sovereignty over Abyssinia. As no other members asked to speak, the President declared the discussion closed and, in summing up, stated that "the great majority of the Powers represented in the Council have expressed the opinion that every State Member of the League is entitled, according to its own position and its own obligations, to decide independently the question of the recognition of Italian sovereignty over Abyssinia".

This closed the discussion on the British proposal without any resolution being adopted.

It cannot be affirmed that this "liquidation" was characterised by great candour. The result will still have to pass a number of rocks of a formal juridical nature before the name of Ethiopia is removed from the list of Members of the League. At the September session, there will no doubt still be a number of fanatical collectivists who will combat with doctrinary reasons the formal establishment of the Abyssinian death certificate. On that occasion too there will be the obstruction of the Soviet Union according to plan, though the Union or its conscious or unconscious agents will hardly succeed in bringing the "Emperor Haile Selassie" in person before the Assembly as a reminder of the bad conscience of the League. He has again had the bitter experience that the League can no longer free him from the position into which it had manœuvred him. For there is no possible doubt that the Empire of the Negus no longer exists, and the Assembly will have to admit that it cannot place the lifeless letter of the Covenant above reality.

THE VICTORY OF THE SWISS NEUTRALITY IDEA⁽¹⁾

Declaration by the Swiss Federal Council of March 21st, 1938.

On March 13th the Federal State of Austria, with which Switzerland has maintained cordial neighbourly relations, ceased to exist as an independent State. The historical event which has occurred before our eyes is of the greatest significance. The desire of the peoples of Germany and Austria to unite was nothing new. Even in the last century it led to armed conflicts; this desire has now been fulfilled.

The Federal Council understands that these events have deeply moved our people. It takes the opportunity offered by the meeting of the Federal Assembly at its ordinary spring session in order to enlighten public opinion and to dispel groundless fears. The change brought about in the political map of Europe cannot result in a weakening of the political position of Switzerland. The independence and neutrality of the Confederation, on the contrary, prove to be more than ever indispensable for the maintenance of the European equilibrium. Solemn assurances in this respect have been given to us from all quarters. Their value is incontestable. None of our three neighbour States can desire or aim at the downfall of Switzerland; none of them threaten our democratic institutions which form an essential vital principle of the Confederation and its twenty-two cantons.

It is a century-old mission of Switzerland in Europe to guard the passes of the Alps in the interest of all. Switzerland covers and protects vital frontier sections of her neighbours. The desire of the Swiss nation to fulfil this task and to maintain its independence with its blood is unanimous and unshakable. Switzerland holds aloof from foreign actions. Any attack on the inviolability of her territory would be a dreadful crime against international law.

The doctrine which our country must draw from events is clear. The attempts to bring about the recognition of our complete neutrality must be continued and must lead to their goal; any ambiguity in this respect must in fact be removed. It is moreover necessary for us to endeavour to maintain correct and friendly relations in the same manner with all our neighbours. The struggle between opposing political systems in other countries does not concern our State. Every nation is free to devote itself to its own internal affairs. The Swiss nation is united and must always remain united in the will to defend the incomparable fatherland which God has given it against all to the last breath at any cost.

In these troublous times we are more than ever aware of the task allotted to us by Providence, namely that a democracy such as ours is based on the principle of freedom in order and that nothing can shake the Confederation.

Declaration by the Swiss Parties on March 21st, 1938.

All groups of the Federal Assembly approve the declaration of the Federal Council and solemnly declare that the entire Swiss nation, without distinction of language, confession or party, are decided to defend the inviolability of their fatherland to the last drop of their blood. The stronger the expression of the will of the Swiss nation to maintain their rights on the ground of responsible cooperation in the State, the more effective will this resistance be.

The Swiss nation are prepared to make the necessary sacrifices for their national defence; but military armaments would be without avail if they could find no support in the spiritual and moral forces of the entire people: unity among all members of the Confederation must gain the victory over political and economic differences, and our internal discussions must be carried on in a worthy spirit, in mutual respect for the views of others and within the framework of our democratic institutions.

The Federal Constitution has entrusted the Federal Council with the duty of watching over the external security of Switzerland, and of guarding its independence and neutrality. The Swiss nation is prepared to support the Federal Council in this important task which must be carried out in the meaning and spirit of our democracy and in accordance with the Federal Constitution.

Trusting in a benevolent Providence which rules over the century-old history of our country, the Swiss nation is resolved with determination and courage to meet any difficulties which arise out of the seriousness of the times.

Memorandum from the Swiss Federal Council to the League of Nations, of April 30th, 1938.

By a letter of April 29th, 1938, the Swiss Government has transmitted to the Secretary-General, for communication to the Council, the memorandum referred to in M. Motta's letter of April 20th, 1938, which was circulated to the Council and the Members of the League in the document C.137.M.82.1938.V.

The text of this memorandum is as follows:

Memorandum.

When the question of Switzerland's joining the League of Nations was under consideration, she laid great stress on the necessity of preserving her neutrality within the framework of the new international organisation. On February 8th, 1919, in a memorandum addressed to the Powers assembled at Paris for the purpose of concluding peace, the Federal Council stated that the Confederation was anxious to lend its co-operation to the League, but without sacrificing a fundamental principle of its policy.

The following are some of the arguments by which it supported its attitude:

"The Confederation is entitled to emphasise the fact that its neutrality is not a neutrality which is observed in particular circumstances, but is a permanent neutrality. Its peaceful policy is based upon a principle which became established as a maxim of statesmanship early in the sixteenth century. Although the Swiss shed their blood on all the battlefields of Europe in causes not their own, yet they adopted and preserved neutrality as the guiding principle of their own policy, and embodied it in the Constitution of their own federal State. The Federal Council's declaration of August 4th, 1914, is but a repetition of a series of identical decisions taken by the Federal Diets during four centuries. The Swiss were thus the first to proclaim their faith in the high ideal which is destined to achieve its triumph in the League of Nations. This systematically pacific attitude has no parallel in history.

"The neutrality of Switzerland is not merely the result of the application of rules of international law and of international conventions. It is first and foremost the expression of the profound conviction and firm resolve of the Swiss people, who have always adhered to it with unchanging sincerity and loyalty. They would not understand the abandonment of a political maxim which has proved its value to them through a period of centuries...

"Swiss neutrality has a character of its own that distinguishes it from any other neutrality. It is one of the essential conditions of the domestic peace, the union, and hence the independence, of a nation composed of diverse linguistic and cultural elements. That diversity is precious to Switzerland, for, despite the smallness of her territory, it is the source of an intense national life.

"The preservation of this age-old institution is of as much value to Europe as to Switzerland herself. Not without reason did the Great Powers assembled at Paris in 1815 declare that 'the neutrality and inviolability of Switzerland, and her independence of all foreign influences, are in the true political interests of Europe as a whole. That declaration retains all its force.

"It is the duty of the Swiss Confederation to continue to be, as in the past, the faithful guardian of the crossings of the Alps...

"Neutrality alone has preserved for centuries the bond of union among peoples of different race, speech, and creed. It is through the scrupulous observance of the principle of neutrality that the Swiss Cantons have been able to develop a spirit of mutual understanding based upon respect for one another's individuality. The oldest of existing republics would be happy to contribute to the League of Nations the fruits of the experience gained during the centuries of the slow and laborious development of its federative system. Only provided that she remains faithful to her traditional principles does Switzerland feel that she can take, in the best interests of all, that place in the League of Nations which is assigned to her by her history."

This special position was viewed with a sympathetic understanding by the Powers. By Article 435 of the Treaty of Versailles, Switzerland's neutrality was not merely recognised and confirmed, but was declared to be compatible with the Covenant as an engagement "for securing the maintenance of peace", within the meaning of Article 21.

None the less, the neutrality of Switzerland was not embodied without qualification in the League system. By virtue of the declaration made by the Council of the League in London on February 13th, 1920, whereby note was taken of Switzerland's resolve to defend her territory in every circumstance, she preserved her military neutrality, but on the other hand, she was to accept the obligations devolving upon other States Members in respect of economic and financial sanctions.

This was an important concession on the part of neutral Switzerland to the principles of co-operation on which the League was founded. Nevertheless, this restriction upon her age-old policy was not accepted without a struggle by the people and the Cantons.

The decision of the majority of the people and the Cantons was influenced by a variety of reasons. In the first place, Switzerland felt that, under a system of strict sanctions coming almost automatically into operation, there would be no essential change in her position as a neutral country; and she also believed that a large reduction of armaments, in combination with an exact mechanism of collective security, would very substantially reduce the possibility of armed conflicts. Lastly, she cherished the hope that the League would eventually come to embrace all those important countries which as yet remained aloof on account of political circumstances. That hope was expressed in set terms in the Federal Ordinance which was submitted to a popular vote on May 16th, 1920.

Circumstances have greatly changed since Switzerland joined the League. Some of the most important clauses of the Covenant have not been enforced. The system of sanctions has not operated in every case. Competition in armaments has been resumed on a larger scale than ever. Instead of becoming universal, the League has lost the participation of some important countries. The United States did not see their way to join, and four great countries, two of them Switzerland's neighbours, have withdrawn.

Such a state of affairs could not but affect the position of a perpetually neutral country. Owing to her unique situation, Switzerland cannot accept a system of optional sanctions. Her neutrality cannot be allowed to depend upon circumstances; it has been established once for all. Its strength is in its clear definition and its permanent character.

At the present day, the distinction between military and economic sanctions would prove illusory so far as Switzerland was concerned. If she resorted to economic pressure, she would be in grave danger of being treated exactly as if she had taken military action.

Switzerland trusts that the League of Nations, of which she is proud to be the home, will overcome its present difficulties. Although, in accordance with her undertaking of February 13th, 1920, she has modernised and reorganised her army, for which her people have in fact made the greatest sacrifices, she remains faithful to the League and its ideal of peace and international co-operation. She will continue to collaborate with the League in all questions in which her status as a neutral country is not involved; but she considers herself entitled to ask that her absolute neutrality be explicitly recognised within the framework of the League.

Accordingly, the Federal Council, supported by the overwhelming majority of the Houses of the Federal Parliament and of the people of Switzerland, seeks of the Council of the League, with every confidence, a declaration that the traditional neutrality of the Confederation is consistent with the provisions of the Covenant.

The Federal Government does not doubt that the Council will formally accept the foregoing declarations, and so confirm the unique character of Switzerland's neutrality.

The Report by the Swedish Representative, M. Sandler, Minister of Foreign Affairs, to the League Council on May 11th, 1938.

1. By communications dated April 20th and 29th, 1938, the Swiss Federal Council raised the question of Switzerland's neutrality within the framework of the League of Nations before the Council of the League. In a memorandum attached to the second of these two communications the Swiss Government submitted its desiderata to the Council; they were also developed by word of mouth by the representative of Switzerland at the Council meeting of May 11th, 1938.

2. The special situation in which the League of Nations has recognised Switzerland to stand in its capacity of Member of the League was defined by a resolution of the Council dated February 13th, 1920. The resolution in question did not give rise to any discussion in the Assembly. It should be observed, as regards the respective competence of the Council and Assembly, that this is not a question which under the Covenant falls within the exclusive competence of either the Council or the Assembly. Both organs of the League are accordingly competent in the matter.

The Federal Council was in fact concerned that the League of Nations should consider its application at the earliest possible date.

3. The Swiss memorandum contains observations of a general character on which, in present circumstances, there is no occasion for the Council to pronounce.

The consideration which, in the Council's opinion, makes it possible to settle the case of Switzerland in the light of its special features is the peculiar position of Switzerland, with its traditional standing as a perpetually neutral Power. This neutrality, which was recognised by the Treaties of 1815, is an uncontested principle of international law. The principle was confirmed by the Treaty of Versailles in Article 435. The Council of the League of Nations in its resolution of February 13th, 1920, recorded that "Switzerland is in a unique situation, based on a tradition of several centuries... explicitly incorporated in the Law of Nations". It stated that "the perpetual neutrality of Switzerland and the guarantee of the inviolability of her territory... are justified by the interests of general peace".

In consideration of the position of Switzerland as a perpetually neutral State, the Council of the League agreed in 1920 that Switzerland should not participate in measures of a military character. The Swiss Government now asks the Council to go further in this direction, and to recognise that Switzerland will not participate in any sanctions whatsoever.

To prevent any misunderstanding, it should be made clear that Switzerland will not participate in any measures of the kind contemplated in Article 16, whether such measures are adopted in application of Article 16 or in application of some other article of the Covenant.

Having regard to the very special position of Switzerland, and being informed of her intention while not participating in putting sanctions into operation to continue at the same time to co-operate in every other respect with the League of Nations, the Council of the League is to-day disposed to comply with the Swiss request.

4. In accordance with the policy of abstention which it proposes to follow, the Swiss Government will not participate in decisions with regard to the putting into operation of sanctions by the organs of the League of Nations.

5. The Council of the League of Nations notes with satisfaction the assurances given by the Federal Council in London in 1920 to the effect that Switzerland is prepared for any sacrifices for the defence of Swiss territory under all circumstances, and further takes note of the strengthening of the Swiss defences of which it is informed by the Federal Council's memorandum.

6. The Swiss Government has proclaimed through the mouth of the Swiss representative of the Council its loyalty to the League of Nations and its desire to continue to collaborate with the League. The members of the Council will be in agreement in appreciating this collaboration. Accordingly, subject to the discontinuance of participation in putting sanctions into operation, the position of Switzerland as a Member of the League, and as the State on whose territory the headquarters of the League is situate, remains unchanged. To-morrow, as to-day, the position of Switzerland will remain unaltered as regards all the provisions of the Covenant except those relating to sanctions and Switzerland will continue to accord to the organs of the League all the freedom required for the exercise of their activities.

7. The representative of Switzerland has been at pains to make clear that he has no intention of dealing with anything except the case of his own country, leaving entirely unaffected the position of other Members of the League as regards the scope which they attribute to Article 16 of the Covenant.

It is obvious that the request of the Swiss Government, and any action which may be taken thereon, cannot in any way affect the positions thus taken up or prejudice any decisions which may be taken within the League.

8. I have the honour to submit the following draft resolution to the Council:

Draft Resolution.

"The Council of the League of Nations, in presence of the Swiss Government's memorandum dated April 29th, 1938,

"Having considered the requests put forward in the memorandum of the Swiss Federal Council, and explained by the representative of Switzerland at the meeting of May 11th, 1938,

"Having regard to the special position of Switzerland resulting from her perpetual neutrality which is based on age-long tradition and recognised by the Law of Nations,

"Recalling that, by its declaration made in London on February 13th, 1920, the Council recognised that the perpetual neutrality of Switzerland is justified by the interests of general peace and as such is compatible with the Covenant,

"Approves the report of the representative of Sweden,

"And in these circumstances takes note that Switzerland, invoking her perpetual neutrality, has expressed the intention not to participate any longer in any manner in the putting into operation of the provisions of the Covenant relating to sanctions and declares that she will not be invited to do so.

"And places on record that the Swiss Government declares its determination to maintain unaltered in all other respects her position as a Member of the League, and to continue to give the facilities which have been accorded to the League for the free exercise by its institutions of their activities in Swiss territory."

May 14th, 1938, the day on which the League Council recognised by an unanimous vote that the integral neutrality of Switzerland is compatible with the provisions of the League Covenant, will be a memorable day in the annals of the Confederation. The age-old principle of Switzerland, which it adopted of its own free will and which was not a subject of discussion as such, has again demonstrated its vitality and reality and has been strengthened and reinforced by the action of the Federal Council. Federal Councillor Motta in particular has displayed untiring energy and perseverance in solving a problem which he regarded as essential in the interest of Switzerland, although it was much more complex than that of 1920. The skill which he displayed was noticeable by the fact that of all the Membres of the Council the only one to raise difficulties was, as usual, Soviet Russia. It almost appeared as if Litvinov wished to take a personal revenge for the courageous speech with which M. Motta in September 1934 gave the reasons of the Swiss Government for voting against the admission of the Soviet Union to the League of Nations.

Though a number of speakers in the debate on May 14th, referred to the "special situation" of Switzerland and attributed its desire for neutrality solely to "historical claims", such a view is not accurate to this exclusive extent. Federal Councillor Motta in his impressive pleading did not refrain from mentioning, apart from these historical reasons, some special reasons applicable to the present time, in particular the faulty development of the League and the dangers and disadvantages in which its members are thereby involved.

From the practical political point of view, therefore, the Swiss request for the conversion of Swiss differential neutrality into total neutrality was undoubtedly a precedent which all the arts of interpretation endeavour in vain to deny. It is true that the efforts of countries such as Holland, Belgium and the Northern countries and certain South American countries to remain outside the complications of Geneva are on a different plane from the formal legal point of view. But their tendency is the same, and that is the important point; their desire is to retain their freedom of decision and action in respect of an institution which is not in a position to make effective contributions towards a detente, much less towards a solution of urgent problems.

Germany and Swiss Neutrality

In his great Reichstag speech on May 21st, 1935, the Führer and Chancellor for the first time made the following statement regarding Germany's attitude to Switzerland:

"We Germans have every occasion to be glad that there is a State on our frontier with a population that is to a great extent German, with great inner firmness and possessing real and actual independence."

Since that time Switzerland has not been specifically mentioned in Adolf Hitler's statements, nor in the great Reichstag speech on foreign policy on January 30th, 1937. The official Swiss quarters rightly interpreted this silence to mean that, in accordance with the former statement, respect for Swiss neutrality was a matter of course for Germany. Nevertheless the Führer and Chancellor took the opportunity of a private visit of the former President of the Swiss Confederation, M. Schulthess, to Berlin at the end of February 1937 to emphasise his declarations in the above-mentioned Reichstag speech and the desire of Germany to respect Swiss neutrality and independence. The conversation between Herr Schulthess and the Führer took place on February 23rd, 1937. On February 27th the Federal Council at Berne published the following official communiqué:

Official Communiqué of the Federal Council of February 26th, 1937

The President of the Confederation informed the Federal Council at its meeting on Friday that the former Federal Councillor Schulthess had taken advantage of a private visit to Berlin to have a conversation with the German Chancellor. This conversation took place on February 23rd. In the course of the conversation, in which the German Chancellor again emphasised his sincere love of peace, he made statements in definite terms and with great energy regarding relations with Switzerland that may be summed up as follows:

"The continued existence of Switzerland is a European necessity. We desire to live as good neighbours on the best terms with her and to come to loyal agreements on all matters with her. In my recent Reichstag speech, when I spoke of the neutrality of two other countries⁽¹⁾, I intentionally omitted to mention Switzerland because the traditional neutrality which she practises and which has always been recognised by the Powers, including ourselves, is in no way questioned. At all times, whatever may happen, we will respect the inviolability and neutrality of Switzerland. I say this most definitely. I have never given cause for any other view. I authorise you to communicate this declaration to your Government for communication to the Swiss people."

This announcement led on March 5th at a meeting of the Swiss Federal Council to an interpellation which gave M. Motta President of the Political Department, Federal Councillor and at that time President of the Confederation, an opportunity of emphasising the satisfaction expressed by the Federal Council at the Führer's statement, of pointing out its importance as an element of appeasement and a factor of universal peace, and of dissipating the rumours which had arisen in some Swiss quarters that some conditions were attached by Germany to Swiss neutrality.

It is well known that, on March 1938, after the events in Austria and the achievement of the Anschluss of German-Austria with Germany, Dr. Köcher, the German Minister at Berne, again repeated the sense of this declaration to the Swiss Government.

THE WITHDRAWAL OF CHILE FROM THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

Reasons for the Withdrawal given on May 11th, 1938 to the Council of the League of Nations by Mr. Edwards, Representative of Chile⁽¹⁾

Mr. President, under Article 4 of the Covenant, the Council decided to invite the Chilean representative to take part in its deliberations when the item on the agenda entitled "Application of the Principles of the Covenant" was under discussion, and my Government gratefully accepted the invitation, because it is anxious once again to explain its views on a question which it brought up two years ago.

It should be observed that the Chilean proposal did not bind the League to anything. The idea was simply to find out what other great Powers and certain great American countries thought about reform. None the less Chile met with all kinds of difficulties in putting her proposal through. Some turned a deaf ear, and maintained that the Covenant must not be touched. A spirit which appears to us to conflict with the very principles of the League of Nations—founded, as it was, to seek by every peaceful method of international collaboration for the peace of the world—has prevailed and has been active in the course of outside demonstrations of a passive and courteous character.

The original proposals of Chile had unquestionably some chance of success at the time when they were put forward. Would they, one wonders, have been able to prevent the developments which have since succeeded, threatening peace and mutilating the League still further and reducing it to a condition of obscurity and impotence? I do not venture to pronounce on that subject; but at least my country retains the deep satisfaction of having made an effort which will be regarded now, and still more in the future, as wise and foreseeing.

In the position in which we are left after the disappointments of recent discussions at Geneva, the only practical step remaining from the body of the Chilean proposals would no longer have any meaning. An invitation to non-Member States to express their opinions on reforms which the League has refused for two years past to consider, and which it has shelved by putting an end to the labours of the Committee of Twenty-eight, would be too late.

Now that one European Great Power has withdrawn from the League and another has repeated its decision not to belong to the League, such an invitation on the part of the League would give the impression that we still continue as before, and more than before, to live in a world outside political realities.

I take leave to define what we mean by "political realities" in the light of the Covenant.

In our view, a coercive League of Nations such as we now have must inevitably be universal. If it is not, the States which are Members of it do not constitute a league of nations but an alliance involving an obligation to render economic and, on occasion, military services in its support. A League of Nations, which is not universal, cannot and should not be coercive.

The ideal embodied in the Pact was the ideal of a universal and coercive League. That is still the ideal of Chile. But the developments and experiences of eighteen years are there to show that the ideal is unattainable for a long time to come; and in presence of this political reality we believe that the moment has come to remodel the Covenant and to make the League de jure what it is de facto, namely, an international organisation of a non-coercive character.

It is none other than the equivocal situation in which the majority of States-Members are placed as a result of the provisions of the Covenant which has compelled Switzerland to press—with perfect reason, as we think—for restoration of her pre-war neutrality. There would have been no occasion for this perfectly proper demand if the League had been universal, and if the vague declarations hitherto made had been adequate to cover the responsibilities and obligations devolving on States-Members under the Covenant.

Given the present bases of the League of Nations and the deep gap by which they are divorced from the realities of the life of nations, it becomes necessary in each successive crisis to seek with a skill, which I am the first to recognise, for ingeniously elastic or dilatory formulæ in order to conceal, without avowing the concealment, the material impossibility of observing and enforcing the obligations incurred under the Covenant.

We view with apprehension this state of things. We have always made the respect of treaties the pivot of our international policy; and it appears to us to be contrary to our tradition and principles to remain bound by legal obligations which are disregarded and ignored, but nevertheless remain in force and may involve us at the most unlikely moment in serious responsibilities and consequences or in misunderstandings.

If a treaty like the Covenant is not scrupulously observed whether because it is (as I maintain it is) divorced from political realities and to that extent inoperative, or because some of its signatories are anxious to elude the obligations which it implies, or because it is found a tiresome encumbrance in the path of signatory States whose interests, like all things human, are unfortunately in a state of perpetual flux—it is useless to retain it in force and to pretend that it has a validity which it no longer commands. The political part of the Covenant is to-day no more than a legal shell with nothing in it, which creates for some who remain within the framework a dangerous illusion, while it inspires in others, who are still without, an unshakable resolve to remain outside, free of the perplexities and complexities of an institution which they regard as decaying and living from hand to mouth.

Sedatives will not save the League of Nations. A surgical operation is necessary to cut out the dead flesh of those Articles of the Covenant which are disregarded and violated again and again by the Members of the League, or left in suspense by unilateral declarations, the real effect of which is to undermine and nullify the sanctity of treaties. It is this dead flesh which poisons the organisation of the League, and will lead gradually it certainly to its death, if radical reforms are not adopted in order to adjust the legal structure of the Covenant to the experience of its eighteen years of existence and to the political realities of international life.

Such was the aim which Chile had in view in raising this question of universality, and proposing reforms to be effected in concert with non-Member States as a means of attaining this end.

Rumours have been prevalent—I know not from what source—which spread for credulous ears the suggestion that in the action which Chile has taken she has been actuated by special sympathies for certain Great Powers which have left the League for reasons which it is not for me to estimate. Narrow and ignorant persons have alleged that Chile was acting at the sole instance of the totalitarian States outside the League. Rumours so ridiculous I leave to the contempt of international public opinion.

But are we in a position effectively to contribute to the peace of Europe with the aid of the resources placed at our disposal by the Covenant? Do we not see with our own eyes that the Great Powers are convinced that the Covenant affords no safeguards of security, and that they seek security in rearmament and in the repudiation of Article 8 which provided for disarmament? What can a disarmed, distant State like Chile do for the peace of Europe beyond refraining from encouragement of, or contribution to, disputes and differences, and abstention from discussions and decisions provocative of such disputes and differences? Neutrality is at any rate a negative means of appeasement.

Even at the risk of repeating what I have already said, I may be allowed to say once more that the Covenant in its present form is incompatible with international realities and that if it were reformed and everything coercive in its provisions were removed, we might perhaps hope that its moral authority would do far more to prevent disputes than legal provisions which all the States Members refuse to apply in order to avoid far worse evils.

The Great Powers of Europe have been forced to admit after eighteen years' experience and one unfortunate experiment that collective security which the Covenant was designed to create is a dangerous illusion for an institution which is not universal and is deprived of the indispensable aid of other important States in a world that is profoundly divided. They therefore decided to reach agreement among themselves and to seek the guarantees of peace by means of bilateral instead of collective agreements. We are therefore glad to-day to welcome the first results and we are the first to congratulate the great Powers on returning to international political realism by following a method which was described a short time ago in three words: defence, appeasement, realism.

Chile is anxious and desirous of continuing to collaborate in the technical sphere, but at the same time she feels sure that in its present form the whole structure of the Covenant is dead and must be legally recognised as such and replaced by another Covenant more in keeping with the realities of international life.

We do not know what attitude the Council will adopt, and we await its decision with impatience before determining our own.

If our ideas are not shared by others and do not meet with the response for which we hope, we shall withdraw from the discussion without any feeling of bitterness, conscious that we have done our duty courageously and quite frankly to an institution in which we have collaborated to the full extent of our pacific ideals, an institution that we now see coming to an end in its present form with regret as great as our pleasure and satisfaction when it appeared on the international horizon like a rainbow marking the end once and for all of the settlement of international disputes by the cruel and brutal force of arms.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA AND THE STRUGGLE OF THE SUDETEN GERMANS FOR THEIR NATIONAL RIGHTS

A Documentary Report

Speech by Konrad Henlein, Leader of the Sudeten Germans, at Karlsbad on April 24th, 1938

The Sudeten German Problem and its Solution — The Eight Demands

"In order to establish the historical truth, I will today refer to the offers of agreement which we have made on three occasions.

On October 21st, 1934 at our great demonstration in Röh-misch Leipa, when for the first time I stretched out the hand of understanding and conciliation to the Czech nation, it was simply ignored. Later, after the tremendous election result of May 19th and 26th, 1935, equipped with the legitimization of nearly 70 per cent of all Sudeten Germans, when I repeated my willingness to cooperate in the appeasement of the nations and in the development of the State, my second offer was also rejected. And when, by introducing our National Protection Bill in Parliament, I created a new and objectively concrete foundation for approaching the national problem which had become constantly more urgent, this third and most binding attempt was also rejected.

I can therefore calmly leave it to the judgment of world opinion to decide whether we Sudeten Germans or the Czechoslovak Government and the Czechoslovak people have acted more correctly. I have no intention whatever today to run the risk of a fresh rejection. Today I can confine myself to raising the problem afresh in its entirety and referring world public opinion to its significance and importance. I approach my task with the consciousness of the responsibility towards the Sudeten Germans and the whole of Europe, in order once more to call attention to and give a warning against impending dangers.

Like the German nation in the Reich, the German national groups in the old Monarchy had relied on President Wilson's fourteen points. Their fundamental watchword, the principle of the right of self-determination of all nations, was to usher in a new and juster order in Europe. In the justified expectation that a century-old enmity would be ended and a just order would be established in the territory of the old Monarchy on the principles of equality of rights and self-determination, the Sudeten Germans looked forward to the decisions of the Peace Conference. This hope was severely disappointed by the responsible Powers of the Peace Conference. The New Europe did indeed bring the Slavonic and Roumanian peoples of the Monarchy a freedom to an extent which they did not themselves expect, but injustice and violence was used against the German national groups and the Magyar people.

In the face of this violence we declare that the Sudeten Germans have never abandoned their claim to the universal right of self-determination, because that right is inalienable and cannot be a subject for compromise.

When the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy collapsed, we Sudeten Germans also claimed this right and worked for it by constitutional means. The ignoring of these facts at the Peace Conference made the responsible Powers at the Peace Conference jointly responsible for the present untenable conditions of this State.

The twenty years' guilt of the peacemakers calls peremptorily for a change in the situation which they created. The responsibility for the peace of 1919 is borne by the western States and by Czechoslovakia as an allied Power.

According to the preliminary peace there were to be no annexations, the large and small nations were to be granted their natural rights, national claims were to be justly considered, and the nations were in future to be governed only with their own consent. The right of self-determination was not to be a mere phrase, but a peremptory principle of action. According to points 4 and 10, the peoples of Austria-Hungary were to be accorded the freest opportunity of autonomous development. The principle of justice was to apply to all, whether strong or weak.

If the reconstruction of European conditions had been carried out in accordance with these principles, there would be no national problem in the heart of Europe today."

Konrad Henlein went on, on the basis of the historical documents regarding the peace negotiations, to consider closely how far the Czechoslovak Government had kept at any rate the promises which it freely gave at that time regarding the treatment of the Germans. As regards the contents of Memorandum II, main document 3, he said it was an irony, after a development of twenty years, to speak of an "incarnation of modern democracy". In particular he dealt with Memorandum III, main document 6, and with Dr. Benes' note of May 20th, 1919 and compared the promises therein contained in detail with the actual legal and administrative position, and came to the following conclusion:

"However superficially the Peace Conference examined the statements in the memoranda and investigated the facts, and however little comprehension they had for the national problems involved by the foundation of Czechoslovakia, it was nevertheless clear to the Peace Conference that the problem of our German national group in the new State to be created far transcended the problem of a minority, and was therefore a special problem which could not be satisfactorily solved by the usual protective provisions for minorities. The committee of the peace makers was therefore aware that our question was not only part of the problem of the international structure of the State, but was a fundamental problem for the existence and working of the State in all spheres of life, without the solution of which a harmonious existence of the State could not be attained."

Konrad Henlein then went no less thoroughly into the so-called Minorities Protection Treaty of September 10th, 1919. "Naturally," he stated at the outset, "these provisions also apply to our protection, but without restricting the measure of our national rights or releasing the State and the Czech people from their obligation to solve the problem. But these obligations under international law have not been kept any more than the promises in the memoranda. The exhortation of the Peace Conference, in accordance with the report of May 21st, 1919, has been entirely ignored.

The provisions of the Minorities Protection Treaty, contrary to the express wish of the Peace Conference, were included only partially and in a weakened form in the Constitution as a fundamental law of the State. One of the principal protective provisions, the guarantee of real equal treatment of all citizens, was deliberately omitted.

On the basis of the Protection Treaty we have a full claim to the establishment of the fact that a number of laws which have done us serious injustice and caused us heavy losses are contrary to the treaty and to the constitution. Merely as examples I will refer to the law on land reform, the language law, the law for the protection of the Republic with its supplements, the law on the reform of the political administration and almost all political laws since 1933, in particular the law on the dissolution of political parties, the authorisation laws and, more especially, the law which quite changes the constitutional position of the State, the law on the defence of the State. To a still greater measure this applies also to the official acts of the Czechoslovak authorities. By an increasing number of laws and decrees, the recognition and exercise of civil rights is a matter for the free discretion of the authorities.

In fact, a legal position has arisen which makes the Minorities Protection Treaty quite ineffective, because only the absolute and uncontrollable, unrestricted discretion of the authorities prevails.

The Constitution was decided upon by the so-called 'revolutionary national assembly', which was not authorised for the purpose by public general elections, but which consisted of a purely Czech committee, the so-called 'Narodni vybor'. The national groups of the new State, consisting of four and a half million people, making 34.5 per cent of the total population of the State, were not represented at all in this revolutionary national assembly.

The Constitution, therefore, did not arise out of the decision of the entire population of the State, but of only a part. The basic law of the State was thus a violation of the fundamental principle of every democracy, namely the sovereignty of the people.

According to the statements in the memoranda and according to the preamble of the Treaty of St. Germain, Czechoslovakia was proceeding to form a voluntary union of the peoples of Bohemia, Moravia and Silesia together with Slovakia into a uniform and independent State. I must point out that this statement in the memorandum and this preamble to the Treaty of St. Germain constitute a historical and actual untruth.

The Sudeten Germans, after the collapse of Austria, also claimed for themselves the right of self-determination, formed their own national governments for Bohemia and Moravia-Silesia and announced to the whole world their desire for independence. The Sudeten German territory was occupied by Czech troops against the will of the Sudeten Germans a few weeks after the declaration of the Republic. No negotiations were sought with the Sudeten Germans by those who were at the head of the new State.

On June 1st, 1920, the German national representatives, after being elected to the first legal legislative National Assembly, protested by means of legal declaration. On March 4th, 1919, when the entire population of the Sudeten German territories made demonstrations expressing their desire for national freedom, this voice of the Sudeten Germans was ignored.

The dictated Peace of St. Germain created a State in the heart of Europe with a population consisting of six different races, in which the greatest nation represented only about 50 per cent of the entire population.

The fact that this 50 per cent, i. e. the Czech nation, regards the State as created solely for itself and wishes to rule over it as if it were a pure Czech national State, was bound to give rise to the most serious national and political tension. By the attempt of the Czechs to impose their political will on the other 50 per cent of the population of the State and to develop their predominant position to a constantly increasing extent, a situation was created which is now in urgent need of being cleared up.

In the past twenty years the Sudeten Germans have on various occasions tried in a pacific manner, by means of a frank understanding, to obtain at any rate a part of their rights. They have also repeatedly applied to the League of Nations as the guarantor of their rights under the Treaty. The Sudeten Germans have in the course of years sent through their authorised representatives no less than 22 petitions and memoranda to the League. But not one of them came before the Committee of Three, not one of them came before the League Council, not one of them was settled.

The Sudeten Germans recognised with bitter disappointment that this method was hopeless. Henceforward they will send no more petitions to the League of Nations, but will use other means to obtain their rights.

The Sudeten Germans have also tried to obtain their rights in the State itself. They have frequently endeavoured to make an arrangement with the Czechs in this State which would render possible a complete and frank adherence of the non-Czech peoples to the State.

The world is aware of that attempt by Sudeten German parties which has gone down to history under the name of 'activism' and which only recently came to an end. From 1926 until the spring of 1938, that is to say for twelve long years, German parties have endeavoured with a self-denial amounting almost to self-sacrifice to obtain at any rate the appearance of equality of rights and the scantiest material guarantees. This attempt also, which, in spite of constant humiliations and the complete absence of any success, was carried out for twelve years, was unable to move the Czechs to come to an agreement with the Sudeten Germans. The activist attempt to reach an understanding came to grief on the boundless demand of the Czechs for power, on the ideology of the Czech national State, and on the anti-German mentality of the parties dominating the State.

In view of the profound national consciousness which today inspires the entire German race, it can be a matter of surprise to no one if the 75 million Germans in the Reich take a constantly increasing interest in the fate of the great Sudeten German national group.

But it cannot at present be a matter of indifference, not only for Germany but for the whole of Europe, whether the Sudeten Germans who are suffering political and legal oppression, obtain their rights or not.

* * *

The change to be brought about must entail a fundamental departure from the idea of the National State. For the development of the State during twenty years must have taught the Czech people that there can be no Czech National State with us. If the Czech people want only a national State of this kind, they can only have it without us. If the Czech people will give up their illusions and carry out a reconstruction of the State in common with the other national groups, it must be made absolutely clear to them that the instrument of the Minorities Protection is quite inadequate to satisfy us.

We will never be content to play the part of a so-called "minority".

We are not a minority with minority rights. If we do not obtain the same rights as the Czechs, we shall no longer be in a position to assume the same duties.

A solution of the national problem while at the same time maintaining the Czech National State idea and the Czech claim for domination over the other peoples and their settlement territories is absolutely impossible. Here there is no question of negotiating or bargaining, but only a decisive No!

The codification of the existing so-called minority provisions of a legal and administrative nature into a statute can in reality mean nothing else than the further establishment of a twenty-year diminution of rights in all spheres of national, political, economic and State life, in other words the perpetuation of injustice and violence. The plan of a minority statute has, however, made two things clear to the world: in the first place, that the Czechoslovak Government has now also realised the necessity of a legal settlement of the question of nationalities; in the second place, however, that it has still not gone so far as to tackle the problem fundamentally. Either it has not reached the stage of realising this fact, or it still thinks half-measures are sufficient.

What we have suffered, tolerated and lost in the last twenty years goes to form a single vast charge against a system which we consider it our duty to combat with all our strength.

How long will the Czechs still try to represent that dangerous view which bids defiance to all historical development that it is the Slavonic duty of the Czech people to form a bulwark of the Slavonic race against the Germans? It is dreadful to have to reach the conclusion that the Czech people have for decades been reared in a false view of history and been urged into a historical mission which they can never fulfil. The Czech people have never at any time or in any way possessed as close spiritual, cultural and economic connections with another Slavonic people as with the Germans.

If the twenty-year anniversary of this State is celebrated this year, it must of course be understood that the Germans, after twenty years of oppression, cannot take part in such celebrations. During these twenty years the Czechs have done nothing to win the Sudeten Germans for the State in which they were incorporated against their will. The Czech people had time enough in twenty years to arrange internal conditions to the satisfaction of all peoples. But their statesmen have not fulfilled what was to be expected of them in three respects. They have not kept firstly the promises which they gave voluntarily at the Peace Conference, secondly their obligations under the Treaty of St. Germain and thirdly the legal obligations into which they entered under the Constitution. They have replaced civil and political equality of rights by a diminution of the rights of the non-Czech peoples, and the free development of all races by national, political and cultural oppression of the non-Czech population. Instead of a true democracy, the dictatorship of the Czech majority, bureaucracy and police was set up. Instead of a "second Switzerland" with satisfied nations possessing equal rights, a State was created in which at present all non-Czech peoples justly feel themselves to be unfree and dissatisfied, deprived of their rights and oppressed. Today all the non-Czech peoples and national groups from Bohemia to Sub-Carpathian Russia protest against a treatment which can no longer be brought into harmony with national self-consciousness, honour and dignity.

The mistakes and delays of the Czech administration date back to the time when the State was founded. While it was pointed out in a Czechoslovak memorandum to the Peace Conference that the general situation necessarily made Czechoslovakia a deadly enemy of the Germans, the following fundamental question must now be raised: is it desired to continue to maintain this political aim which is removed from reality and therefore dangerous, or is it desired to take account of the real historical development? If the Czech statesmen sincerely desire to enter into friendly neighbourly relations with the German people, there must be a threefold revision of the conditions under which the Czechs view world policy:

1. a revision of the Czech historical myth which is based on false ideas;

2. in particular a revision of the unfortunate view that it is the duty of the Czech people to form a Slavonic bulwark against the so-called German urge towards the East ;

3. a revision of that position in foreign policy which has hitherto brought the State into the ranks of the enemies of the German people.

At the same time, the Czech people must make up their minds that the rearrangement of their relations with the Greater German Reich is impossible without a simultaneous rearrangement of their relations with our national group.

* * *

The demands which we have to put forward on behalf of the united Sudeten Germans can be reduced to a simple formula : We shall feel ourselves to be oppressed so long as we cannot do the same as the Czechs. Everything that is permitted to the Czechs must also be permitted to us. In a word, we wish to live as free people among free people. If, therefore, there is to be a peaceful development in the Czechoslovak State, the following State and legal order must, in the conviction of the Sudeten Germans, be created :

1. Establishment of complete equality of rights and status of the German national group with the Czech people ;

2. Recognition of the Sudeten German national group as a legal body, by the grant of a position of equal rights in the State ;

3. Determination and recognition of the German settlement territory ;

4. Creation of German self-government in the German settlement territory in all spheres of public life, in so far as the interests and affairs of the German national group are concerned ;

5. Creation of legal protective provisions for those nationals who live their national life outside the closed settlement territory ;

6. Removal of the injustice done to the Sudeten Germans in 1918 and reparation of the damage caused by that injustice ;

7. Recognition and application of the principle : German officials in the German territory ;

8. Complete freedom to adhere to the German national idea and the German ideology.

In view of the recent internal and foreign political development and the increase in value and power of the Sudeten Germans, I should be entitled to extend our claims still further. I do not do so in order to prove to the whole world that the Sudeten Germans, in spite of all their bitter experience, are prepared, by limiting their claims, to make an honest and serious contribution to the maintenance and strengthening of peace. It is now for the administration of the State and the Czech people to give the same sincere proof and to speak less of peace while doing more to promote it. But no further attempts must be made by means of fine words to give an impression of order in the State, especially to foreigners who are unaware of the facts, and to continue to evade the problem by means of superficial apparent solutions. But it would also be wrong if Czech policy were to rely solely on its alliances with France and Russia without taking upon itself a decisive share in the safeguarding of European peace.

Regardless of the State frontiers, the Sudeten Germans, as a part of the German people, with whom we always have been and still remain in indissoluble connection, could not and would not hold aloof from an ideology to which at present all Germans in the world gladly adhere. In particular we, as Germans who are in danger and who are fighting for our existence, can but adhere to an ideology the supreme law of which is the law of the community. This is a question of sentiment, the liberty of which is guaranteed to every citizen by the Constitution. We also claim this liberty, without thereby placing ourselves in opposition to the principles of the State. In the same manner as the Germans of the whole world, we also adhere to the fundamental National Socialist views of life, which fill our entire feelings and thoughts and in accordance with which we shape the life of our national group within the framework of the laws.

I must state very frankly and categorically that it is intolerable to us that, under the cloak of subtle legal constructions, persecutions occur which are not aimed at criminal acts but only against that view which must today be simply described as the German view. Czech terrorists will hate us and persecute us on account of this frank adherence to the German National Socialist ideology. Genuine democrats on the national Czech side will understand and respect our adherence. For they are aware that even in this State there must be room for every honest ideology and that the Czech people themselves have to thank a uniting national sentiment for their rebirth a hundred years ago. It will therefore depend on the insight and will of the Government of the Czech people whether, on the twenty years' jubilee of the State, the conditions which are at present intolerable to us still exist or whether the Czech contribution to the peace of Europe will be made. We do not want war either within or without, but we can no longer tolerate a position which for us signifies war in peace."

At the May festival in Gablonz on May 1st, 1938, Konrad Henlein again set forth and supplemented his Karlsbad programme. This programme, he said, contained no maximum demands, but a basis that was just sufficient to bring the national problem to a solution. It was not a question of dead paragraphs, but of the vital right of the German national group, not of the Constitution but of a new and just order in the State. He could therefore withdraw nothing from his Karlsbad statements and claims. It could not be the duty of Europe to support with every means the principle of the Czech demand for rule and power against the principle of equality of rights for all peoples and national groups in Czechoslovakia, but it was on the contrary the duty of Europe to accelerate this internal appeasement.

But it is not only the Sudeten German national group that has brought its neglected national rights urgently to the notice of Prague in the last few days and weeks. Almost at the same time, namely on April 25th, at Budapest and May 12th, at Mährisch-Ostrau, representatives of the Hungarian and Polish national groups made demands on Czechoslovakia for national autonomy. As far back as March 29th, in the Prague Parliament the deputies Kundt for the Sudeten German Party, Szüllö for the Hungarian national minority, Wolf for the Poles and Dr. Tiso for the Slovakian autonomists made significant statements warning against apparent solutions. It is therefore possible to speak of the formation of an autonomist bloc of all non-Czech national groups.

Resurrection of the nations! Yes, but in this case not in the old Danube Monarchy but in the young Moldau republic.

It is now the turn for the State to speak. Has it understood the signs of the times? It almost seems as if it had not, in view of recent events. Did it really think the statement that three-quarters of the Sudeten Germans were behind Konrad Henlein was merely a case of the wish being father to the thought and a flight of the imagination on the part of the Sudeten German party? If so, it has learnt better from the elections on three successive Sundays which took place, as it were, with a background of fixed bayonets. After Henlein's victory with over 90 % of the Sudeten German electors, there can be no further doubt as to the national consciousness of unity and the national unity movement of the Sudeten Germans. This has moreover given sanction to the Karlsbad demands. Dr. Hodza, in expressing the opinion in his statement to the press on May 19th, that "the idyllic times of the last 15 years, which followed upon the War, are now past and the people must return to a new epoch of struggle and remain in a permanent state of alarm", does not show great comprehension for the position. These fifteen years may have been idyllic for the Czechs, but they were certainly not for the foreign national groups. For the Germans they began on March 4th, 1919, when 52 of their members paid for their belief in the right of self-determination by death. At the beginning, too, was the common legal statement of the 69 German deputies in the first Prague parliament on June 1st, 1920:

"The Germans of Bohemia, Moravia and Silesia and the Germans of Slovakia had never any desire to unite with the Czechs and to form a union to create the Czechoslovak Republic... The German Sudeten territories have in fact never been asked their wishes, and as far as they are concerned the result of the peace treaties is merely the sanctioning of violence, but not a legal position... We therefore reject the fable of the purely Czech State, of the Czechoslovak nation and of the Czechoslovak language, as being in gross contradiction with the facts. We will never recognise the Czechs as the masters, and never agree to be servants in this State..."

The above remark by Hodza merely shows in a striking manner that the Prague Government has never succeeded in gaining the slightest trace of love, respect and confidence among the national groups.

Nevertheless the moment when Konrad Henlein entered the study of the Czechoslovak Prime Minister for his first conversation was a historical one. For it signified the collapse of a formalist construction into which the Czech State had been forced from its birth and which created the grotesque position that the founder and leader of the greatest party was not received by the Government because he was not a member of parliament!

On May 19th, 1935, when the first great election victory of the Sudeten German party gave them at one blow 44 seats in the Chamber of Deputies and, in Hodza's words, put an end to the former idyll, it would have been an easy matter to restart this idyll, though of course it would have had to include all. But the authorities in Prague would not realise that this change-over in the party system of the Sudeten Germans did not raise a parliamentary problem, as was thought by the formalists, but brought the State up against the question of its existence. The historic chance of a compromise with the Sudeten German national group, which Konrad Henlein offered to the Czechs after this election victory was thrown aside, because erroneous speculations were engaged in regarding the future development of the Sudeten German party.

Has Prague at last learnt the lesson? It is true that there is no longer any talk of a minority statute, but of a nationality statute. Dr. Krofta, the Foreign Minister, in the Brussels « Soir » and the « Intransigeant » of May 18th, even announced a charter of nationality rights. He also hinted at its contents: a résumé or codification of the minorities protection provisions hitherto applicable in a legislative act. During the elections, Dr. Benes on May 21st at Tabor and Dr. Hodza on May 26th in « Paris Soir » went a little further. The former said: "The Government is preparing some very important legislative measures which will make more perfect our present nationality system, which will confirm the actual equality of rights and political and moral equality of all citizens and all nationalities in the State, which will safeguard their justified political, economic, and cultural positions on the basis of their numbers, strength and proportion, and which will give them the guarantee that they will maintain and fully develop their nationality under all circumstances and will really be able to feel themselves equals among equals". Dr. Hodza supplemented these statements and, in reply to the interviewer, summarised the fundamental principles of the future Statute in two words: self-administration and proportionality. The Germans, who form 22 % of the population, will have access to 22 % of the positions in all fields of the State administration. And the other nationalities will have the same privileges in proportion to their numbers.

In the meantime this statute, which has almost become legendary, has been revised three times because the members of the Government could not agree, and Deputy Kundt had to state in the « Sudetendeutsche Rundschau » of June 3rd, in view of the constant jungling with the statute, that it was not yet ready. At the same time he added that a statute could not solve the necessary legal order in the State, i.e. the constitutional and legal reforms as demanded by the Karlsbad programme. As regards the bright idea of proportionality, Deputy Dr. Neuwirth stated that if it was thought the problem could be solved by a figure proportionate to the population, this was an error. The filling of 22 % of the administrative posts anywhere in the country with Sudeten Germans would not safeguard the territorial, economic, cultural and national future of the German national group. That group did not want to have dealings with the State through individual members, but as a legal body. The illusion of the national State and its people should be replaced by the idea of peoples and national groups with equal rights and the right to self-administration, that is to say, self-determination of their own common affairs and the right to an equal voice in the common affairs of others. In short a national order should be created on a different basis from that of Versailles and St. Germain which had been proved to be a danger not only for the State itself but also for European peace.

THE CZECHOSLOVAK STATE AND ITS FOUNDATION

Documents of the Peace Conference

I. The 11 Memoranda submitted to the Peace Conference as the Basis for the Establishment of the State and the Incorporation of Foreign Territories and Peoples

It has recently been repeatedly stated in Czech circles, especially in connection with the eleven memoranda of the Czechoslovak Peace Delegation which were only made public at the end of 1937, that their representatives at the Peace Conference had little influence on the decisions of the «Big Four». Of these memoranda hitherto the text of only the third and eleventh had been published, dealing with the problem of the Germans in Bohemia and the claim for the reparation of war damage by the Czechoslovak Republic. In a series of articles in the «Prager Presse», the German organ of the Czechoslovak Government, a writer signing himself XY dealt on October 6th, 8th, 9th and 10th, 1937 with the German publication of the memoranda which had been acquired in the original French text by the «Kaiser-Wilhelm Institut für ausländisches Recht» of Berlin. They were published by the rapporteur of the Institute, Dr. Hermann Raschhofer together with the German translation (Die tschechoslowakischen Denkschriften für die Friedenskonferenz 1919/1920; Carl Heymanns Verlag, Berlin W. 8), in order to investigate the value under international law of these memoranda in view of the foundation of the Czechoslovak Republic.

In the above mentioned series of articles in the «Prager Presse», the writer XY who, judging by the contents, must occupy a special position in Czechoslovak Government circles, made the main charge that matters which occurred eighteen years ago should no longer be stirred up.

The Czech memoranda, he says, were «politically adapted to the time»; a number of material mistakes had crept in at that time; they represented the political programme and must be regarded as political documents; moreover if these documents were compared with those of other States and nations, the great moderation and reasonableness of the Czechoslovak memoranda would be observed.

It must not be underestimated that such a confession is of particular value at the time when it is made. But it is in no case true that these memoranda were merely political documents. The memoirs of Dr. Benes «The Resurrection of the Nations» show that the present President of Czechoslovakia was himself the author of these memoranda. In order not to be taken by surprise by sudden decisions of the Great Powers, he began to prepare material for the Peace Conference. «I therefore rapidly composed, improvising and without data and literature, most of our memoranda in which I included all the peace claims. When our Peace Delegation arrived, I submitted them for its approval. Some of the memoranda were supplemented and others corrected by the members of the Delegation. When the Peace Conference suddenly asked the Delegations of the individual nations to present their wishes in writing. I was able on the next day to produce almost everything that was wanted. This preparedness bore fruit in the solution of our questions in the commissions of the Conference».

The memoranda are therefore the official demands of the Czechoslovak Delegation. To deal with them is not merely to rake up memories of the past, but rather to clear up the principles of the immediate present. Mr. XY may be right when he says that the decisions reached in Paris may have also been taken on other grounds on which Mr. Benes could have had no influence. «The historical fact that ultimately" as Harold Nicolson, the British member of the Committee on Czech affairs, observes, "the Big Ten or the Big Five decided all important questions in camera and apparently on a quite fortuitous and irresponsible basis" is contested by no one. Even Mr. Balfour spoke of "ignoramus", of "three almighty, all-ignorant men who sat together and divided up entire continents". But it is also clear from Nicolson's notes to what extent the Czechoslovak representatives were the "enfants gâtés de l'Entente", and the minutes of the meeting of February 5th, 1919 shows not only at what length Mr. Benes spoke but also the complete identity in the arguments and information between his report and the memoranda. (Reproduced in David Hunter Miller: My Diary at the Peace Conference, Volume 14, page 211 et seq.)

While on the one hand Benes succeeded by his caution and skill in obtaining recognition for Czechoslovakia shortly before the armistice, his memoranda led to the Czechoslovak peace demands being practically accepted in February 1919, without regard to the Austrian note of December 13th, 1919. When it is added that it was only in May and June that the German-Austrian Peace Delegation was faced with detailed conditions, which they had simply to sign unreservedly, no one will be able to affirm that the decision regarding three and a half million Germans was taken on any other basis than that of the Czech memoranda. These memoranda are thus the foundations of a "justification" of the arbitrary annexation of German territories and peoples.

In 1919, after the conditions of St. Germain became known, the Sudeten German people themselves applied to the Peace Conference and described their position in a memorandum. They were just as much entitled as the Czechs and Slovaks, the Latvians, Lithuanians and Estonians, in view of their cultural standard and the number of their population, to claim State independence; their connection with their German brothers and sisters was however so profound that they abandoned this idea. But since they were Germans, their oppression was dictated.

"Because they were Germans"—this reason is not willingly accepted today. It is therefore a duty to tear aside the mesh of lies which, by veiling the great blame for the existing European dissension, is again imposed on world public opinion by anti-German propaganda. The memoranda, from which the following extracts are given, are documents showing the deepest hatred of Germany. If the authors of these memoranda attributed such hatred to events which occurred at the time of the great migration of nations it will undoubtedly be permissible eighteen years after they were written to bring them before those who hypocritically appeal to the principles of democracy and respect for the right of self-determination. This applies in particular to the new Czechoslovak State which has not yet agreed to reconcile itself with the Sudeten Germans as a party with equal rights. But the Czech people did not wish it. The logical result would be, in order to have peace in the State, to renounce those portions of the population that cannot be coerced. But, for strategical and other materialistic reasons, the Czechs do not want to make this renunciation; these are reasons for which the right of self-determination of the nations has been unscrupulously violated. It is therefore possible to look in the memoranda for a reply to the question as to why bleeding wounds in Europe are left open in spite of the great dangers which they entail for all. When Wilson demanded respect for the national claims of the nations, he added prophetically that the right of self-determination was not a mere phrase, but a peremptory principle of action which statesmen could in future only neglect at their own risk. As the Czechoslovak Delegation at the Peace Conference counted on a decision to be taken on general political, economic and strategic grounds, they endeavoured in their memoranda to supply these particular grounds for such a decision, and therefore the argument of the "deadly enemy" and "arch enemy" runs like a red thread through these proposals. On reading the memoranda it becomes terribly clear in the first place how simple and ignorant the authors must have thought those who had to take great decisions on the basis of those statements and, in the second place, to what extent hatred and blindness decided the fate of the nations in 1919, so that it was unnecessary to take the trouble to allow logic to rule in the memoranda. In the name of the right of self-determination the Czechoslovak representatives demanded the destruction of century-old organic connections with a reference to "historical frontiers" of which the Czech people had their first experience in 1919. When the right of self-determination for the Czechs could not be proved even by exaggerated statistics, the memoranda went on with surprising indifference to adduce economic, strategic or historical grounds, and when even that was not convincing enough they spoke of the great "political mission" of the Czechs in the interest of the Allies whose aim it must be in future to exclude the Germans from European policy and to suppress their "urge for expansion" by a circle of Slavonic nations. This is not sheer romance, for we are taught by the remarks of French statesmen that such a front of national hatred was to be erected in Europe and its disastrous effects have not yet been overcome. The memoranda of the Czechoslovak Delegation are finally the documentary foundation of another dispute which has recently come to the fore. The Czechs have affirmed that the Czechoslovak Delegation in Paris did not promise that the new State would be founded as a kind of Switzerland. On this point we will furnish the necessary documentary material in a special section in this number.

Space prevents us from explaining our attitude in detail to the historical, geographical and statistical statements in the memoranda, although it would be of the greatest interest in clearing up the present discussions to publish these documents in extenso. For the purpose of our publication it may however suffice to publish the text of the conclusions which the authors have given briefly at the end of each memorandum and in various cases at the end of each section.

These "conclusions" furnished the construction according to which the grounds were subsequently adapted. We have, however, been obliged, in addition to these conclusions, in some cases to give extracts from the preceding matter, as we desired to show the tendencies which ultimately facilitated the decisions of a power policy.

In short, these memoranda may be said to form a kind of report on the motives of the foundation of the Czechoslovak State. They give indications of what their authors regarded as valid principles. At the same time they endeavour to determine politically the character and task of the Czech State in the midst of the European world of peoples and States, namely the alleged reparation of historical injustice, considerations of a strategical nature, the role of the Czechs as the protector of other Slav peoples, in short, definite political intentions which are to be found mainly in the fact that Czechoslovakia must be regarded simply as a bulwark against Germanism.

* * *

The first memorandum bears the title: Czechoslovakia. Her history and civilisation. Her struggle and her work. Her importance in the world. It treats in detail of the general position of the Slavs in relationship to Germans and Romans and makes a comparison in particular of the characteristics of the Slavonic and Germanic races. Other chapters deal with the Czechoslovaks and their special position among the other Slavs in the middle ages and in the nineteenth century in view of their historical, cultural, economic and political development; on this basis the predominant mission of the Czechoslovaks in the history of the Slavs is argued, and the "idea of Slav solidarity" is advanced.

The conclusion reached is as follows:

In summing up all our remarks on the special physiognomy of the Czechoslovaks within the great Slavonic family and in the world, we may make the following statements:

1. Thanks to their geographical position and historical circumstances, the Czechoslovaks have formed a group which stands at the head of the Slavonic nations in its historical development towards new forms of modern civilisation.

2. In modern and contemporary times they have as a nation reached the highest spiritual, social and economic development. Their national organism represents in the grouping and organisation of the social classes the most balanced body and that best suited to the conditions of modern life within the other Slavonic nations.

3. Their general position necessarily made them deadly enemies of the Germans who were their oppressors. The question whether they wished it or not did not need to be raised; they were enemies through the force of circumstances; it was their historical role. But since they were too weak, they were only able to appeal to the great principles of humanity as against their German oppressors, so that their philosophy and all their political doctrines are penetrated by a philosophical idealism without reservations and restrictions.

4. This position arose out of the initiative which they took in their movement for Slavonic solidarity.

5. Lastly, there is a final and very special point in the history of civilisation: all Slavonic nations have gone through a period of national rebirth. We have seen that the Czech rebirth was entirely different from that of the other Slavs. The other Slavs were simply oppressed. The Czechs were almost entirely exterminated; they have accomplished, as it were, the miracle of resurrection.

It is comprehensible that this nation which has succeeded by its great struggle in all spheres of social life and especially by its spiritual and economic development in gaining the first place among all Slavonic nations, at present arises its voice to cry to the whole world that it has the right to political independence at the side of the other free nations. In this war it has done everything and suffered the worst persecutions from the Central Powers in order to merit that independence; the ultimate victory of the Entente has brought with it the complete triumph of the Czech cause.

As regards the alleged "extermination policy" practised by the Danube Monarchy, the chapter on the development of the Czechs before the War gives valuable, though unintentional, information. It reads as follows:

At the beginning of the present war, we represented a harmoniously constructed closed national formation; a strong peasant class formed, as it were, the backbone, a finely organised working class formed the limbs and was the expression of our purely democratic aspirations, a well-to-do and independent middleclass was growing up and fought with all its might against the privileges of the Germans, a numerically strong and highly educated intellectual class represented the head. Educated in the German school, it was compelled to use German methods and German systems, but this was only a means to combat the Germans more effectively. We have solved a number of questions that are still outstanding with our Slavonic brothers, such as, for instance, the question of national education (there are practically no illiterates among the Czechs) and the Jewish question (which is of predominant importance with the Russians and Poles) etc. The Poles, moreover, have also achieved a great work, especially the Poles in the Posen district who in this respect resemble the Czechoslovaks in the method of their national work. The Slovenes are almost in the same position. The others have remain behindhand.

To sum up, we may say that the Czechoslovak national organisation is at present perfectly well balanced. Intellectually the nation is well educated, has more than 6000 Czech elementary schools, 110 secondary and higher schools, 39 commercial and industrial schools, 65 agricultural schools, art and music academies, two technical high schools and a university. Czech literature and art is flourishing, and the activity of the nation in this respect, even during the War, is astonishing.

In political respects the fate of the Dual Monarchy was decided more and more in Prague. During the War it was observable that Bohemia drew the other Slavs into open resistance against Austria-Hungary. If Bohemia today becomes independent it will undoubtedly be an exemplary State, since everything is prepared for this. It is admirably administered and in a more flourishing condition than Belgium was before the War. In economic respects the Czechs are developed to such an extent that they at present assume the first place among all the Slavs and are even victorious against the competition of German commerce and German industry. In the last twenty years this economic development of the Czechs has surprised the whole world. Thanks to their commercial firms and banking institutions they have penetrated into all the provinces of Austria and Hungary and even into the Balkans. This spiritual, political, economic and social rebirth of the Czech, in view of its rapidity and its complete success in less than a hundred years, is a unique example in history.

At the present time, therefore, we see the Czechs maintain their old position among their Slavonic brothers and continue their tradition which made them the advance guard of the great Slavonic family in the heart of Western Europe.

The second memorandum contains the territorial demands of the Czechoslovak Republic at the Peace Conference.

It reads :

The territorial demands of the Czechoslovak Republic relate to a number of very important points; these points must be cleared up in order to give an accurate idea of the Czechoslovak question in its full extent.

These problems, which include the entire Czechoslovak question, can be divided up as follows :

1. The question of the three main provinces of the old crown of Bohemia which were always Czech : Bohemia, Moravia and Silesia.

2. Rectifications of the frontier of Bohemia, Moravia and Silesia at the cost of Germany and Austria.

3. The question of Slovakia which was torn with violence from the Czechs several hundred years ago, was artificially separated from Bohemia and is now demanded back by the new Czechoslovak Republic on the grounds of the right of self-determination of the nations.

4. The problem of the Ruthenes of Hungary ; in view of the special position of this question we consider that the best solution would be their union with the Czechoslovak Republic.

5. The problem of the neighbourhood of the Czechoslovaks with the Yugoslavs and the necessity for the Czechoslovak Republic and the Yugoslav State to claim certain territories in which the majority of the population is German and Hungarian.

6. Internationalisation of the following routes :

(a) Elbe,

(b) Danube,

(c) Vistula,

(d) The Bratislava-Trieste railway and the Bratislava-Fiume railway,

(e) the Prague-Furth-Nuremberg-Strasbourg railway.

7. (a) The problem of the Czech population in Vienna, which represents almost a quarter of the inhabitants of the former capital of Austria, who cannot remain without protection in the hands of the Germans.

(b) The question of the Lausitz Wends, who are threatened with extermination by the Germans, and whose lot it is the sacred duty of the Czechoslovaks, as their nearest relatives, to care for.

The Danube frontier is a vital question for the Czechoslovak Republic. It cannot be the subject of any concession and it is impossible even to discuss the matter with the Magyars.

It is the only possible natural frontier between Hungary and Slovakia in these two districts. Any other frontier, in view of its inexactitude, would be a constant source of disputes, demands and provocations from one side or the other.

But—and this is essential—with this frontier the Czechoslovak Republic becomes a real Danube State. That has inestimable political and economic consequences. It places this State in a special position as regards Greater Roumania and Yugoslavia, not to mention Hungary and German-Austria. Without the Danube frontier the Czechoslovak State is deprived of a foundation that is indispensable for its future position in Central Europe, and of the power which it needs in order to protect itself (with all respect for the principles of justice and right) politically and economically against the Germans and Magyars and even against its other neighbours. The Danube is for the Czechoslovak State one of the pillars that support its entire political and economic structure.

Access to the Danube at one point or another cannot satisfy it. The Czechoslovak State must be really a Danube State. This will form its vital power and provide its real importance against the east, just as the mountainous frontiers of Bohemia provide its real physiognomy in the west against Germany.

I will be seen that moderation was not the predominant characteristic. The territorial claims went considerably further than what was ultimately accorded.

The right to Bohemia, Moravia and Silesia was based on settlements in ancient times and construed into a "sacred demand". But even this does not suffice; the memorandum continues :

If we take as the basis of our territorial claims the historical frontiers of our three provinces Bohemia, Moravia and Silesia, this does not preclude the possibility of adding to this territory the territories adjoining these provinces in which a Czechoslovak population resides.

In fact this is the case in four territories : two in Prussian Silesia and the two others in Lower Austria. The Czechoslovak Republic therefore demands their annexation. These claims are based on the principle of nationality.

The grounds for the claim to the incorporation of Slovakia are simply stated to be as follows :

1. The Czechoslovaks demand the Slovak territory, which will comprise certain areas partly inhabited by Magyar population.

2. They base this solution on statistical grounds, which prove that their own losses in Magyar territory will for the most part be thus made good.

3. The territory which they demand forms a geographical unit, and it is in particular the Danube frontier which is indispensable for the Czechoslovaks and will place the Czechoslovak State in a political and economic position that will enable it to fulfil its true role in Central Europe.

4. At bottom a frontier such as that demanded by the Czechoslovaks implies nothing more than the application of the same principle of reparation that has been applied to the Germans.

It makes a particularly grotesque impression to demand a minority statute for the Czechs in the city of Vienna and the union or complete autonomy of the scattered population of "Lausitz Wends" in Saxony and Prussia, amounting according to the memorandum to 160,000, "the remains of a Slavonic race which are nearest the Czechs in civilisation and language".

The third memorandum, "The Problem of the Germans in Bohemia", deals with the problem of the Sudeten Germans, which has today become of such importance. We do not need to enter into the statistical tricks employed with a view to proving that the number of the Germans was from 800,000 to 1,000,000 less than was commonly accepted. The figure is known today as it was then, and the object was to make the problem appear less important than it was in reality. The same object was pursued by the following arguments:

The German population along the frontiers of Bohemia is divided into three different geographical groups which have no adequate connections and no common economic interests.

The three groups cannot in view of their geographical position form administratively an autonomous province. For the same reasons they cannot be reunited with German-Austria. If they did not remain a part of Bohemia they would have to be joined up with Germany. This solution would, however, entail very serious disadvantages, and various reasons (economic, strategic, political and even democratic reasons) can be advanced which are all in favour of these so-called German territories remaining with the Czechoslovak Republic.

Finally, in order to throw dust in the eyes of the peace makers who were entirely ignorant of these geographical and ethnographical conditions, some quotations from Prague newspapers together with some statements by Czech workmen were put forward as the opinion of the Germans of Bohemia regarding the Czechoslovak State, and these one-sided documents led up to the following conclusions which have today been entirely refuted:

1. that the Germans of Bohemia are not a united and organised element aiming at a definite object;

2. that they have no leaders in whom the masses have confidence, and that there is no popular movement of real strength in Bohemia which is entitled to claim the legal principle of self-determination of its fate;

3. that, on the contrary, those of the Germans of Bohemia who are capable of giving clear expression to a political idea state that economic interests impel the Germans of Bohemia to prefer the Czechoslovak State to a Greater Germany and that the union of Bohemia with Germany is an illusion.

The next three chapters, however, certainly do not contain "genuine democratic principles", but very material considerations. In this connection they let the cat out of the bag, for they state briefly and bluntly that it is purely economic, strategical and political grounds which make the union of the Sudeten Germans with Czechoslovakia an absolute necessity.

The conclusions state:

Economic grounds oppose a separation of the so-called German territories of Bohemia from Bohemia; if such a separation were made, 1. the economic life of the Czechoslovak State would suffer very deeply and Czechoslovakia would be in danger of becoming an outpost of Germany, and 2. these German districts would be economically ruined.

The natural frontiers which separate Bohemia from Germany are essential to Bohemia for strategical reasons. If these districts are separated from Bohemia, she will be entirely exposed to the greed of the Germans and a new field of activity will be prepared for the economic and political imperialism of the Germans.

It must also be borne in mind that the Germans in Bohemia are only colonists or the descendants of colonists.

Here also as in the case of the Magyars, the pill was to be gilded for the peace makers in Paris, and the following promises were made to them regarding the future fate of the Germans in the Czechoslovak Republic:

It is essential to have a clear knowledge as to how the Germans are treated in the Czechoslovak State. The Czechoslovak Republic is not only prepared to accept an international legal settlement which may be reached by the Peace Conference in favour of minorities, but is further prepared to go beyond such a settlement and to give the Germans all rights to which they are entitled.

The Czechoslovak Republic will be an absolutely democratic State; all elections will take place by general, direct and equal suffrage; all offices will be open to all citizens; the language of the minorities will be everywhere admitted; the right to have their own schools, judges and courts of justice will never be denied to any minority. It must be added that the Czechs, although they are aware that the Germans were granted excessive privileges under the old régime, are in no way thinking of suppressing, for instance, the schools, universities and technical high schools of the Germans, which were moreover little attended before the War.

To sum up, the Germans would have the same rights in Bohemia as the Czechoslovaks. German would be the second national language, and no measure of oppression whatever would be used against the German population. The régime would be similar to that of Switzerland.

This régime will be introduced into Bohemia, not only because the Czechs have always had a deep feeling for democracy, right and justice and loyally grant these rights even to their opponents, but also because they are of opinion that this solution which is favourable to the Germans is also favourable to the political interests of their own country and their own race.

In the 19th century they have retained much practical, and in particular much political sense. They are far too much "realists" and have too much commonsense in order not to see that violence and injustice were the causes of the downfall of Austria-Hungary and that a similar policy could only harm their own State and their race.

Conclusion: All the traditions of the Czechoslovaks admit of the conclusion that the new Republic will in no way oppress the Germans, but that the latter will enjoy a regime of freedom and justice.

Particular interest attaches to the view of the nationality principle which is summarised in the conclusion to the entire memorandum:

We have brought forward many arguments against the separation of the Germans of Bohemia from the Czechoslovak Republic. In favour of the opposite thesis we can only advance a single argument, namely the nationality principle applied in its ultimate consequences, if the language is taken as a criterion.

We respect the nationality principle, but we do not think it should be applied in cases where it threatens the independence of another nation. Then sacrifices must be made in favour of those who merit them and who offer adequate guarantees for their honour and love of peace, especially in a case such as that of Czechoslovakia and the Germans.

This tendency in favour of the Czech claims again appears in the fourth memorandum. It deals with the Polish claims to the Silesian district of Teschen which in view of its award to Czechoslovakia has for years led and still continues to lead to constant friction between that country and Poland. The same arguments are brought to bear against Poland as against Germany with a view to incorporating this district in spite of the Polish population being twice as great as the Czech.

As the nationality principle would have clearly decided in favour of Poland, the memorandum overcomes the objections felt by the Czechs themselves with the "consciousness that there is a higher justice than the mechanical application of a principle". There is no difficulty in finding pretexts to act contrary to the nationality principle in the interest of a "higher justice" in order to remove a people and territory from community with their own race and soil.

In the fifth memorandum the question of Slovakia is again dealt with in detail, and the Czechs put themselves forward as the guardians of the "Slovak branch of the race", make territorial demands for it and base them on their own reasons. The entire memorandum is nothing more than an accusation of the rule of the Magyars and their oppression of the Slovaks. But it does not hesitate to claim that over a million Magyars should be placed under the rule of the Czechoslovak State; as a certain consolation for the peace makers of Paris and in order to make them more inclined to grant this demand, the following promise is made:

that the régime which we should apply to the national minorities in the Czechoslovak Republic is a régime of the very greatest freedom; all rights which safeguard the free development of every nationality would be granted to the Magyars as to the Germans. Moreover the essential character of the Czechoslovak State will be that of a genuine incarnation of modern democracy.

The intentions voiced in the second memorandum regarding a Czech-Yugoslav corridor, the "strongest positive argument" for which is expressly stated to be the separation of the German and Magyar peoples, show clearly the hypocritical character of such promises. It is hardly compatible with the "genuine incarnation of modern democracy" to assume the mission of dividing and separating races and nations which are friendlier to each other than one would like.

« Je vous en prie, n'en parlez pas. C'est une bêtise », burst out Harold Nicolson, as he himself writes, when Benes and Kramarsch tried on February 27th, 1919, to convince him by innumerable maps of the value of this corridor. It was finally turned down at the Peace Conference. But this attempt remains as documentary proof of the sovereign disregard of the nationality and minority rights of five hundred thousand Germans and Magyars, although even the memorandum speaks of a "dangerous" solution which is "artificial and indefensible from the military point of view". But by putting forward the bogey of a "pan-German policy of aggression and expansion" and by pretending that a European problem was involved, an appeal was made, on the grounds that "the application of the nationality principle will never be complete", to a "higher interest which categorically demands the sacrifice of a certain number of inhabitants". It need only be added that the other territorial claims, like the attempt to form a corridor, could only be harmonised with the "higher interests" which necessarily did not concern a young State so much as the Great Powers; this higher interest was thus reduced to what certain democracies have been very successful in disguising, namely the aims of their power policy. It may be some consolation at present to Europe that in the meantime economic reason has come into its own, and Yugoslavia in particular will now be glad that the Czech proposal to construct a corridor to her territory was not put into effect.

The idea of the internationalisation of the means of communication and the definite demands set forth in the memoranda with this object in view have been shattered. These demands, as is plainly pointed out, aimed at "attacking Germany at her most vulnerable point". Here again the authors of the memoranda appear in the rôle of the great European strategists who, in disregard for natural economic conditions, have only one object in view, namely the military domination of Central Europe with the help of France and her allies; for this purpose the military routes, the most important railways and water connections are valued according to their strategical importance, in order to cut of the old consolidated railway lines and connections and to propose new ones with the object of developing the encirclement of Germany.

In the sixth memorandum also we have the picture of contradictory arguments. Here the reference is to "only" 537,962 Ruthenes. What is to be done with them? The memorandum has the most original solution. They are really Russians. According to their geographical situation they are near East Galicia and Hungary. Would mankind be favourable to their fate being "Russia"? Should they be allotted to Poland? Then they would share the fate of their Galician brothers. Their "fate" would be gloomy in this case. Should they be given to Hungary? Mankind would not admit of this, for "the Magyars have oppressed all other races for centuries".

"There is a last solution: the union of the Ruthenes with the Czechoslovak Republic as an autonomous province would appear to be the best solution in the circumstances."

It must of course be admitted that the Ruthenes expressed the wish to be joined up to Galicia, but that is only a "current", for as the memorandum states, the majority of the people are indifferent.

On May 8th, 1919, the Ruthenes, after being prepared by Masaryk, entered the Czechoslovak State as an "autonomous territory".

The claim of the "Lausitz Wends" is again dealt with in the seventh memorandum, and the following conclusion is reached:

They also appeal to President Wilson's principles. They base their claims not only on historical grounds. They also claim the natural right of self-determination on the basis of Article 4 of President Wilson's principles of February 12th, 1918.

1. The Lausitz Wends, the last remains of a great race, have today arisen in order to bring their national and political claims before the Peace Conference.

2. They regard their case as one of the problems which the Conference must settle in order to fulfil the high moral duty which the world expects of it and which it has set itself; the problem of the Lausitz Wends is one of those which will show to what extent Germany will be compelled to carry out the plan of a new Europe and new humanity.

3. They appeal in their favour to the great martyrdom which they have suffered for centuries, to historical and ethnographical reasons and the right of self-determination of the nations.

4. The Czechoslovaks, as their nearest brothers, are morally compelled to bring their case before the Conference, and to support and defend them. That is their moral, and at the same time, political duty, and they beg the Conference to examine the problem with them and to provide a just, equitable and exact solution.

This introduces into the predominant position of the nationality principle a new consideration according to which it may be the legal and political duty of a people not only to take action for the fate of its compatriots not belonging to the State and living outside the settlement district, but also to constitute itself the protector of certain political aspirations of related national groups.

With the same unconcern, the eighth memorandum demands the cession of a part of Prussian Upper Silesia, especially on economic grounds, because the Czechoslovak State could in future obtain its supplies of coal from this district.

The ninth memorandum, "The Problem of the Glatz territory", must be regarded as a remarkable document for the purely military considerations in the Czechoslovak claims to territory. In spite of the admission that "this district is in its majority incontestably German", and that "170,000 Germans" live there, the entire Glatz district was demanded.

The Czech attempt to lay hands on Glatz is part of the imperialistic dreams of its authors, and since no Czech considerations could make it credible, there is nothing more characteristic than the statement in the third paragraph of the conclusions, that "the Czechoslovak State requests the Peace Conference to examine with it what possibility would best serve the interests of the allies and of Europe". Thus they did not dare to mention Czechoslovak interests, but the interests of the allies. Here also it is obvious that the authors of the memoranda so worded them as to obtain the sympathies of the responsible statesmen at the Peace Conference.

The long enumeration of territorial claims is finally concluded in the tenth memorandum by a list of frontier rectifications desirable mainly for strategical and economic reasons; the Czechoslovak delegation expresses its willingness to concede certain territories to the neighbours concerned, i.e. Austria, Prussia, Saxony and Bavaria, but no details are given.

The eleventh and last memorandum on the claim for compensation for war damage addresses a last appeal to the Allies and points out to them the extent to which the Czechoslovak nation, by the revolt of the soldiers which destroyed the striking power of the Austro-Hungarian army, and by the undermining work of the nation, helped the Allies to gain the victory.

1. The Czech soldiers mutinied in masses and, as everyone is aware, from the very beginning of the War repeatedly went over with their arms and equipment to the ranks of the Allies in order to enter the army of the Entente and to fight against Germany and Austria-Hungary.

2. The population began to sabotage the whole economic and political life, all warlike operations and all military preparations. They systematically sabotaged all the supply measures and destroyed military works, machinery, military buildings, munition dumps and large ammunition factories. It is unnecessary to give striking examples in order to prove to what extent the spirit of sacrifice went. Sabotage was deliberately carried on in agriculture and industry in order to prevent products from reaching Austria-Hungary and Germany.

3. They demoralised the soldiers. Our banks organised a boycott of Austro-Hungarian securities and war loans.

4. The entire nation was at one; the entire nation worked quietly and silently from the beginning of the War until the final collapse.

The Czech people, feeling themselves to be independent and enemies of the Central Powers, started work and used every means in their power to combat the Central Powers:

1. Mass desertion of the soldiers.

2. Systematic sabotage of political, economic and financial life, systematic sabotage of the military works and war organisation.

3. Systematic demoralisation of the troops and populations.

4. Complete solidarity of the nation, of which no part went with the Central Powers.

While the treason to the Dual Monarchy is thereby glorified, the counter-measures taken by the Monarchy in its struggle for existence, are naturally criticised in the sharpest terms. The measures taken against this highly treasonous attitude are mentioned in the conclusions with incomprehensible astonishment:

1. The Czechoslovak provinces are districts under Austro-Hungarian occupation.

2. A terrorist rule was imposed on the Czechoslovak population and they were subject to terrible persecutions.

3. Requisition were made similar to those when a country is attacked, and we were deprived of:

(a) All provisions;

(b) All cattle;

(c) All raw materials, especially metals;

(d) All means of communication; at the same time the population were obliged to accept milliards of devalued bank notes, to subscribe to loans which are at present obviously valueless.

Then comes the great appeal:

Our case is considerably strengthened by everything we have undertaken in the allied countries in order that the Central Powers might be destroyed as rapidly as possible.

We decided from the first days of the War to go with the Allies. Even at the beginning of August 1914, the present President of the Czechoslovak Republic M. Masaryk and the present Minister of Foreign Affairs M. Benes, with many of their friends, founded a powerful organisation against Austria-Hungary, which began work without delay. First the politicians were brought together, and then we went abroad in order to undertake the work of military organisation.

Everybody knows what the result was.

1. Apart from their struggle for freedom, the Czechoslovaks attempted effectively to support the Allies in their terrible struggle against Germany.

(a) They set up three armies, in France, in Italy and in Russia, which took effective part in the fight and gained general admiration.

(b) In particular they retained Siberia under the influence of the Allies and thus formed a basis for the restoration of Russia.

(c) They rendered possible the blockade of Germany by the protection of these territories.

2. Everybody today recognises these services and is clear as to the result of our actions. The leaders of the allied nations have on several occasions recognised these services.

3. On the day of the final settlement of everything that was done during the War, we refer to these words in support of our claim.

II. The Struggle for the International Legal and Political Establishment of the Czechoslovak State before and during the Paris Conference

The appeal was not in vain: The line pursued by Czechoslovak propaganda during the War, which consisted in the destruction of the Monarchy and the weakening of Germany, was also maintained in innumerable personal memoranda by Masaryk and Benes. In 1919 the decision did not go to justice but to hatred, not to the right of self-determination but to warlike plans. Even before the end of the War, the Czechoslovaks declared their willingness to assume the mission of the struggle against Germanism. Benes' article "Detruisez l'Autriche-Hongrie", with a map showing the war aims, which was prohibited even by the French censorship, showed this general line. The destruction of German soil and the tearing away of German populations from the mother country were the aim of the pamphlet "Our State and World Peace" by the Czech General Staff officer Hanus Kuffner. He demanded the division of the entire German soil in the East far beyond the frontiers of Bohemia, the extension of the three Slavonic States to the points from which German eastern settlements started in the middle ages. His more immediate aim was to bring the southern, western and northern slopes of the Bohemian-Moravian frontier into the hands of Czechoslovakia. The same ideas are reflected in the memoranda of the Czechoslovak Peace Delegation (Lausitz Wends).

"The nationality principle," writes Benes in truly Machiavellian fashion, "is applied in its main lines, while it naturally takes political and strategical necessities into account."

* * *

At the very beginning of the War, Masaryk, the President of the Czech group in the Austrian Parliament, left Prague in order to carry on propaganda for the independence of the Czechs and Slovaks in the allied countries. He was followed by Dr. Benes, at that time leader of the secret organisation known by the name of "Maffia". Its main activity may be summarised as follows:

1. Propaganda among the allies for the liberation of the Czechs and Slovaks from Austrian rule by an appeal to the right of self-determination of the nations.

2. To win over and organise the Czechs and Slovaks living outside the Central Powers for this ideal, especially those in Russia and the United States.

3. To encourage and organise the desire for independence among the Czechs in Bohemia by secret contact with the leaders in that territory.

4. To organise the hundred thousand or more national Czechs and Slovaks, who lived abroad as deserters and war prisoners, into a Czechoslovak army.

5. The creation in Paris of a National Council in order to bring about the recognition of this Council as a belligerent Power.

On November 3rd, 1916 Briand received Masaryk in Paris and the latter handed to him a "programme for the partition of the Danube Monarchy". On January 12th, 1917 the Czechs were for the first time mentioned in an official document, namely in the allied reply to Wilson's peace proposal at the end of December 1916. In this statement, the liberation of the Italians, Serbs, Roumanians and Czechoslovaks from foreign rule was demanded.

The development desired by Paris then took place rapidly. On August 17th, 1917 an agreement was concluded by the Czech National Council with the French Government for the formation of a Czech army (consisting of prisoners and deserters). This was followed on December 16th, 1917 by a decree of Poincaré, the President of the French Republic, regarding the setting up of a Czech army in France.

On December 16th, 1937, when the twentieth anniversary of the signature of this decree was celebrated at Prague in the presence of the French Foreign Minister, M. Delbos, General Husak made a speech in which he gave the number of these so-called legionaries: "It is generally little known that there were 60,109 volunteers in the Russian legions, 9368 in the French, 19,211 in the Italian, 1365 in the Serbian, making a total of 90,063. In the British army there were 1102 and in the American army 42,404 soldiers of Czechoslovak origin".

On April 21st, 1918, by means of a similar Czecho-Italian agreement, it was decided to form a Czech army in Italy, which was set up on June 30th, 1918. The anniversary of this treaty could not be celebrated to the same extent on account of the lack of Italian participation. A reference was merely made to it in an army order by President Benes on April 21st, 1938, in which a parallel was drawn between the Czech risorgimento and the Italian; the latter was however of a different kind and had a different course and did not lead to the annexation of half a dozen foreign nationalities.

After Lord Robert Cecil, on behalf of the British Foreign Secretary, had recognised the right of the Czech nation to complete independence on May 22nd, 1918, the Czech National Council was first recognised by Mr. Balfour himself on June 3rd, 1918 as the "supreme organ of the Czechoslovak movement in the allied countries" and subsequently, on June 29th, 1918 by M. Pichon, French Foreign Minister as the "first foundation of a future Czechoslovak Government". On August 9th Mr. Balfour declared his agreement with this step, and a similar declaration was made by Italy on October 3rd. Moreover the French Government in its note confirmed the present frontiers for the Czechs.

"True to the principles of respect for the nations and the liberation of oppressed countries, the Government of the Republic declares the claims of the Czechoslovak nation to be justified and well-founded and will endeavour as far as possible at the proper time to vindicate their wishes for independence in the historical frontiers of their territories which will ultimately be liberated from the oppressive yoke of Austria-Hungary."

France thus bound herself in the impending peace negotiations to take action for the creation of a Bohemian State within its historical frontiers, i.e. the whole of Bohemia, Moravia and the Austrian parts of Silesia. France kept this promise to the letter.

The United States, however, went a step further than the western Powers. They recognised the Czech National Council de facto as an independent Government. The note on this subject of September 2nd, 1918 makes the following statement:

"Since the Czechoslovaks, in support of their aspirations towards independence in this War, have entrusted the sovereign political power to the Czechoslovak National Council, the Government of the United States recognises that a state of war exists between the Czechoslovaks thus organised and the German and Austro-Hungarian Empires. It also recognises the Czechoslovak National Council as a de facto belligerent Government.

The Government of the United States further declares that it is prepared to enter into relations with the Government thus recognised de facto for the purpose of carrying on the war against the common enemy, the German and Austro-Hungarian Empires."

The propaganda carried on by Masaryk in the United States and by Benes, the Secretary General of the Czech National Council in Paris, was thus crowned with complete success. Masaryk was successful in particular in gaining Wilson and Clemenceau for his ideas.

After the de facto recognition by the United States, i.e. from September 2nd, 1918, the Czech National Council appointed itself the "Government of the Czechoslovak Nation" with its seat in Paris.

The creation of the Czech State as such took place, at first formally, on October 28th, 1918, after the Austro-Hungarian Foreign Minister Andrassy had stated in a note to President Wilson that he agreed with Wilson's intention that the nations of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy should themselves decide their fate. The existing National Committee in Prague took over the administration of the new State.

The most important provisions of the Law on the creation of the Czechoslovak State are worded as follows:

"The independent Czechoslovak State has come into existence . . . The National Committee, as the executor of State sovereignty, issues the following decree in the name of the Czechoslovak nation:

Art. 1. The State form of the Czechoslovak State will be decided by the National Assembly in agreement with the Czech National Council in Paris. The National Committee is the organ of the united will of the nation and the executor of State sovereignty."

(Art. 2 to 5 provide in detail that the provincial and Imperial laws remain in force.)

The National Committee was extended on December 13th, 1918 together with the "provisional constitution" to form a National Assembly. Neither organ was, however, elected on the basis of the "united will of the nation". For the National Assembly was solely an extension of the National Committee, so that the Czech and Slovak parties appointed new representatives to the National Assembly. The National Assembly, consisting of 270 members, Czechs and Slovaks, on February 29th, 1920, decided upon the Czechoslovak Constitution which is still in force.

After the Czech State was created on paper on October 28th, the struggle began regarding its territorial structure. This struggle was carried on firstly with diplomatic means by Benes and the Paris Minister Osuski before the opening of the peace negotiations, especially in the period from November 1918 to February 5th, 1919, and secondly by armed force. In November 1918 the Czechs fought with the Hungarians for the possession of Slovenia, and an agreement regarding the frontier demarcation was even reached between Slovaks and Hungarians on December 5th, 1918; this agreement was negotiated by Dr. Hodza, the present Prime Minister, who was then delegate of the new Czechoslovak Government at Budapest. This draft agreement was however immediately rejected by the Czechoslovak representatives in Paris on grounds of "better knowledge and more powerful assurances", and in view of these assurances and the material support received the Czechoslovaks conquered the whole of Slovak territory including Hungarian districts which had been represented to be "historical territories". An attempt by Hungary to reconquer them in May 1919 was unsuccessful. On June 12th the "Big Four" fixed the present frontiers, and at the end of June under the leadership of the French General Pellé these territories which contained a pure Hungarian population were conquered for the new State.

The same procedure was adopted against the German districts which had already carried out their act of union to German-Austria. The protest by German-Austria on December 3rd, 1918, with the proposal that this conquest should be submitted to a neutral arbitral tribunal, was rejected by Prague. The elections subsequently fixed by the Austrian National Assembly for March 4th were prevented by the occupation of the German districts and on May 13th, 1919, the "Big Five" in Paris recognised the annexation of the Sudeten territories.

How did this annexation take place in Paris? On October 15th, 1918 the French Government recognised Czechoslovakia as an "allied nation" and the Czechoslovak National Council as the "provisional Government" of the new State; the other allies also recognised the Government, England on September 3rd, America on October 18th and Italy on October 24th. It was at this moment that the Czechoslovaks abandoned their former demands which had been vague and cautious and brought forward their real intentions. This was done at a time when there was no longer any doubt as to the victory of the allies and the flush of victory knew no reasonable bounds. On November 4th, 1918, Dr. Benes handed in a note demanding the "occupation of strategic points" particularly in the territories bordering on Germany.

Dr. Benes' next diplomatic step was to demand the Sudeten German territories and the district of North Hungary which is ethnographically difficult to define. Dr. Benes hoped to succeed in this step with the allies by means of undecided statements put forward, however, "without reservations". Only one factor was uncertain: the development of eastern conditions. This uncertainty is clear from advice to the new Prague Government on November 5th, 1918: "Avoid disturbances and bloodshed in the German districts. It is in our interest that no news reaches here to the effect that these districts are organising themselves too independently and are absolutely irreconcilable with us. Send us news and proofs that representatives of labour, industry and the peasants have expressed the wish to remain with us."

M. Benes was well aware how determined and irreconcilable the German population was towards the Czech attempts in spite of the collapse of the old Monarchy and in spite of the Czech legionaries. The Prague Prime Minister, Dr. Kramarsch, reported to Benes on November 15th, 1918 that "the question of German Bohemia is very acute . . . Our Germans already regard themselves as part of the German Republic".

The prevailing view in Paris regarding the frontier question is reflected in a letter from Dr. Benes to Dr. Kramarsch on November 27th: "I beg you to restrict relations with the Magyars and Germans as much as possible. Formally and officially you should not deal with them at all . . . We are recognised by the world; they are not. And the most important point is: they will not be recognised. I beg to inform you that there will be no peace negotiations with them. They will merely be informed of the peace. Any negotiations by us with Karolyi, the Hungarian President, only strengthen his position . . . I am working energetically in this direction and base myself on the fact that we are recognised and they are not . . . Nothing whatever has been said, and nothing will be said, about the Germans in Bohemia. On that you can rest assured. But that is extremely confidential." In his letter of November 28th, 1918 he wrote: "It is already certain that the Magyars and Austrian Germans at the Conference will not be let loose against us", and in his letter of November 29th, 1918: "I talked today with Pichon. He advises us for our own sake to maintain the standpoint (of not negotiating). It is therefore necessary to put an end to any official negotiations with the Germans and Magyars, on the one hand not to condescend to them and on the other hand not to attach any importance to them". On December 10th, 1918 asks Prague to have a few more days patience in the question of the Germans in Bohemia. He is certain of obtaining a favourable decision. Masaryk, he says, would also clear up the position.

This clearing up of the position took place as follows. The German-Austrian Government, in a note of December 13th, 1918 sent to the Allies through the Swiss Legation in Paris, demanded a plebiscite in the German Sudeten districts. Pichon declined this proposal and on December 21st Masaryk read his first message as President in Prague, in which he coined the expression "German immigrants and colonists".

The next act was the military occupation and the simultaneous agreements with General Franchet d'Esperay, in which France accepted the Czech proposals for a "strategical extension of Czechoslovakia", all the more because Dr. Benes explained that "it was not possible that General Franchet's armistice should grant an enemy State the right to allied territory". Dr. Benes stated with satisfaction in his book "The Resurrection of the Nations" that "it was proved by documentary evidence how important it was to have attained the recognition of the independence and of the Government before the collapse".

The occupation of the German Sudeten districts was an annexation against the will of their inhabitants. The jubilee publication of the Czechoslovak Parliament in 1928 admits this occupation. "The Government had no other course than to take decisive steps against the resistance of Czechoslovak citizens of German race with a view to safeguarding the Czechoslovak frontiers which were absolutely essential for its existence and thus preventing two Governments—the Czechoslovak and the National German—from struggling for the organisation of the administration in certain parts of the Czechoslovak Republic.

III. Vain Warnings and Protests — Official Refutation of the Memoranda

(See also the documents in No 13/1938 of this Journal on the Anschluss of German Austria, pp. 179-187.)

We have seen that the only documentary material used by the Peace Conference was that supplied by the Czechoslovak Peace Delegation. The heads of that delegation, so to speak, bombarded the Allies with maps. There is a characteristic note by Nicolson on the conversation which he had with Benes and Kramarsch on February 27th, 1919: "Benes has a mass of charts drawn for the use of children or the Conseil des Dix. I am exhausted and worn out. I am losing my nerve. 'Je vous en prie', I cry, 'n'en parlez pas. C'est une bêtise.'"

From Benes' memoirs and also from the works of Hunter Miller and Charles Seymour, it is clear that the Czechoslovak representatives constantly took the greatest care to prevent any gap in the procedure of the Conference which would allow those to speak who must have been mainly concerned with such a division of countries and peoples. In this the cautious representatives of Czechoslovakia were entirely successful. It was only in May 1919 that the German-Austrian Peace Delegation learned for the first time the extent of the decisions taken by the Allies in secret meetings, in spite of the knowledge that even on March 4th, 1919 the Sudeten German people had given heroic proof of their unanimous adherence to Germanism in the face of Czech and French machine guns and had demanded union with German-Austria. It is rare in history that a people in times of the utmost social distress, after an exhausting four-year war and in the face of the collapse of a great State, has fought so fearlessly for union with the mother country. The protest made by this people on March 5th, 1919 is not only a proof of ideal national community, but is evidence of the manner in which international law was mercilessly and unscrupulously trodden underfoot by the allied and associated States.

The warnings and protests of the German Moravians, the German Bohemians and the Sudeten Germans, as expressed in the declarations of October 30th, 1918 and January 23rd, 1919, remained the historical evidence of the brutality of the Paris decisions. In addition they make the responsibility of the allied and associated Powers still heavier since, in spite of the knowledge of these representations, decisions were taken under which Europe has constantly had to suffer for two decades. The German groups, who had no knowledge of the Czechoslovak memoranda at that time, not only took up a position to the peace conditions but at the same time refuted the historical, ethnographical and economic statements made in those memoranda. These representations bear the stamp of truth, particularly because they had to be drawn up with the necessary regard for the mentality of the victors and could only maintain what was really unattackable and incontestable.

Extract from the Speech by Dr. Bauer, German-Austrian Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, at the 21st Meeting of the Constituent National Assembly for German-Austria on June 7th, 1919

The Allied and Associated Powers are creating a Czechoslovak State which will contain, in addition to 6 ½ million Czechs, 3 ½ million Germans who will from the very first day resist the hated foreign rule; it will also contain two million Slovaks who, in spite of their close relationship with the Czechs, have their own language, have no historical community with Bohemia and Moravia and have a different social structure and a different cultural tradition from the Czechs. In addition to the Germans and the Slovaks, the Czech State will have nearly three-quarters of a million Magyars, half a million Ukrainians and at least 100,000 Poles. Czechs, Germans, Slovaks, Magyars, Poles and Ukrainians—is this not a new Austria that is arising under the Czech flag, a new nationality State in which six nations, filled with fierce hatred to each other will be brought together and will be hindered in their entire economic, social and cultural development by the national hatred and national struggle nourished by compulsory rule and poisoning the whole of public life?

The old nationality State has collapsed although everything that is old is regarded as sacred; will the new nationality State, an artificial formation of a diplomacy based on a policy of power, be able to survive without economic community, geographic unity or common history? The old nationality State by its collapse has brought the most terrible consequences to the entire world; will the new nationality State, when it is finally shattered by the urge for freedom of the peoples, be able to collapse without setting the whole world aflame?

An attempt is made to console us by stating that the Czechoslovak Republic may become a new Switzerland in which six nations would live together in freedom and peace.

Switzerland arose out of a common struggle for freedom and not out of the compulsory dictate of a victor who subjects the peoples to foreign rule against their will. Switzerland is a voluntary confederation, not a compulsory union in which the peoples have been forced together and will be kept together by the sword of the victor.

The bloodstained 4th of March was not a Sempach or a Murten. The nationality State which was founded by force can only maintain itself by force; it must come into conflict with the urge for freedom of the peoples; its mere existence must be a source of constant danger for the peace and freedom of the nations of the whole world, just as was the existence of the old Austro-Hungarian Monarchy.

We do not envy the Czechs and Slovaks their State independence. But I am convinced that the right of the Czechoslovak nation to an independent State does not extend beyond its own closed linguistic area, and that it is not only a national interest of the German nation but a truly international interest, an interest of the peace and freedom of all the nations of Europe, that the Czechoslovak State should be limited to the settlement territory of the Czechoslovak people.

If it were limited in this way, the Czechoslovak Republic would have every prospect of the happiest economic and cultural development and could lead a free and peaceful life without endangering the freedom of other peoples. But if German Bohemia and the Sudetenland are handed over to the Czechoslovak Republic, not only will 3 ½ million Germans be deprived of their right of self-determination, not only will German Austria lose nearly all her coal mines and nearly all her textile, glass and porcelain industry, not only will our productive forces, our national capital, our economic capacity and our taxation capacity be reduced by more than half, but at the same time a State will be created in the midst of Europe which will be a scene of the fiercest national struggle, a seat of German, Hungarian and Polish irredentism, a source of permanent enmity between two neighbouring peoples and a permanent danger for peace. We are powerless to prevent this; but at the eleventh hour we again give a warning. There exists an international solidarity of the nations; the fate of Poland and the history of Serbia have shown that the violation of a nation is the ultimate cause of the sanguinary fate of all nations.

The reason given for tearing away German Bohemia and the Sudetenland from German Austria is the geographical position of these territories. But this reason certainly does not apply to the German districts of Bohemia and Moravia which directly adjoin Lower and Upper Austria and form a closed linguistic territory with Lower and Upper Austria and the Alp territories. The cession of these territories to Czechoslovakia cannot be justified by geographical, ethnographical or economic arguments; only one argument can be advanced in favour of this demand, i.e. the historical argument, the argument of the historical frontiers. But historical frontiers are only considered to be immovable when they are in favour of the Czechoslovaks and against us.

No respect is paid by the draft peace treaty of the Associated Powers to our historical frontiers.

At the same time we doubt whether the Allied Powers are aware how badly hit we are by such a frontier demarcation.

Note from the German-Austrian Peace Delegation regarding German Bohemia and Sudetenland.

Delegation of the Republic of German Austria

No. 304

St. Germain-en-Laye

June 15th, 1919

Sir,

I have the honour to submit to Your Excellency herewith a Memorandum addressed to the Peace Conference and drawn up by the representatives of the German parts of Bohemia, Moravia and Austrian Silesia, with a view to prove the injustice with which 3 ½ millions of German Austrians are threatened by the Conditions of Peace presented to German Austria.

In view of the extraordinary importance of settling satisfactorily who is to exercise public authorities in the mining basin of Austrian Silesia, I annex an additional draft Convention with this object in view.

As regards the future of the Germans in Bohemia and in the Sudetian districts, I venture to summarise the general impression caused by the Conditions of Peace all over German Austria which the under-signed Delegation is called upon to interpret.

The Allied and Associated Powers are in the course of committing a flagrant injustice towards the population of the above-mentioned territories and towards all German Austrians and to drag the Czechoslovak people itself into an adventurous and disastrous policy. The collapse of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy affords an opportunity of putting an end to this unfortunate struggle between the German and Czech peoples by guaranteeing to each one of them the right to live freely its own national life. By stopping at the frontiers of the districts which really constitute the domicile of the Czechs and Slovaks, the Czechoslovak Republic could in every respect enjoy the satisfactory development of its economic as well as of its social prosperity. It would, if it contented itself with the domain of its own peoples, be one of the richest countries in Europe. Now if German Bohemia, the Böhmerwaldgau, the Sudetian country and the district of Znaim are incorporated in this happy and fertile state, if these German regions are united to Czechoslovak territory against the wishes of their inhabitants, the former Austria would be replaced, in so far as the Germans and the Czecho-Slovaks are concerned, by two small states continually struggling with one another: and it must be remembered that the former Austria, however problematical its existence may have been, always assured more or less the material existence of its peoples. The Powers would thereby create in the middle of Europe a centre of civil war which might become much more dangerous for the world and its social life even than the continual ferment in the Balkans. This judgment may seem hard but it is based on the firm conviction of the German Austrian people. This conviction is unanimous and may be summed up in the following watchword "Let us leave this house which is burning, and let us join our country of origin."

The wrong which is being done to German Austria is painfully apparent to all eyes. The extent of territory and the number of inhabitants concerned are more than double the territory and population of Alsace-Lorraine. Whilst wishing to repair the wrong done to France in 1870-71, the Allied and Associated Powers are about to create a double Alsace. Whilst proclaiming the right of peoples to dispose freely of themselves they at the same time pass a sentence of political death on a population more numerous than the whole of that of Norway or of Denmark. Alsace-Lorraine was annexed to Germany after a war; that was a basis for an annexation which is now with reason set aside by the conviction inspiring international morality; it was, however, recognised for thousands of years by international law as a title of legitimate acquisition. Now the Germans of Bohemia and of Moravia and of Silesia are enslaved without ever having been in a state of war with the Czecho-Slovaks at the very moment when the German Austrians, relying on the Armistice Treaty, thought themselves in safety; as they were quite unable to defend themselves, they felt all the more bitterly the violence which was done to them. How can a people ever forget such cruel and unheard of procedure? Alsace-Lorraine passed from the dominion of a great and highly civilised nation to that of another great Power. This change was nevertheless felt to be an intolerable affront. German Bohemia on her part is however, although it formed part of a great and ancient nation, to be delivered over to a less numerous people, younger than it is as regards civilisation, and forming only a small State. 3½ millions of Germans are to be handed over to the sovereignty of 6½ millions of Czechs! The subject nation can never tolerate such domination. The dominating nation will never be able to accomplish the task set before it! Both are condemned to fight with one another in a disastrous struggle which is far more tragic than were the misfortunes which beset the former Austria, who at least was supported by the equilibrium of mutual hate caused by the different aspirations of eight different nationalities. This disastrous attempt means that after the most appalling carnage of all time the newly established state of things will be far worse and more threatening for European peace than before the war. It is impossible to estimate the disillusion and bitterness of the German Austrians in question, unless it be remembered that they were just on the point of spontaneously adopting the victorious ideas of liberty and democracy proclaimed by the Associated Powers, and that they thought that the moment had just come to establish freely with their brothers inhabiting the Alps a new German-Austrian Republic, and that at that very moment their liberty was snatched from them again and impounded by military occupation on the part of the Czecho-Slovaks; the draft Conditions of Peace ratify after the event these acts of violence; but the German people will never understand how, in view of the humanitarian declarations of the great Powers, a parliament at Prague in which there is not a single German can dispose of the fate of a German country whilst the representatives elected in that country by the free votes of the people are gagged by police measures. The people will never get over that. It will always feel the effects of such proceedings and will never be able to admit the idea that it was handed over without being consulted, by foreigners to foreigners!

The German-Austrian Peace Delegation therefore unreservedly unite with the writers of the annexed Memorandum in requesting that liberty may be restored to the said German countries, by means of elections on a basis of the free votes of the populations of German Bohemia on the one hand, and the Sudetian districts on the other, in order that in each of those provinces a constituent assembly may be called upon to dispose absolutely of the people which it represents.

The German-Austrian Delegation think that they may expect that the Peace Conference will discuss the question of the German districts of Bohemia and in the Sudetian regions, for on this question depends our fate and our future.

Memorandum submitted by the representatives of the German districts of the Sudetians in reply to the Conditions of Peace of the Allied and Associated Powers

(Extract from the Report of the German Austrian Peace Delegation.)

I

Fundamental principles of Peace

According to Part II, Article 6 of the Draft Treaty of Peace and Article 82 of the Conditions of Peace proposed to Germany, the German-Austrian territories of German Bohemia and of the districts of the Sudetians, as well as the "Böhmerwaldgau", southern German Moravia, parts of Lower Austria, the district of Neubistritz and the enclave of Iglau-Stecken are to be separated from the German-Austrian State and incorporated in the Czech State.

The German-Austrian Peace Delegation considers that one of its first tasks is to examine this part of the Conditions of Peace in accordance with the principles which have been proclaimed on many occasions by the President of the United States of America, Mr. Woodrow Wilson, principles which have become the political creed of the democracies of the Universe, have been expressly approved by the belligerent Powers, and have presided over the creation and the development of the German-Austrian Republic.

The principles in question are, in the first instance, as follows:

(1) Point Ten of the message delivered to the Congress of the United States of America on January 8th, 1918:

"The peoples of Austria-Hungary should be accorded the freest opportunity of autonomous development The day of territorial conquest and aggrandizement is gone by; as is also the day of secret covenants Every peace-loving nation which wishes to live its own life and determine its own institutions should be assured of justice and fair dealing by the other peoples of the world as against force and selfish aggression."

(2) The speech delivered at Washington's Tomb on July 4th, 1918:

"The settlement of every question, whether of territory or of national sovereignty, of economic arrangement or of political relationship, must be made upon the basis of the free acceptance of that settlement of the material interest or advantage of any other nation or people which may desire a different settlement for the sake of its own exterior influence or mastery.

"What we seek is the reign of law based upon the consent of the governed, and sustained by the organized opinion of mankind."

(3) The speech to Congress on February 12th, 1918:

(a) Peoples and provinces are not to be bartered about from sovereignty to sovereignty as if they were mere chattels and pawns in a game.

(b) Every territorial settlement involved in this war must be made in the interest and form a benefit of the populations concerned, and not as a part of any mere adjustment or compromise of claims amongst rival States.

(c) All well-defined national aspirations shall be accorded the utmost satisfaction that can be accorded them without introducing new, or perpetuating old, elements of discord and antagonism that would be likely in time to break the peace of Europe and consequently of the world.

(4) "The impartial justice meted out must involve no discrimination between those to whom we wish to be just and those to whom we do not wish to be just. It must be justice that plays no favourites and knows no standards but the equal rights of the several peoples concerned."

II

Origin of the German-Austrian State

The essence of these principles and proclamations can be resumed in the theory that the sovereign will of the "governed" should be considered, both now and in the future, as the most decisive and most important force in the constitution of a State. In this way the formation of the German-Austrian State and its provinces was, in fact, accomplished. The representatives of the former Austrian Parliament from the German electoral districts, elected in 1911 on the basis of universal, equal, and direct suffrage, strengthened by the general approval of the population, united themselves in a provisional national assembly of German-Austria; they proclaimed solemnly and unanimously the union of the districts inhabited by German-speaking populations in a single State and assumed the executive power. Similarly, the members of that assembly, deputies of the homogeneous districts of Northern Bohemia, Moravia and Silesia, inhabited by German-speaking populations, proclaimed the creation of the provinces of Bohemia and of the country of the Sudetians, declared those provinces to be part of German-Austria, subjected them to the laws of that State and instituted provincial governments. Furthermore, German "Böhmerwaldgau" united itself with Upper Austria with which it has a common frontier, while Southern Moravia, which established itself as an independent district, as well as the district of Neubistritz and the German sections of the district of Neuhaus, united with Lower Austria which like wise shares a frontier with them and, moreover, the enclave of Iglau-Stecken joined Lower Austria.

The developments were formally sanctioned by the laws of German-Austria of November 12th and 22nd, 1918, regarding the extent of German-Austrian territory and also by the executive orders of January 3rd, 1919. In accordance with these enactments, these parts of German-Austria consist of the districts enumerated in Annex I.

III

Ethnographic conditions

In all matters concerning these districts we have to do with territories inhabited since their origin by homogeneous German-speaking populations which, except in the enclave of Iglau-Stecken, are directly connected with the regions of Europe where German peoples are domiciled and where the population of another nationality, particularly the Czech population, represents only a small percentage.

According to the census of 1910 (the only official source) the numbers of the population are as follows:

Districts	Sq. Km.	Germans	Czechs
German Bohemia	14,496	2,070,438	116,275
Country of the Sudetians	6,534	643,804	25,028
Bölmerwald	3,281	176,237	6,131
Southern Moravia	2,226	180,944	12,477
Iglau-Stecken	374	38,402	9,769
	26,911	3,109,825	162,674

The effect of the measures of violence now proposed is shewn still more clearly by the following comparisons than by the above figures:

The territory in Bohemia, Moravia and Silesia, inhabited by a homogeneous German population, which is nearly twice as large in area as Alsace-Lorraine and almost equal to Belgium, has a German population about twice as numerous as that of Alsace-Lorraine in 1871. This population is greater than that of Norway, Denmark or Venezuela, is nearly equal to that of Finland or Chile, and is almost as great as that of inhabitants of Switzerland.

The delimitation follows everywhere the clearly recognizable natural and ethnographic lines established by common agreement in 1907 by the representatives of the two nations, at the time when the Czech and German electoral districts for Parliament were determined. These ethnographic lines are exceptionally clear and this fact has also been recognized again and again by French scientists; they are consequently specially appropriate as a basis for the delimitation of States formed by virtue of the national idea of free determination. The clearness and precision of these natural ethnographic lines prove moreover that the Germans of Bohemia, Moravia and Silesia are not of Czech race, as the Czechs allege. For in that case how could one explain the fact that the alleged process of Germanization has been so completely successful within the ethnographic frontier and has remained without any result outside that same frontier?

Czech politicians naturally could not deny that the territories in question are inhabited for the most part by a German population: they deny, however, that the results of the official census have any value whatever by asserting that those results refer not to the nationality but to the ordinary language and that they were falsified by German influences at the time when the census was made. We, for our part, feel bound to affirm the following:

Numerous international statistical Congresses, particularly that held at St. Petersburg in 1873, rejected the application of such distinctions as national feeling or ethnical origin (which is often uncertain) and pronounced in favour of adopting as a standard the "spoken language", a characteristic of a purely objective nature. Further, the errors which might result from applying these different systems are very small and produce an equally small effect on the total result in regard to the two nationalities.

The assertion that the census was carried out under German influence can be disproved by the fact that the Austrian Government was not at all inclined, as the Czechs allege, to favour German influence, but, on the contrary, was often composed of persons hostile to the Germans. Moreover, it is clearly established that the censuses carried out subsequently by the Czechs in order to check the official figures did not produce a result appreciably different from that of the official census. Besides, the policy of German-Austria is solely directed to establishing the ethnical conditions in an indisputable manner by a plebiscite.

Czech politicians further allege that the German territories of Bohemia, Moravia and Silesia have in the course of centuries lost their original Slav character by Germanization. This assertion is false, seeing that the Germans came into this country as successors of the Celts, long before the Slavs, and that the territories which we now claim were occupied peaceably several centuries ago by the German populations which established themselves there.

There is, therefore, no question of a violent process of Germanization,

The territories where German populations are settled today have, in fact, been an ancient German domain for centuries: the insignificant Czech minorities living therein are scattered and only came recently to the country in consequence of the rapid industrial development of these districts.

IV

The treaty of peace regarded as an act creating a new régime of public law

The German Austrian National Assembly, and also Provincial Assemblies, were moreover well aware that the establishment of definite frontiers as regards the other successor States was not completed by the fundamental laws mentioned above, although these laws were entirely based on the principles of democracy and nationality; they realised that the determination of these frontiers still had to form the subject of negotiations regarding the liquidation of the former Monarchy. But these laws were chiefly designed to create a situation in harmony with the decisions of the Congress; German Austria, having full confidence in the solemnly proclaimed principles of self-determination, believed she could expect from these decisions a solution of the problems such as would guarantee firm foundations for a social and economic order and prepare the way, in concert with the peoples, for an equitable constitutional settlement.

The German Austrian State certainly cannot be held responsible for the fact that it has hitherto been impossible to carry out the intention of guaranteeing a well arranged liquidation of the former Monarchy first and foremost as regards territorial questions. It was the Czech Government which, at the time when the Czech State was formed and developed, allowed itself to be guided by principles altogether different from those advocated by the Entente. Without resorting to General Elections, without establishing up to the present day any legitimate Authority, the Czech Government continued the war even after the Great Powers had put an end to it by the conclusion of the Armistice. The Czechs have, in fact, subjugated the German districts by force of arms. The German Austrian Government for its part, has devoted itself to the re-establishment of order in the interior, and, inspired by the formal and constantly repeated declarations of the Entente, has regarded the occupation of the German districts of the Sudetians by the Czechs as a purely provisional measure which would only remain in force until the Peace conference had reached a decision.

Attitude of the Sudetian Germans

The Resolutions whereby the German Districts of the Sudetians were declared to be a part of German Austria were voted by Deputies elected on the basis of direct, universal and equal suffrage, who remained the sole rightful representatives of the people at the time when the Monarchy collapsed. These Resolutions met with unanimous and enthusiastic welcome and approval. The Czecho-Slovak Government represents at the Congress at Paris districts in regard to which it cannot in any way, either now or later, boast of having the free assent or the sovereign will of the population. Despite unheard of military oppression, which even went as far as to re-establishing corporal punishment and apply it to free men and even to women, all political parties, as well as Communes and Corporations, have constantly organised demonstrations to protest against these proceedings. They have succeeded as far as was possible, in spite of the difficulties of communication and the constant efforts to gag the Press and impede the freedom of meeting, in causing their protests to be transmitted to the representatives of the Entente. These demonstrations preclude any doubt whatever regarding the feelings of the population in the German districts of Bohemia. Moreover, repeated demands have been made, although without success, that neutral Commissions should be sent to these districts so that they might be convinced on the spot of the true state of affairs; these demands furnish a further proof of the fact that the German Sudetians have only endured the Czech occupation with repugnance and under stress of military compulsion and that they are sustained by the hope that an impartial enquiry conducted by representatives of the Entente Powers would put an end to their sufferings.

There would be a terrible and disastrous disappointment if the Peace, instead of putting an end to this slavery, made it permanent.

The creation of the German Austrian Republic can, therefore, be considered the purest and (from the historical point of view) the clearest application of the democratic principles governing the modern formation of States. The most that could be done would be to submit this organic act to fresh tests by a plebiscite.

The German Austrian Delegation declares itself ready to consent forthwith to this plebiscite and reserves to itself the right to present to the Peace Congress certain proposals which would guarantee impartiality to the voting.

VI

Proceedings of the Czech Government

No doubt can remain that the proceedings of the Czech Government in the German districts of the Sudetians are in no wise in harmony with the views advocated by the Entente in regard to the new order of affairs. These proceedings are irreconcilable either with the maxims of democracy, or with the principles of nationality, or with a lasting peace of justice. It is likewise certain that if the Peace Conference confirms this foreign domination, it will create new elements of discord for the future, elements which, according to the ideas of President Wilson, should be banished by the Peace for all time.

We affirm that the Czech government, disregarding the right of self-determination, has invaded the territories of the Sudetians upset the peaceful development and the regulation by arbitration of conditions in those countries, and made the German Sudetians the object of a policy based solely on the force of arms and having in view nothing but the material advantage of the Czech nation.

We place it on record that the Czech Government has, under cover of the Armistice, occupied German territory and subjected to its sovereignty, contrary to the principles of the Law of Nations, the German district of the Sudetians; that after overturning the existing legal authorities, it has instituted new authorities and compelled the public officials by threatening their physical existence to take the oath to the occupying State or else has driven them out or thrown them into prison. It has suppressed the free expression of the people's will.

We place it on record that the Czech government has poisoned in an intolerable way the relations between the two nations and destroyed all hope of a peaceful agreement between them. Such wounds cannot be cured. The history of the Czech people is the best proof of this.

VII

Fundamental bases of the Czech State

In any State thus organised a united political will would from the outset be lacking in a great part of the population; and this [sic] will constitute the sole basis for its peaceful development. A State incorporating not only territory inhabited by homogeneous Slovak, Polish, Ruthenian and Magyar population but also extensive districts inhabited by a German population would not be a national Czech State; it would simply be a bad copy of the old Austria, that is to say an organism characterised by the recrudescence of an evil which was thought to be finally stamped out, but on a much less extensive territory, under much less favourable economic conditions and without the historical traditions of centuries. It is to be hoped the wisdom of the Allied and Associated Powers will pay heed while there is still time to the warnings set forth above.

The proportion of nationalities inhabiting the Czech State, after deducting the Polish districts which will eventually be incorporated therein, is as follows:

Czechs	6,291,237 or 48%
Germans	3,719,147 or 28%
Slovaks	1,770,614 or 14%
Magyars	878,643 or 7%
Ruthenes	437,000 or 3%

The projected incorporation in the Czech state of districts of Lower Austria and Prussian Silesia would modify still further the proportion indicated above to the detriment of the Czech nation. If the old Austria was destined to perish because she lacked any unifying political idea common to her various races, both these lessons taught by this experience and also the magnetic force of the democratic and national idea make us foresee that the Czech State, as it is delimited by the draft conditions of Peace, will be unable in the long run to withstand the tendencies of its component parts to settle their own fate freely.

VIII

Conclusions

On the other hand, German Austria deprived of the districts which are the most important from the economic and cultural point of view would be unable to exist as an independent State and for that reason alone would find it impossible to fulfil the obligations imposed on her. But the Czech State, on the contrary, has no need of other people's possessions in order to be assured of the means of livelihood. If this assertion be called in question during the course of the negotiations, the Delegation will be ready to submit to the Peace Conference statistical and economic data which would offer all the means available for forming judgment on the question in dispute. Moreover the international regulation of economic relations offers many means of paying good heed in future also to all desirable economic relations.

The German Austrian Delegation, convinced that the Peace Conference has the task of satisfying within the territory of the former Monarchy "all well defined national aspirations without introducing new or perpetuating old elements of discord and antagonism that would be likely at any time to break the Peace", solemnly places it on record that the Draft Treaty communicated to it is in absolute contradiction with the sovereign will of the German Sudetians and is resented by them as the worst injustice.

The German Austrian Delegation abides by the sublime words of one of the members of the Peace Conference: "that the Great Powers have assumed in full consciousness of their act the entire responsibility for the peace and for the establishment of the reign of justice." Confiding in this promise, the Delegation ventures to submit to the Principal Allied and Associated Powers the following proposal:

"The question as to which State the German population wishes to belong shall be decided by a Plebiscite to take place in the German Districts of the Sudetians by Communes under neutral control, in the absence of Czech troops and in accordance with a procedure to be settled."

IV. The Definite Breach of the Preliminary Peace Treaty and the Violation of the Right of Self-Determination

No particularly great evidence is required to prove that, after the recognition of Czechoslovakia as an allied State and after its "historical frontiers" had been recognised and the disputed districts had been occupied by force, the dealings of the Peace Conference with this problem from February 5th, 1919 must necessarily be of a purely academic nature. This Peace Conference met—and the personal presence of President Wilson made the fact all the more impressive—when the principle of the American prophet had already been most seriously violated. Peoples and provinces had already been transferred from one sovereignty to another as if they were chattels or pawns in a game. Although the help of Czechoslovak war prisoners and deserters had had no decisive influence on the victory of the Allies—which had only become possible by American help—the legal title of the Czechoslovaks to the possession of foreign territory and foreign peoples was based on the fact that, twenty days before the armistice, they had been recognised as an "allied Power".

Reservations were made at the Peace Conference only by the representatives of the United States against the territorial demands of the Czechoslovak delegation. But it will be seen from the proceedings of the first meetings on February 5th and 27th, 1919 that after the forceful decisions that had already been taken, the fate of the Sudeten German people which was only made known by the Treaty of St. Germain of September 10th, 1919, had already been decided de jure at these meetings.

The reports of these meetings therefore supply very useful information in many respects for forming a judgment of the position.

The minutes of the meeting of February 5th, which are reproduced by David Hunter Miller, show clearly that the eleven memoranda possess the fundamental importance which we attach to them for the decision taken. In a long speech Dr. Benes repeated almost word for word all the arguments which were intended to support the Czech demands and at the same time to lead astray the non-French participants in the meeting who were ignorant of the real position.

The discussions of the Committee for Czechoslovak affairs, which was set up at this meeting, began on February 27th, 1919. The minutes recorded by David Hunter Miller (Vol. 17, p. 88) read as follows:

1. Report of the Meeting of the Committee for Czechoslovak Affairs.

A — Organization.

The Commission was organised with M. Jules Cambon as president, and Marquis Salvago Raggi as vice-president. Its composition is as follows:

United States: Dr. C. Seymour, Mr. A. W. Dulles.

British Empire: Right Hon. Sir Joseph Cook, G. C. M. G., Hon. H. Nicolson.

France: M. Jules Cambon, M. Laroche.

Italy: Marquis Salvago Raggi, M. A. Stranieri.

B — Procedure.

It was decided that each Delegation present its views in general in order that questions regarding which there was a consensus of opinion should be eliminated from discussion, and that the Czecho-Slovak Delegates be called in only for the purpose of answering specific questions. The president requested each Delegation to bring a résumé of its opinions to the next meeting.

C — German Question.

The question of including the Germans now living in the territory which was formerly Austrian Bohemia, Moravia, and Silesia was presented. It was finally agreed that the frontier as defined by the political boundaries of Bohemia and Moravia of 1914 should be accepted in principle as the frontier of the new Czecho-Slovak Republic, subject to such minor rectifications, additions or subtractions of territory, as may be found desirable on the further investigation of particular points...

The notes on this meeting by Jules Cambon, Chairman of this Committee, read as follows:

"The question was raised whether it would be advisable to give the new State the frontiers of Bohemia as fixed at the time of Austria, or whether the frontiers should be so limited that three million Germans would remain outside, a solution which would naturally increase the population of the German State.

Economically and geographically the old frontier should be maintained in the interest of both populations. The Italian delegate, who no doubt intended to put forward strategical grounds in another case in the interest of Italy, emphasised considerations of this kind in order to safeguard the security of the new State. He demanded that the mountains of Bohemia should form the frontier.

The American delegate, on the other hand, stated that his country refused to take strategical points of view into consideration.

I could not refrain from answering him—and this raised a laugh among our colleagues—that the Americans were too disinterested in European security. When one was near the fire one had a certain comprehension for the fire brigade, and strategical considerations were of certain importance for those who were exposed to the battle every day.

The American delegate then referred to the existence of the League of Nations. I put an end to this discussion with the remark that we must nevertheless wait till the League of Nations was at work before relying on it.

It was finally decided that the Germans of Bohemia should be allotted to the new State."

The note by Jules Cambon leaves no doubt as to the fact that this decision was taken primarily on strategical grounds; it was taken against the objection of the American delegates who contested the justice of such a step by the Conference but who obviously had not the necessary diplomatic skill to insist on the maintenance of Wilson's conditions and of the provisions of the preliminary peace treaty.

This decision of the Committee for Czech Affairs signified the definite decision regarding the lot of the Sudeten Germans. We are told by Nicolson that the members of the Committees of Experts on territorial questions were of opinion that their duty was merely to prepare and facilitate the examination and decision of the Supreme Council. The territorial committees were to act as a kind of court of first instance and examine the demands put forward by the small and medium allied States in accordance with the terms of reference given them by the Supreme Council, to restrict the questions requiring decision as much as possible and to make recommendations for a just settlement. The members of these committees accordingly thought that their recommendations would be subject in the last instance to a final discussion. They obviously thought that the representatives of the conquered States would be admitted to these discussions on the basis of which a just solution would be reached.

The members of these territorial committees, according to Nicolson, had no hesitation in making compromises and recommending decisions which they hoped would not in the last instance be approved. On account of this false view the territorial committees showed a readiness to accept far more of the demands of the small Powers—which were put forward as maximum demands—than they would have done if they had known that the Supreme Council would for the most part adopt the unanimous reports of the committees without further discussion.

The Committee for Czechoslovak Affairs completed its report for the Supreme Council by March 12th, 1919. In this report also the Americans made reservations.

On March 25th after the General Committee for territorial questions had examined the Czechoslovak Committee's report and merely made some drafting changes in articles intended to be inserted in the Treaty of Versailles, the latter Committee adopted the report with these amendments on March 28th, 1919 and submitted it to the Supreme Council. The text of the report of the Committee for Czechoslovak Affairs with the draft of the provisions to be included in the Versailles Treaty is not known.

The establishment of the western frontier of the Czechoslovak State was dealt with by the Committee of Four. We have the following record of its meeting on April 1st, 1919, in which the American and French views came into conflict, though the Americans were unable to hold their own. The debate also shows clearly that the German character of the territories in question was well known, and that if the right of self-determination had been exercised by a plebiscite these districts would have declared for Germany.

Secretary's Notes of a Meeting held in M. Pichon's Room at the Quai d'Orsay, Paris, on Tuesday 1st, 1919, at 3:00 p. m.

Mr. Lansing suggested that only that part of the report dealing with the frontier between Czecho-Slovakia and Germany should be considered, at it was desired to collect all the elements of a preliminary treaty with Germany. The boundaries between Czecho-Slovakia and other countries might be considered at a later stage.

M. Sonnino agreed to this procedure.

M. Cambon said that the task of the Commission had been one of considerable intricacy. It had attempted to do justice to ethnic claims but economic and strategic considerations had also to be given weight as a purely racial frontier would have left Czecho-Slovakia defenceless and economically crippled. He did not propose to explain the frontier in minute detail, as many points had been left to the decision of the Frontier Commission which would ultimately be sent to mark the boundaries. The eastern point of contact with Germany began at Neustadt.

The American Delegates objected to the whole method of drawing frontier lines on strategic principles.

M. Cambon said that it was not strategic interests but considerations of national defence that guided the Commission.

Mr. Lansing enquired whether there was any difference.

M. Cambon replied that he had himself heard President Wilson declare that the new States should be set up under conditions which would enable them to survive. The Commission had been entrusted with the task of setting up a new State in Central Europe. This State had perforce an odd shape, its territory was so narrow as to run the risk of being overrun at the very outset of hostilities. It was for this reason that the Commission had thought it advisable to reduce the glacié surrounding Glatz.

Mr. Lansing said he did not wish to debate the question of Glatz. He wished, however, to point out that the fixing of frontier lines with a view to their military strength and in contemplation of war was directly contrary to the whole spirit of the League of Nations, of international disarmament, and of the policy of the United States as set forth in the declaration of President Wilson.

Mr. Lansing observed that in this salient there were 90,000 Germans and no Czechs.

M. Cambon replied that the Commission had come to the conclusion that nature had so clearly marked the outlines of the country that it was undesirable to alter them without very cogent reasons. Further, it had thought it inadvisable to make a gratuitous offer to Germany of additional population, and thereby to create a precedent for the attribution of other Austro-Germans to the main federation.

Mr. Lansing asked whether the Commission would approve of a plebiscite in this area.

M. Laroche said that this question had been raised in the Commission, which, after consideration, had decided that a plebiscite could not be proposed in an isolated salient without extending it to the remainder of the German Bohemians. If this were done, the Czecho-Slovak State would be reduced to very slender proportions.

Mr. Lansing observed that this was not good reason to justify an injustice.

M. Laroche denied that an injustice was being done. The inhabitants of these regions were accustomed to live in close connection with the rest of Bohemia, and did not desire separation. Moreover, the German colonisation was of recent date. The result of the policy suggested by Mr. Lansing might be that the whole of Bohemia would elect to join Germany in order not to be separated from the German Bohemians.

M. Pichon said that on behalf of France, he also had reservations to make. He could not allow Germany to be fortified by populations taken from what had been Austrian Dominions, taken, moreover, from Bohemia, which, he trusted, would remain an ally of France, and handed over to Germany, which, as far as he was concerned, still remained a country to be feared. If America refused to take into account considerations of national defence, France was not in a position to neglect them.

In Jules Cambon's memoirs we find the following note on this meeting:

"On April 1st Jules Cambon reported to the Committee of Four on the views of the Committee of which he was Chairman regarding the establishment of Czechoslovakia. The American delegate Lansing objected to the transfer of German populations to the new State. Our delegate was astonished at such a point of view. He pointed out that the ethnical question was not alone at stake, but that account must also be taken of economic and military points of view and of the habits of the German Bohemians.

Lansing said such views might justify any injustice.

I confess that I was bored by such pharisaic views. The attitude of the United States in California and Porto Rico might have served me as an argument, but I was afraid of poisoning the discussion and contented myself by stating that Czechoslovakia was territorially a weak State and was subject to the danger of being immediately cut off by an attack. Wilson had always said that viable States must be created and that national defence was an essential element of the new States."

David Hunter Miller reports that the Council of Four took the final decision even before April 8th, 1919 to fix the existing German-Bohemian frontier between Germany and Czechoslovakia in the Versailles Treaty and to reject all proposals for amendments.

Accordingly it was again on military and general political considerations that the Supreme Council decided the fate of three and a half million Germans against their will and against the solemn treaty provisions.

Thus in the year 1919 century-old connections of historical, cultural, ethnical and economic nature were torn asunder, and three and a half million people of German race living in a closed settlement territory were first annexed by force of arms, then subjected to the sovereignty of a State which had only been recognised for a quarter of a year by certain interested Great Powers, and finally converted into a "minority" in this State, without these people being asked and without their protests being listened to, not to mention being taken into consideration.

This arbitrary act was perpetrated by the victors of the War in the name of the right of self-determination and of democratic principles and ideals.

In reply to the protests made by the Austrian peace delegation, the Austrian National Assembly and the Sudeten German districts against this violation of right and justice,¹ the peace makers of Paris had only one stereotyped answer which they also gave in the ultimatum of June 16th, 1919 in reply to the protests of the German peace delegation: "The Allied and Associated Powers categorically reject the statement that a barter with peoples and provinces has been carried on. Every territorial provision has been reached after careful and most conscientious examination of all religious, racial and linguistic circumstances. The legitimate hopes of all peoples who have lived a long time under foreign rule have been taken into consideration and the decisions have been founded in each case." At the end comes the laconic statement that the nationality principle has been followed in so far as it could be put into effect without creating the material for new conflicts.

The next chapter shows how this nationality principle was followed when it was not a case of the Czechs but of the Germans.

V. The Problem of Minority Protection

What was promised

It was only after the most important decisions had been taken in territorial questions that the Supreme Council took up the questions concerning the protection of the minorities which had been created by the new frontiers.

On May 1st, 1919, that is to say a few days before the peace conditions were handed to the German delegation, the Supreme Council decided to set up a committee for the purpose. The Supreme Council found it necessary to impose obligations on the new States, in protection of the inhabitants not belonging to the majority, as a condition for their final recognition. The last suitable moment for this was the signature of the Peace Treaties. As Sir Maurice Hankey wrote on behalf of the Supreme Council to the Secretary General of the Conference, Poland and the other new States were not to be considered as founded until the Peace Treaties were signed, since the territories of the States were up to that moment "technically" parts of Germany and Austria.

As it was not possible in the short time intervening before the peace conditions were handed to the German delegation to draft the clauses of such a treaty, the Supreme Council merely contented itself with the introduction of Articles 86 and 93 in the Versailles Treaty under which Czechoslovakia and Poland accepted and agreed to embody in a Treaty with the Principal Allied and Associated Powers such provisions as might be deemed necessary by the said Powers to protect the interests of inhabitants of those States who differed from the majority of the population in race, language or religion.

The insertion of these two articles was tantamount to the decision of the Supreme Council. The States concerned had no other course than to bow to this decision; they could at most make objections to the wording of individual provisions. Moreover the Czechoslovak delegation, in its third memorandum, had made observations regarding the treatment of the Germans in the future Czechoslovak State and had declared its willingness "in case of need to accept any international legal settlement determined by the Peace Conference in favour of the minorities"; the delegation even added that it was prepared to go beyond such a settlement and to give the Germans all the rights to which they were entitled.

When the number of the Germans to be incorporated in the Czechoslovak State is considered, this claim was undoubtedly the worst violation of the right of self-determination of the nations which had been so solemnly proclaimed in the preliminary peace treaty a few weeks earlier. In this case an assurance of equality of rights and political independence ought to have been required in order to enable the Supreme Council to take any decision in favour of the Czechoslovak State. It was therefore a clever calculation to obtain the incorporation of a great foreign national group by means of such promises.

It has already been pointed out that the Committee for the new States was set up by the Supreme Council's decision of May 1st; on May 3rd, 1919 it held a meeting in which it began to discuss the provisions for a minorities protection treaty with Poland drafted by David Hunter Miller.

The report to the Supreme Council adopted at the first meeting on May 3rd, 1919 provided, in accordance with the terms of reference, that a minorities protection treaty for Czechoslovakia should be drafted and a corresponding reservation was to be proposed for insertion in the Treaty of Versailles.

The setting up of the new Committee was based on a decision by the Supreme Council. The "starting point" was not Poland alone, but the new States; moreover the Allies desired to impose the obligations in respect of the protection of minorities before the signature of the Versailles Treaty, not only on Poland but also on Czechoslovakia and the States which had obtained a considerable extension of territory.

On May 3rd, 1919 the Supreme Council approved the first report of the Committee and at the same time decided to insert the subsequent Article 86 which relates to the minorities protection treaty with Czechoslovakia. The Committee first discussed the provisions of the treaty with Poland, which was to serve as a specimen for the treaties to be concluded with the other States. This second report was adopted by the Supreme Council on May 17th, 1919. On May 19th the application of the clauses of the Polish treaty to Czechoslovakia was examined. At the meeting of May 20th, 1919 M. Berthelot, who had entered into communication with Benes and requested him to set down his verbal statements confidentially in writing, submitted the note from Benes regarding the protection of minorities in Czechoslovakia.

Benes' note reads as follows:

1. "It is the intention of the Czecho-Slovak Government to create the organisation of the State by accepting as a basis of national rights the principles applied in the constitution of the Swiss Republic, that is, to make of the Czecho-Slovak Republic a sort of Switzerland, taking into consideration, of course, the special conditions in Bohemia."

2. There will be universal suffrage under the proportional system which will assure to the various nationalities of the Republic proportional representation in all elective bodies.

3. The schools will be maintained by the State, throughout its territory, from the public funds, and schools will be established for the various nationalities in all the communes where the number of children, legally ascertained, proves the necessity of establishing such schools.

4. All public offices, in which in principle the two languages will have equal value, will be open to the various nationalities inhabiting the Republic.

5. The courts will be mixed, and Germans will have the right to plead before the highest courts in their own language.

6. The local administration (of communes and "circles") will be carried on in the language of the majority of the population.

7. There is no religious question in the Czecho-Slovak Republic, hence there will be no difficulties on this subject.

8. The official language will be Czech, and the State will be known abroad as the Czecho-Slovak State; but in practice the German language shall be the second language of the country, and shall be employed currently in administration before the courts and in the central Parliament on equal footing with Czech. It is the intention of the Czecho-Slovak Government to satisfy the population in practice and in daily use, but reserving a certain special position for the Czecho-Slovak language and element.

9. To express this in a different way we may say: the present state, in which the Germans had an overwhelming preponderance, will remain; only, the privileges that the Germans enjoyed will be reduced to their just proportion (for example, the German schools will be reduced in number, because they will be superfluous).

It will be an extremely liberal régime, which will very much resemble that of Switzerland.

Paris, May 20th, 1919."

Special importance attaches to the report on Czechoslovakia submitted by the Committee for new States to the Supreme Council.

M. Berthelot read a note (Annex (A) which he had received from Mr. Benes regarding the privileges which the Czecho-Slovak State proposes to accord to minorities within its boundaries. It was observed that these facilities would be considerably more far-reaching than any obligations which would be imposed on Czechoslovakia by the Treaty.

"In continuation of the former Report, the Committee beg leave to submit the attached draft of clauses to be inserted in a Treaty with Czecho-Slovakia.

It will be noted that these are almost identical with those which have already been approved in principle for Poland, with the one exception that the two special clauses relating to the Jews are omitted. There are, of course, considerable differences in the circumstances of the two States; the Committee, however, were strongly of opinion that for general political reasons it was most desirable that the provisions presented to them should be as nearly as possible identical.

In the case of Czecho-Slovakia the minorities which have to be considered are firstly the Germans, who number about 3,000,000; secondly, the Magyars, who will probably number 800,000; thirdly, about 150,000 Ruthenians. The situation of the Magyars and of the Ruthenians is not dissimilar to that of the Germans and the Ruthenians in Poland, and they can be dealt with on the same lines.

The position of the Germans in Bohemia is, of course, completely different; they have till within recent years been the dominating influence in the State; they form a highly developed, very capable element, and, in the past, have been a very aggressive population. It is clear that the prosperity and perhaps almost the existence of the new State will depend upon the success with which it incorporates the Germans as willing citizens. The very magnitude of this task makes it one quite different in character from the mere protection of the other minorities with which the Committee have had to deal; it is one which goes so deeply into the heart of all the institution that the solution of it is probably best left to the Czechs themselves.

The Committee have received a communication from M. Benes, the representative of Czecho-Slovakia at the Peace Conference, in which he has informed them that it is the intention of the present Government to treat the Germans with the greatest liberality, and the proposals he makes go far beyond anything which the Committee would have felt justified in putting forward. Under the circumstances, therefore, they consider that it would be wiser not to make any specific reference to the Germans, and the more general propositions which are included in the draft Treaty are so moderate that it is anticipated that they will be accepted without any demur by the Czecho-Slovak Government..."

On the basis of the decision of June 16th, 1919, the Committee sent this report to the Supreme Council. The latter approved the draft treaty on August 6th, 1919.

The final signature of the Minorities Protection Treaty took place on September 10th, 1919 together with the signature of the Treaty of St. Germain.

* * *

The above documents show that the decision of the Paris Conference was taken with a knowledge and after consideration of the promises of the Czechoslovak Delegation regarding the treatment of the Germans to be incorporated in the State. The Czechoslovak Delegation renewed the solemn promise that it had given in the third memorandum in the note which it addressed to the Committee for the new States on May 20th, 1919 and which the latter took as a basis for its recommendations to the Supreme Council. In its report the Committee drew the Supreme Council's attention to the fundamental difference between the Polish and the Czechoslovak problem: the Germans in Czechoslovakia did not form a minority in the real sense but a State-constituting national group upon whose legal position in the State not only the welfare of the State but its very existence depended. The Committee had all the less need to deal with this question as M. Benes, the official delegate of Czechoslovakia, had given binding promises in this respect. The Committee therefore confined itself to making general minority provisions and did not draw up special provisions for the legal position of the Germans. Under these conditions and assumptions the minority protection treaty with Czechoslovakia came into being. The deciding instances relied on the fulfilment of these binding promises which they had received and on which their resolutions were based.

* * *

The signature of the Treaty of Versailles by Germany and Czechoslovakia, however, also gives the German Reich a right under Article 86 to demand the execution of the minorities protection provisions not only from the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, but also directly from Czechoslovakia.

Czechoslovakia, as an allied Power, took part in the conclusion of the preliminary peace treaty which came into existence between the German Reich and the Allies through the intermediary of the President of the United States. In the American note of November 5th, 1918 the American Government communicated the reply of the allied Governments to the German offer for peace and an armistice. The preliminary peace treaty came into being by the immediate acceptance of this reply of the Allies by the German Reich. Consequently, Czechoslovakia as a party to the preliminary peace treaty with the German Reich agreed to keep to Wilson's principles regarding the right of self-determination, and the German Reich can demand that this party to the treaty should keep its promise.

THE OPPRESSION OF THE SUDETEN GERMANS

The Czechoslovak Government was thus bound not only by the Minority Protection Treaty, but also by the promises which it gave in the memoranda and in the note of May 20th, 1919. The question was most admirably set forth by the present President, Dr. Benes, in his Dijon doctor's thesis: "Le problème autrichien et la question tchèque. Étude sur les luttes politiques des nationalités slaves en Autriche". In this work he says: "While the realists (at that time the leading party in Bohemia, with Masaryk at the head) take their stand on the principle of natural right, they are necessarily definite federalists. They wish to solve the Austrian problem and the Czech question by decentralisation, by a reconstruction of the Constitution in the federalistic and autonomous sense".

As regards the Czechs and the Germans in Bohemia, Benes wrote: "A reconciliation of the two races is really only possible, if they both enjoy complete autonomy. The one must be separated from the other. There is no other means than to make the nationalities more or less masters of their own affairs."

Before the War, Masaryk also rejected as immoral any redivision of Austria that did not take linguistic frontiers into consideration and that did not therefore bring a clear national division and constantly pointed out that only the grant of national self-administration could put an end to the nationality conflict in Austria. He made this perfectly clear in the Vienna "Neue Zeit" in April, 1896: "Peace between ourselves and the Germans is possible if we recognise freedom as the so-called formal principle and social justice as the so-called material principle. Anyone who seriously desires freedom and social justice must work concretely for political autonomy. The establishment of German and Czech districts as administrative units has been frequently suggested; I entirely agree. Like Havlicek, I say: I am the master, you are the master."

The "kind of Switzerland" referred to and the "very liberal régime which will approach very closely to the Swiss" can no doubt be traced back to these views of Benes and Masaryk; that régime was promised in Memorandum No 3 and in Benes' note of May 20th, 1919 or was rather used as a pretext which more or less deceived the peace makers in Paris. In the fourth article of the series by XY in the Prager Presse, therefore, an attempt is made to invalidate this promise by legal subtleties and to bring it within the standards of ordinary minority rights. In this connection we would refer to the admirable refutation given by Professor Bruns of Berlin, Professor of International Law, in his "Zeitschrift für öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht", Volume VII, No. 4 (Berlin-Leipzig, 1937, Walter de Gruyter & Co.).

The national groups in Czechoslovakia aim at nothing else than the realisation of this programme. But, unfortunately although both Benes and Masaryk ten years later, for the sake of propaganda, wrote down all these fine principles regarding a federal State, they banished them from their hearts, when the Czech question was no longer the core of the Austrian problem but, on the contrary, the Sudeten German question was the core of the Czechoslovak State problem.

But it was not only the promises and obligations arising out of the above documents that were forgotten or consigned to the deepest archives of the Hradshin or Kolowrat Palace. All the fine phrases which Masaryk, Benes, Hodza, Krofta and other responsible statesmen addressed on every opportunity to the "minorities" were also forgotten or turned into valueless statements of principle which were unfortunately not followed by deeds. It is impossible to give a complete list of them: the confessions and statements in the memoirs of the two first-named: "World revolution" and "Resurrection of the Nations", Masaryk's message of October, 1928, the speeches by Dr. Benes at Brux on October 28th, 1935, at Reichenberg on August 18th, 1936, at Bratislava on September 20th, 1936, the Christmas message of December 24th, 1937, the Easter message of April 16th, 1938, the speeches at Tabor on May 21st, 1938 and at the jubilee celebrations of the 20th anniversary of the Republic on May 25th, 1938 at Prague, the speeches by Dr. Hodza on April 28th, 1927, on November 17th, 1937, on July 2nd, 1936 and March 4th, 1938 in both Houses of Parliament, the interviews in "Paris Soir" of March 29th and May 26th, 1938, the broadcast message of March 28th, 1938, the statement to the press on May 20th, 1938 and lastly the speech at Bratislava in the counter-demonstration against the congress of the Hlinka party on June 6th, 1938; the speeches by Dr. Krofta on May 21st, 1936 and November 11th and 17th, 1937 to both Houses of Parliament, the interviews in "Paris Soir" of March 27th and May 26th, 1938, in the "Soir" and "Intransigent" on May 17th, 1938 and in the "Universul" on May 7th, 1938.

The basic tendency of all these statements is the constantly repeated expression of good will and the firm determination to carry out the minority protection obligations, to solve these problems voluntarily and without compulsion in agreement and in wise cooperation with the Sudeten Germans, to stop the Czechisation policy in order to cause no bitterness. It is even admitted that mistakes have been made which must not be repeated, that the minorities policy suffers from a certain inequality and that some errors have been committed in the execution of this policy.

But such admissions are always followed by the statement that nevertheless the protection of minorities in Czechoslovakia is the "most exemplary, most democratic and most liberal" and that everything is "in the best order".

Some excellent formulae may also be noted.

For instance, Dr. Benes says:

"The Sudeten German membership of the great German cultural community is quite natural, and no State has any reason to object to it. The State is aware that the political frontier must in no way constitute a spiritual obstacle."

"People who are enslaved and deprived of their human dignity, who are denied tolerance, objectivity and good will are entitled to defend themselves. The same applies to society, the nation and the State. It is therefore my desire that all these questions should be objectively discussed between the Czechoslovaks and our nationalities and that a solution acceptable to both parties may be sought in a friendly and reasonable manner. I am in favour of this question being tackled on both sides with all seriousness and sincerity and especially in the spirit of peace, good will, objectivity, conciliation, mutual respect and fair play.

Dr. Hodza said:

"The Czechs do not desire, but reject, any denationalisation of the minorities. A nation that has survived such oppression as the Czech will never lend itself to doing injustice to another nation, but will always be aware that the power of a State and the people's own position in the State will be the more permanent in proportion as right and justice for all, without national, social or religious distinctions, form an organic part of such State.

It is therefore the duty of the State, from the first day of its renewal, to regulate its relations with that people in such a manner that Czechoslovakia is their permanent home."

There are many references in these statements to the Government decisions of February 18th, 1937 which were to bring a "definite appeasement of the nationality struggle", namely, as Dr. Hodza stated, within a year. The Sudeten German Party of Konrad Henlein took no part in the agreement, but only the "Government parties", the so-called "activists".

As against the administrative compromise between the Czech and German Government parties of February 18th, 1937, by which certain concessions were granted to the Germans, Henlein, at a great congress of administrators at Aussig on February 28th, 1937, claimed national self-administration, an assurance of national frontiers and reparation for the wrong done to the Sudeten Germans since 1918. On April 27th, 1937 the Sudeten German Party in the Prague House of Deputies submitted six bills for the protection of nationalism, but they have not yet been dealt with in parliament.

In the agreements of February 18th, 1937, the following promises were made:

1. A legal safeguard that Sudeten German workmen and employees would be engaged in public works (and would naturally be actually employed).
2. Official posts to be given in proportion to the population.
3. The protection of German young people to be financed regularly, i.e. in proportion to the population.
4. The German school demands to be fulfilled.
5. The German communes to be given linguistic facilities in their dealings with the authorities.

It will be seen that the German parties to the agreements of February 18th were satisfied with a minimum programme.

In any case the incredulous might say that at least a start had been made. This start might pave the way, if only psychologically, for a compromise, since the Czechs were not too obstinate in various points and there was at least an honest intention and good will.

Unfortunately—to anticipate the final result—even the most modest hopes have been disappointed, and the German "activists" themselves have come to this conclusion during the past year.

Two of these activist parties, the Farmers' Union and the Christian Socialist Party, on March 22nd and 24th, 1938 put an end to the attempt which began twelve years ago, in 1926, "to achieve national appeasement in the State and security for the vital rights of the Sudeten German national group by cooperating in the Government". They withdrew their Ministers from the Government and joined the Sudeten German Party because, as the resolutions on the subject state, "the failure of the principles adopted in February has aroused the greatest disappointment among the entire Sudeten German population, the development of recent times demands a uniform effort and the joint contribution of all the forces of the people, and the common demands of all Sudeten Germans must be fought for by a united front".

Thus the house of cards of Sudeten German activism collapsed and the Prague minority policy fell to pieces. The activist camp now only contained the German Social Democrats, in spite of their sharp criticism of this policy, but as a result of the elections they are reduced to a party group with no influence. But the Sudeten German Party, which Konrad Henlein had formed on October 1st, 1933 from the scattered political parties of the Sudeten Germans, became the strongest party in the Parliament and Senate as a result of the accession of the parliamentary representatives of the two parties mentioned.

What was really the position of this "most exemplary, most democratic and most liberal minorities policy" of the Prague central authorities?

The Orbis publishing house in Prague published in February, 1937 a pamphlet entitled: Are the Germans in Czechoslovakia oppressed? Ministerial replies to the complaints of the Sudeten German Party. This work described matters in such a way as to show that the Czechs did not place the Sudeten Germans at a disadvantage in economic, political or national respects.

This work was misleading and intended to disguise the problem of the Sudeten Germans in order to make their just complaints appear unjustified to world public opinion.

In order to refute this view and to prove how justified these complaints were a work by Hans Richter was published in April, 1937 by the University publishers, Wilhelm Braumüller of Vienna and Leipzig, entitled: Are the Sudeten Germans not oppressed in Czechoslovakia? The reply was given by Czechoslovaks of the Czechoslovak Government, not Sudeten Germans or Germans of the Reich, and they brought before the light of public opinion the oppression of the Sudeten Germans and their great distress.

Below we give some extracts from this work, which are all the more striking and conclusive as they do not come from friends or adherents of the present Sudeten German movement but from the camp of their opponents. We have not quoted from this work the terrible details of distress and misery, despair and suffering in the Sudeten German towns and villages but have restricted ourselves to general descriptions and to the conditions arising therefrom. But they are sufficient to convince any objective and humane reader of the true position in these districts.

"Sozialdemokrat", Prague. — December 24th, 1933.

"... The distress of the unemployed has become incalculable. There are people who have been unemployed for three or four years. And the number of those who earn nothing is constantly increasing. The children are crying for bread. There is no fuel in the house. Meat and fats have long been an unattainable luxury. The clothes have become threadbare. It is scarcely possible to mend them again and they cannot be replaced. The sufferers remember the War years. At that time their lot was almost the same as now. But then famine was general. Now the stores and the shop-windows are full of goods. This increases the bitterness."

January 12th, 1936.

"Children in the Erzgebirge stay away from school, because they have nothing to eat and no shoes.

"In the Sudeten German border districts there are constant reports this winter of the distress of the population which is becoming more and more intolerable and, in connection therewith, of the sad conditions under which the young people of this district are growing up. Children are the innocent victims of a period of distress the end of which is not yet in sight. Conditions in the Böhmerwald and Erzgebirge are particularly bad. It is known from press reports that innumerable poor Germans in the Böhmerwald send their children to the numerous Czech minority schools which have been opened in recent years in the Osser district merely in order that the children may obtain an occasional plate of hot soup or a glass of milk, because they are rewarded by shoes and clothes for providing a possibility of filling a Czech minority school and justifying the existence of a Czech educational establishment. Shoes and clothes are articles which have long been unattainable for hundreds and thousands of our wretched countrymen in the Böhmerwald.

It has long been clear to those who have an insight into the conditions that matters are not much different in the Erzgebirge, near the world spa of Karlsbad, and that the distress of the population is no less evident in that district."

February 14th, 1937.

"After the collapse of the War and the foundation of the Czechoslovak Republic, large sections of the German rural population placed their hopes in a new settlement of land tenure conditions. These hopes were severely disappointed by the practical application of the land reform law.

The systematic penetration of the German area with land-owners of other race had an irritating effect on the German population. In the German border districts there are thousands of small farmers and cottagers who were hungry for a piece of land. They had to look on while people with no idea whatever of agriculture came and took the land before their nose. Generally the owners of these remaining estates had the further task of looking after the opening of a Czech school, if possible with German children, and this undoubtedly increased the ill-feeling in the German districts. The effect was even worse in economic respects. Hundreds of owners of remaining land went bankrupt and used the land allotted to them for speculation purposes. It is estimated that there are at present nearly 1000 of these remaining estates that are faced by ruin. The former president of the Land Office, Vozenilek, himself stated that about 45 per cent of these estates had got into economic difficulties, although most of them bought the land dirt cheap.

Any one coming into the province at present hears dreadful stories about the economic machinations of certain owners of these remaining estates."

Hr. Richter, Mayor of Reichenberg, in his speech of welcome to M. Necas, Minister of Public Welfare. August 21st, 1935.

"Distress has reached such a point that assistance is urgently required. I am not a National Socialist, but I must say that anyone who crosses the frontier, which is situated a few hours away, and sees what work is being done there and then considers the hunger and deprivation of the unemployed in Czechoslovakia, anyone who sees the distress of the workers and the compulsory standstill of heavy industry, must necessarily make comparisons and reach the conclusion that there is not everywhere the same churchyard calm as in Czechoslovakia. It is high time to take action. The Sudeten German workmen want work and not alms, and they think they are justified in calling for the provision of work by the State. The Sudeten German population is embittered and turns away from the old parties because all their patience and loyalty are unavailing. It is high time for the State economic service to step in.

"Prager Montagsblatt". October 22nd, 1935.

"The Minister of Public Welfare, Necas, will, we learn, visit the West Bohemian distressed areas next week. After the courageous speech by the Minister at Reichenberg, thousands of unemployed hoped for an improvement in their sad lot. They are only afraid that Engineer Necas will obtain his information from officials, party secretaries and trades union people and will have no opportunity of seeing for himself the terrible position in the distressed areas in the Eger valley and in the famine districts of the Erzgebirge. We therefore recommend him to devote two days to a journey by car—like Haroun al Rashid of yore—and to study the living conditions of the population in the industrial communes and the mountain villages of West Bohemia."

"Volkswille". Sozialdemokratisches Tagblatt, Karlsbad. May 31st, 1936.

"Incalculable suffering has come over the masses of the Sudeten German people. Our towns and industrial villages are like churchyards; hundreds of thousands of hard-working and industrious people have become recipients of public relief, and those who still have work earn little more than what is strictly necessary to keep body and soul together. Our people in the frontier zone live a wretched, unhappy life, and the strain on their nerves, their will to live and their strength of character must be described as superhuman."

The Social Democrat deputy Wenzel Jaksch (Government Party) in the "Sozialdemokrat", Prague. December 1st, 1936.

"In October 1935 about 62 per cent of all unemployed were in the districts with a German majority, and in October 1936 the figure had risen to 69 per cent. The last available statistics show that unemployment has declined since October 1935 by an average of 28.2 per cent for the State as a whole, while in the districts of Bohemia with a German majority it only declined by 14.9 %. It should be specially mentioned that a number of industrial and rural distressed areas in Bohemia (Dux, Gablonz, Kaplitz, Karlsbad, Marienbad, Neudeck, Tachau, Teplitz-Schönau, Trautenau) record a stabilisation of their distressing unemployment figures. Recently we noted the same phenomenon in North-Moravia-Silesia.

These distressing figures are not quoted for our private amusement or even for internal use in the party. The most primitive national justice must however begin by devoting at least the same attention to the mass distress in the German districts as to the wishes of the spirits industry. Anyone can test our statements. No interested person is forbidden to study the true position in the distressed districts. It is however not sufficient to obtain reports written by paid and, to say the least, uncomprehending control organs, but it is necessary to see for once how the victims of the crisis live in the distressed villages of the Erzgebirge and the Böhmerwald, what they have to eat, what sort of clothes and shoes they wear, and what is the state of health of the children and adults. Such checks would be extraordinarily useful. Why do those who complain of the "abuse" of the action to supply food hesitate to get into human touch with the victims of their mania for economy. In this sphere a position has arisen which is wellnigh intolerable."

Wenzel Jaksch in the Czech Review "Programm" for January 1936.

"The activist Germans are also dissatisfied with the national political results of democratic cooperation. In spite of all efforts a fundamental settlement of national political problems has not been tackled in any quarter. It must unfortunately be frankly stated that a great part of Czech public opinion tries to belittle the Sudeten German problem. The enemies of the Republic are speculating on the fact that Czechoslovak democracy is incapable of solving its nationality problems. The mere fact of the participation of the Germans in the Government is not a solution. A fundamental and conventional solution of joint national life in the Republic is very necessary. The formula coined by Svehla and adopted by Benes: "Equal among equals", should not only be used on festive occasions but should also be applied when distributing State contracts, in appointments to the public service and in the development of the cultural arrangements of each race.

Czechoslovak policy has hitherto been lacking in the firm determination to use the State not only as an instrument of power but also as an instrument of national understanding."

Wenzel Jaksch at a meeting in Bodenbach on April 26th, 1936.

"We are faced by a new discussion on the basic tendencies of Czech policy. National guerrilla warfare continues on all fronts and poisons the internal political atmosphere. Innumerable treaties are concluded with other countries, while it has been impossible internally to conclude the most modest national political agreement. At the side of the legal, there is an illegal nationality policy. It would seem that most Czech politicians did not understand the warning of May 19th. After the elections it was openly admitted that serious mistakes had been committed against the Germans. No practical results were, however, forthcoming, but, on the contrary, the policy of pinpricks was continued. Our justified complaints have encountered a wall of dead silence."

"The fundamental problems of joint national life since 1918 have either been answered in a one-sided manner or have remained unsettled. The Czech formula that the obligations to the minorities must be fulfilled cannot satisfy us. Those who wish to dispose of us as a minority should bear in mind that several nations in Europe with a smaller population than the Sudeten Germans have their own State. From the State point of view it is sheer madness constantly to send further numbers of Czechs to the over-populated German areas. We state quite openly that the discrimination against the Germans in the public service, in the language question and in the entire administration has reached a degree that is generally found to be untenable... Czech policy is faced with the internal decision whether there is room or not in its conception of the State for the Sudeten Germans."

"Nordböhmischer Volksbote", Sozialdemokratisches Tagblatt, Bodenbach October 24th, 1935.

"Words are too weak to describe the distress and sufferings of the young in the crisis areas. It is painful and disturbing to think how many people and how many valuable talents will be lost to a more fortunate society of the future, especially at a time when the number and health of the rising generation decide the fate of the nations. But if human assistance is not granted to the utmost extent of what is possible, we must all assume an indelible guilt in the face of the rising generation."

The Czech writer Mrs. Pujman in the Review "Přítomnost", Prague. October 19th, 1935.

"The people in the Reichenberg district are under-nourished and suffering from mass neurasthenia. Everywhere one meets famine-stricken set faces.

"It will be replied that distress in North Bohemia is the same as in Slovakia, Ruthenia etc. I am far from maintaining that distress is an exclusive characteristic of North Bohemia. But I have convinced myself that the distress in North Bohemia is of greater specific gravity. Unemployment is no longer an epidemic phenomenon there, but a natural condition, and that is a bad thing."

"Neue Morgenpost", Prague. November, 1935.

The Czech jurist Dr. Traub reports on the travel impressions of a delegation of Czech intellectuals to the North Bohemian frontier district.

"The impressions which we gained in the distressed areas had an overwhelming effect on the members. I can only confirm in full the report by Mme. Pujman. A considerable portion of the Sudeten German population, as a result of under-nourishment and unemployment that has lasted for years, is suffering from mass neurasthenia. Everywhere the terrible, set expression of the famine-stricken is seen. The economic basis of entire districts has been lost. We visited places in which 75 per cent of the entire adult population is without any income. Conditions as regards labour, wages, housing and health are everywhere bad. Unemployed men showed us with tears their last tattered shirt. Others said they had not had a piece of bread for three days. The most overwhelming complaints are made by the representatives of the communes and child welfare regarding the decline in physical well-being and health, especially in communes which could formerly boast of exemplary education and excellent welfare institutions. The children can no longer follow the instruction on account of under-nourishment, and those who leave school fail to find work; moreover they can scarcely do any serious strenuous work on account of undernourishment. And yet they cannot obtain any support from the State because they are not yet considered as unemployed."

"Ceské Slovo", Prague. — November 1st, 1935.

The editor of the newspaper, M. Hedja, reports on his impressions during a tour through the Sudeten German famine area.

"For 14 years not a single Minister of Commerce has paid an official visit to the German Bohemian industrial area. Since the beginning of the economic depression, no active Minister, with the exception of Engineer Necas, Minister of Public Welfare, has become acquainted with actual conditions or obtained direct information at first hand from manufacturers and workmen.

With whom I spoke? Industrials, manufacturers, workmen, hotel proprietors etc., all of whom complained of the lack of interest shown by Prague. Whatever the Germans do arouses suspicions among the Czechs.

It is obvious that we Czechs do not come to an agreement with the Germans. The lack of understanding is, indeed, mutual. It cannot be said of the Germans who have lived for sixteen years in Czechoslovakia that they have approached the Czechs. The depression has further widened the separation between the two nations living in North Bohemia, more than anyone who has the fate of the State at heart can approve.

I believe that in such a case it is the sacred duty of the ruling race to take the first step. And this step must arise out of mutual recognition. It is not sufficient in winter to go to the Riesenbegirge for ski-ing or in summer to the Saxon-Bohemian Switzerland. In the first place our politicians should get to know the industrial circles of Bohemia and Moravia, not only the Czech population but the German also. It might be then clearer what appears today to be the most serious cause of the present political line of the Germans, namely that it is in the main a famine front against Prague."

"Neue Zürcher Zeitung". — December 7th, 1935.

"What impression did we obtain from our journey through the Sudeten German district? We may state frankly that it was depressing for any friend of peace and democracy, but also for anyone who is fond of the German language. We found, for instance, that even the Customs officials at Eger, that most important entrance station for the German-speaking district, could hardly speak German and could not read it. Even on the German University the inscription is in Czech. Almost all positions in the State service, posts, police, railway etc., are filled exclusively by Czechs. The taxation authorities in the German district are also exclusively in the hands of the Czechs; it is clear that this is a source of embitterment, especially as the compulsory collections which are also carried out by Czechs are often of extreme severity. The misery prevailing among the unemployed is scarcely describable. If the districts with the greatest unemployment are painted black, they correspond almost exactly to the entire Sudeten German linguistic area."

"Demokraticky Stred", Prague. — April 30th, 1936.

"It is necessary to state frankly that the German minority possesses justified grounds for complaining and for insisting on an improvement of the position of the Germans in social and economic respects. There is no doubt that the Germans have a claim to be admitted to official posts and that they should be assisted in the terrible economic distress from which the mixed area is suffering. By not bothering about the German problem, we do not remove it from the world. The less we bother about it, the more urgent and unpleasant it will become... The fact that over three million Germans live in the Republic may be unpleasant, but it does not cease to be a fact... It is impossible to deny justice to the minorities. It is therefore in the interest of the State to win over loyal citizens of German race for the Republic... That the Germans are not united at this particular moment is a great advantage... But if we continue this irresponsible lack of interest in the German problem, we shall lose even those Germans who have already been won over for the Republic."

"Přítomnost", Prague. — December 1935.

Extract from an interview with the English journalist Seaton Watson in connection with his visit to Prague.

"Consider the infernal confusion caused by British policy in the Irish question. Our action against Ireland for a long time aggravated British relations with the United States where many million voters are of Irish origin and views. Perhaps a remote analogy might be sought with the relations of Czechoslovakia to Germany, except for the great difference that the ocean lies between America and Ireland, while Czechoslovakia is situated directly on the frontiers of Germany. The Czechs should therefore study the Irish question, but as a terrifying example. In the Irish question, the English made all their concessions too late; for whenever agreement appeared to be in sight, some complication came from outside which upset it. This may serve the Czechs as a warning. The Czechs could also learn a lesson from the South African policy of the British Empire. It was proved after the Boer War that the mistakes and hostilities of the past could be made good by a reasonable peace treaty and extensive political and cultural concessions."

These few quotations, which could be increased by many others giving the views of impartial and objective foreigners, show that the minorities policy did not aim at fulfilling the pledges assumed and the promises given, but at "Czechoslovakising" the Sudeten Germans, pushing the linguistic frontier back to the frontier of the country and erecting in the near future on the ruins of Sudeten Germanism a new Czech bastion and a centre of the Czech frontier population, as has been constantly pointed out in the Czech press. The Czech frontier population stands in the service of the expansionist policy with its diabolical system and brutal unscrupulousness, which is applied sometimes with cynical frankness and at other times with clever disguise in a manner for which no comparison can be found.

The Czech frontier population with its methods of deprivation of rights, terrorism and ill-treatment of the minorities, has recently been supplemented by the gendarmerie, the State police and the army: a mockery of the obligations and promises solemnly assumed and given by the Moldau republic nearly twenty years ago. The fine words of Masaryk: I am the master, you are the master, have since then been changed to an increasing extent and with increasing speed to the less pleasant words: I am the master, you are the servant.

THE PROBLEM OF THE HUNGARIAN MINORITY

Extract from the Speech by the Hungarian Foreign Minister von Kanya in the Chamber of Deputies on June 2nd, 1938

"In the first part of my speech I endeavoured to show how the hegemony of the State which got the upper hand in the Great War has definitely come to an end in view of the change in power conditions and how the equilibrium which has been so long lacking in those conditions has been restored.

I will now turn to the question of the Danube basin which is as important for the safeguarding of European peace as the relations existing between the Great Powers. It cannot be denied that there is a certain similarity between the Great Powers on the one hand and the State of the Danube basin on the other hand. The defects of the Treaty of Versailles had a disintegrating effect on the Great Powers, and similarly the Peace Treaty of Trianon makes its disintegrating effect felt in the Danube valley. Both there and here there are strong endeavours to bridge the existing difficulties. The negotiations regarding the Danube valley only assumed a serious form in the course of last year, because the exaggerated self-consciousness of the States of the Little Entente had until then formed an insuperable obstacle. The international position of Hungary was required in order to reach the result that the States of the Little Entente showed more consideration for us and adopted a milder tone.

The negotiations being carried on with the States of the Little Entente relate to the improvement of the lot of the Hungarian minorities, the recognition of the Hungarian minorities and declarations to be given mutually in the spirit of the Kellogg Pact. The most important element in the negotiations is naturally the question of minorities. The States of the Little Entente, in return for their great territorial gains, had assumed international obligations for the proper treatment of their large Hungarian minorities. The practical execution of these obligations, however, has been protracted and the minorities problem has therefore become the central point in the present negotiations.

I consider it necessary to explain the difficulties with which we are faced in order to make clear the slowness of the negotiations which to many people seems incomprehensible. In the first place these difficulties include unfortunately the very serious differences which the Peace Treaty of Trianon created between ourselves and our neighbours. The bridging of these differences is naturally a very difficult and delicate task. It is made still more difficult by the fact that the Little Entente came into existence exclusively against Hungary and that the anti-Hungarian character of this group of Powers still exists. The three States of the Little Entente adopt different courses in many fundamental problems. But as against Hungary they constantly follow the principle of close cooperation. We for our part, however, are not inclined to negotiate with the Little Entente as a bloc. The other side insisted, however, that the agreements to be reached individually with three States should be entirely identical. It is sufficient to glance at the position of the three States, which is in many respects materially different, to see how decisively this circumstance has hindered the smooth course of the negotiations.

The international position of the three States can really not be called identical.

Czechoslovakia did not succeed in creating correct relations with her neighbours, and the situation between her and three of her neighbours is somewhat tense.

Yugoslavia, on the other hand, created a peaceful atmosphere on all her frontiers, which is also felt by us. There is no doubt that the relations of Hungary with Yugoslavia have developed more favourable in the last two years than with the two other States of the Little Entente.

Roumania also succeeded, by dropping her pro-Russian attitude and by developing Polish-Roumanian relations, in consolidating her international position.

The position of the Hungarian minorities differs in Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia and is fundamentally different in Roumania. In Czechoslovakia the various minorities form the majority of the inhabitants who demand their rights with daily increasing force. In Roumania the Roumanians are, it is true, in a majority but the most numerous Hungarian majority is in that country and lives in closed blocks, and it is generally known that their lot is very bitter. Another serious difference is that Czechoslovakia has not denied the principle that the minorities question has an international political character. On the other hand, Roumania—although she has signed the international minorities treaties—adopts the principle that the minorities question is exclusively a matter of internal policy in which other States have no concern. In support of this thesis she bases herself on the fact that the Roumanian people is so penetrated with nationalistic feelings that the Government is incapable in the matter of minorities of entering into obligations with foreign States. It is useless to point to the German-Polish minorities agreement or to the fact that last year Italy and Yugoslavia had found means of settling the minorities problem in connection with the signature of a pact of friendship.

All this shows how difficult it is to bring the negotiations on minorities questions with the three States differing so widely in their position and relations down to a common denominator. But events prove almost daily the predominant importance of the minorities question and I think everyone must agree even at the present time that this question has become an international problem which can no longer be neglected.

On this question which has been discussed for many months I would like to say a few words.

As it is by no means my intention to do anything to aggravate the position, though I might have much more to say, I will confine myself to pointing out a few important factors which show how little friendly the attitude of Czechoslovakia has been towards us for many years and with what self-restraint Hungary has replied.

At the end of the War, when Czechoslovakia with the help of the friendly Great Powers created a State in which the so-called nationalities formed the majority as compared with the ruling nation, she was also accorded extensive Hungarian territories. Many hoped that this very circumstance would cause the Czechoslovak Government to do everything to conciliate Hungary and at any rate in the economic sphere, to lay the foundations of normal relations. The official Czech policy was, however, conducted on quite different lines and was probably based on the view that the extraordinarily favourable position of the Czechoslovak Republic after the War, which rested solely on the force of bayonets, would be maintained for a long time to come. In view of this opinion, the Government dealt with the Hungarian question in a superior manner: by creating closer relations with Roumania and Yugoslavia it aspired to the position of a Great Power and cared little for the feeling ruling in Hungary. It adopted a menacing attitude towards even the slightest Hungarian agitation and constantly threatened war. The target of the extremely strong Czech propaganda was primarily Hungary. We heard long stories of the alleged backwardness of Hungary and of our constant disturbances of the peace, so that we were gradually compelled to discover the guiding hand of Prague in any serious press campaign directed against us. I need not repeat on what deaf ears the complaints of the Hungarian nationality fell in Prague.

It is self-evident that such a procedure carried on consistently for a considerable period could not rouse sympathies in Hungary for our Czechoslovak neighbour. But last year, when negotiations were finally started between ourselves and the States of the Little Entente, we gladly entered into these negotiations and suppressed our indignation at past events. I think we could not have given stronger proof of our good will.

But now, when the Prague Government found it necessary, in view of the great disturbances caused by the nationalities question, to order partial mobilisation which extended not only to the frontier against Germany but also to the Hungarian frontier, we adopted a calm attitude to this procedure—which could scarcely be called friendly—and refrained from any measure which might have further aggravated the position. We are determined to continue to follow this course which we consider to be right and proper, but the rapprochement between the two States cannot be promoted exclusively by the good will of Hungary. Hungary will not disturb the peace, but Czechoslovakia has so many nationalities that we shall not see what development the future holds until it is made clear what concessions the Prague Government is prepared to make to all its dissatisfied nationalities. It is obvious that it must act in the same way towards all the races. England is of opinion, which she did not fail to communicate to Prague, that it will only be possible by extensive concessions to introduce calm in the nationalities question. What we long ago pointed out, namely that the minorities question in present circumstances has become a central problem for the maintenance of peace, is now recognised by that Great Power which takes an increasing interest in the European position and whose impartiality in this question will not, I think, be doubted even in Prague. The further development depends upon whether the Czechoslovak Government can bring itself to create a nationalities statute, which will tranquilise the numerous minorities living in Czechoslovakia and whether it will not, under the influence of certain political quarters, be drawn into rash political speculations which can in no circumstances serve the cause of peace. It depends on this whether the détente which is at present observable will be durable."

THE SLOVAK FIGHT FOR AUTONOMY

The Pittsburg Agreement of May 30th, 1938

"Slovakia for the Slovaks! We are neither Czechs nor Czechoslovaks. Consequently in the name of justice and lasting peace, we demand the autonomy of Slovakia."

These sentences form the heading to the memorandum which the two Slovak leaders and members of the National Assembly at Prague, Father Hlinka and Dr. Jehlieka, handed to the Peace Conference in Paris, on September 20th, 1919.

Nineteen years have elapsed since that memorandum got thrown on one side and disappeared—possibly without being read—among the piles of similar documents, including presumably the copy of the Treaty which has now, after 20 years, reappeared so unexpectedly for Czechoslovakia.

In the early hours of May 26th, 1938, the Polish Steamship "Bathory" anchored in the harbour of Gdynia. This event, which accorded with the ordinary itinerary of the vessel, was regarded by a minority of the population of the Czechoslovak State, which is just now the focus of political interest, as a day of greatest expectation and excitement: the fact was that there were on board some hundred Slovak 'pilgrims', who had come from the United States for the sole purpose of testifying to their solidarity with their oppressed compatriots in Europe, bringing with them, as an outward proof of this their desire, a document carefully preserved for 20 years—which had once, when the Czechoslovak State was founded, promised their compatriots living in Czechoslovakia a political, cultural and economic life their own. I refer to the so-called Pittsburg Agreement of May 30th, 1918.

Complete equality of status with the Czechs in a common State (still to be founded) had indeed been solemnly promised to the Slovaks in similar agreements concluded abroad between representatives of the two peoples, such as the Declaration of Moscow of May 16th, 1915, and the Agreement of Cleveland of October 27th, 1915.

When the Pittsburg Agreement was concluded between the American Slovaks and Masaryk, a 'ratification' had at the same time to be made with the home country itself. Thus, two days after the State was founded, on October 30th, 1918, that Declaration signed by 103 Slovak members of the National Council at St. Martin (Slovakia) came into being, in which the separation of Slovakia from Hungary and its attachment to the new Czechoslovak State was provisionally determined for a period of ten years. The clause relating to the ten-year probationary period was eliminated by the two agents of the Czech "Maffia" who achieved notoriety through the Koza-Medvecký case and the text of the Declaration was further falsified by these people by the insertion of a statement purporting to be a relinquishment by the Slovaks of their right to send their own representative to the Peace Conference.

The Slovak people was taken by surprise, but a few noble Slovak leaders like Hlinka and Jehlieka took a separate delegation to Paris for the Peace Conference in the Spring of 1919, on their own initiative.

Now, through this political pilgrimage of American Slovaks to their old home, the Slovak—like the Sudeten-German—problem has reached a decisive stage.

It was through the Pittsburg document that Th. G. Masaryk, who was later to become the first President of the Czechoslovak Republic, achieved the union of the Czechs and Slovaks living in the United States. Its provisions read as follows:

"The representatives of Slovak and Czech organisations in the United States, the Slovak League, the Czech National Association and the Association of Czech Catholics have negotiated, in the presence of the Chairman of the Czechoslovak National Council, Professor Masaryk, on the Czechoslovak question and on our propagandist demonstrations held up to the present and decided as follows:

We approve the political programme, which aims at uniting the Czechs and Slovaks in an independent State of the Bohemian Provinces and Slovakia.

Slovakia shall be accorded its own administrative machinery, its own Diet and its own courts, and Slovak will be the official language in schools and Government Departments and in public life generally.

The Czechoslovak State shall be a Republic and its Constitution shall be democratic. The organisation of co-operation between Czechs and Slovaks in the United States will be extended and developed in mutual agreement, as necessity arises and in conformity with the position as it changes. The detailed provisions relating to the setting up of a Slovak State shall be left to the liberated Czechs and Slovaks and their rightful representatives."

The coming into being of this Agreement was rightly regarded as the greatest achievement of Masaryk's propagandist activities, for it was through that Agreement and that Agreement alone, that the 7½ million Czechs acquired the basis for the justification for an independent State. 7½ million Czechs and 2.3 million Slovaks were enabled in this way to claim the right to create their own independent national unit, which Masaryk and Benes were, it is true, later to determine according to the principle of geography rather than of ethnography. It was essential that the Slav States, in which the longing for national autonomy was smouldering, should place themselves unreservedly on their side.

The text of the Agreement does indeed quite clearly reflect that longing, as also the fact that those agreements purported to be agreements concluded between two completely independent nations with equal rights. As early as the Spring of 1916, Masaryk and Benes had founded, as refugees, together with Stefanik, the "Czechoslovak National Council" for the purpose of making propaganda among the Allies for the creation of a new State, to be erected in Bohemia on the ruins of the Habsburg Monarchy. The hyphen was intended at that time to be an earnest of the fact that two nations with equal rights were involved. The division thus deliberately made between the two words Czechs and Slovaks is quite clear from the Pittsburg Agreement and, like the text of the Agreement itself, indicates in no uncertain manner the aim pursued by the Slovaks in their attachment (Anschluss) to the common State: namely, the securing of an independent life for their race and consequently administrative separation—spell decentralisation—in all departments. They desired once for all to free themselves from subjection to the centralising aspirations of another dominating State and were most certainly not anxious to jump from the frying-pan of Budapest centralisation into the fire of that of Prague. Father Hlinka, the aged leader of the Slovak autonomy movement, put it as follows: it is a political union and union of State, but not a national union, for there is no such thing as a Czecho-Slovak nation.

All this was solemnly guaranteed through the Agreement by responsible Czech representatives, who were however never desirous of carrying it out once they had attained their object: namely, by means of additions, to obtain a "majority nation" and thus to acquire, in the eyes of their patrons in the Western democracies, a title to found and govern the State.

It was already apparent at the Peace Conference at Paris that the Czechs did not intend to keep their promise. Their official representative, Dr. Benes,—now President of the Republic—managed to convince the "Big Four" that the Czech delegation was the only one entitled to represent the new political unit, and the Slovak delegation was forced to leave the Conference and France. The use of the hyphen was made a treasonable offence and severely punished. Father Hlinka and other members of the Slovak delegation in Paris, were, on their return home on October 12th, 1919, thrown into prison for "treasonable activities". All reference to the Czech promises in the Pittsburg Agreement was not only forbidden, but regarded as an attack against the security of the State and punished by law.

A similar period of suffering now began for the Slovak "brother", as for the other national groups. The exact opposite happened from what the Slovaks had hoped and been promised. They received neither their own administration nor their own Diet. They were not accorded their own Courts and Czechs was made the official language and the language of the schools instead of Slovak. Government offices in Slovakia, the Courts, schools, banks, industry and business were flooded with Czechs. The hoped-for blossoming of distinctive national characteristics was stifled by the rigid central Government in Prague. The "little brothers" not only remained little, but became poor, until even the self-controlled peasant character of the Slovaks retaliated against this sort of "new freedom" and forged itself a political instrument in the shape of the autonomy movement.

That the Czechs did not intend to keep their promise to the Slovaks is shown by a quotation from Masaryk's book "World Revolution" (page 233) in which he says:

"This Agreement was concluded in order to reassure a small Slovak minority, which dreamed of some sort of autonomy for the Slovaks. I signed it without hesitation, as it was a local agreement between the American Czechs and the Slovaks."

That this Treaty was anything but a local agreement, is shown by the text, all comment being superfluous. The non-execution of the clear provisions has since been explained by the Czechs in various ways. Immediately after the introduction of the new regime, it was explained that the Slovaks were not yet ripe for such a far-reaching measure of autonomy. Later, it was stated that the terms of the Treaty had long since been carried out. Then, when the Slovaks proved the contrary, the agreement was regarded as invalid—first of all on the ground that, at the time of the conclusion of the agreement, Masaryk was not yet President of the Republic and was therefore not empowered validly to sign, and then that the "Slovak League", with which the Czechs concluded the Agreement, had no legal existence at that time, as it was not recognised by the State until 1919. Finally, Masaryk himself called the Agreement a forgery, but he was compelled later, when in 1922 the Slovak League in America published the full text with the signatures, to admit its existence, although he sought to contest its validity in law on the strength of the above-mentioned and other formalist objections. These self-contradictory commentaries reflected the uncertainty of the Czechs with regard to the Slovak demands, whose unreserved fulfilment was ever and again demanded by the autonomists with unremitting tenacity though by elastic methods adapted to the political position at the moment.

The Premier, Dr. Hodza, was finally compelled to admit, in a statement to the Press on March 20th, 1938, that the Agreement, though not valid in law, was morally valid and could not therefore be jettisoned without further ado.

The Slovaks have now acquired in the Pittsburg Agreement, their Magna Charta, which has now been solemnly produced, a powerful ally before the whole world and a political instrument, which will compel Prague to return to the method of honourable negotiation, which it abandoned 20 years ago.

It must have struck the Slovaks as peculiar that, on the occasion of the reception festivities at Gdynia, Warsaw and Prague, the Czechoslovak delegations competed with the Slovak and Polish delegations in the cordiality of their greetings and expressions such as "affection and gratitude" and "deep emotion to think that they had returned to the beautiful, free and happy Slovakian land and brought with them the Pittsburg Agreement—that extremely valuable historical document" should have flowed from the mouths of official representatives.

In spite of these soft words, the Slovaks have preserved their caution and have deposited this valuable document—not in Prague, but in Rosenberg—Father Hlinka's seat—where it is being preserved by loyal Slovaks until it is called upon to play its part in achieving the final struggle for autonomy.

* * *

The gushing articles of welcome in the Czech press soon gave place to articles of a diametrically opposed character, when, on the occasion of the 20th anniversary of the Pittsburg Agreement, the Slovak People's Party held a party jubilee at Bratislava during the Whitsun holiday, at which Father Hlinka read out the text of the "Bible of the Slovaks", invoked those of the signatories who were still living and present as witnesses to the genuineness of the signatures and received from the participants in the demonstration a solemn oath the "they would not give up the struggle until the Pittsburg Agreement had been carried out".

Following upon this, the Party Congress summarised the political demands of the autonomous Slovaks in a resolution, from which the following is a quotation:

"We thank our American brothers for their great sacrifices of blood and treasure in the struggle for the liberation of the Slav people and for their long-sighted statesmanship in laying down in the Treaty of Pittsburg the conditions of the association of the Slovaks with the Czech nation. We solemnly testify before our compatriots and before the whole world, that the Slovaks desire to live in the Czechoslovak Republic with all the rights of an autonomous people and will never cease to fight for their natural rights, which were secured to them by treaty. We reject the fiction of the (non-existent) homogeneous Czechoslovak people and will not submit to being deprived of our national rights.

We most decidedly reject Bolshevism both for our country and for foreign countries and swear to work with all our might for the liberation of the nation and of the whole world from Bolshevism.

We welcome the interest evinced by other countries in the settlement of the internal problems of the Czechoslovak Republic; we demand of the Government of the Czechoslovak State the pursuance of an equitable policy for the solution of our internal political problems and the initiation of friendly relations with all neighbouring States; we demand that the balance be held fairly between the Slovak people and the Czech people on the basis of our national rights. We are prepared to cooperate in this work of conciliation, which would afford the Slovak people, the Czech people, our national racial groups and our common State, fair prospects of life and development for all time.

The time for the solution of the Slovak question has come and it permits of no postponement: the Slovak people will not be held responsible by posterity for any confusion of the issue or any results arising therefrom."

The most important political result of the demonstrations and consultations at Bratislava was the approval of a demand for a Law relating to the autonomy of Slovakia. One of the most essential parts of this demand is the following statement: "Slovakia is an autonomous part of the Czechoslovak Republic".

The legislative rights of the Prague Parliament shall in future extend only to common affairs of State. These common affairs comprise; constitutional questions, foreign policy, national defence (subject to the proviso that Slovaks shall in peace time serve in Slovakia only and be under a Slovak provincial command), questions of citizenship, currency, Customs, communications, postal telegraph and telephone services, administration of the National Debt and loans for common objects, taxes duties and fees in so far these are necessary for common purposes, and finally monopolies and Government concerns with the exception of the State forests, estates, mining concerns and spas situated in Slovakia. Decisions of the Prague Parliament shall however be valid only if the majority of the Deputies elected in Slovakia required in each case shall have approved a decision concerning matters of common interest. In other matters, the Slovak Deputies to the Prague Parliament shall have no right to vote. All matters however which are not expressly reserved for the Prague Parliament shall fall within the competence of a Slovak Diet to be set up on the principle of proportional representation as a result of general, direct and secret elections. The Slovak Diet shall vote on the future constitution of the Slovak (Federal) State; the officials of the Slovak administrative Departments must be Slovaks and in the common civil administrative offices the Slovaks shall be represented in numbers corresponding to the ratio between them and the total population. Judicial authority in Slovakia shall be vested in a Slovak Provincial Court and a Supreme Slovak Court. Matters affecting other racial groups living in Slovakia shall be treated on a footing of complete equality.

Many of those assembled on the historical Hviezdoslav Square must during this demonstration have been carried back in memory to the 10th of May 1848 (the year of the Revolution) when the Slovaks framed their first demands for autonomy and to the 6th and 7th of June 1861, when 6000 Slovaks from all parts of the country constituted themselves at Turocz-St. Martin "the Slovak National Assembly" and formulated similar demands.

From the Slovak Memorandum to the Peace Conference of September 20th, 1919.

The tyranny to which the Slovaks were subjected by the Austro-Hungarian Empire was a matter of common knowledge throughout the world and when, as a result of the World War, the old Empires began to totter, the Slovaks hoped that political freedom would be born for them out of the ruins of the old world: when the old Monarchy was dissolved as a result of the collapse of the Central Powers, the Slovaks enthusiastically welcomed the conception of a new Slav State, which was to be composed of the various sister nations: Czechs, Moravians, Slovaks and Ruthenes. Every Slovak was convinced that the Slovak nation would enjoy in this State a measure of autonomy in which it would be able to preserve its national character and devote itself to the development of its own culture. Indeed, we were encouraged in this hope by the promises of persons well-qualified to speak with authority and in particular by the Agreement concluded between Czechs and Slovaks residing in America and the representatives of both nations and signed at Pittsburg on May 30th, 1918.

Never has a nation been so cruelly disappointed in its hopes as has the Slovak nation. It was agreed in America that a Czecho-Slovak State should be set up, in which the Slovaks should be accorded their autonomy: their own language, a national Parliament, their own Courts and Slovak as the official language. It was decided to found a Czecho-Slovak State, in which two Nations—Czechs and Slovaks—should live in complete freedom and on a footing of perfect equality. This agreement has however never been carried out, as those who seized political power would not hear of autonomy for the Slovaks. They are doing their best to create not only a Czechoslovak State, but a uniform Czechoslovak nation, which is an ethnographical monstrosity. Instead of receiving the promised Slovak freedom, we have once again been the victims of a fresh servitude. Instead of receiving our Slovak autonomy, we have come under the Czech domination, which was substituted for Magyar domination. We have merely changed our yoke and instead of the Magyar yoke the Czech yoke has been placed on our necks and this yoke is the heavier and bitterer, inasmuch as it has been placed upon us by people who call us their "brothers".

All our woes had their beginning and origin on September 14th, 1918, in Paris, when those concerned agreed to the idea of a Czechoslovak Republic, without defining or guaranteeing to the Slovaks the political autonomy which had been promised to them. We hoped that, at a later stage in the work of the Conference, Messrs Masaryk, Benes and Kramarsch would endeavour to keep their word and incorporate in the Peace Treaty that which justice, natural rights and written agreements demanded for the Czechs.

While mention was made in the Peace Treaty between the Allied and Associated Powers and Austria of an autonomous territory of the Ruthenes South of the Carpathians, no reference to a Slovak nation or its autonomy is to be found in it. For that reason we have come to Paris in order to demand what was solemnly promised to us; and we have further been obliged to take this step by the sorry plight to which our people have been brought through Czech imperialism and selfishness.

Slovakia has simply become a colony of Bohemia and is being treated as such.

As we cannot attain our object by means of a parliamentary fight, we appeal to the Peace Conference in the confident hope that it will guarantee to us that which we were promised.

In the Peace Treaty of Saint-Germain-en-Laye concluded on September 10th, 1919 between the Allied and Associated Powers and Austria, we read: "the Czecho-Slovak State agrees in a treaty with the Principal Allied and Associated Powers to the insertion of the provisions which these Powers regard as requisite for the protection of those persons living in Czecho-Slovakia who are, as regards race, language or religion, distinct from the majority of the population". We therefore demand that these Powers regard us as a distinct nation from the Czechs and protect our interests by guaranteeing us the largest possible measure of autonomy.

We base our modest demands on the following arguments:

1. Slovakia, which forms nearly half of the Czech and Slovak Republic, cannot well be governed by the Central Government in Prague not only because Prague is far away from Slovakia and difficult of access, but also because the special character of Slovakia requires a different Government from that of the Czechs—a personal and separate government.

The Czechs and the Slovaks are "brothers" who have never seen one another and were never together. These two nations are entirely different in mentality and character. The Czechs are an industrial people and the Slovaks an agricultural people; the Czechs are for the most part Hussites and the Slovaks are Catholics; the Czechs have lived with the Germans and the Slovaks with the Magyars; the Czechs are more materialistic and the Slovaks more idealistic. There is no Czecho-Slovak nation, but only a Czech and a Slovak. We are not Czechs or Czecho-Slovaks, but Slovaks and we wish to remain Slovaks. One glance at Slovak history is enough to show that Czechs and Slovaks are different nations.

2. The inhabitants of the Czech and Slovak Republic cannot work peacefully side by side, if peace does not reign in the country. Czech imperialism is causing discord between Slovaks and Czechs and thus hindering peaceful and fruitful cooperation.

3. In order to counter-balance German imperialism on the Continent it was desired to found a strong Slav (Czecho-Slovak) Republic, this Republic will however be weak, for it will be divided through Czech imperialism and the dissension occasioned thereby. It will be strong if the Slovaks receive satisfaction and are not subjected to the hegemony of the Czechs. It is therefore in the interests of European peace that Slovakia be freed from this hegemony, as otherwise there can be no lasting peace in the country.

4. The Magyar and German minorities living in the Czecho-Slovak Republic are equally bitter about this Czech hegemony.

5. The victorious Entente has granted political autonomy to the members of the Ruthenian nation living in the Czecho-Slovak Republic, although this nation is far less numerous than the Slovak, and we can therefore with all the more justification demand the same treatment.

6. Every agreement must be carried out loyally and especially an agreement sealed with blood, as was the Pittsburg Agreement. The Slovak legionaries shed their blood for the victory of the Entente and not for Czech imperialism.

7. As the Czechs constitute only one third of the population of the Czecho-Slovak Republic, this Republic can only become a centre of order and peace in Central Europe if the just demands of all nations of which it is composed are satisfied.

In order to prove to the Conference that our statements are true in every respect, we ask for a plebiscite for Slovakia, which will show the true feelings of the Slovak people. This plebiscite must not however be held under the Czech régime of terrorism, but under the protection of the Army of the Entente.

We entrust our fate to the Peace Conference. Our right to exist was given to us by our Maker and we hope that the glorious Peace Conference will secure us that right against human injustice.

LIBERTY OF THE PRESS AND PRESS PEACE

By Reich Press Chief Dr. DIETRICH

On the essential nature of the press, National Socialist press policy, the conception of the liberty of the press, the international power of the press, responsibility and irresponsibility of the press and the way to international press peace

Text of the speech made in Berlin on March 5th, 1938 before representatives of the Diplomatic Corps and the foreign press

I am happy to have an opportunity of discussing before an audience so peculiarly qualified to appreciate problems connected with the press, questions affecting the published word which are at present exercising the minds of men more than ever before.

I say more than ever before, for a new problem has been added during the last few decades to the great political problems with which the nations have been called upon to grapple. Press questions have for long, it is true, been numbered among the most interesting problems of social life generally and the most important of those affecting the relations between nations, but never before has the press so directly and deeply affected the political events of the time, as it does to-day.

Only a few days ago, the Leader of the German nation was impelled to make this growing international problem of the press the main theme of the great speech which made such a deep impression in every country of the world. With all possible frankness and clearness he showed up the dangers and the pernicious effects of destructive press work, with the fatal influence which it is having to-day on high politics, and in this way the press as a political problem of world importance has, by one eminently qualified to speak, been thrown into the arena of international debate.

The Führer's all too well founded accusations ruthlessly showed up the negative side of international press work, but it may be that many who heard this speech realised for the first time the extent to which the press has, especially during the last few decades, become a factor of international policy. Press policy is to-day more than ever before an important constituent part of politics, both national and international. Consequently I believe that in dealing in detail with this question to-day and attempting to discuss it in all its aspects from the point of view of the pressman, I can plead justification for my demands upon your attention for the purpose of considering this subject.

The press is one of those phenomena, of which one can say that their shadow attracts the eye more readily than the light which they give, which possibly explains the fact that there are still persons honestly concerned for the future who regard the press as one of the greatest misfortunes which have ever befallen mankind and true enough it is that it might be possible to live without it and perhaps more happily than with it, but unfortunately the times in which we live have progressed too far for such a contemplative existence to be possible. To-day the press has become one of the most important functions of modern life, without which the existence of the nations is no longer thinkable. The press is the interpreter of daily events beyond the limits of time and space and that which connects men daily and hourly with the world as it exists beyond the horizon of their own vision. The newspaper is the mirror of the world and the press is always and everywhere in the centre of events. It has been called the nurse of public opinion, the megaphone of the nations and the eye and ear of the world. To discuss the extent to which the press truly fulfils the lofty duties thus assigned to it is to open up the whole press problem of our time. But however that may be, the press is an important factor of political life. It creates the atmosphere—whether for good or evil—in which politicians have to work; it keeps pace with policy and is in some sort the propaganda department of diplomacy, and it is therefore highly significant that diplomats should be assembled with journalists here to-day.

German press policy is being largely misunderstood throughout the world, but I am convinced that, properly understood, our press policy is calculated to eliminate just those devastating effects which a mistaken conception of the press has had upon the world.

It is self-evident that it is impossible either to understand the structure of our press or to grasp the essential significance of our press policy without some knowledge of the intellectual foundations of National-Socialism and the new thought which has taken shape within its framework or the new conception of the State which it incorporates and the relations of the individual to the community, which have provided us with a new foundation for our life and enriched our thought with totally new perceptions and ideas. I have in other connections often spoken of this revolution of thought which National-Socialism has brought about in the German people.

I have pointed out that National-Socialism has overcome individualist thought as the structural intellectual defect of a whole epoch and replaced it by community-conscious thought.

In this way, whole new avenues of knowledge have been "opened up and developments initiated, of which the outsider, whose mental life runs in quite different channels, is as yet entirely ignorant. The ideas which are familiar to the foreigner and regarded as self-evident in his country and among his nation are often inadequate to enable him to follow without prejudice and appreciate with understanding the stupendous happenings in Germany. We are standing, one might say, at the crossroads of two systems of thought and that is, when all is said and done, the source of all difficulties and misunderstandings which we so often encounter in international discussion to-day. It is impossible to understand National-Socialist action by means of liberalist thought. Only those who are carried away by this new community-conscious thought or at least attempt to grasp it can understand National-Socialism, its epoch, its values, its language and its message.

What I have said here of the progress of human notions which has brought about a revolution of thought in Germany in the last few years, applies especially to the press. If we examine the premises from which criticism of National-Socialist press policy proceeds and observe the long-since obsolete and no longer applicable criteria employed here, we can hardly wonder at the misunderstandings and the hostility with which the National-Socialist conception of the press meets at the hands of so many foreigners. It is true that the press, in virtue of its development, was a child of Liberalism, but the press of the Liberal epoch is not synonymous with the conception of the press generally. The conception of a newspaper in the National-Socialist State is fundamentally different from that which the liberalist philosophy has created in the minds of many of us. The essential characteristic of the liberalist press is to be found in the fact that it conceives it to be its vocation to provide a channel of expression for individual opinion and criticism of the State and its institutions. The individual, whether as journalist or free collaborator, is here the spokesman of so-called public opinion without other authority than his own presumption or private judgment and this strictly accords with the fundamental conception of individualist thought. The National-Socialist idea of the community on the other hand allocates a fundamentally different duty to the press: namely, to bring the individual to a comprehension of the vital principles of the community. The German people have learnt that the expression "Stand together" (zusammenhalten) is the greatest treasure that lies hidden in its storehouse.

The National-Socialist Party, as the great movement for the renovation of the German nation, has learnt from its own history that the uniform political thought of the whole nation is the basis of all national and social success and that only with knowledge of the questions affecting the common destiny can come the will to solve them. It sees in the knowledge of these questions affecting the common destiny a source of power and in the press one of the most potent means of furthering that knowledge.

In the National-Socialist State, it is not the duty of the press to express the opinion of the individual in regard to the whole and to give the appearance of "public opinion" to something which is nothing of the kind: on the contrary, its duty is constantly to bring before the individual questions affecting the destiny of the community and, where he is not aware of their existence, to impress it upon him. In this way, the newspaper becomes the daily monitor of the nation—the school of political thought, whose task it is to make every citizen realize that he is a member of the community and bound up with it through all vicissitudes. In our country, we do not regard that fluctuating barometer of moods provided by ill-tempered reporting under the daily and hourly influence of a thousand and one uncontrollable individual interests as "public opinion." With us, public opinion is the true will of the people, which National-Socialism seizes direct at its source, by virtue of the very real bonds uniting it with the people: with us, public opinion is not made, but ascertained; with us, the newspaper is not the hunting-ground of irresponsibility and unbridled criticism by a few individuals, who, in the service of anonymous interests, misuse the right of criticism to undermine the authority of the State. With us, who have better methods of keeping the State in touch with the people, the newspaper is the printed conscience of the nation and called to further the work of the State, not to paralyse it. That is quite a different conception of the press from that of Liberalism, and we are convinced that it is better.

In the light of such a conception of the press, which is on quite a different plane from the other, the arguments adduced by our foreign critics against the German press are seen to be irrelevant. They go wide of the mark, as they are taken from the vocabulary of a liberalist philosophy, whose notions are no longer applicable to our time or to our conception of the duties of the press. The German press also ventures to criticize, but it criticizes, not what is of service to the people, but what is harmful to it. Within the obvious limits set by the vital interests of the nation, it enjoys in the long run a greater degree of freedom than the liberal press has ever possessed: it even ventures to criticize the "liberty of the press", which is lauded with all the passion of which democracy is capable, as one of humanity's most sacred possessions: not the freest pen of Liberalism dare touch this so-called "liberty of the press" and our colleagues in the editorial offices of the "freest democracies in the world" know why, but they may not say so, as such embarrassing frankness would entail a compulsory change of occupation.

I have recently proved from the history of the journalism of many countries, what the freedom of the press really is and brought historical and documentary evidence to show that the conception of the liberty of the press is one of the emptiest phrases which have ever befogged the minds of men. I have proved by the incontrovertible witness of those who claim to possess the liberty of the press in their countries, that from the day when the press first came into being until now, there has never anywhere been any liberty of the press—that indeed in those countries where it is most loudly praised, it is in most wretched case and that it is one of the greatest intellectual swindles in history.

I will recapitulate the details of one only of these complaints by members of a misused profession against the mental slavery of the liberal press (a large number of which are given in my publications), as it is a particularly clear example.

In 1913, the American journalist, John Swinton made the following frank statement at the annual session of the American Press Association:

"In America, there is no independent press, apart from the newspapers of the small country towns. Everyone knows this, but no one dares to say what he thinks about it and even if he did, it would not be published. Any man who was mad enough to write his personal opinion would soon be in the street. The duty of a New York journalist is to lie and cast himself at the feet of the God Mammon. He must sell his country and his race for his daily bread. We are the instruments and the vassals of rich people behind the scenes. We are marionettes: they pull the strings and we dance! Our time, our talents, our lives and our capacities belong to these people. We are mental prostitutes." That is a hard and savage indictment launched 25 years ago, and conditions have become no better since.

A book was recently published in New York entitled "The Washington Correspondents", which contained some very interesting matter bearing upon this subject: the author publishes the answers to questionnaires which he had sent to several hundred journalists. The commonest answer to the question: "how far does the liberty of the journalist go?" was something like this: "Everyone knows that he has to write what the editor wants" or "they would soon be fired, if they did not give their editors what they wanted". The editor of the book, Leo C. Roston, writes in one place: "in a society where liberty is a high-sounding slogan, limited by economic reality, a clear conscience is a luxury confined to those who have enough money to refuse to compromise at the cost of their personal ideals".

This book, which was not written by us, but appeared in the United States, would make very instructive reading for all those people who consider that they are entitled to reproach us with having too little liberty of the press. Or again, they should read that sensational indictment of the American press, recently published in New York by Ferdinand Lundberg under the title "America's 60 families" and especially the chapter called: "Journalism under the domination of money", in which the liberty of the press is seen for what it is. The liberty of the press is a phantom! a notice hung out for the benefit of gullible minds! There has never been any liberty of the press and there is none to-day anywhere in any country of the world and people ought to have sufficient sense of reality to admit it. The press is always dependent and always under an obligation to someone. The only question is, "to whom"? : to irresponsible commercial and party politics, the anonymous forces of money and of the destruction of all human order and morality, or to the statesmen responsible for the lives of peoples and the political authorities of the nation?

In 1933, when we began to build up the National-Socialist State and found that we had inherited a veritable legacy of chaos in the matter of the press, we had to ask ourselves this question, and we decided in favour of the latter answer and lost no time in acting upon our decision. The purification of the press in Germany was, so to say, the visiting card, and the reorganisation of our press in some sort the first-fruits, of the National-Socialist revolution.

If a party press, which for years waged a ruthless war against all vested press interests, had not been built up by the National-Socialist party with great trouble and at the cost of heavy sacrifices, the prestige of the press among the people would probably have been irretrievably lost! It was imperative to bring law and order into the chaos which we took over. Already on October 4th, 1933 it was possible to promulgate the Editorial Law (Schriftleitergesetz) and on January 1st, 1934, it came into force.

The new structure of the German press is simple and clear. In the true National-Socialist spirit, the Editorial Law shifted the centre of gravity of responsibility for the contents of the paper from the thing to the person and clearly maintained the principle of personal responsibility for the editorial part: that is, the intellectual and political contents of the paper. It is entirely in accordance with the principle of the absolute responsibility of the individual to the community that the person who writes in a paper and makes opinion should be responsible to the State and the public for his activities, and it is entirely agreeable to the German conception of law as opposed to that of the liberalist system, that the person who is free to decide as to the intellectual contents of a newspaper—who for instance edits the contributions of other collaborators and decides as to their acceptance or non-acceptance—should be personally responsible for them. The immoral principle of anonymity was thus abolished.

The National-Socialist Press Law brought the German journalist into a direct relationship to people and State, to whom, in addition to his own conscience, he is responsible in the matter of his intellectual work, while the State secures to him the legal freedom from undue influences, necessary for the fulfilment of his duties and obligations, which influences he was formerly unable, as the weaker party, adequately to resist.

The introduction of this law marked the beginning of the new position of journalism in National-Socialist Germany and has brought about a radical change in the social position and prestige of the German editor.

It is a great mistake to think that we in Germany desired a mechanical State press, which would make the editor simply the mouth-piece and the scribe of State departments! Nothing of the kind! We want a living popular press, freely developed by the personality of the editor and brought, under the influence of his sense of duty as a journalist, to creative fruition for the good of his people!

The whole German press knows perfectly well that there is still a great deal for it to do. A personal transformation as far-reaching as that which we undertook needs time to enable the new organisation fully to adapt itself to its duties. Legal regulation was an unavoidable necessity. The radical separation of business and politics brought about by the German Editorial Law provided the first necessary condition for the recovery of our press, for that Law awoke to life in the breast of every German journalist the inner law of that higher liberty of the press by virtue of which journalism is singled out as a nobler profession than many others in virtue of its national responsibility.

In this we see the inward power and the national significance of the press as the corollary of its international power and significance as a factor of world politics, which is the aspect I emphasised at the beginning of my remarks, and I am now speaking, as I believe, to an audience which may be presumed to take a special interest in this far-reaching problem.

The press, as I have already remarked, is a greater power in the lives of the nations than many of our contemporaries in their bourgeois wisdom imagine. It was formerly called the seventh Great Power and it has, I believe, in the last 20 years gone up a few places in the list of precedence of world political factors, for in proportion as the nations have approached nearer to one another with the help of modern communications and news service, the moods and shades of mood, the political atmosphere and political reactions within the nations have become of infinitely greater importance in determining the political decisions of the Powers. To-day, the real or imagined attitude of the nations to all great events is communicated from one country to another in the space of a few hours. Do not say: "but the wireless makes the process more rapid still". The wireless reproduces the voices of the press, which is regarded, rightly or wrongly, as the barometer of public opinion. The press is thought of as public opinion, as it has the very greatest influence upon it, and it may therefore be described as the barometer of world politics, whose indications have certainly influenced the decisions of many cabinets in the last few decades more powerfully and directly than many realise.

This power, which has been given to the press as one of the most influential of those factors of leadership in modern times which can be developed for good or evil in national relations, was appropriately described by a French diplomat as the tongue of which Aesop said that it was at once the best and the worst thing in the world. Unfortunately the bad tongue has hitherto made itself heard far more clearly in international relations than the beneficent power of the press have been able to make themselves felt. How often has the poisoning of public opinion by lies deliberately propagated through the press and by irresponsible sensational reporting most gravely jeopardised the peace of the nations! The Führer, in his last speech in the Reichstag, put his finger on this open sore in the common life of the nations, gave the agitators and poisoners of the wells of knowledge a German answer and told the Governments that it would be a meritorious achievement, if not only the dropping of poison, incendiary and explosive bombs on the population could be prevented by international action, but also—and especially—the sale of such newspapers as had a worse effect on the relations between States than any produced by poison or incendiary bombs could be prohibited. In my speech at the last party congress at Nuremberg, I showed by means of historical documents how unscrupulous work by the press may sow hatred and unchain war between nations that love peace. And I may tell you that up to now not a single serious voice has been raised to refute these charges. It is true that I was told by certain foreign newspapers, though without any reasons being given, that I was a “singular press surgeon” and that my speech was a sign of “Nazi mentality”. This was said in the newspapers. But in private letters from many journalists I received numerous expressions of agreement which proved to me to what extent my explanations to all decent journalists who are under the compulsion of circumstances were spoken from the heart. And what is true of so many journalists is also true of so many democratic statesmen. They have for a long time realised how heavily the press problem weighs upon them, but they do not dare to tackle it. Their own freedom of the press forbids them—I might almost say on fear of their lives—to open up these problems. The fact that all those who might have a possibility of changing the conditions are compelled by their parliamentary dependence on the press to be silent involves the tragic difficulty which opposes the solution of a problem which in itself is quite simple. While in other respects in political life loud speaking is very much in favour, the silence in the democratic press in these matters resembles that of a Trappist monastery. It is only the leaders of the authoritarian Governments that have hitherto raised their voices loudly and clearly against this position.

The head of the Italian Government, Signor Mussolini, has in the last few days again pointed out to the president of the international organisation of publishers how greatly the evil of tendentious press reports is widespread. All these incorrect and untrue press reports, he said, created a spiritual condition which was not without objection and which all countries should help to remove in the interest of peace.

The President of the French Republic, M. Lebrun, at the annual meeting of the Union of French Republican Journalists on February 8th, 1937, issued an earnest warning to French editors not to abuse the so-called freedom of the press. Freedom, he said, if used without prejudice and with moderation, was good; but if people were carried away by passion and hatred, it was bad. The French editors should think of the various ways in which press policy was handled in different countries. On the one side there was something like an orchestra conductor, who harmonised everything without discord and false notes. This made the national will appear more uniform and more powerful. It was a strength which was to the advantage of the country. But, on the other hand, in countries where the critical sense was developed to excess, everyone went his own way. This involved the danger of compromising everything by exaggerated individualism and making the desired effect impossible. Thought should always be given to the regrettable consequences of inadvertent or even deliberate false reports which might endanger harmony among the nations, for which greater sacrifices than ever before must be made, and that peace which was desired by all.

At a lunch of the Foreign Press Association in Paris the French Foreign Minister, M. Delbos, spoke a few days ago against the habit of false or tendentious news and stated that the common duty of newspaper representatives of all countries was to counteract the fever which had broken out.

The press must do more for the reconciliation and union of the nations than for their separation.

According to the “Temps” of April 16th, 1936, no other than M. Herriot demanded a law against the calumnious press in the following words: “It is intolerable that in a decent country such as ours lies can be disseminated without punishment. In the reform law, therefore, two points must be taken into consideration: the obligation to sign all articles and the prohibition of abuse on the part of the responsible editor. For I consider it to be right and essential that the director of the newspaper and the writer of the article should assume the responsibility”.

The Czechoslovak President, Benesh, according to the “Prager Presse” of April 21st, 1935, asked the question: “Is it possible to overlook the manner in which the moral condition of our generation is destroyed by a press guided by revolutionary, demagogic, immoral, venal, sensational and other points of view and aims?”

The Irish President de Valera, in a speech to the Irish branch of the Institute of Journalists, answered in the affirmative the question whether the freedom of the press should be restricted or not, with the words: “The expression ‘freedom of the press’ must be given a reasonable interpretation; it must not mean the toleration of a power without responsibility. In many quarters there is a confused idea of ‘freedom of the press’. By it people propagate a confusion of the mind to which they would not expose their children in private life. The people must be protected against the abuse of press influence.”

Numerous other statesmen from every possible country have expressed themselves in similar terms, including recently the Danish Prime Minister Stauning, the Swiss Federal Councillor Dr. Meyer, and in his recent League speeches the former British Foreign Secretary Eden when he made the fitting and humorous remark: “Diplomatic successes have little value as news, while diplomatic failures have durable consequences which are heard and felt for a long time.”

The British Prime Minister, Mr. Chamberlain, in one of his recent speeches on foreign affairs in the House of Commons, said: “The might of the press for good or for evil is very great in the field of international relations, and a careful use of this power, directed by full consciousness of responsibility, may possibly have far-reaching effects, since a favourable atmosphere for the objects at which we aim may thus be attained.”

No doubt the British Prime Minister, in giving this warning, was thinking of the disastrous part played by a great part of the British press during Lord Halifax’ visit to Berchtesgaden, and of the disservice done to British diplomacy. And in fact what possibilities of understanding have not been destroyed in the last few years by the stupid sensationalism of an irresponsible press and the fabrications of obscure elements. This debt account is large, but it grows to gigantic dimensions when it is remembered what immense positive possibilities lie within the power of the press and what blessings it could bring to the human community if it were conscious of the true responsibility of its task.

Imagine how peaceful the world would be if people not only wrote about peace, but if peace were kept in the newspapers themselves. The press could work absolute miracles in the political life of the nations. For twenty years, for instance, a League of Nations has dealt with international relations. How many diplomatic efforts, how many meetings and conferences have taken place! The result is not only small, it is deplorable. And is not the disappointment at the fruitlessness of these efforts the main reason for the political defeatism from which so many European countries are at present suffering? How different the relations of the nations to each other might be, if they recognised the importance of the press and its possibility of action in favour of an understanding cooperation and used the power of the press for this lofty aim? It is no Utopia when I state that, in an atmosphere of mutual respect and mutual understanding created by the press, they would attain in a few months what they could not attain by other means in the course of decades. The scourge of mankind, sowing in many cases hatred and discord, which a great portion of the press has unfortunately now become, might be one of the most useful means of binding the nations together. The nations want peace and understanding with their neighbours. But the press in so many countries, though it boasts of representing public opinion, does not allow these wishes to become effective. The man in the street in many countries may justly ask why the road to the international press peace is not taken. The nations can agree on cocaine smuggling, traffic in women and the prosecution of bank robbers; why should they not take up jointly the combating of political agitation and the sabotage of peace carried out by irresponsible press elements? I should like to put this question at the present time.

I do not deny the difficulties of a solution in individual cases. They lie less in the will of the people than in the organisatory conditions and in the structure of their press. The Führer, in his Reichstag speech, gave some clear indications of the objections that there were no legal possibilities in other countries of putting an end to lying and calumny. In going further into this question, it is far from my intentions to propose any methods of carrying out any wishes and desires of my own. That is not our affair. But I may point out that in Germany and Italy practical conditions have for the first time been created by means of modern press legislation for international press cooperation. The structure of our press the main lines of which I have drawn in fact opens up for the first time a prospect of the aims attainable by an international press policy which, if it is regarded objectively and pursued without prejudice, may be made a real blessing for all nations and for mankind. Those who have recognised these practical aims and possibilities are compelled in the interest of the nations and of peace to strive for their practical achievement on an international basis. German press policy is guided solely by these considerations in endeavouring by means of bilateral written or unwritten press agreements between one country and another to pave the way gradually towards reason and understanding in the field of the international press.

The press agreements concluded by Germany with Poland and Austria serve this purpose and, quite recently, in connection with the visit of the Yugoslav Prime Minister, we reached a happy "Gentlemen's Agreement" regarding mutual press relations. I may take this opportunity of pointing out that the close friendly relations between the German and Italian people are not for the least part due to the attitude of the press of the two countries which, by means of mutual friendly visits for some years past, has tightened the bonds of friendship which at present bear such rich fruits for the two nations.

German press policy will continue to pursue this path of non-aggression pacts and press agreements from country to country in accordance with the political possibilities afforded. But it must be stated in this connection that there are limits. Not limits of the good will which we possess, but limits of the possibilities of negotiation in general, limits of press morality in other countries. Just as there can be no armistice between two States of which one has a well disciplined army while the troops of the other are in the hands of condottieri who wage war on their own, there can be no peace of the press if only one part obeys national discipline while the other avoids all responsibility and is directed solely by the anonymous influence of peace-destroying powers. In view of the national discipline in which our press has been educated by the National Socialist press policy and which it is always able to maintain, we are placed in a position to conclude and to keep such agreements. But what is the position in many other countries? In the case of diplomatic representations regarding unqualified attacks on our people and our State, how often is the almost stereotyped answer given: "We admit that this is a flat lie and a gross offence but, in view of the freedom of the press guaranteed under the Constitution, we have no means of taking effective action".

Such objections are quite incomprehensible to us, even from the standpoint of the most generous democratic press policy. For what is defended by such a view of the freedom of the press, is not the freedom, but the impudence of the press. In this case the State appeals to its own constitution to defend not the freedom of the press, but the freedom of abuse and calumny. As Herriot says: "It is intolerable that in a decent country such as ours lies may be disseminated without punishment." He only said what every decent person thinks in every country, for there is no Constitution which can protect such actions in the name of the people. This is obviously a case of a false interpretation of the general rights of mankind. For every Government can take steps against agitators and liars who poison the foreign political relations of the nation and thus seriously endanger the peace of their own people. The welfare of the people and the security of the State are the supreme law for democracy. In cases where the interests of the nation are endangered in the most irresponsible manner by journalists engaging in the game of poisoning the springs, every statesman should be entitled according to the written and unwritten laws of his constitution to confiscate an edition of a newspaper guilty of this crime against the nation. Countries in which such principles, which are a matter of course for every decent person, cannot be applied are not in our opinion suitable parties for press agreements.

In foreign countries the curious habit has crept in of making the German Government responsible for every word in German newspapers, while demanding from the German press that it should show a moderation amounting to self-sacrifice, for which those living under a falsely understood freedom of the press feel no compulsion whatever. There is a constant speculation on our sense of decency which does not bring the aim of a press peace one step nearer. For we will not in any case bear the blame of this irresponsible press agitation as a reward for our honest efforts. Every such attack, if it is not immediately checked by the Government of the country compels us to hit back with the same weapons. Moreover we have already given evidence that we are in a position to make our rights clearly heard. We believe that the bad habit of measuring with such unequal gauges is not to the advantage of the international press agreement. We cannot afford to be peaceful angels when the devil drives. But in that case we abide by the word: A tooth for a tooth and an eye for an eye. We also can only make our contribution to the press peace if there is give and take. We cannot be expected to keep the arrows of our press in the quiver, if the mud-throwers are set in motion all around us. This point must be perfectly understood by the statesmen of other countries who regard a press peace as essential for preparing for a general political settlement. It is not of much use to give assurances of peace round the green table, while at the same time leaving the press free to carry on its campaign of agitation.

In Germany, as in Italy, we have taken the first step by our press reform and press legislation with a view to a sound international press policy and have shown the way towards a purification of the international atmosphere. In a number of other countries also reason is beginning to make itself felt. We have recognised that the moral crisis which the world press is passing through is not to be sought so much among the journalists as among those who are their anonymous employers and prescribe their actions behind the scenes. We have drawn the consequences from this : in our Editorial Law we have liberated ideas from the invisible fetters of money and placed the journalist in a directly responsible position towards the people and the State, without touching the private economic basis of our press. By this clear and sound solution we have brought order into our journalism. It is now for the others to follow us if they take their desire for peace seriously. The methods they choose are their own affair and we do not wish to interfere with them. Just as in foreign policy, National Socialism has its own conception in the field of press policy. Just as we possess the political conviction that the peace of the world can only be safeguarded by the existence of free, sovereign and happy States, just as it is our economic creed that the working of world economy can only develop on the basis of sound national economies, the position is the same with our press policy which is guided by the principle that only a morally and economically sound national press is the pre-requisite for an international cooperation in the sphere of the press.

The reduction of the obstacles of agitation and calumny between the nations, which is in the interest of all nations and serves the well-being of all peoples, will be accomplished all the more quickly as responsible statesmen in all countries realise the will of their nations in this question and have courage to make this will felt. The alleged "freedom of the press"—which they feel obliged to respect—is a phantom, "which has no greater power than the terror which it causes". This was written as far back as 1827 by one of the first European pressmen; and people should no longer be afraid, for the sake of a meaningless slogan, to look facts in the face. The journalist who is practising his profession has for a long time recognised the true aspect of this strange freedom of the press, which for him does not exist. He is aware, in the words of an American, that "in theory the press is free, but in practice this freedom is set on one side by the power of money". The statesmen should be clear on this point when they jib at this hurdle. With the spurs of good will and an appeal to the nations' desire for peace, they will overcome it. True freedom, if it is really desired to attain it, does not lie in unbridled licence, but in responsibility. In responsibility towards the community of all nations who desire to find in the press not a separating element which incites the nations, but a binding element which serves the cause of peace.

This responsibility should be brought to the consciousness of all, both the men who direct press politics and the journalists who write the newspapers, whether they work at home in the editor's office or as correspondents abroad. We regard fruitful cooperation with the representatives of the foreign press working in Germany as the main foundation for beneficial press relations with other countries.

Since I am under the impression that some misunderstandings exist regarding our attitude to the foreign journalists accredited in Berlin and that these have not yet been fully cleared up, I would like to say a few words on this subject. I have repeatedly expressed the conviction that journalistic fairness and national obligations in the press work of the foreign journalists can be easily reconciled. But this presupposes a certain measure of psychology and of comprehension for the position and for objective events on both sides.

We consider it to be the task of the foreign correspondent to give his countrymen an unprejudiced and true picture of a foreign country and people. Those who look upon their duty in this manner can at all times count upon our support, for we then respect in them the publicist representatives of an organ of public opinion in their country. We will not contest their right of objective criticism if they are dominated by the will to serve truth. But those who have personal feelings, or feelings dictated by their own ideology, of aversion or even hatred against the country that gives them hospitality, which bring them into constant conflict with their professional duties and make it difficult or even impossible for them to report objectively, should not come to us as correspondents. For their distorted and tendentious reports not only harm our country but also their own and subject them to constant and justified mistrust which must sooner or later lead to a breach. We are sensitive when we observe that a foreign journalist opposes all the efforts of the politician to create good-neighbourly relations with other nations by efforts going in the contrary direction, namely to endeavour to incite other nations against us by consistently one-sided and deliberately tendentious reports on internal German events. In this case we have used the institution of expulsion, which is moreover not a National Socialist invention but a measure employed by all others and one to which journalists are everywhere subject if they violate their professional duty of decency and abuse the hospitality accorded to them. In such cases we have made use of this measure and will also do so in future.

On the other hand we appreciate the special conditions under which the foreign journalists have to do their work. We are not smallminded and are not of those who think they must regard every foreign journalist as a poisoner of the springs if he does not write exactly as a National Socialist. We are aware and count on the fact that, as a member of a foreign nation, in many respects he thinks and feels differently from ourselves, just as we expect of a German abroad that he should always remain conscious of his Germanism. We merely demand that the foreign correspondent should serve the cause of truth, should comply with his journalist duty of decency and, in the same manner as the diplomat abroad, should look upon his mission from a high watchtower, namely the responsible care for the relations between the peoples.

It is true that a newspaper cannot exist entirely without sensation. But do not the achievements of National Socialist Germany offer material enough and to spare for sensational reports? It is wrong to search diligently for the negative when so much that is positive exists. Exaggeration for the sake of sensation involves a danger of sideslipping and thus of falling an easy prey to rumours and falsehood. I would not refrain from drawing your attention to this danger.

Gentlemen of the foreign press, if I may anticipate the list of your desiderata, I know that it begins and ends with the demand for information. I desire to help you in this respect as far as I can; but you should not ask us for anything unreasonable. It is the custom of every Government to give only such information as it can in the interest of the people and State and at such time as it considers suitable. On account of this natural restriction, therefore, the journalist in all countries is always dissatisfied. Those who have themselves been journalists understand that and try to help as far as possible.

That is what I wanted to say to you. I have done it sine ira et studio in front of people with whom my work will in future bring me together more than in the past. If I have succeeded in drawing your attention to the problem with which I have dealt and which I regard as one of the most important of our common political tasks, then this evening has fulfilled its purpose.

The interest which you take in these questions, Gentlemen of the diplomatic service, is of great importance for their solution. Bismarck's remark that every country must in the long run pay for the windows broken by its press, always proves true. The broken glass, Gentlemen of the diplomatic service, comes within your sphere. Gentlemen of the press, your presence is no less valuable to me. Moreover as against the diplomats I can rehabilitate you with those other words of Bismarck regarding the press: "I can make a Secretary of State of Foreign Affairs or of the Interior out of a capable editor more easily than a skilful and serviceable journalist out of a dozen privy councillors."

This is still true today. And it doubtless applies also to you, Gentlemen of the foreign press in Germany. I regard you and your cooperation in your profession not as a destructive, but as a constructive, element with a view to realising those necessities of press policy of which I have spoken to you this evening and which have become one of the most urgent problems of international policy.

In his Reichstag speech the Führer distinguished between two kinds of journalists. I shall consider myself happy if I can always and without exception count you among those who know that they are best serving their people when they point the way of truth to them. I would therefore like to conclude with a word which perhaps best expresses those feelings which are ours in our cooperation with you, and which should always guide the journalist abroad in his work:

Respect the native land of all,
But love your own.

INTERNATIONAL PRESS AGITATION

A Danger for Peace and a Heavy Strain on International Relations

Extract from the Reichstag speech by the Führer and Chancellor on February 20th, 1938

But what does poison friendly relations between these states, (Germany, France and England) and consequently causes trouble, is the intolerable Press campaign which is being conducted in these countries under the slogan of "Liberty for expression of personal opinions". I have little use for the reiterated sentiments of foreign statesmen and diplomats who declare that there is no law in these countries to put an end to lies and calumnies. Here it is not a case of private affairs, but one concerned with the fellowship of peoples and states. And we are not in a position to make light of such things for any length of time. We simply cannot close our eyes to the effects of such a virulent campaign. If we do so, it may easily happen that in certain lands the malicious machinations of weavers of lies will succeed in arousing hatred of our country, which, if disregarded, will gradually develop into a universally hostile attitude towards us. The German nation could not possibly face this with the necessary power of resistance, since our own Press policy prevents the expression of such hostility towards these nations. And this is a grave menace indeed, and one that endangers peace. For this very reason, I refuse to tolerate any longer the unbridled and persistent scoffing and slandering to which our country and people are subjected. We shall answer these calumnies in future and that with real National Socialist thoroughness.

What has been disseminated during the last few weeks alone in the way of insane, impudent and stupid statements about Germany, is simply outrageous. When Reuter invents attempts on my life, and English papers tell of large-scale arrests in Germany, of the closing of Germany's frontiers towards Switzerland, Belgium and France, etc., of the alleged flight of the Crown Prince from Germany, of a military rising, of the imprisonment of German generals, or, as an alternative, of the march of German generals to the Chancellery, when reports are rife that Himmler and Göring had quarrelled over the Jewish question, and that I was therefore in a difficult position, or that a German general had formed contacts with Daladier with the help of intermediaries, that a regiment had mutinied at Stolp, that 2,000 officers had been cashiered, that the whole of German industry had been mobilized for war, that differences had arisen between the Government and private industry, that twenty German officers and three generals had fled to Salzburg that fourteen generals had fled to Prague with Ludendorff's corpse, that I had lost my voice, so that our cunning Goebbels was looking for a man who could imitate it and my speeches could be made by gramophone records. I fear that tomorrow this same journalist will either doubt my identity, or else will say that I made the gestures and a gramophone was behind me, and so on. Mr. Eden boasted in a recent speech of the various liberties of his land. One special liberty he failed to mention, liberty for journalists to slander and jeer at other nations, their organizations, men and governments, to their heart's content! We might of course say all this stupidity is not worthy of being taken seriously. After all millions of foreigners in Germany see that there is not a single word of truth in it. What a contrast to the Soviet member of the League of Nations, who banishes strangers from his land, and even closes the Consulates, whilst in Germany everyone is at liberty to accumulate experiences on the spot.

But such obstacles to international amity cannot be permitted indefinitely. I am glad to state that a section of the foreign Press did not participate in the despicable attacks on the honour of other nations. But the harm caused by such incitement is nevertheless so great that in future we do not intend to tolerate it without a flaming protest. This crime is all the more serious when it deliberately aims at goading on the nations to war. I need only mention a few facts in this connection.

Let me remind you of the sudden, slanderous reports of last year when it was alleged that Germany had landed 20,000 men in Spanish Morocco. It was indeed fortunate that this infamous lie could be immediately refuted. But what would happen if such a dementi could not be made quickly enough to avoid trouble.

This list of major crimes also includes statements that Germany and Italy had formed an alliance to divide up Spain, and a recent malicious statement to the effect that Germany and Japan had made a pact to possess themselves of the Dutch colonies. Can one call this an honest trade, or still speak of a liberty which enables international criminals of this kind to keep the world in a state of constant unrest? Are not these people war-mongers and war-makers of the most infamous kind? The British Government wishes to limit armaments or ban bombing. I once proposed that myself. But at that time I also suggested that it was still more important to prevent the poisoning of public opinion by infamous articles in the Press. What has strengthened our feelings towards Italy—if that were at all possible—is the fact that in that country State leadership and Press policy follow one path. The Government does not talk of mutual understanding while the Press agitates for the opposite course.

I am sure it would be a most praiseworthy achievement were we to come to an international agreement, so as not only to prevent the use of poison, incendiary and explosive bombs, but above all to prevent the circulation of those newspapers which do more harm to the promotion of friendly relations between nations than any poison or incendiary bombs.

Since such an international press campaign is not conducive to appeasement, but must rather be regarded as a grave menace to peace among the nations, I have decided to carry on with the reinforcement of Germany's Armed Forces as a security against the day when these threats of war might actually turn into bloodshed and terror. The necessary steps were taken on February 4th and the work is being carried on speedily and efficiently. Germany at any rate has a sincere desire to restore mutual confidence between herself and all the Great Powers of Europe, as well as with other States. If this is not successful, it is not our fault. We earnestly believe that little can be expected at this time from conferences and single conversations because of this attitude on the part of the Press. It is impossible to deceive oneself as to the following facts. The international Press campaign against peace will immediately destroy every attempt to arrive at an understanding between peoples and nations. It will immediately misinterpret or distort the meaning of every conference. It will immediately place a false light on every agreement. And there is, therefore, nothing to give one confidence under these circumstances that any good can come out of such conferences or out of such conversations, as long as governments on the whole are not in a position to act decisively because they must always consider the public interpretation placed upon their actions.

We believe, therefore, that for the time being the only practical way of arriving at an understanding is through the normal diplomatic exchange of notes, thus preventing too crude falsifications of the International Press.

REFLECTIONS ON THE MANNER IN WHICH AN UNDERSTANDING BETWEEN THE NATIONS IS ENDANGERED AND PREVENTED BY PRESS POLICY

The events of the last few months and weeks and the manner in which they are treated in a great part of the world press give us occasion at the present time to revert to the speech by the head of the Reich press and the remarks on the same subject by the Reich Chancellor and Führer. At times it was as if we had been put back into the period of the Great War when the antipathy of the world was mobilised against Germany by deliberate lies regarding Germany's war guilt and her crimes in the War. "Falsehood in Wartime" was the name given by the present Lord Ponsonby to the "Amazing collection of carefully documented lies circulated in Great Britain, France, Italy, Germany and America during the Great War", published by Allen & Unwin in 1928.

The carefully written book mercilessly discloses on the basis of authentic material the lies which were launched by the Governments of the belligerent States in the world press in order to inflict moral injury on the enemy. It is written from the standpoint of a man who looks down on human weaknesses with a sense of superiority; he regards falsehood as a common habit in war time and does not charge any particular nation. Human credulity, he says, perhaps exceeds the habit of lying. Ponsonby kept himself during the War free from the war psychosis and the readiness to believe war lies. He was one of the five men who, together with E. D. Morel, on November 17th, 1914 founded the Union of Democratic Control on account of his impression that the real reasons for Britain's entry into the War had been concealed by the British Government. In his book "Democracy and Diplomacy", London 1915, he stated openly that the violation of Belgian neutrality was not the real reason but only the pretext. In 1921 in an article in the "Schweizerische Monatsheften für Politik und Kultur" he adopted an attitude for the first time to the question of war guilt and declared that the forced signature of the Versailles Treaty was valueless. Since that time, both together with Morel and alone after Morel's death, he has continued his struggle against the war lies which he summarises in the present collection.

There is an informative short sentence which, in connection with the fact that is confirmed by this collection of lies, states that most of the war lies and the most dangerous of them were of Anglo-Saxon origin. He says on page 14: "The use of the weapon of falsehood is more necessary in a country where military conscription is not the law of the land than in countries where the manhood of the nation is automatically drafted into the Army, Navy or Air Service."

Ponsonby deals first with the official reasons for Great Britain's entry into the War. He repeats what the Union of Democratic Control had seen immediately that the prompt entry of Great Britain into the War was necessitated by her commitment to France. "The denial of these secret commitments constitutes a page in the history of secret diplomacy which is without parallel."

Ponsonby then deals with the so-called atrocity stories. The tragedy of the mutilated nurse Grace Hume finally ended with the condemnation of her sister Kate Hume who had fabricated the whole story and communicated forged letters to the press. The story of the crucified Canadian was stated to be untrue by the Under-Secretary for War in the House of Commons in May 1915. Belgian babies whose hands had been cut off travelled throughout the world. No one paused to ask how long a baby would live were its hands cut off. Everyone wanted to believe the story and many went so far as to say they had seen the baby.

The lie regarding the baby rescued from German incendiaries in a burning farm at Courbeck Loo is also shown up in Ponsonby's book. The inventor of this story was the American journalist F. W. Wilson, who admitted that he had fabricated it and wrote about it as follows in February 1922 in the "New York Times":

"At the beginning of the War I was correspondent of the "Daily Mail" in Brussels. They telegraphed out that they wanted stories of atrocities. Well, there weren't any atrocities at that time. So then they telegraphed out that they wanted stories of refugees. So I said to myself: 'That's fine, I won't have to move.' There was a little town outside Brussels where one went to get dinner—a very good dinner too. I heard the Hun had been there. I supposed there must have been a baby there. So I wrote a heart-rending story about the baby of Courbeck Loo being rescued from the Hun in the light of the burning homesteads. The next day they telegraphed out to me to send the baby along, as they had about five thousand letters offering to adopt it. The day after that, baby clothes began to pour into the office. Even Queen Alexandra wired her sympathy and sent some clothes. Well, I couldn't wire back to them that there wasn't a baby. So I finally arranged with the doctor that took care of the refugees that the blessed baby died of some very contagious disease, so it couldn't even have a public burial."

When the Pope promised to make a great protest to the world if a single case could be proved of the violation of nuns and mutilation of children, it was impossible, even by the inquiry carried out with the support of Cardinal Mercier, to prove a single case.

Ponsonby quotes two interesting statements from the United States against the atrocity stories. One is the statement by five American war correspondents against the reports published by the various commissions of inquiry set up by the allies, in particular the commission under the chairmanship of Lord Bryce which also represented suppositions and affidavits of single witnesses as absolute facts. This statement includes the following passages:

"To let the truth be known, we unanimously declare the stories of German cruelties, from what we have been able to observe, were untrue. After having been with the German army for two weeks, and having accompanied the troops for over one hundred miles, we are not able to report one single case of undeserved punishment or measure of retribution. We are neither able to confirm any rumours as regards the maltreatment of prisoners and non-combatants. We found numerous rumours after investigation to be without foundation. For the truth of the above we pledge our word of honour as journalists.

Roger Lewis, Associated Press;

Irwin Cobb, Saturday Evening Post, Philadelphia
Public Ledger, Philadelphia;

Harry Hansen, Chicago Daily News, Chicago;

James O'Donnell Bennett, Chicago Tribune;

John T. McCutcheon, Chicago Tribune, Chicago."

In the issue of the New York World of January 28th, 1915, appeared the following dispatch:

"Washington, January 27th, 1915. Of the thousands of Belgian refugees who are now in England, not one has been subjected to atrocities by German soldiers. This, in effect, is the substance of a report received at the State Department. The report states that the British Government had investigated thousands of reports to the effect that German soldiers had perpetrated outrages on fleeing Belgians. During the early period of the war columns of British newspapers were filled with the accusation. Agents of the British Government, according to the report of the American Embassy in London, carefully investigated all these charges; they interviewed the alleged victims and sifted all the evidence. As a result of the investigation, the British Foreign Office notified the American Embassy that the charges appeared to be based upon hysteria and natural prejudice. The report added that many of the Belgians had suffered hardships, but they should be charged up against the exigence of war rather than to brutality of the individual German soldiers."

Ponsonby states that the most revolting and at the same time best known and most successful war lie was that of the corpse factory, which first appeared in the Times of April 16th, 1917 and was deliberately disseminated especially in the Far East. The word "Kadaver" was deliberately transferred from the corpses of animals to those of human beings, and it was affirmed that the Germans would manufacture fat and other products from the bodies of fallen German and foreign soldiers. Ponsonby publishes this sad chapter of loathsome agitation with full documentary material, from which appears in particular that this lie excited the minds of people till the end of 1915 when, finally, in reply to a question by Mr. Arthur Henderson in the House of Commons on December 2nd, Sir Austen Chamberlain, then Foreign Secretary, nailed the lie to the counter shortly after the conclusion of the Locarno Agreement.

Ponsonby devotes special chapters to the so-called U-boat outrage, the sinking of the Lusitania, the Lusitania commemoration medals, the doctoring of official papers, the war aims and, lastly, the slogans: war to end war, war against militarism, war for democracy, of the falsehood of which he gives striking proof.

Ponsonby says the greastest falsehood of all was "the descriptions towards the end of the magnificent, just and righteous peace which was going to be established on lasting foundations", and he gives quotations of remarks made for home consumption by British Ministers such as Mr. Asquith, Mr. Bonar Law, Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Long regarding the unselfish participation of Great Britain in the War, and compares them with the "not bad total of conquest territory".

An instructive example of the way in which a war lie is fabricated is given by Ponsonby in connection with the fall of Antwerp.

An article on the subject in the "Kölnische Zeitung" contained the following sentence:

"When the fall of Antwerp got known, the church bells were rung" (meaning in Germany).

Thereupon the following notices appeared in the press of the Entente countries:

"Le Matin": "According to the Kölnische Zeitung, the clergy of Antwerp were compelled to ring the church bells when the fortress was taken".

"The Times": "According to what Le Matin has heard from Cologne, the Belgian priests who refused to ring the church bells when Antwerp was taken have been driven away from their places."

"Corriere della Sera": "According to what the Times has heard from Cologne via Paris, the unfortunate Belgian priests who refused to ring the church bells when Antwerp was taken have been sentenced to hard labour."

"Le Matin": "According to information to the Corriere della Sera from Cologne via London, it is confirmed that the barbaric conquerors of Antwerp punished the unfortunate Belgian priests for their heroic refusal to ring the church bells by hanging them as living clappers to the bells with their heads down."

Ponsonby writes: "To cover the whole ground on atrocity stories would be impossible. They were circulated in leaflets, pamphlets, letters and speeches day after day. Prominent people of repute, who would have shrunk from condemning their bitterest personal enemy on the evidence, or rather lack of evidence they had before them, did not hesitate to lead the way in charging a whole nation with every conceivable brutality and unnatural crime."

He says there can be no more discreditable period in the history of journalism than the four years of the Great War, during which there must have been more deliberate lying than in any other period of the world's history.

* * *

Who would not gladly refrain from excavating these souvenirs of such deliberate falsehood and cunning, and of such almost incomprehensible credulousness and foolishness, but that we are again compelled to experience and witness the same spectacle in which the same method is again employed, though the sources are slightly different, in order to incite world public opinion against Germany.

The fact that war lies are again dug up was shown by the great celebrations with which the Rheims Cathedral, which had been severely damaged in the War and restored, was again consecrated on July 10th in the presence of the French President Lebrun and a large number of princes of the church, ministers, members of parliament, generals, diplomats, intellectuals and foreign delegations. It was reserved for the Anglo-Saxons to cast aside the lofty reserve of the French speakers and again to hint at the events of the Great War. For instance, the American Ambassador Bullitt again referred to the "murder of defenceless men, women and children". The representative of the British delegation, the conservative member of parliament MacEuwen took advantage of the events of the war which had led to the damage to the cathedral to ascribe a deliberate intention of destruction to the German adversaries of that time and said "they wanted to destroy, not only the body but also the soul".

The "Deutsche Diplomatische Korrespondenz" writes on this subject as follows:

"Everyone in Germany will fully understand that the complete restoration of a symbol such as the Rheims Cathedral represents for France should also call to mind the memories necessarily aroused by the War which brought bloodshed to all nations and was particularly terrible for France as the scene of the conflict. If, therefore, one of the speakers drew the lesson from those fateful days that everything should be done to prevent a recurrence of such events, this cannot but find an approving echo in Germany. But unfortunately these celebrations were not confined to memories and warnings of this kind.

Particular tactlessness was shown by the representative of the British delegation, the conservative member of parliament MacEuwen.

An effort should be made as far as possible to avoid controversy with regard to the method of warfare on both sides, because such memories are always calculated to arouse feelings which are comprehensible during a war psychosis but which all who desire the reconciliation of the nations and peace would wish to see finally removed. But if aspersions are cast on the honour of one party in a manner which can only be regarded as a defamation and which obviously serves the purpose of strengthening the feelings of hatred and aversion, it is a duty to go to the root of the matter and to inquire into the motives.

The fact is that the Rheims Cathedral, which has always been regarded by us Germans as one of the very greatest works of art of European culture, was situated only a few kilometres from the German front. It is also a fact that the Germans constantly noticed, or thought they noticed, that enemy observers used the favourable view offered by the church towers in order to guide the enemy fire and that enemy guns were stationed in the vicinity. Military necessities—which were at that moment decisive—gave cause to set up a defence against this to the minimum necessary extent. This was not done in order to destroy the cathedral as such or as a symbol, for which every German had the same noble feelings as the adversaries, but in order to counter a military danger. If it had really been desired to destroy this work of art, other possibilities would have existed at that short distance. Moreover a shorter time would have sufficed, for all the damage that occurred was inflicted not within a few hours but in the course of four long war years. In fact, as any impartial adversary must admit, the damage, however regrettable and tragic it may be, was mainly the effect of splinters and due to guns of small calibre, so that the building as such, although it was situated in the heart of the struggle could be spared thanks to constant consideration by the Germans. Moreover the cathedral of St. Quentin, which was situated within the German lines, was subject to a more serious measure of destruction by the opponents.

A most decisive protest must be raised by the Germans against motives attributed calumniously to the German troops before Rheims which never existed and which are therefore felt to be a grievous offence. If deliberate destruction must necessarily be brought to mind, the British speaker at Rheims could and should have found more fitting examples in the recent past. For it cannot be assumed that he is unaware of the barbaric disgrace to culture with which churches of inestimable value in Spain have been destroyed out of pure love of destruction for no military purpose. But such allusions which lay nearest to hand obviously did not suit Mr. MacEuwen at this moment.

In Germany everything is done to take to heart the lessons of the War and to make good past mistakes. This also includes the attempt to cause their own people to forget many things—such as the hunger blockade against German women and children—in order not to make it more difficult to come to agreements with other nations. Germany therefore opposes all the more sharply and with all the greater contempt those who represent the inevitable hardships of the War as a sign of infamous wantonness and barbaric lack of culture with a view to setting the nations at variance."

* * *

This post-War campaign might well be called "Falsehood in post-War time". We will not revert to the colonial guilt lie, which comes under the heading of the War lies and, together with the war guilt lie, has proved to be the hardest to kill on account of the material interests which it conceals and which endanger the German colonial claims. We will also not speak of the lies which for so many years poisoned the atmosphere in the reparations question. Nor of the legends of the "unwillingness to pay" displayed by the German nation, whose fatal policy of fulfilment in fact caused deeper wounds to the economic body of the German people than the War itself and brought the nation to the verge of a second revolution and of Bolshevik chaos, not to speak of the the world economic position which was the ultimate cause of a return to reason. We will also leave out of consideration those false assertions of the "German danger" with which the victorious Powers rearmed while at the same time disarming Germany to the point of internal and external powerlessness.

While the various stages of this paper campaign of world democracy and its press against democratic Germany would make up a bulky catalogue, this is still more the case with the press calumnies against National Socialist Germany since 1933. For even the most insignificant measure taken by Germany in the political, economic, cultural and social sphere in order to free the German people from the internal and foreign political stranglehold of Versailles has always been greeted by the majority of the democratic world press with a flood of suspicion, of tendentious and false reports, of incrimination and contempt, and has been accompanied by malevolent speculations. We need only refer to the stereotyped reports which constantly recurred at the beginning regarding the early collapse of the national socialist regime with the object of preventing any cooperation with the democracies. Quite recently, on February 24th, the British Foreign Secretary, Lord Halifax, in defending his policy of mutual understanding, was compelled to refer to this foolish practice of constantly prophesying a collapse. We would also refer to the press campaign against German rearmament which was used in the armaments discussion as a threat to peace and is still a cover for the further rearmament of the heavily armed Powers. In this connection, of course, no mention is made of the disarmament carried out by Germany in fulfilment of disarmament provisions imposed on her before she was compelled by the bad will of the others to think of her own security in a surrounding world of armaments. No mention is made of her numerous disarmament and armament proposals, of which Mr. Eden once said that, if it could, the world would now grasp them with both hands. But they had been rejected at the time with scorn. And what a fierce fire of poisonous paper bullets was released by the first successful steps of the Führer to make a breach in the ring laid by foreign policy around Germany and, by means of bilateral treaties with her neighbours, to give the German nation breathing space and liberate it still further from the fetters of Versailles. The old slogans of German militarism and imperialism were again heard in the press, particularly in those countries whose militarism and imperialism had celebrated their greatest triumphs in the economic, territorial and military provisions of the dictated peace treaties of Paris which had been put into effect for fifteen years.

These slogans became louder and louder as New Germany continued to break the fetters by which Germany had been chained in impotence to the ground. The regaining of military freedom, the reunion of the German Saar territory, the reoccupation of the Rhineland, the liberation of the Reich railways, the Reichsbank and German waterways from heavy financial and economic burdens aroused storms of protests, threats and incriminations in the democratic world press.

In particular, it appears to be quite incomprehensible to French policy that the friendly bilateral agreements which Germany gradually concluded with her neighbours referred solely to their mutual relations and did not aim in any way against third parties, in contrast to the essential feature of most of the treaties concluded by Paris after the War. While French statesmen and leading persons for years undertook journeys round Germany and this was regarded as perfectly natural, the press in question was full of portentous reports as soon as German statesmen began in their turn to visit European capitals in order to improve political and economic relations with a view to releasing Germany from the permanent economic dependence and political isolation which had been the aim and desire of certain Powers and establishing her in the spheres which those Powers had considered to be their own particular and permanent interests.

These storms therefore reached their culminating point during the Spanish civil war, on the occasion of the reunion of German Austria and in the course of the Czechoslovak nationality crisis.

Everyone still remembers the mendacious reports in the Spanish civil war regarding the landing of German troops in Morocco, the establishment of heavy guns against Gibraltar and Germans aspirations in respect of Spanish colonies. We also know from the recent proceedings taken in Paris by the notorious journalist Gerauld-Pertinax of the "Echo de Paris" against the journal "Gringoire", which had accused him of being a danger to France, what was the source of these reports which brought about a twenty-four hour crisis in the international situation, namely Pertinax himself, Madame Tabouis ("Oeuvre"), the infallible clairvoyante of the French journalistic world with the somewhat incompatible and peaceful Christian name Genoveva, and lastly the "Humanité". The danger which they represented for European peace was removed by the immediate action of Adolf Hitler and the French Ambassador in Berlin, and a few days later the falsity of these reports was confirmed from official British and French quarters. Nevertheless, similar reports again cropped up and caused the present Reich Minister of Foreign Affairs, at that time Ambassador in London, Herr von Ribbentrop, to make a number of sharp protests in the London Non-Intervention Committee. The reprehensible attempts which were constantly made to poison the international atmosphere by means of the Spanish civil war are demonstrated by the recent reports in French newspapers of the right, the "Journal des Débats", "Action Française" and again in the "Oeuvre". According to these papers, the German Government which—as a relentless opponent of the Soviet Russian authorities and their pernicious game in Spain—has hitherto endeavoured to the best of its ability, jointly with the other Powers in the Non-Intervention Committee, to put an end to the unhappy civil war, tried to counteract the present improved prospects because it was interested in prolonging the struggle. For this purpose it was secretly supplying the popular front troops with arms and ammunition with a view to tying down Italy as long as possible in Spain in order to sabotage the Anglo-Italian agreement and thus prevent a subsequent rapprochement between Paris and Rome.

The former French Premier, M. Flandin, in his broadcast speech on June 21st, rightly stigmatised the danger of the international poisoning of the springs and, in proof of this, stated that in the course of a fortnight in March he had found no less than five sensational reports in a single popular front newspaper which aimed at involving France in the Spanish conflict.

Shortly before going to press the latest mendacious report comes from London. It is again the "News Chronicle", and the "Deutsche Nachrichtenbüro" writes on the subject as follows on July 12th:

"The English newspaper News Chronicle gives great prominence to the alleged verbatim reproduction of a lecture said to have been held by a very highly placed German officer to leaders of the party regarding Germany's supposed aims in Spain. Germany is stated to have intervened in Spain in order to use it as a testing ground for her military methods, as a means of securing vital positions and of thwarting in advance British and French strategy in a possible war.

The officer in question is also said to have stated that the German aim was to separate Portugal from England. In case of need the powerful army which Franco would possess after a victory in Spain was to be thrown into the scale for this purpose. With the support of the widespread feeling in Portugal in favour of a nationalist Spain, this army would be in a position more effectively than by diplomatic means to bring into power a régime in Portugal that would be acceptable to Germany.

In connection with this incredible imputation, the "News Chronicle" publishes an article stating that neither the British nor the Portuguese Government can ignore this brutal disclosure of German aims in Spain by one of the leading men in the German army. In his lecture, it states, the German officer disclosed that the object of intervention in Spain was to bring Great Britain and France between the jaws of a pincer in a war that was regarded as inevitable. He is said to have stated that the batteries in the neighbourhood of Algeciras and opposite Gibraltar would be of great service when it came to cutting the vital communications of England and France. He is also said to have stated that the foundation of a fighting front had been laid which would be partly Italian, partly German and partly national Spanish and would run along the Pyrenees against France.

This was, it stated, diabolically frank and was not restricted to England and France but was also of concern to Portugal. In view of this evidence, Chamberlain's government was guilty of criminal negligence of vital British interests. The Government by its Spanish policy was helping the Governments of countries whose secret it was to maintain the control over a strategical position which enabled them to bring England to her knees. The Portuguese Government was also warned. If it supported Franco's case, it would be encouraging forces which were prepared in case of need to do away with the independence of the country by force. The publication of this document should open Chamberlain's eyes.

The London newspaper that has in recent months marched at the head of the campaign of hatred and incitement against Germany excelled itself in this article. Its opposite number in France, the Paris "Oeuvre", for similar motives also published this not quite commonplace sensation. Both newspapers, however, though they naturally did not say so, took their information from the same source, namely the Moscow broadcast, which reported on this "lecture" some time ago and even gave the name of the officer, General von Reichenau. While the Moscow broadcast announced that the lecture was delivered at the War Academy in Munich, it was now stated that officers of the Reichswehr or leaders of the party formed the audience. When it is added that the Strasburg broadcast station, which also took up the news, transmitted it to its listeners as a document and written report, there are already four different versions, from which late-comers such as the London "Star", the French "Populaire", "Ordre" and "Epoque" could select what suited them best. The French trades union paper "Le Peuple" silenced any qualms of conscience by coolly stating that "even if the document was forged, its significance remained the same".

That it was a deliberate campaign of agitation and lies was shown shortly afterwards by an article published in the News Chronicle by the former French Air Minister Pierre Cot, who, as a faithful adherent of the Popular Front, made constant deliveries of aeroplanes to Bolshevik Spain. The aim of this article was neither more nor less than to incite the democracies (to which of course the Soviet Union belongs) to engage in a preventive war against the authoritarian States and in particular against Germany. It was, it said, still possible to prevent an attack on Czechoslovakia and thus to block Germany's path to the cornfields of Hungary and the oil-wells of Roumania. (This is a favourite idea of the American journalist Knickerbocker, who had had these intentions on the part of Germany whispered to him by the great "unknown" and who reported them to his North American agency in the middle of June.) The best trump card in this respect was the Russian air force which would use Czechoslovakia as a basis of action. Soviet Russian air attacks from a Czech base would be a severe blow for the German armies.

In accordance with the well-tried principle in the Great War, "Tell a lie and stick to it", the "News Chronicle" of July 15th again for the third time warms up the old legends regarding the landing of German troops, fortification engineers and technicians in Morocco opposite Gibraltar. On this occasion also General Franco's navy is manned with 5000 German marines, so that there is presumably not much room left for the Spaniards on their ships. In addition to the supply of about 250 aeroplanes which, for the sake of veracity, are enumerated according to models and kinds, there are now, it is stated, 2000 German parachute pilots in Franco's forces.

But there is system and method behind these fantasies. Their intention is to bring charges against Germany, on account of deliveries either to Burgos or to Barcelona, of intervention in the Spanish civil war and violation of the non-intervention agreement.

Apart from Germany, the arrow is also shot at Chamberlain who is charged with "criminal neglect of British interests". This neglect no doubt consists in the fact that, after infinitely difficult and prolonged efforts and negotiations, he finally succeeded on April 16th in removing the tension that had lasted for two years, in settling comprehensively the mutual points of conflict and in bringing the Spanish civil war which has menaced European peace for a similar period towards its final solution by means of the new agreement in the London Non-Intervention Committee on July 5th, unless Moscow and its satellites in the French and British press again sabotage this solution.

Presumably the French Prime Minister M. Daladier is also to be an object of this attack since, after the Spanish popular front experiments of the Plum-Boncour Government, he has finally closed the Pyrenees frontier and—in contrast with his British colleague Chamberlain who is constantly attacked by the questions of the Labour Party in the House of Commons—cut short the attacks of the popular front deputies by the simple course of adjourning the Chamber for the vacation at an early date.

The rapid and bloodless Anschluss which was received with complete enthusiasm by the entire Austrian people for the time being took the breath away from the agitators in the western democracies. They had not enough time to make up rumours and tendentious reports. But the moment seems now to have come for them to make up for lost time with renewed zeal. If the object pursued were not so bitterly earnest, the concentrated mass of articles in the last few weeks would seem to be madly grotesque. As usual on the occasion of these first-class contests, the parts were divided. At one time French newspapers, at another time English, Belgian, Polish and Czech newspapers, threw the ball to each other, in order that the news might be disseminated simultaneously and the real source might be disguised. A favourite means for this purpose consists in the so-called "special correspondents" as in the case of the notorious article in the "Temps" on the Berlin events of February 4th, 1938 when the Führer brought about a stronger concentration of military power and made changes in the leading posts. When such a "changing of the guard" takes place in other countries, such as Italy, England, Hungary, or even in the United States, this is a matter of course. But in Germany it must be preceded by a revolt of officers, a refusal by regiments to obey orders, and disturbances in Berlin, Pomerania and East Prussia. The source of this mysterious correspondent, who first reported his information from Basle, then from Warsaw and Cracow, has not yet been discovered. The former French Premier, M. Flandin, at a meeting of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Chamber, placed it in the Quai d'Orsay, and the then Foreign Minister, M. Delbos, promised a strict investigation. M. Flandin spoke at the time of the "guerrilla warfare of tendentious information and malicious statements by which German-French relations were poisoned", and M. Delbos replied that "he would not hesitate to combat with the means at his disposal the campaign of the press and other organs which might damage the friendly and courteous relations which France desires to maintain with all nations". These special correspondents and travellers in Germany generally sit in the editorial offices and are equipped either with official material or with gigantic instruments for seeing and hearing at a distance with which they either hear the grass grow or see visions of events of which their correspondents on the spot have nothing to report but which satisfy the desire for sensational news, if only for the purpose of increasing sales while at the same time picking holes in the "dictatorships".

But as the press apparently cannot live without sensations, Dr. Dietrich has pointed out to these seekers after sensation that they can satisfy their requirements by means of a few real sensations offered by the Third Reich in widely different spheres of social, economic and cultural life which, in contrast with the untrue sensations, are calculated not to incite the nations against each other, but to bring about an understanding between them.

But to return to the Austrian sensations. Every correspondent must have been overcome with envy of the good fortune of his colleagues, if even a minute fraction was true of the stories which they have cabled since June 16th to the whole world from Vienna, Berlin and Berchtesgaden.

On that day the Daily Herald reported that the Führer was obliged, at the written request of 1300 members of the party in Austria, to proceed to Vienna on the 17th in order to remove serious difficulties which had arisen in the Austrian national socialist party where the best places were occupied not by Austrians but by Reich Germans. Innumerable newspapers and news agencies took up this news and embroidered it with details of other difficulties caused by the Anschluss which had led to open dissatisfaction with the "Prussian course". A Roumanian newspaper drivelled about "the dreadful spectacle of the struggle between the Prussian spirit and the soul of Latinised Austria". On the 17th, the Havas agency, and on the 18th Reuters, took up the chorus and devoted some profound reflections to the "martyrdom of Austria" which has since filled the columns of the newspapers. Then come famine demonstrations, as against which however there are other reports of hungry Reich Germans coming in crowds to Austria to eat their fill. Particular affection is shown for the city of Vienna. Its charm is said to have been destroyed and its former flourishing gardens turned into a huge fortress, which, however, does not seem to have been observed either by the Viennese or foreign journalists. In Upper Austria the peasants were said to be in revolt, because the deforestation changed the climate and endangered agriculture. As usual the "Illustrierte Krakauer Kurier", which had discovered the revolt of officers in East Prussia on February 4th, distinguished itself in this field. It was able to report very definitely that the Führer had been since the 16th at the Villa Hermes in Schönbrunn, naturally incognito though nevertheless in the company of almost all the Reich Ministers and leaders. The paper was in particularly good form, for it published the measures taken by Hitler to remove the difficulties. On the 21st there was a démenti by Havas, while the "Oeuvre" reported at the same time from Paris that the Führer had abandoned his journey because the differences of opinion between Reich Commissioner Bürckel and the Austrian Nazis could not be settled in the way he had expected. In the meantime, according to French and English newspapers on the 25th German troops were brought up in readiness in order to restore order and to suppress risings and revolts in Vienna because the Austrian police and soldiers were not reliable (according to the "Petit Parisien" some regiments had mutinied). On the 25th, however, according to the Evening Standard, Hitler did appear in Vienna, in spite of the fact that, according to the "Daily Herald" he was at Berchtesgaden and refused to receive the Austrian delegations that wanted to speak to him. In the meantime, Reich Commissioner Bürckel proceeded to Berchtesgaden or Berlin (according as it suited the paper) to ask for help. And thus it went on. The Führer was constantly on the way between Berlin, Vienna and Berchtesgaden and Reich Commissioner Bürckel constantly travelling to Berlin and Berchtesgaden without ever arriving. Towards the end of June the culminating point in this campaign of lies appears to have been reached. The Daily "Herald", which had led the dance on the 16th when it announced the visit of the Führer for the 17th, closed it on the 28th with the report that Hitler would now shortly proceed to Vienna. The more serious newspapers which had for nearly two weeks entertained their readers with horrors from Austria again became more cautious, but this naturally did not repair the damage done.

It is of course clear that this medley of mutually contradictory lies and inventions in which foreign news agencies, which should have been particularly objective in view of their relations with official quarters, and also newspapers which are otherwise to be taken seriously took part, is not due to mere fantasy, but to method with a very definite object. It is a matter of indifference whether the plan for this agitation was hatched, according to reports from Brünn on June 7th and 8th, at an emigrant conference in Paris or not. This fact would merely throw more light on the ulterior motives. The "Figaro" and the "Daily Telegraph" gave open expression to the object aimed at by stating that the Sudeten Germans were becoming more and more convinced that a solution of their difficulties within the framework of Czechoslovakia offered them clear advantages. "The complete subjection of the National Socialists in Austria appears gradually to cause the view to be taken that a solution of their difficulties is possible without any change in the present Czechoslovak frontiers". The above false reports regarding conditions in Austria thus had Prague in view and were intended on the one hand to deter the faith of the Sudeten Germans in their German national feeling and, since Germany was weakened by these conditions, to paralyse their desire for the grant of their national rights; on the other hand they were intended to stiffen the backs of the Prague Government. A game that was as foolish as it was dangerous and that has already once nearly extended the Czech nationality crisis to a European conflagration.

We now come to the crisis days of May 21st and 22nd when Europe was almost pushed into the abyss of a new war by means of a deliberately conducted press campaign and the excessive official zeal of certain governments in respect of a danger of war which did not exist.

Immediately after February 12th, after the conversation between Hitler and Schuschnigg at Berchtesgaden, the political poisoning of the wells was begun in respect of Czechoslovakia, and the News Chronicle felt obliged to give proof of its anti-German attitude by reports regarding the massing of German troops on the Austrian and Czech frontier. This gave the Führer another opportunity, when speaking in the Munich Hofbräuhaus at a party formation festival, to show his attitude to these mendacious reports. The reports regarding the threat to Czechoslovakia increased in intensity from March 18th to April 10th, the day of the plebiscite on the Anschluss, in spite of the fact that Mr. Chamberlain had announced in the House of Commons on March 14th the tranquillising statements by Field Marshal Göring and Foreign Minister von Neurath to the Czechoslovak Minister in Berlin. The folly of these reports went too far even for some French newspapers which opposed them with the warning that they rendered no service to Czechoslovakia. On March 23rd Dr. Krofta, the Czechoslovak Foreign Minister, called together the representatives of the foreign press in order to lecture them on the subject: Freedom of the press involves obligations. In referring them to the statements by Dr. Dietrich, he requested them to show the necessary reserve and the requisite objectivity especially when reporting from a country that gave them hospitality.

The impending communal elections in Czechoslovakia and the police and military measures taken by the Czechoslovak Government for the alleged purpose of carrying out the elections in an orderly and undisturbed manner in the Sudeten German districts and the tension to which this gave rise did not, apart from a few more or less insignificant incidents, bring any disquieting news. Then came the shooting of the two Sudeten Germans in the early morning of the 21st which showed like a flash the extreme degree of tension reached. Shortly before this and quite unconnected with it, reports of the alleged movements of German troops, were received on the 19th of May from Prague and London regarding which the British Ambassador in Berlin asked for information on the 20th and 21st. These legendary movements of troops that no one in Germany had seen but which were used by the French and British press on the 21st and 22nd in big headlines to bring the spectre of a fresh war before the eyes of their readers and the further news telegraphed between London, Paris and Prague to the effect that the Czechoslovak Government had ordered the partial mobilisation of the army left no doubt that this was a propagandist manoeuvre to construct a new war guilt lie. What was the position in reality?

The Berlin correspondent of the "Times" reported as follows:

"Except for the press campaign, which is violent, nothing appears to have been done here which could aggravate the crisis. If there have been any troop movements on a large scale, they have eluded the attention of all observers. A few precautionary measures and stoppage of leave in certain areas are all that can be discovered in the way of military preparations. The Reich Government go about their business calmly. Herr Hitler began this morning (Sunday) the construction of Munich's underground railway. His speech was wholly devoted to traffic problems."

These facts were also confirmed not only by other correspondents who had been invited by the Government of the Reich to verify them on the spot and were enabled to convince themselves of the incorrectness of the reports, but on the 23rd the British Ambassador in Paris informed the French Foreign Minister that no movements of German troops had been observed in the course of a detailed investigation on the spot. The "coup planned by the German army" proved, as Garvin stated in the Observer, to be "an artificial machination", to which, however, Prague had promptly reacted. It was regrettable that nevertheless, and in spite of the official assurances given on the 20th and 21st to the British Ambassador in Berlin, the British Government should permit the retailing of panic rumours in the British press on the 21st and 22nd and the deliberate misinterpretation of the Ambassador's visits. Unfortunately Mr. Chamberlain in his speech in the House of Commons on May 23rd, while disposing lightly of the allegations regarding the movements of German troops as stories, failed to clear up the entirely false impression caused by the combination of untrue reports and excessive official zeal and to inform the public that all the diplomatic actions of Great Britain, as far as Germany was concerned, forced an open door.

Although the "Times" (which it must be admitted had not taken part in the campaign) pointed out on the 24th that "an independent inquiry has shown that the rumours of German movements of troops on the Czech frontier are incorrect", the other newspapers and news agencies, in so far as they made any comment at all, in order not to give the lie to their own statements, covered their retreat by the further untrue report that the German troops had been withdrawn. The "détente" which was now observed was, under these circumstances, naturally not ascribed to the presence of mind, calmness and prudence of the German Government in the face of the Czech partial mobilisation and to the firm discipline of the Sudeten Germans in the face of Czech provocations and attacks. The laurels of the preservation of peace were rather placed on the head of the British Government through whose (and at the same time France's) determination "Europe had been saved from a serious danger".

* * *

In conclusion, Prague felt obliged on June 22nd to undertake a justification in an official statement regarding the reasons which led to the military measures of May 21st. The Deutsche Nachrichtenbüro reported thereon as follows:

"In view of the partial withdrawal of the military measures taken by the Czechoslovak Republic on May 21st, statements have been made in authoritative Prague quarters regarding the reasons for these steps, with the obvious purpose of excusing a measure which would have brought Europe to the verge of war if the same nervousness had been shown elsewhere as in Prague. These statements amount to an accusation that the Sudeten Germans, by means of whispered propaganda with the slogan "The day is coming", had agitated for the possibility of a State change in the frontier districts of Czechoslovakia and undermined the authority of the State. Action by means of Czech pamphlets, the origin of which was moreover betrayed by linguistic errors and which entirely failed in their effect on account of their clumsy composition, was intended according to these statements to introduce disintegration into the ranks of the Czechs. In addition there were the repeated statements by German statesmen that it would be necessary to intervene if the alleged oppression of the Sudeten Germans continued and that sanguinary incidents would occur. In connection with the speeches made by the Führer and Chancellor and by Field Marshal Göring regarding the millions of Germans outside the German frontiers, it was stated that the conclusion had to be drawn that an intervention was intended. It was, however, true that on the other hand an assurance had been received from Germany that there was no thought of this.

But when, on May 21st, the feeling among the Sudeten Germans had reached boiling point and when news of the movements of German troops against the Czechoslovak frontier had become known, the Prague Government had to decide what it should do. In view of the above mentioned German declaration that no violent action was planned, it had, it said, confined itself to calling up one annual class of reservists together with men belonging to special troops for extraordinary exercises, without decreeing mobilisation. The right of self-defence, it was stated, must be granted to Czechoslovakia, and the Government had done no more than take measures for such defence in view of an obviously menacing position. It was not so foolish as to wish to attack or threaten the German Reich with one mobilised annual class. It had, however, been affirmed that the measure taken at Prague was intended to bring about the intervention of other Powers against the German Reich. This, it said, was absurd, for Czechoslovakia was well aware that in case of a warlike conflict in Central Europe she would in any case be the victim. The main object was to restore the authority of the State, upon which doubts had been cast, in the German district of the Republic, and at the same time to safeguard calm and security and the holding of independent elections, as it was to be feared that the Sudeten Germans would exercise undue pressure on the Czechoslovak and other parties."

It can scarcely be affirmed that the position of Prague was improved by this explanation, which resembles more than anything a rearguard action. On the grounds that "whispers" were going round in the German districts and—a matter for astonishment—the Sudeten Germans who had been oppressed for years "would exercise pressure on the Czechoslovak and other parties", the Czech General Staff called up "only one annual class of reservists" together with the special troops belonging thereto for "extraordinary exercises". (According to foreign eye-witnesses Sudetenland resembled a battle encampment.) The grounds of "news regarding German troop movements" are scarcely convincing, for Prague, as the immediate neighbour of these mythical movements of troops, was well aware that they did not exist. They were as fantastic as the plans of a "Putsch" ascribed to the disciplined Sudeten German population.

* * *

We will not worry our heads as to whether the British Secret Service was really behind these reports of German troop movements, as at first stated by Jules Sauerwein and subsequently denied by him (and also by the Secret Service). Or as to whether, according to Flandin's statements at a party meeting of the Alliance Democratique at Viennes (Dep. Isère), the French mobilisation order lay on the writing table of the French Premier Daladier on May 21st (this being denied by the latter).

The entire course of these days which were so ominous with heavy storm clouds shows that, apart from the evil press agitation, the procedure in other respects, arising as it did from an internally false policy of prestige, was unfair to Germany and moreover contained and still contains considerable elements of danger. The exaggerated praise given to the collective action of Paris and London, before which Germany was obliged to "recoil" the Czech "test case" which was accompanied by mutual congratulations and ended with a "victory for the collectivists", and the highly successful "general mobilisation of public opinion" might arouse in the minds of "catastrophe politicians" or—as the Times called them in connection with the flood of malicious speculations during Lord Halifax' visit to Berlin—"wire-pullers" and "warlike peacemakers" ideas of a licence with which they might again bring about a "test of strength" which the thin ice over which Europe skated without its breaking during the last crisis could no longer stand.

That this possibility does not act as a deterrent upon the apostles of agitation, but rather as a stimulus to their activities is shown by the position they have taken up in the Spanish and Czech theatres where presumably they find better opportunities of extending the influence of another European focus of danger. Here again the Chamberlain-Daladier tendency does not suit them; for did not the latter in his speech at the banquet given by the Provençal associations in Paris on July 12th again and again praise in the strongest possible terms the honest love of peace evinced by Germany and the Führer, which even induced the "Temps" of July 15th to pay a tribute to the Government of the Reich which, by its spontaneous gesture of good-will in the critical days of May 21st and 22nd helped to remove the threatened danger to peace". Now we have in black and white in the famous daily leading article in the organ of the Quai d'Orsay, a refutation of this new crop of false rumours, according to which the Foreign Minister M. Bonnet once more spoke at a meeting of the Foreign Committee of the Chamber of these legendary movements of troops.

No sooner was this tissue of lies more or less officially unravelled, than they span another one and once again it was the busy spinner of the "News Chronicle" of July 16th who went to work with reports of "Movements of Nazi troops" and "The danger of a repetition of the events of May 21st and 22nd", after the cue had again been given by the Moscow announcer some hours before. This time the "whispered propaganda" passing from mouth to mouth among the Sudeten Germans, and now concerned with talk of a general strike after the proclamation of the Nationalities Statute, was included, and it was deduced from the decision not to hold the great manœuvres (which as every one knows are everywhere held at intervals of several years), that German troops were being secretly assembled in frontier towns and military training centres. If they had been held, they would presumably have constituted a still more dangerous preparation for war in those "war-clouded months" of July and August. "The same tactics are adopted here as in the matter of the attitude of the Führer. If he stigmatizes in his speeches this dangerous practice of playing with fire, that is a "threat" and if he says nothing, it is a "disquieting silence" still more dangerous to peace.

* * *

All this goes to show how very much to the point and how thoroughly justified the warning contained in the sixth point of Adolf Hitler's speech in the Reichstag on January 30th, 1937 was, when he said: "it is impossible to bring about a real pacification of the nations, as long as nothing is done to stop the continual agitation of an irresponsible international clique of poisoners of the springs of knowledge and of men's minds", though this warning has unfortunately failed to bear any fruit up to the present. At the same time, it also shows that today—just, as 24 years ago—war guilt fables are invented and believed, whenever any circles in Europe consider that time and opportunity are favourable for furthering "obscure interests which shun the light of day", as Daladier recently expressed it.

Furthermore, these considerations lend weight and immediate significance to the profound truths uttered by Reich Press Chief Dr. Dietrich.

When all is said and done, there are no two opinions in regard to the dangers of this poisoned pen campaign and every responsible statesman and indeed every person in a public position who has any sense of responsibility knows perfectly well that irreparable damage can be done by the publication of false reports in the press. Thus for years far-sighted people in all countries have been working for measures to restrain the unbridled misuse of the press and for decent truthful reporting, which does not gamble with national requirements and international relations, whenever the machinery of disintegrating agitation is set in motion by wire-pullers behind the scenes. Unfortunately the recognition of these facts has not got beyond the stage of theoretical discussions concerning measures of improvement, and against newspapers which are in principle hostile to the truth warnings are of no use and threats of little avail, especially when their effect is immediately counteracted by assurances that "the liberty of the press" will in no circumstances be infringed.

Adolf Hitler mercilessly exposed this state of affairs in his great speech on February 20th and demanded deeds—not words. Just as certain methods of warfare are forbidden now and to be forbidden in the future—just as the use of disease bacteria and the poisoning of wells are acknowledged to be against international law—so it should be possible to place an international ban upon the poisoning of the human soul, which is incidentally so much more dangerous.

Shortly after the Führer's speech, Dr. Dietrich broke another lance when he drew the logical practical conclusions from that speech. The problem of press polemics and international press work has thus been drawn into the circle of discussions between State and State. A political question of the day of the first importance has now come up for debate, for it is no longer denied anywhere today that the press is a power which both in a good and evil sense, plays a decisive part in the problem of international peace and understanding. If this part is to be played in a good sense, the first prerequisite is the conclusion of a press peace, which does not mean that the press would or ought to be muzzled.

No one objects to foreign newspapers in Germany criticizing, provided they do not criticize for the sake of criticizing or with intent to defame. Where press lies are published for their own sake and degenerate into licence, they can no longer be said to represent legitimate national interests. Nor do they merely serve to fan the agitation against Germany and her Government, but are, as we have seen, nothing more nor less than attacks on the peace of Europe and this, as Dr. Dietrich pointed out, has nothing whatsoever to do with the liberty of the press.

Unfortunately here, as in many other fields, the League of Nations has completely failed, as the Cassandra-like cries of Herriot, one of the most prominent members of the Committee on Intellectual Cooperation, set up for precisely this purpose many years ago, testify. Dr. Dietrich has therefore not only launched an earnest appeal to all competent authorities throughout the world to fight for truth in the press, but also indicated the only method which can enable us to attain our object, since the collective efforts of Geneva have failed; namely, the method of bi-lateral agreements between one country and another, which has already been successfully tried between Germany and some of her neighbours. He stressed the fact that Germany, by virtue of her press policy based on the principle of personal responsibility, furnished every guarantee and opportunity for the conclusion of a press truce—an inter-governmental civil peace—with every State in which the same conditions precedent could be shown to exist. Germany honestly desires to supplement existing effective agreements with others, in so far as it is desired to achieve this object on a footing of genuine equality. The Reich Press Chief may thus be said in some sort to have made an offer to the diplomats and journalists. The decision now rests with them or their Governments who, in view of the events of the last few weeks must have come to realize that the question can no longer be solved by words alone, and it would seem that this is less a question of ability than of goodwill.

The object in view—namely, to abandon negative desintegrating press work for positive and constructive achievements in the service of world peace is surely worth a little goodwill, for, as the former German Foreign Minister, Freiherr von Neurath, said to a representative of the Stefani Agency on May 6th, 1937 during his visit to Italy which gave rise to such wild suspicions; "it would be a blessing if the weapon of defamation could be buried and the international press would realize that its most important task was to bring the nations closer together."

TWO YEARS OF THE CIVIL WAR IN SPAIN¹

The 17th of July was the second anniversary of the outbreak of the civil war in Spain, undoubtedly the most dreadful catastrophe, after the Bolshevik Revolution, that has befallen and threatened Europe. The occasion for it was the murder of the Monarchist leader Calvo Sotelo in the night from July 12th to 13th in Madrid by police officers of the special Government troops, the Guardia de Asalto. This bloodthirsty act—which was to be followed by innumerable other horrible and indescribable acts by the Red authorities and their undisciplined hordes—was not expiated by the arrest and punishment of the murderers but was rewarded by the arrest and removal of the adherents of Sotelo, and was a sign for General Franco, who had been exiled by the Popular Front Government to a command in the Canary Islands, to depart from the strict discipline and loyalty that he had exercised towards the War Ministry and to give the signal for revolt. On July 17th, under his orders, the army in Spanish Morocco which was devoted to his cause rose at his command and the first troops were landed at Cadiz on the 19th. On the 21st Franco arrived by air from the Canary Islands, while the other leader of the rising, General Sanjurjo, who was living in exile in Portugal, was killed in flying to Spain. On August 27th Nationalist Spain transferred the military supreme command to Franco and on October 7th the political leadership. These functions were again conferred on him on August 1st, 1938 by the new State Constitution (Articles 16 and 17).

In the meantime Franco's Government has been recognised by Germany, Italy, Japan, the Vatican, Portugal, Roumania, Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, Brazil, Turkey, Hungary, Guatemala, San Salvador, Albania, Nicaragua and Manchukuo. The United Kingdom has sent a diplomatic agent to Burgos and a Franco agent is accredited in London. The same procedure is at present under consideration by other States, such as Holland and Belgium. On the other hand, a number of States have broken off diplomatic relations with the Red Spanish Government without having hitherto recognised Franco's Government.

Since that 17th of July two years have passed. In their continuous victorious advance Franco's armies have taken one province after another from the Red Government. Of 47 provinces 30 are now in Franco's possession. Four have for the most part fallen to him, while the Reds have only nine, and the remaining four are contested.

This is not the time and place to describe in detail the ruined towns and villages and the hecatombs of murdered people the Red troops have left behind them in their withdrawals. But these two years should have been sufficient to destroy the view in the mind of any unprejudiced person that in Spain "a conflict was being waged by the dictatorships against the democracies", if, as is done in so many quarters, the government system with which the Moscow International, which stands behind the Madrid Government, wishes to endow the Spanish people is described as a democracy. The object of this civil war was briefly described as follows by General Franco to his officers when he left his staff headquarters in Santa Cruz de Tenerife: "We have begun the struggle in order to liberate Spain from a foreign spirit and to restore her to herself. It is the fight for the future of Spain and the culture of Spain that must now be fought. What I demand from you is discipline, discipline and again discipline; faith, faith and again faith."

What discipline and faith have rendered possible for Franco since those July days and since the beginning of the rising, which was critical because unexpected for Franco, at a time when the entire military and political power was in the hands of Madrid, is now shown by a glance at the map. But Franco has conquered four-fifths of the country not only with military arms, but by means of his socialism of deeds, which he has constantly pursued, he has also conquered the hearts of the people, who have been incited against each other by years of communist, anarchist and socialist propaganda.

* * *

The question that arises, as to why this victorious advance of Franco has not brought a definite decision and completely freed the country from the rule of Red violence and bloodshed, draws attention to another aspect of this manifold Spanish problem, namely the extension of the conflict, which was originally a purely Spanish concern, to an international battlefield of foreign political, military and economic interests, a battlefield which has dominated the Spanish scene for two years and threatened to extend it to a European danger.

The future historian who assumes the difficult task of defining the various laws of development of the Spanish civil war will have to start from a complicated ramification of events and their connecting links. For this war cannot be regarded as an isolated event any more than the Abyssinian war. Here also there are events correlated with other events, and possibly diplomatic action in respect of Spain is more unclear and evasive than that in respect of Abyssinia. It has already happened that questions relating to the Abyssinian campaign overlap into the Spanish problem and have at times been transferred from the periphery to the centre.

In respect of all these general political and ideological overlappings which have at times checked and at other times incited the forces of development of the Spanish crisis, the origin should not be overlooked: it is the very vigorous interest taken in this conflict from the beginning by the Soviet Union and French Popular Front quarters. The Soviet Union was impelled by reasons of world revolution, since it regarded the introduction of a Bolshevik system in Spain as a suitable jumping-off ground for the further bolshevisation of Europe, while the French Popular Front was impelled by its ideological connection with the Soviet Union and thought it was obliged to defend democracy in Spain against the erection of a new Fascist dictatorship. To these have been added recently to an increasing extent the British Labour Party and Liberal circles, who are filled with blind hatred of everything that is Fascist and National Socialist and who take every opportunity offered by the military measures that Franco is obliged to take, such as the sinking of ships carrying contraband and the bombardment of important military and strategic points by aircraft, to delay Franco's final victory and the downfall of Spanish "democracy".

Thus it happened that, a few days after Franco's rising, as the French "Œuvre" joyfully announced, the first supplies came from France to the "noble friends" in Madrid, partly across the Pyrenees frontier and partly by sea via North Spanish ports. This was the beginning of the intervention that has since become so famous. These transports of material and ammunition were soon followed by the transport of Red volunteers, from which the so-called International Brigade was formed at the beginning of October and November.

This French-Soviet Russian intervention should be borne in mind in view of the fact that in the past two years the French press and the French Government have constantly pointed out with special emphasis that it was France and, in particular, the French Popular Front Government, that first took the initiative of a Non-Intervention Agreement on August 1st, 1936, which led on September 9th to the appointment of the so-called Non-Intervention Committee in London.

But there is a further point to be remembered in this connection, namely the original attitude of England and France to the question of volunteers, which subsequently became the central point of the entire non-intervention question. As far back as the beginning of August, the Italian and German Governments, in reply to and agreeing with the French suggestion for a Non-Intervention Agreement, demanded that this should not be restricted to a prohibition of supplies of war material but should be extended to the participation of foreign volunteers. This suggestion, which was inspired by the sincere endeavour to localise the Spanish conflict completely in every respect, was not favourably received. At this particular time certain governments had the greatest difficulty in finding comprehension for an embargo restricted to war material among the Marxist groups that supported them, not to mention a prohibition of the transport of volunteers which was at that time taking place through the usual routes. In fact it was openly stated by the Government in the British Parliament as late as the beginning of December that the participation of foreign volunteers in the Spanish conflict was not contrary to the Non-Intervention Committee. It was only on December 7th, after the uninterrupted influx of volunteers to Red Spain had been followed by a similar influx to Nationalist Spain, that this question was brought before the Committee for discussion by the French and British and, on their proposal, it was decided to prohibit the volunteers.

Then began the game of conflicting interests which has since then dominated the discussions of the Committee. While England and also France desired by this non-intervention policy to prevent the spread of the Spanish war beyond the frontiers of Spain, they counted on the war weakening the country and ending in a compromise which would leave the Iberian Peninsula politically, economically and strategically within the zone of influence of these two Powers and would possibly open up new zones. But, after the influx especially of Italian volunteers, the possibility suddenly arose of a strong Spain which would continue the war until the unconditional subjection of Madrid and would under certain circumstances subsequently have a foreign policy closely connected with that of Italy.

Presumably Paris and London had in mind past events, when in 1926 the Spanish dictator, Primo de Rivera, with an obvious dig at France, made no secret of his sympathy for Fascist Italy and rumours were circulated regarding political and military co-operation between the two States and the granting of the right to Italy to occupy the Balearic Islands in case of war, while a few years later, after the fall of Rivera and the monarchy and the seizure of power by bourgeois socialist governments in 1931, M. Herriot, at that time French Premier, made his much commented journeys to Spain in order to bring that country into closer connection with France and to negotiate a treaty for the right to purchase the Balearic Islands. The background of this French interest in Spain is constituted by the Balearic Islands with their capacity of either protecting or endangering French transports of troops from North Africa to France. The background of British interests is constituted by Gibraltar, the importance and position of which is obviously greatly influenced according to whether the hinterland is politically and economically more or less dependent on England. The former Foreign Secretary, Mr. Eden, expressed this in his fundamental speech at Llandudno on October 15th, 1936 when he said that a clear distinction must be made between non-intervention and indifference. The United Kingdom, he said, was not indifferent to the maintenance of the integrity of Spanish territory. A clear distinction must be made between non-intervention in Spanish affairs and intervention in which political interests were at stake. In other words, the United Kingdom would take care that its interests in the Mediterranean and in the maintenance of the communications to the Near East and to India were not endangered. One of these communications is the Straits of Gibraltar. The celebrated "guns over Gibraltar" have on various occasions given rise to critical questions in both Houses of Parliament; behind them has been for the most part not so much real anxiety as incriminations against Italy and Germany. On the last occasion, on April 7th, 1938, Lord Faringdon in the House of Lords gave a description of the suspicious military measures which must have deeply moved every Englishman who felt any concern for the British Empire and the maintenance of the free sea route of Gibraltar. The Government representative disposed of these comments with the brief remark that he was not aware of any alteration in the situation since the Government's previous statements that would justify a change of attitude on the part of the Government. Naturally guns had been added to the defences of both sides of the Straits of Gibraltar since the beginning of the civil war in Spain. On the other hand, it cannot be a matter of indifference to the present Italian Empire, as a great Mediterranean and colonial Power, if national Spanish interests are crowded out by others and, in particular, if influences and currents such as Bolshevism are established which merely serve world revolutionary aims and make Spain a source of disturbance and danger not only for the country itself but also for all the surrounding territories in the Mediterranean and North Africa. Mussolini has from the outset left no doubt that he is not pursuing any territorial aims in his support of Nationalist Spain, and could scarcely have expressed this more clearly than in the statement which he made in November 1936 to an English journalist; he said he would not have the slightest respect for the leader of a nationalist movement who thought for a moment of the possibility of sacrificing a part of the soil of his fatherland. The fight against Bolshevism and in favour of the maintenance of the peace of Europe which is threatened by Bolshevism has naturally aroused nothing but sympathy in Germany and among the German people for Franco's struggle for the freedom of Spain, while the Government of the Reich, like the Italian Government, has energetically denied all rumours to the effect that it claims any compensation for its support of Franco's cause. German and Italy, and also Portugal, have from the outset regarded the Spanish civil war as the struggle between disintegrating world Bolshevism and the forces which desire to maintain Western culture and civilisation. They have regarded Franco's struggle not merely as a rising against the "legal"

State authority, but perceived that it was a way in which this part of the old European continent might be saved from the fate of becoming a province of world Bolshevism.

Franco himself has on various occasions stated unequivocally, the last occasion being on March 29th, 1938 to a Havas representative, that the Mediterranean Statute would not be changed by actions on his part. "After our victory not an inch of Spanish territory will be separated in favour of a foreign Power."

* * *

The diplomatic game of chess which has hitherto taken place in the London Non-Intervention Committee should be regarded and judged against the background of these aspirations. Its confusing negotiations regarding technical questions which veil the political conflicts, such as the introduction of systems of control on land, at sea and in the air, the granting of belligerent rights, the formation of blockade zones, the prevention of air bombardments and submarine torpedo attacks, have never been able to arouse much comprehension among the public. Nevertheless the overflowing of the conflict has more than once been dependent on the upward or downward movement of the Committee, and if an historical account of its proceedings is ever given, this will undoubtedly form one of the most interesting and remarkable documents of the present time.

In estimating its work, it cannot be denied that the Non-Intervention Committee has been able to steer the bark of non-intervention past all the rocks and dangers into the—for the moment—safe harbour of the agreement of July 5th, 1938. It is to the credit of non-intervention—which the Spanish crisis has introduced as a new conception into international law—that the Spanish civil war, in spite of all intervention, was able to be localised and that the explosive matter which had accumulated could be kept at a distance from the rest of Europe. A different judgment could, however, be given regarding the question whether agreement to the demand constantly made by Italy and Germany, that the two parties to the civil war should be accorded belligerent rights, would not have made the entire non-intervention procedure superfluous and at the same time brought the war to a more rapid end. This recognition of belligerent rights was rejected in the first place from the political point of view by the other Great Powers in the Committee because they entirely misjudged the actual position, even after Franco's liberating victorious career and his enthusiastic reception by the greater part of the Spanish people, and they continued to regard him as the "rebel", and the Red authorities in Madrid, who changed according to socialist, communist and anarchist influences and found support in a constantly diminishing number of adherents, as the "legal Government". This recognition of belligerent rights was also denied in the first place because it was demanded by the Soviet Union solely for Madrid, and also because it was regarded, if not by the Government at any rate by large sections of British and French public opinion according to the course of the war, as a measure in favour of Franco. If belligerent rights had been accorded, this would for instance have prevented Red Spanish troops, as recently happened in the case of an entire division (the 43rd) which had fled before Franco's advancing troops into French territory, from returning to Barcelona instead of being disarmed and interned in France and again being used against the Nationalist Spanish armies.

Ed. Bauer wrote very pertinently on February 11th, 1938 in the "Journal de Genève" regarding the recognition of belligerent rights:

"In so far as this war is prolonged and extended on land, at sea and in the air, the fiction on behalf of which people stubbornly refuse to accord to this conflict the juridical character of a war and to grant the character of belligerent rights to the two parties will cause more and more losses and become more and more dangerous. So long as Europe refuses to recognise this war as such, it will deprive itself of the legal conditions, i.e. of the international rules, which might restrict its dangers for neutrals and mitigate its inhumanity towards the belligerents. For if belligerent rights are not recognised, there is no reason to demand that the belligerents should restrict their freedom of action in order to subject themselves to a belligerent law the recognition of which is refused them."

The "Times" also had to admit on July 2nd, 1938 that "the entire position is thus complicated from the international point of view on account of the paradox of a relentless two-year war without the parties to the struggle being recognised as belligerents".

However that may be, it has been possible, after two years, to reach what is to be hoped will be a final settlement which will be put into effect regarding the volunteers and naturally also the prohibition to send fresh volunteers and the question of the recognition of belligerent rights, to which even the Soviet Union had to agree after various trivial though unsuccessful attempts at evasion if it was not to appear openly, before a world which has hitherto been extremely indulgent, as an incurable saboteur of the entire non-intervention; this proves what the Powers could have spared themselves, Spain and Europe, if they could have arrived earlier not only at this decision but also at its execution, naturally without consideration for the Russian machinations.

The view really taken by the Blum Popular Front Government, which boasted with particular pride of the paternity of the non-intervention idea, is shown not only by the unchecked and uninterrupted transports of men and material over the mysterious Pyrenees frontier, as proved by innumerable reports and disclosures of French newspapers, but also by the former Prime Minister Flandin in his broadcast speech on June 22nd and by Blum himself in a recent article in the "Populaire" of June 29th; the latter, when read between the lines, admits the fact that the Blum Government in a ministerial decree which was not published in the "Journal Officiel" deliberately infringed the Non-Intervention Agreement and the French law prohibiting the delivery and transit of war material and expressly permitted the transit of such material. In this article, M. Blum, referring naturally to the German and Italian deliveries, which were alleged to be much greater, said: "I have no intention of denying this fact and the support which the Soviet Government gave to the Republican Government of Spain. No one will deny that this assistance was considerable and was of vital importance for the Republican army in the most critical hours of the war." M. Daladier, at that time War Minister, was also placed in an uncomfortable position in the meeting of the Chamber on March 23rd when unequivocal questions were put by the Right opposition parties regarding the correctness of the rumours regarding the supply of arms to Red Spain, and he had to reply by silence. As late as May 20th the correspondents of the "Times" at Hendaye and Paris reported the constant stream of war material and of volunteers to Catalonia, though not from France itself but from other countries. About the same time it became known from reports from London that the British Government had requested its Ambassador in Paris to make "friendly representations" at the Quai d'Orsay in order to draw the French Government's attention to the supply of arms to the Valencia Government. But all this did not prevent the Red Spanish Foreign Minister, del Vayo, from stating at the May session of the Council of the League of Nations that only 6000 volunteers were fighting on the side of the Government troops as against over 100,000 on the side of Franco. At the meeting of the Non-Intervention Committee on May 31st the Soviet Russian representative, Kagan, in refusing to contribute to the cost of transport of the troops to be withdrawn, gave as his reason that there were no Russian volunteers at all in Spain.

While del Vayo made these statements in the Council Hall of the League of Nations, they were denied outside in the corridors by his own delegates who, as the "Times" correspondent reported, spoke quite openly of the constant support received by Barcelona on all sides.

Blum attacked in the most violent manner the Daladier Government that succeeded him in articles in the "Populaire" for its decision to regard the "transit traffic in arms, ammunition and other war material" as contrary to the principles of the non-intervention policy, which he said, was responsible for "the downfall of Republican Spain", and thus proved the extent to which the previous attitude of France had been determined and influenced by consideration for Marxist tendencies, the threats of the communists and the pressure of the Red trades unions. It is only to be hoped that the Daladier Government will be able successfully to oppose these machinations in its own country and the cross-fire from Moscow, and will ultimately be able to escape from this defile of the Pyrenees which has proved so disastrous for the non-intervention policy.

After long negotiations and diplomatic efforts, which were mainly concerned with overcoming the Soviet Russian resistance, the plan for more effective control in Spain was unanimously adopted. It would be wrong to deny the difficulties, especially in the "combing out" of the Red volunteers, that "army of Babel" as it is called by "Figaro", the members of which have in many cases become Spanish "citizens", and in providing security that those who are withdrawn do not return in some other way to the field of action. The pedantic withdrawal calendar makes an almost grotesque effect in its object of regulating the further course of a war that has continued for two years and proved to be rich in political and military surprises and improvisations. This withdrawal is to be completed in 164 days. But on the 56th day after this complicated withdrawal machinery has been put into action, the most important stage will be reached, namely the recognition of belligerent rights. For it is only by this means that all the dangers of undesirable incidents can be removed and that the fence round Spain can be drawn tighter on land and at sea. It is only then that the principles of general international law will apply to the war. Then Franco will not be a "rebel" but a "legitimised belligerent", and this will give him greater freedom of action, especially at sea, in the control of the merchant ships in the service of Red Spain. The plan should therefore be received with optimism and reserve.

Germany and Italy have now—it is true after two years—received the satisfaction that finally, after the abortive attempts with the drafts of July 14th and November 4th, 1937, the most essential means of checking the Spanish conflict, i.e. the withdrawal of the volunteers and the granting of belligerent rights, is being seriously tackled. Under Soviet Russian obstruction and French intervention in the name of non-intervention, the crisis has for two years been moving in a vicious circle. It must be admitted that British policy and the record patience shown by Lord Plymouth, the Chairman of the Committee, in 96 meetings of the sub-committee and 30 meetings of the main committee, have succeeded in overcoming every critical position. They always found a proposal which led out of the blind alley and enabled a fresh start to be made. Though this saved Europe from a breach, it was impossible to conceal the dark sides of these tactical moves: a solution of the Spanish question was not found. On the contrary the atmosphere over the western Mediterranean became constantly darker and more threatening, and torpedoes and bombing aeroplanes created the most serious incidents which again form a danger for the execution of the agreement, as they supply water to the mills of the opposition quarters in London and Paris in their propaganda against the Governments of Chamberlain and Daladier.

ROUND THE CIVIL WAR IN SPAIN

Submarine Piracy and the Nyon Alarm

When in the middle of September last year England and France and seven riparian States of the Mediterranean and Black Sea met in the small town on the shores of Lake Geneva and agreed on a Supervision Agreement, the object was to protect merchant shipping in the Mediterranean by means of intimidation against further mysterious attacks by unknown submarines. The means of intimidation was that 60 British and French destroyers and a large number of aeroplanes were ordered to the Mediterranean with instructions to fire at and to attempt to sink any submarine caught in the act of attacking a non-Spanish merchant ship. The establishment of this vast system of protection in the Mediterranean was combined with a demonstration of Franco-British naval co-operation, of which French and British newspapers wrote at the time that it was closer than the co-operation of the two navies during the War. On September 30th Italy, which had refused to take part in the Nyon Conference on account of Soviet Russian attacks and calumnies, acceded to the agreement by means of a special arrangement in Paris and was allotted a definite supervision zone the size of which was in accordance with her claim to equality of rights with the other two Powers. This intimidating action had the effect of pacifying the Mediterranean, for there were no further attacks on merchant ships. For this reason the number of supervision vessels was reduced at the end of 1937, though the main reason was no doubt the high cost.

At the beginning of 1938 this position suddenly changed and the torpedoing of merchant ships again began to increase. After a Dutch and an Irish steamer had met with this fate one after another in the middle of January, the British s.s. "Endymion" was sunk on January 31st 16 miles south of Cartagena and therefore outside territorial waters, and eleven persons, including the Swedish control official, lost their lives. This led on February 2nd to an excited debate in the House of Commons in which Mr. Eden stated that a meeting would take place on the same day between the three control Powers, the United Kingdom, France and Italy, in order not only to bring the control up to the level of October 1937 but also to strengthen it. This was done and this meeting decided to word still more strongly the firing orders issued to the Mediterranean police. In future the submarines were to be attacked and, if possible, destroyed if they came under suspicion through sailing under-water outside the territorial limit. It was not necessary for a submarine to have attacked a merchant ship, but it was sufficient that it should be travelling under-water in order to be attacked by the control ships. The intimidating action of Nyon thus assumed a more dangerous form as a result of this new measure. The immediate acquiescence of Italy proved the groundlessness of the rumours spread by Valencia and Moscow that the submarines in question were Italian. The identity of the submarines has, however, never been established.

Air War and Air Bombardment

But suddenly another weapon became more active and came into the bright light of public opinion, especially in Anglo-Saxon countries. We speak deliberately in saying that this was sudden and that it affected Anglo-Saxon public opinion in particular. It was to be foreseen that, the nearer the decision came, General Franco would make use of the weapon which in case of war every Government and every military authority would use in order to overcome the resistance of the enemy, namely blockade and air bombardment, with a view to preventing the supply of foodstuffs and war material and destroying important military objectives and arrangements behind the lines of the opponent. This was the case in the Great War and will presumably again be the case in a future war if victory or defeat is at stake. We know how inhumanly the German nation was blockaded in the last war under the leadership of the present apostle of peace, Lord Robert Cecil, while the French air attack on the open town of Karlsruhe was recently again sadly called to mind on the twentieth anniversary of this event. We will not stir up old wounds. It is a matter for deep regret if war measures with comprehensible aims cause suffering to innocent people, as was the case with the bombardment of Barcelona on January 30th, 1938. But, in the face of the natural indignation of the British, we should like to ask the question: Who began these bombardments? Was it not Red aeroplanes which on July 20th, 1936 rained their murderous bombs on Larache and Tetuan? As the British Member of Parliament, Sir Henry Page-Croft, wrote in the "Times" on February 4th, was it not Red aeroplanes which between July 18th and September 23rd, 1937 bombarded open towns such as Lerida, Granada, Cordova, Seville, Malaga, Segovia, Toledo, Avila, Saragossa, Teruel, Huesca, Jaca, Mocril, Valladolid and others no less than 57 times, at a time when Franco did not possess sufficient aircraft? Where was the indignation then of the Labour Party and the Liberals who at present attack Chamberlain, not so much for moral as for electioneering reasons? The Red Spanish Government itself admitted these bombardments when, at the beginning of February 1938, in view of the French and British efforts to put a stop to the bombardment of open towns, it announced that during the negotiations the air forces of the Republic would restrict itself to flights in connection with the land forces and that such flights would only be used for reconnaissance behind the lines.

There is a further point. When we read that the British Trades Unions addressed a letter to Mr. Chamberlain expressing the abhorrence of the labour movement for the dreadful massacre of men, women and children in the Spanish towns, or that the labour group of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office at Geneva, at its 82nd session, made a protest expressing its profound indignation at the bombardments, we cannot recall that the same quarters and their press organs raised any objections when hundreds of thousands of civilians in Red Spanish territory outside the war zone lost their lives, not by warlike action but as the victims of sheer thirst for blood. The very people who are at present agitating for the abolition of bombardments found no cause to protest or to express their abhorrence at the deliberate horrors of Red civil warfare, but rather announced loudly their sympathy for the perpetrators, which was naturally not calculated to deter them from their barbarous practices.

In view of these facts it is a mockery for the Red Spanish Government to protest in diplomatic Notes against the bombardments and to state, as in the Note of May 28th, 1938, that it has done everything to humanise the war.

* * *

The bombardment of the British s.s. "Alcira" on February 4th, 18 miles from Barcelona and therefore outside Spanish territorial waters, together with the bombardment of Barcelona on January 30th, brought up the entire problem of the air arm, its prohibition or restriction, and the humanisation of the war. On February 1st the French Prime Minister, M. Chautemps, spoke to the press against the bombardment of Barcelona and said it was the urgent duty of the Governments to do everything to bring about an international settlement regarding the use of the air arm. On February 2nd Mr. Eden took advantage of this appeal in order to state that the British Government had for months past requested the competent organs to examine the question, and he also referred to Adolf Hitler's proposals. He defended the British Government against the charges made on the grounds that it had prevented an international settlement being reached at the Disarmament Conference through the fact that it demanded the permission to throw bombs from the air in outlying regions. Mr. Eden denied that this demand, whether it was wise or not, had prevented a settlement, and the "Times" supported this view in a leading article on February 4th, though it had to admit that the British attitude in this question had thereby been weakened.

After the bombardment of the "Alcira", the British Government sent a serious admonition to Franco through its Commercial Agent in Burgos, Sir Robert Hodgson, to the effect that its patience was not inexhaustible and that, if such cases were repeated, it would not merely protest and demand compensation but would exercise adequate reprisals. To this Salamanca replied that in the first place there were no proofs that the torpedoes had been launched by the National Spanish side and that in the second place all these incidents were caused by the fact that, after two years of warfare, belligerent rights had still not been accorded to the two parties and that, in the third place, the holy war of Nationalist Spain should not be confused with a colonial war.

The bombardments of ports, it continued, were moreover intended to prevent the trade in arms, ammunition and explosives and war material of all kinds, both in loading places and factories, whether on lighters or ships, without distinction of the national flag, since aeroplanes were unable to make such a distinction. Ships which did not carry contraband and deliberately entered such zones exposed themselves of their own free will to the results of their own temerity, and the attacks to which they were subject were not directed against them but against the objectives situated in enemy ports at which they called.

In reply to the constant attacks of the opposition in the House of Commons, the "Times" of May 3rd published an interesting and illuminating article by its correspondent in Riga regarding the world revolutionary aims of the Komintern, especially in Spain, and made the following comment in a leading article:

"The fighting in Spain has not been, as both Labour and Liberal speakers seem to believe, a revolt against an established Government which was actually governing the country, but a civil war resulting from the inability of the Government nominally in power to enforce respect for the law among its own followers. This inability was in large part caused by agitation fomented and directed from Moscow. Italy and Germany have not been the only countries to intervene in Spain. It is disputable even if they were the first." Opposition speakers ignore this fact.

The French newspaper "Figaro" of the 19th—more or less as a reply to the attacks made on England and France in the League Council at Geneva on May 18th by the Red Spanish Foreign Minister, del Vayo, to the effect that they were "deliberately hindering the Spanish nation in its struggle for freedom and delivering it up with bound hands to the aggressor"—wrote even more clearly:

"It is foolish to make the imputation that the sympathies of France go out to a Government of Valencia or Barcelona because it represents the Republic and democracy in its struggle against the rebels. It cannot be too often repeated that there is neither a republic nor a democracy in the Red zone, but a rule of tyrannical and anarchist organs which are tearing at each other's throats and which have as little regard for the human personality as for freedom. It is scandalous that republicans and democrats who swear by their principles do not hesitate to expose those principles in this dreadful masquerade. The only excuse for most of them is that they are unaware of the truth. Those who know the truth and do not speak it are nothing more than deceivers."

On May 31st and June 4th, in view of the bombardment of Alicante and the sinking of the s.s. "Thorpehall", further questions were asked in the House of Commons. Mr. Chamberlain again referred to the draft international agreement under preparation, which, he said, must be in such a form that all Governments could accept it. Mr. Butler, Under-Secretary of State, reported on the Government's intention to enter into communication with the Norwegian, Swedish and American Governments with a view to setting up a small Commission which—naturally with the agreement with Valencia and Burgos—would examine the military necessities and the damage done by the bombardments on the spot. In addition the establishment of so-called security zones would be considered. For the first time the Members of Parliament, Sir Arnold Wilson and Sir Henry Page-Croft, referred to the illegal activity of certain torpedoed merchant ships.

On June 28th the "Times" wrote on this subject as follows:

"The facts of the trade with Spain are pretty well known. The bait of profits multiplied manifold above the normal draws an ever-increasing number of British merchantmen to the coasts of Spain. When they proceed within the limit of territorial waters they pass into the war area; and there they risk destruction. They carry the Union Jack because it is usual for ships to fly their national colours. Some of the ships belong to companies which have a long and honourable record of business with the Iberian Peninsula; but many others have been drawn into the trade by the unusual profits, and are neither British ships nor manned by British crews. They have simply taken advantage of the easy conditions allowed by the Board of Trade for obtaining registry as a British vessel and the consequent right of flying a Red Ensign. It is rather ridiculous to suppose that every foreign adventurer who forms a company having its "principal place of business" somewhere in His Majesty's dominions shall enjoy at once the full rights of British citizenship in regard to his maritime property—including the right to involve us in difficulties with a foreign State. Some of the ships so employed are known to be uninsurable and fit only for the scrap-heap. If individuals care to indulge their taste for adventure and their love of gain to this extent, they must really be prepared to take their chance as to success and even survival—and to give them their due most of them are perfectly prepared to do so—and accept the British Government's ruling that they will be protected on the high seas but not when they have entered the maritime area of Spain.

By a curious paradox it is the very efficacy of the protection of the British Navy which has produced so many British victims, by drawing an abnormally large proportion of British or pseudo-British ships into the Spanish trade. There is an impression in the mind of the public that General Franco—or rather the air commands co-operating with the General—discriminates against British vessels and makes a point of sinking them rather than others. That is certainly not the case. In fact General Franco's warships have driven the vessels of some other nations off the Spanish seas, and the profitable market is now open only to those ships which are so well protected all the way to Spanish territorial waters. Hence the general eagerness to possess one. It may be hoped that the Government will pursue their plan of trying to arrange for a neutralised port to which bona-fide merchantmen can deliver non-contraband cargoes without fear of molestation. An entirely legitimate trade is of course still being conducted all the time with both sides in Spain; and it is the manifest duty of the Government to protect it and further it by all practicable means in the present complicated circumstances. But the difficulty here is that General Franco, not possessing belligerent rights, cannot lawfully prescribe the definition of contraband; and the Non-Intervention Committee's definition does not include motor-lorries or, of course, foodstuffs and other commodities which are essentials of war."

The circumstances and motives under which some of the British ships reached Red Spanish ports can therefore scarcely be judged according to moral points of view. At the present time other serious British newspapers also recognise the necessity for distinguishing between genuine British ships with cargoes, the admissibility of which is under control, and ships which, rightly or wrongly, merely sail under the British flag, while their owners and most of the members of the crew are not British, and which constantly carry war material to Red Spain and thus take direct part in the war. The Nationalist Spanish Government has, however, a justified interest in preventing such supplies of war material from abroad, and it would be wrong to demand that, in the interest of a few shipowners, it should renounce the measures which would appear to it to ensure a speedy end to the civil war. Those Members of Parliament who plead for increased imports of arms to Red Spain carry their pretensions somewhat too far when, in addition to refusing the granting of belligerent rights which would make the imports more difficult, they also desire to make it impossible to prevent these imports by the only other means available, namely the use of the air force.

On June 10th the "Times" expressed its fundamental attitude to the entire question in the following words:

"It is intolerable that men who are themselves performing international duties in favour of fair play between the conflicting Spanish parties should be slaughtered by the agents of one of those parties, and the destruction of merchant vessels from the air is of course entirely against the canons of international law. The Nyon Agreement of 1937 specifically confirmed the application to aircraft of the rules of warfare which govern—or should govern—the action of submarines. An attacking warship is bound to give warning to a merchant vessel and to provide for the safety of her crew. But the warship—or aeroplane—is not supposed to attack except in case of resistance. The merchant ship is liable to arrest and to search, but not to attack unless she shows fight. That is a simple statement of the legal position, but the application of the accepted code to the circumstances of the Spanish civil war is very far from simple. The Nyon system of control, which is of course still in operation, was set up to combat the practice, which had grown to alarming proportions, of sinking merchant vessels on the high seas, and particularly on the trade routes of the Mediterranean. Although action within territorial waters was not in every case excluded, such action was in general left to the nation in whose waters the act of piracy had to be resisted; and the States which signed the Nyon Agreement did not include Spain. The Spanish Republican Government, it is true, invited the Nyon Powers to enter Spanish waters in their task of countering piratical attacks. But the fact remains that the main purpose of the Nyon Agreement was to ward off aerial attacks on non-Spanish merchant ships on the high seas—a purpose which it has admirably fulfilled.

The incidents that now create so much ill-feeling occur within Spanish territorial waters, which is to say within the war area; and they are therefore in a somewhat different category. Ships pursuing their lawful occasions on the high seas must by all manner of means be protected from attack, and the attackers be threatened with reprisals. But if merchantmen enter the war zone they do so at their own risk. It has indeed repeatedly been stated by the British Government that they were prepared to protect British shipping from unlawful interference up to the margin of territorial waters; but beyond that they must proceed at their own risk, and the merchant captains have been strongly advised not to proceed. It has also to be remembered that some of the ships that have got into trouble lately are chartered by the Spanish Government for long periods and act under the orders of their temporary masters. In many cases owners and crews are making extra money on account of the risks they run. There is the further point that, although the Carriage of Munitions to Spain Act prohibits cargoes of war material from being carried to Spain in British ships, food, fuel and lorries are not included in the list of contraband. They are nevertheless as vital to the combatants as shells or guns.

All this is not to say that the sinking of merchant vessels at sight should be allowed. But totalitarian and aerial methods of warfare have quite outstripped the conventions which used to protect civilians and merchant seamen. The civil population seems likely to be as much the target of destructive missiles as the combatants themselves, unless new conventions can be devised and upheld."

In view of this position, which had no analogy with the sinking of ships by unknown submarines, but which involved regular warlike action on the part of the Nationalist Spanish air force, the idea of a Nyon air agreement, in which France, England and Italy would ensure the freedom of the air by means of air patrols in the same manner as they had ensured the freedom of the seas in the summer of 1937, was soon dropped after it had formed the subject of political discussions for a few days.

It was clearly disclosed by subsequent letters to the "Times" that such assistance to British ships or ships sailing under the British flag was not an altruistic or ideal question but a matter of very materialistic and profiteering interests. Admiral Keyes, in one of such letters to the "Times" on June 30th, referred to the entire procedure as a "prostitution of the British flag, which had hitherto been esteemed and respected on all seas". The former French Prime Minister, M. Flandin, also severely criticised the entire procedure in his speech before the "Alliance Démocratique" at Vienna on June 12th. He said:

"The Spanish war is the most serious menace to peace and to French security. It is incredible that a minority of the nation more or less inspired by Moscow should cause constant danger to the obvious detriment of France. As Wladimir d'Ormesson has already pointed out, official France is not neutral but shows inexhaustible sympathies for the Reds and hostility for the Nationalists.

"The successive Governments of the Popular Front have constantly tolerated a considerable transit of war material to Barcelona and Valencia. Scandalous fortunes, to which the war profit tax ought to be applied, have been built up and continue to be built up with these instruments of death. It is a mockery to be indignant about the bombardment of pseudo-merchant ships which would not call at Spanish ports except to transport suspicious cargoes. We demand that a stop should finally be put to this policy, which not only prolongs the war but also prevents us from co-operating with Italy in the détente in the Mediterranean and Central Europe, which encourages and favours war-mongers of all kinds and will to-morrow bring us up against serious difficulties in Spain, where we have so many interests to represent by our trade and our supplies of raw materials."

In the House of Commons on June 14th, 21st and 23rd, Mr. Chamberlain again explained the difficulties of the whole position. He stated in the first place that, in reply to the British representations of May 31st, General Franco had on June 5th expressed his regret. The National Spanish airmen had not had British ships especially in view but all ships lying close to military objectives. That most of the ships were British was due to the fact that many ships of other nationalities misused the British flag or had only recently been entered in the British register of shipping in order to enjoy the protection of Great Britain. The National Spanish Government, the reply continued, could not renounce the use of the air arm since the prolongation of the war was also due to the import of war material by British and other ships. Franco had however made two suggestions in order to avoid the bombardment of ships with permitted cargoes: in the first place the formation of security zones for shipping in certain ports, and in the second place the choice of one or more so-called neutral ports outside the war zone for British ships which would naturally not have to carry war material and must therefore be under the supervision of an international control officer. Apart from the consideration of these proposals, the execution of which was not without difficulty, the examination of the entire position in other respects had shown that real protection could not be afforded to the ships in the war zone except by the active participation of England in the hostilities. But this would imply intervention in the civil war and its extension beyond the Spanish frontiers, which the Government must reject as incompatible with the principles of non-intervention. The Government therefore repeated the warnings given to ships on November 28th and 29th, 1937 to avoid the three-mile limit, as they could not expect any protection by the Government against bombardments and torpedoes within that limit.

"The fact was that there was no international code of law with respect to aerial warfare which was the subject of general agreement. There were certain rules of international law which had been established for sea and land warfare. Those rules, or the principles which underlay them, were applicable to aerial warfare and were not only admitted but insisted upon by this Government. But they did not entirely meet the case which we had to meet to-day. Mr. Noel Baker had skated very lightly over the difficulties, which were extremely formidable and for which no complete solution had yet been found. He (Mr. Chamberlain) was asked a question a little time ago on that subject, whether the Government was taking any steps to concert, with other countries, some international understanding as to the rules of aerial warfare. Some impatience was displayed on benches opposite because the Government had not yet taken such a step, but he explained then, and he repeated now, that it was no use throwing out a general invitation to other people to come and talk about it unless the Government could put before them something concrete and practical which could form the subject of discussion.

The British Government were engaged on a careful survey of the position with a view to trying to formulate a practical scheme which they could put before other countries for their acceptance or modification.

I think we may say that there are at any rate three rules of international law or three principles of international law which are as applicable to warfare from the air as they are to war by sea or land.

In the first place, it is against international law to bomb civilians as such, to make deliberate attacks upon civilian populations. That is undoubtedly a violation of international law. In the second place, targets which are aimed at from the air must be legitimate military objectives and they must be capable of identification. In the third place, reasonable care must be taken in attacking these military objectives so that by carelessness civilian populations in the neighbourhood are not bombed. Those are three general rules which we can all accept, and which we do accept, but it is quite obvious that when you come to put them into practice they do give rise to very considerable difficulties.

We can all strongly condemn any declaration on the part of anybody, wherever it may be made, or on whatever side it may be made, that it should be part of a deliberate policy to try to win a war by the demoralisation of the civilian population through the process of bombing from the air. That is absolutely contrary to international law, and I would add that, in my opinion, if any such policy is followed, it is a mistaken policy from the point of view of those who adopt it, for I do not believe that deliberate attacks upon a civilian population will ever win a war for those who make them.

The difficulty arises when one of the forces engaged in aerial warfare, being accused of deliberate bombing of civilians, denies, not that civilians are being bombed, but that the bombing was deliberate and alleges that they were in pursuit of military objectives. What is a military objective? Surely these are not matters which can be passed over as if they were of no importance. Suppose a church is used as the headquarters of a division. Is that a military objective or is it not?

Mr. S. O. Davies (Merthyr, Lab.). — It depends upon what side it is on.

Mr. Chamberlain. — That shows the attitude of mind with which Hon. Members approach this question. If we are to have international agreement we must not approach it from the point of view of whether our sympathies are on one side or another; we have to adopt a rather more detached spirit than that. We must try to lay down rules which will be accepted by all sides and will be carried out in practice.

When I say that reasonable care must be taken in attacking military objectives not to go outside of those objectives, it is extremely difficult in practice to determine whether in fact the dropping of bombs which have killed civilians in the neighbourhood of military objectives is the result of want of care or not. Suppose a man makes a bad shot, which is not at all unlikely with machines going at over 300 miles an hour and when, as I am informed, in taking aim you have to release the bomb miles away from its objective, it seems to me that it is extremely difficult to lay down exactly the point at which reasonable care turns into unreasonable want of care. Difficulties of this kind are great enough to baffle us in finding any easy solution, and I do not think we shall serve any useful purpose by shutting our eyes to that fact and attempting to lay down rules which do not provide for the difficulties which certainly arise in practice.

In making any proposition of the kind we have first of all to satisfy ourselves that we have obtained some practical solution of the question, and when we have done that our difficulties are not at an end, because we still have to obtain the agreement of others. Anybody who recollects what enormous difficulty there was in obtaining international agreement when the provisions for disarmament were discussed at Geneva will realise that we are by no means out of the wood when we ourselves think we have found what seems to be a satisfactory code of rules. Agreement upon matters of this kind depends very largely not only upon the reasonableness of the proposition that is put forward, but also upon the general international atmosphere which prevails at the time, and it is therefore one of the objects of his Majesty's Government so to improve that general international atmosphere that we may have a better chance of obtaining agreement as to the way in which aerial warfare should be regulated."

* * *

This firm attitude on the part of Mr. Chamberlain brought to naught all the attempts of the Opposition to launch any action against Franco, such as the seizure of National Spanish ships in British ports, the arming of merchant ships with anti-aircraft guns, the sinking of National Spanish ships as a reprisal for the sinking of British steamers, the bombardment of Palmas, the blockade of Mallorca, the recall of Sir Robert Hodgson, British agent at Burgos, and the handing of passports to the Duke of Alba, National Spanish agent in London, etc. Lloyd George finally demanded the bombardment of the alleged Italian airports on the island of Mallorca (the larger Balearic island occupied by the National Spanish Government), to which Chamberlain replied that, in spite of his 76 years, he might again hurl the country into war.

In this connection it is not superfluous to point out that, after the torpedoing of the armoured vessel "Deutschland" on control duty when many sailors were killed and wounded, when Germany fired on the fortress of Almeria, the very people who at that time criticised this reprisal in the strongest terms are at present, when it is a question of British or Red Spanish interests, demanding much more effective and extensive reprisals without any detailed investigation into the circumstances.

On June 16th the Government was again attacked in the House of Commons for its attitude in the negotiations in the Disarmament Commission in respect of the abolition of the air arm. Mr. Chamberlain stated in the first place that the demand at that time was for the maintenance of the air arm for police purposes in outlying regions and not for attacks on the civil population. The bombardment of tribes in revolt would be restricted to their habitations, while a warning of 24 hours would be given so that the families could remove to a safe place. Even in the case of war operations these warnings would be given before the start of operations, so that the non-combatants could withdraw. The "Times" endeavoured in a lengthy but not very convincing article to support Mr. Chamberlain's statements, but had to admit the possibility of difficulties since France and Italy might claim an equal right to maintain bombing squadrons for police purposes in North Africa, which could easily be transferred to Europe across the Mediterranean. Mr. Chamberlain then stated expressly that the Government was prepared to renounce the maintenance of such bombing squadrons if they were an obstacle to a general settlement.

* * *

The culminating point in this bombardment debate was reached when the Red Spanish Government stated through its representatives in London and Paris that it would have to take to reprisals if the attacks did not cease and if the commission of inquiry proposed by the British Government did not soon begin its work. These measures would not, however, be directed so much against the places occupied by the Nationalists but, in view of the foreign intervention, against more distant objectives, i.e. principally against Italian towns. Rome promptly replied that, in this case, it would not reply with paper protests but with guns. Moscow, which presumably stood behind these new tactics of despair on the part of Valencia, would then have reached its aim of hurling Europe into the whirlpool of the Spanish civil war. Under pressure from London and Paris, for whom this challenge of a general war went too far, Valencia promptly withdrew and issued a démenti. What had been intended, they said, was not Italian towns but the Italian air base on Mallorca.

* * *

Mr. Chamberlain's efforts to set up a Commission of inquiry for controlling the bombardment of "open" towns, failed in the first place on account of the refusal of Washington. The Dutch Government, to which London then applied, made its acceptance dependent on certain conditions and when the Norwegian and Swedish Governments also raised objections, the British Prime Minister dropped his original plan.

"The House will be aware", declared Mr. Chamberlain on July 13th in the House of Commons, "that during the last few weeks his Majesty's Government have been endeavouring to form an International Commission which would be prepared to proceed to the scene of an aerial bombardment in Spain and report on the facts, at the request of the competent Spanish authorities concerned. I regret to say that it has, for various reasons, been found impossible to arrange the formation of such a Commission on an international basis. His Majesty's Government propose, therefore, in the hope that that may be acceptable to the two parties in Spain, to dispatch to France a Commission consisting of two British nationals for the purpose in view at as early a date as possible. They will only proceed on the initiative of one or other of the parties in Spain."

On July 26th, he made the following statement on the bombing of ships:

"We sent a communication to the authorities of Burgos proposing that an immediate investigation should be made into certain cases to which we had already drawn their attention and in which it appeared to us that the attack had been in fact a deliberate one. We proposed that this investigation should be carried out by two naval officers, one appointed by his Majesty's Government and the other by the Burgos authorities. If they agreed that the attack was deliberate then the Burgos authorities should make the necessary arrangements to pay immediate compensation to those concerned. If, on the other hand, the two officers were unable to agree, then our proposal was that the matter should be referred to a third party, not of British or Spanish nationality, but who should be agreed upon between the Burgos authorities and ourselves, and that he should make the final decision.

We have now received a reply from the Burgos authorities in which they said in pursuance of their desire to meet the wishes of his Majesty's Government they accept this formula and they agree that the investigation we propose should be carried out. We are now considering whether it would not be advisable to send Sir Robert Hodgson back to Spain with instructions which would cover, among other things, the detailed working out of this proposal."

* * *

Mr. Chamberlain spoke as follows on the position in Spain in his speech at Kettering on July 2nd:

"Ever since the beginning of the war in Spain my colleagues and I realised the inherent danger in the situation, that it might lead to war in Europe; and it was because of that consideration that, in conjunction with the Government of France, we decided very early upon a policy of non-intervention with the express purpose of confining the civil war to Spain and preventing it from becoming a general conflagration. We have had endless difficulties in that policy, but in spite of them all, in spite of the sneers and the jeers of the Opposition, we have succeeded in our main objects. We have kept other countries out of the war, and to-day, at long last, the British plan for the withdrawal of foreign volunteers from Spain has been accepted and we are hopeful that it will not now be long before they leave that country to Spaniards.

The situation has been complicated by the bombing by General Franco's aeroplanes of British ships entering the zone of hostilities in Spanish ports, and the Government have been fiercely denounced by those great patriots who sit opposite to us in the House of Commons for allowing the British flag to be insulted, and particularly for allowing British property to be destroyed. There is nothing like your Socialists for standing up for British property. Well now, a long time ago we gave a warning to British shipowners that, while we were intending to give them full protection so long as their ships were on the high seas, we could not undertake to protect them after they had entered territorial waters in the zone of fighting, and we said that because, after very carefully examining all the possible means of giving them protection, we were satisfied that we could not do so without at any rate a very considerable risk of being ourselves involved in the war.

Well now, the risks which are run by these ships literally mean that the rate of freight which has to be paid is very high, and shipowners are getting as much as four and five times the ordinary rates of freight for voyages to these ports. We have given this warning. If, in spite of it and for the sake of making these profits, these shipowners still send their ships to these waters and then get bombed, is it reasonable that we should be asked to take action which might presently involve not only them but you in the horrors of war which I have been trying to describe, and you are not getting any profits at all?

I should consider that if we were to listen to demands of that kind were we should be betraying our trust to the people of this country. That does not mean that we condone bombing of ships from the air, or that we recognise an aerial blockade of ports. We have on numerous occasions made protests to General Franco about particular incidents and he has in reply given us the most emphatic assurances that it is not, and never has been, the intention of his Government to single out British ships for deliberate attacks, and if some of them have been struck—so he tells us—that is just because it is extremely difficult to ensure that a bomb dropped from a high-flying aeroplane will only hit the objective at which it is aimed and might sometimes hit other things, like ships which may be in the immediate neighbourhood.

I find it a little difficult to reconcile that explanation with some of the facts which are known to us, but perhaps, after all, Franco's airmen do not always rigidly adhere to their instructions. However that may be, it remains true that as long as this war goes on and British ships are carrying cargoes into the ports of the Spanish Government, so long the danger of incidents of this kind will remain. Much the best solution would be the cessation of hostilities altogether, and if at any time we can see any prospect of offering our services to bring that about with a reasonable chance of success, you may be sure we shall not let that opportunity pass by us."

Amplifying his statements in the House on July 26th, he said:

"There is no need for any appeal to be made to this government to take advantage of any opportunity which may occur for mediation, an armistice of anything that would bring to a close military operations which I think must shock us daily. But in all these cases there are moments when it is not only futile but may indeed be mischievous for third parties to try to intervene. I hope the House will believe that we do not intervene at this particular moment it is only because we are convinced that the moment has not come when we can intervene with success."

In these endeavours to find ways and means of settling the problem of aerial warfare and air bombardment, not only in view of the present Spanish conflict but in a general manner by means of an international agreement, it must be pointed out that even at the Disarmament Conference proposals were made by Germany in this direction. These proposals, which were at the time not taken seriously by the other Great Powers, since Germany had no air arm, were again brought forward in concrete form in point 9 of the attitude of the German Government as expressed in the speech by the Führer and Chancellor in the Reichstag on May 21st, 1935. At that time, it is true, the German air force was still under construction and was of very modest dimensions compared with the forces of the other Powers, and this was again the reason why these proposals were so lightly ignored. The entire problem would have been easier to-day and the innocent civil population would have been relieved in the Spanish war from the dreadful strain of the bombardments, if those proposals had at any rate been taken at that time as a basis for further negotiations. The detailed proposals were as follows:

"The German Government is ready to take an active part in all efforts which are capable of leading to practical limitations of unrestricted armaments. It believes the only possible line of approach to this objective under existing circumstances is to be found in a reversion to the ideas of the former Red Cross Convention of Geneva. The German Government considers that for the present the only possible progress that can be made is along the lines of gradual abolition and outlawry of implements and forms of war which are essentially incompatible with the Geneva Convention already in existence.

The German Government believes in this connection that, just as the use of Dum-dum bullets was formerly prohibited and thereby—generally speaking—eliminated in practice, so the use of other specific weapons can be prohibited and in practice eliminated. The weapons which the German Government has in mind are all such as serve primarily to bring death and destruction, not to combatants, but to non-combatant women and children. The German Government thinks it is a mistaken and impracticable policy to abolish aircraft while at the same time allowing bombing from the air. It sees however a possibility of banning the use of certain weapons between nations as a breach of international law, and outlawing nations which nevertheless make use of such weapons as outside humanity and all human right and law. Here again the German Government feels that progress step by step is most likely to prove successful, and suggests accordingly the prohibition of the discharge of gas, incendiary or explosive bombs outside actual areas of combat. Progress can be made with such a prohibition pending the complete international outlawry of bombing altogether. So long however as bombing is allowed, any limitation of the number of bombing aircraft is of questionable value owing to the possibilities of rapid replacement.

If on the other hand bombing as such is branded as a barbarity inconsistent with the law of nations, the construction of bombing aircraft will soon come to an end of itself as useless and superfluous. It was found possible in the past by the Geneva Red Cross Convention gradually to make an end of the practice of killing defenceless wounded and prisoners. It should be equally possible in the present by a similar Convention to prohibit, and eventually to stop altogether, the making of war by bombing on the equally defenceless civilian populations.

Germany believes that fundamental treatment of this problem along these lines would do more for peace and security than any Pacts of Assistance or Military Conventions."

The Anglo-Italian Agreement of April 16th, 1938¹

As has been already pointed out, the factors which helped to make the international fronts increasingly clear-cut on the Spanish question were, from the outset, not only the sentimental and ideological antitheses, but also political and strategical considerations, which attained more and more prominence as the war went on. The Spanish question, which for geographical reasons alone constitutes a Mediterranean question, influenced ever more strongly and unmistakably the Mediterranean problems and with them the relations between the Great Powers concerned—on the one hand Italy and on the other hand France and England, and it became increasingly obvious that these Mediterranean problems with their influence on the Mediterranean policy of these Powers could not be solved before the termination of the Spanish crisis.

This fact had the most fatal influence on the Anglo-Italian Agreement of April 16th, 1938, whereby a compromise had been found in the matter of the Mediterranean interests of the two Powers after years of sharp conflict between them. This Agreement was welcomed at the time by every friend of peace and was founded in the main on the hope entertained by both Powers for an early victory for Franco. This hope was not fulfilled and the Agreement is now running the risk of remaining a dead letter, as did the "Gentlemen's Agreement" of January 2nd, 1937, for, though it does not require any special ratification, it can only come into force at a date to be agreed upon by the two Governments. England laid down the condition that a "settlement of the Spanish question" must first be reached and the Prime Minister, Mr. Chamberlain, in his answers to questions in the House, took his stand upon this "prerequisite", without however saying what he understood by such a settlement.

In his last speech in the House on July 26th, he made the following statement on the present position in regard to the Agreement of April 16th:

"The agreement was to come into force upon a date to be determined by agreement between the two Governments, but on April 16th Lord Perth addressed a Note to the Italian Foreign Minister in which he reminded him that his Majesty's Government regarded the settlement of the Spanish question as a prerequisite of the entry into force of the agreement made between the two Governments. I should like to explain, because I am not sure that it is generally apprehended, why it was that we put in that stipulation.

We never regarded this agreement as simply a bilateral arrangement between Italy and ourselves. When we entered into negotiations we did so because we thought then and we are still of the same opinion that the restoration of the relations between Italy and this country to their old terms of friendship and confidence would bring us appreciably nearer to our ultimate aim, which is a general European appeasement. We felt at the time that the moral justification for our recognition of the Italian position in Ethiopia would be the knowledge that that recognition had brought with it a real contribution to the peace of Europe. We felt that while this conflict was going on in Spain under the sort of conditions in which it had been waged, the Spanish situation was a perpetual menace to the peace of Europe, and it was for that reason that we said that it must be removed from that category before our agreement was brought into force.

It is not our fault and it is not the fault of the Italian Government that that condition has not been brought about.

They have kept full faith with us in the reduction of their troops in Libya, in the cessation of anti-British propaganda, and in collaboration on the Non-Intervention Committee. We on our side have carried out our engagement to take steps at the Council of the League to clarify the position of Member States in regard to the Italian sovereignty over Ethiopia.

We cannot abandon the position we have taken up in regard to the settlement of the Spanish question, which we have over and over again declared to the House. But, on the other hand, we profoundly regret this unforeseen delay which has taken place in the completion of the agreement, and we shall do all that we possibly can to facilitate the withdrawal of the foreign volunteers from Spain in order that that country may cease to offer any threat to the peace of Europe.

Mr. Attlee (Limehouse, Lab.).—Do I gather from the right hon. gentleman's statement that what he means by a settlement in Spain is the volunteers withdrawal agreement? Hitherto we have not known what he meant by a settlement in Spain. Do I understand now that it is merely a question of volunteers being withdrawn?

Mr. Chamberlain.—I would like to see what happens when the volunteers are withdrawn. If his Majesty's Government think that Spain has ceased to be a menace to the peace of Europe, I think we shall regard that as a settlement of the Spanish question."

On July 27th, Lord Halifax, speaking in the House of Lords on the same subject, said:

"Let me say one word about Anglo-Italian relations, inasmuch as the Anglo-Italian agreement is closely linked with the Spanish problem. It has been a matter of great regret to his Majesty's Government that the pre-requisite governing the entry of that agreement into force still remains unfulfilled. It may be arguable that it was a fault in the agreement itself that its coming into force should be made dependent on circumstances over which neither Government prima facie could exercise full control. The fact, however, remains that this condition, which arose out of the fact that the agreement was designed as part of general world appeasement and is a matter on which his Majesty's Government have given definite pledges, is not one which his Majesty's Government can abandon.

I may point out that, so far as concerns the letters exchanged and the verbal understanding reached at the time of signature, we have carried out our written undertaking to take steps at the question of Italian sovereignty over Ethiopia. We, on the other hand, have welcomed the good faith of the Italian Government in reducing their garrison in Libya and in abstaining from propaganda. We have been gratified, too, by the collaboration of the Italian Government on the Non-Intervention Committee.

On the other hand, we have never concealed our regret that the signature of the Anglo-Italian agreement has not resulted in an improvement in Franco-Italian relations, for one of the principal objects of our own agreement was to recreate an atmosphere of international confidence in the Mediterranean, and until Franco-Italian relations are restored to cordiality that great purpose obviously cannot be wholly achieved.

It may be that there are powerful forces in the world which are unwilling to see the old friendship restored between this country and Italy. Mischievous suggestions have been made that the agreement is designed to loosen the Berlin-Rome axis. In other quarters it has been hinted that the real object of it is to try to drive a wedge between the French and British Governments. If I may speak quite plainly, a policy based upon the hope of driving a wedge between Berlin and Rome would, I think, be as futile as would that of attempting to divide Paris and London, and I find it very difficult indeed to believe that any serious or responsible-minded person to-day can think in terms of either of those irresponsible hypotheses.

But, if hostile forces are at work, it is of great importance that neither we nor the Italian Government should be diverted by them from our main object—the bringing into force of our new agreement. If either of us has doubts or difficulties we can at any time give full and frank expression to them through the normal channels which are available to us, and in international as well as private relations incalculable harm may be done by the unnatural suppression of suspicions or by reluctance to strain friendship by frank speech.

If a friendship is not capable of standing such a strain it is not worthy of the name of friendship, and if H.M. Government and the Italian Government are able, as we hope, to invoke this spirit of confident patience to bridge the period which must elapse before the agreement can come into full force I see no reason why such delay as may be inevitable should at all mar the understanding that it was the principal purpose of the agreement to restore."

On the other hand, the Italian Foreign Minister, Count Ciano, in his speech at the Milan Congress of the Institute for the Study of International Politics on June 2nd, 1938 made the following statement concerning the Agreement.

At the bottom of many international situations there is a problem of mutual knowledge, and it is impossible to do any lasting or fruitful work unless it is founded on consciousness of the new realities which history unceasingly creates in its course. The British Prime Minister gave proof of this consciousness in the courageous and frank speech he made in the House of Commons in introducing the Agreement concluded with Mussolini's Italy on April 16.

The words of the eminent statesman have had a profound echo among the Italian people as evidence of the motives which have inspired Mr. Chamberlain and his collaborator, Lord Halifax, in their work of clarification and conciliation. The Anglo-Italian Agreement has the merit of having cleared the ground of all the residue of the past and of having placed the relations between the two Empires on a basis of clarity and loyalty, which is the only basis on which understanding between nations can be stable and firm.

Nothing is more dangerous than to conclude agreements which conceal, under ephemeral compromises, ambiguities and mental reservations. It is not in the style of Fascist Italy to enter into political combinations of this kind. It is in nobody's interest to do so. Above all it is not in the interest of peace, which, if it is to be solid, cannot be founded on a fragile network of diplomatic bargaining, but demands the recognition of respective historical positions and a clear determination to respect them.

These are the elements which give strength and vitality to the Anglo-Italian Agreement, and which fix its significance as an effective contribution to the stability and pacification of Europe, which Italy desires and realistically pursues.

The Key to the Anglo-Italian Agreement lies then in the "settlement of the Spanish question": that is to say, from the Italian standpoint, in the recognition of the Italian Empire by England. Italy has already done a good deal to prepare the way for this compromise, as has been admitted by Chamberlain and Halifax, while England's contribution has been inconsiderable, for the British Government has not yet adopted the course which would logically follow from the step taken in Geneva at its instance, whereby freedom of action in the matter of the recognition of the Italian Empire was restored to the former "sanctionist" States, for which recognition Rome is waiting, quite apart from the fact that during the months which, in the most favourable case, the application of the new plan will take, the Spanish question will continue to be the object of further agitation by the Bolsheviks, Popular Front politicians and Anti-Fascists in France and England, for which the Agreement—elastic though it is—may not be sufficiently elastic to withstand. The speculations of these elements on Italy's difficulties in the matter of her food supply and the clear answer contained in Mussolini's speech delivered in the Pontine Marshes of Aprilia point only too clearly to the dangers inherent in these attempts to undermine the work achieved. It is therefore not to be wondered at that Italy should have approached the British Government, through her Foreign Minister, Count Ciano, by way of the British Ambassador in Rome, Lord Perth, with the request, conveyed on June 4th that it would consider hastening the putting into force of the Agreement, in order to prevent its psychological effects also from being entirely counteracted by further procrastination.

The "Times" of July 7th stated that the probability of the civil war lasting a long time might make it expedient for the British Government to modify its views in regard to the interpretation of the expression "settlement of the Spanish question", so as not to be obliged further to delay the coming into force of the Agreement.

It may be true that this connection between the settlement of the Spanish problem and the coming into force of the Anglo-Italian Agreement was useful as a means of bringing pressure to bear on the Non-Intervention Committee and hastened the British acceptance of the new plan for the withdrawal of volunteers and the stricter control of the land and sea frontiers of Spain: that, in other words, April 16th 1938 was a turning point for the Spanish question.

Experience has however taught us to use caution when moved to indulge in optimistic predictions in regard to future developments in Spain. Indeed, as Mr. Chamberlain has implied and Lord Halifax much more clearly intimated that, without a similar Franco-Italian Agreement, the aim of an European "détente" cannot be realized, a fresh obstacle in the way of the enforcement of the Agreement of April 16th might under certain circumstances be encountered here which would also for the most part be ultimately attributable to the Spanish crisis. It is true enough that besides an Anglo-Italian understanding, a Franco-Italian entente is also necessary and desirable, if a general settlement of the Mediterranean problem is to be achieved on peaceful lines, but where is the reason for the failure, in spite of numerous attempts, to achieve such an understanding, to be sought?

The negotiations for Franco-Italian Agreement

On January 7th, 1935, Mussolini and the French Premier, M. Laval, signed the Befana Agreement in Rome, which was to relieve the Franco-Italian tension which had persisted since the end of the Great War, and establish a new balance of power in Europe. For France, this agreement signified in particular the liquidation on cheap terms of an old French debt—namely, the promises made to Italy in the secret treaties of 1915 and 1917 signed in London and St. Jean-de-Maurienne respectively, in return for her agreeing to enter the war. It is a matter of common knowledge that these and other secret treaties provided for the division of the spoils among the principal allies though the enemy had not then been defeated. When however such division really came up for discussion during the Paris negotiations, it was found that—not only had the vanquished, in their blind confidence in the high-sounding peace principles of the Allied and Associated Powers been the victims of a disgraceful swindle, but that the latter were unable to agree among themselves in regard to the spoils of war and their division. Italy in particular was then deprived of the share of Germany's colonial possessions and of the former Turkish territory which had been promised to her, while, as a cheap substitute for this, France ceded, under the terms of the Treaty of January 7th, 114,000 square kilometres of desert in Northern Tibesti and some thousands of square kilometres of uninhabited territory in French Somaliland and the Island of Dumeirah which faces it. Apart from this, the Contracting Parties confirmed the 1896 Convention relating to the status of the Italians in Tunis (notice of termination of which had been given by the French) and signed two supplementary agreements concerning disarmament and the Austrian question. Of the whole agreement, the question of whose importance in connection with the Abyssinian campaign (then about to be launched) has not yet been cleared up, nothing has remained, since the fall of the Laval Government during that campaign and its replacement by Blum's Popular Front Government with its unreserved concurrence in Eden's sanctions front, but the valueless desert and the strategically useful island of Dumeirah. As this agreement has not been denounced, it still exists in theory, but it has become a completely dead letter.

From Italy's point of view, the most offensive act of the Popular Front Government during the sanctions war was the recalling on October 31st, 1936 of the Ambassador in Rome, Count de Chambrun, on a—in Italy's view—extremely flimsy pretext, which was followed a year later—that is, after the conclusion of the sanctions war—by the recall of the Italian Ambassador in Paris, Cerrutti, by Mussolini, as a countermeasure, the vacancy at the French Embassy in Rome not yet having been filled by that date. The Popular Front Government presumably wished to show by its attitude how little importance it attached to the fostering of good relations with Rome and from then until its fall in April of this year it regarded the history of the post of Ambassador to the Quirinal, which was vacant for two years as one of the most successful achievements of the "policy of the democratic Powers". The obviously important duty of watching over French interests in Rome was ignored during the Abyssinian conflict and still more during the Spanish crisis in favour of a policy of anti-Fascist dilettantism, which may be said to have reached its climax during the few weeks of life of the Blum Cabinet in March of this year, when, to the general amazement, including that of France herself, Paul Boncour suddenly got up at the Quay d'Orsay and with the enthusiastic approval of the Communists, Socialists and some of the Radicals, not only pleaded for loyalty to long obsolete League doctrines, but, in order to save "democratic Spain", produced from his private drawer extremely concrete plans for military intervention which came as the greatest surprise to the French General Staff. It was mainly against these plans that Mussolini directed his speech in the Chamber on March 30th, when he drew an impressive picture of the military might of Italy.

The obfuscated mass of a policy composed of ideological goals, legalistic hair-splitting and pure fictions was propelled into some sort of movement by the policy of agreement of Chamberlain and Mussolini as also by the fall of the Popular Front Government and its replacement by the realistic Daladier Government. On the day on which the Anglo-Italian Agreement was initialled in Rome—April 16th, 1938—the Franco-Italian "rapprochement" negotiations were also opened there. The French Chargé d'Affaires in Rome, M. Blondel, asked the Italian Foreign Minister, Count Ciano, on behalf of the French Government, if the Italian Government was prepared to reopen negotiations with France with a view to restoring "normal relations" between the two countries. On receiving an affirmative reply, Blondel received official instructions from Paris and the conversations then began immediately, the hope being even expressed on the French side that a preliminary conclusion might be reached before the May session of the Council of the League of Nations, if not before Adolf Hitler's visit to Italy.

Unfortunately French policy has been responsible, by various acts or omissions, for rendering worse again the psychologically favourable atmosphere created by the Agreement of April 16th. Instead of beginning the negotiations by immediately filling the post of Ambassador which had for so long been neglected, French policy took refuge behind legalistic arguments and not unnaturally gave the impression in Rome of having adopted the method of understanding through force of circumstances only—possibly under pressure from England. According to the French plan, the preliminary pourparlers between M. Blondel and Count Ciano were to provide a basis for the negotiations proper, which were then to be prosecuted in Rome by the new Ambassador. As however he could only present his credentials in Rome if they were addressed to the King of Italy and Emperor of Abyssinia, that would involve the recognition of the Italian Empire, which again, according to the formalist reasoning of the French, would require the consent of the League of Nations. This consent was in fact accorded at the May session of the Council, inasmuch as freedom of action in the matter of recognition was restored to the sanctionist States which, with the exception of England and France and a few others, had already made use of that freedom. But even after it had been freed from these formal fetters, the French Government could not make up its mind to take that step and, quite recently again, it was decided at a Cabinet meeting not immediately to fill the post of French Ambassador to Rome.

In spite of the suspicious haste with which Paris desired to prosecute the negotiations, further proof of the failure to appreciate the favourable psychological position was evinced by the all too transparent references in the French Press to the "German danger" for Italy, the German "Drang nach Osten" and Italy's "precarious economic and financial position" in view of her requirements in Abyssinia and Spain, which were held to point to the fact that an early understanding with Paris was indicated from Italy's point of view.

The "Temps" of May 4th and June 22nd, wrote:

"The Rome-Berlin axis is a fact with which one must reckon just as much as with the permanent collaboration between France and England. No-one can seriously think of attempting to play off one group against another or split either of them. Common sense requires that we should face the facts as they are and endeavour to render possible a measure of cooperation between the two great Liberal Powers on the one hand and the two great authoritarian Powers on the other, as part of a general European policy, in order to establish upon firm foundations a policy calculated to ensure peace over a long period. It would indeed be vain to attempt to return to something which has finally collapsed as a result of the events of the last three years. Everything tells us to adapt ourselves to the realities of the hour, which it is in no-one's power to eliminate and to devote ourselves with equal good will to a new work of understanding and collaboration."

In the same breath however it proceeded to say:

"For the Fascist Government, this is a question not merely of prestige—of a diplomatic success, designed in some measure to compensate the Italian people for the disappointment felt over the incorporation of Austria in the German Reich and the German urge towards Central and Eastern Europe—but also of the results of the situation in which Italy at present finds herself. It is perfectly natural that the Italian Government should desire, without further delay, to receive recognition of the "fait accompli" in East Africa. On the other hand, material difficulties are being encountered in connection with the exploitation of the conquered Abyssinian Empire, for the solution of which Italy's present resources do not of themselves suffice. In Italy itself, the financial and economic position is causing serious anxiety and lastly it is natural that the prospect of the Spanish civil war dragging out for many months longer, involving as it does the maintenance of Italian military forces and large supplies of war material, should disturb public opinion on the other side of the Alps and produce a certain feeling of disquietude which the Fascist Government has every reason to wish to disperse... The diplomacy of the Italian Government will need all the flexibility for which it is noted to counteract this, as far as it is possible to do so. Its task will be rendered easier by the restoration of relations of mutual confidence with England and France, which will naturally have the effect of liberating the Duce from certain definite anxieties and giving him greater freedom of movement within the framework of the Rome-Berlin axis, which he himself created under the pressure of circumstances, which have now, by recent events, been relegated to the past."

It is not surprising that didactic remarks of this kind did not increase Rome's willingness to negotiate, as her susceptibilities are very acute on that point. Indeed, the Duce was not long in replying to them, both in his speech at Genoa on May 14th and the appeal which he made to the peasants on July 4th standing on the threshing-machine at Aprilia in the Pontine Marshes which, thanks to his energy and initiative, have become arable land, while Count Ciano, in his speech on June 2nd at the Milan Congress of the Institute for the Study of International Politics deliberately omitted all reference to Franco-Italian relations.

Apart from these mainly psychological stumbling-blocks, other difficulties have also arisen out of the concrete programmes of negotiations elaborated by both sides which go to show that Franco-Italian understanding is by no means as simple or easy of achievement as the French Press has on several occasions implied. Certainly the Agreement of April 16th obtained for French diplomacy also a number of valuable and express undertakings from Italy in regard to the status quo in the Western Mediterranean and the Spanish peninsula, which it would presumably have cost Paris much time and trouble to procure for itself, but on the other hand there are a number of points which were not touched upon in the Anglo-Italian Agreement, such as the problems of the Eastern Mediterranean and the Red Sea (the delimitation of the French positions in the light of the new balance of power in the Middle East established by the April Agreements), the settlement of the question of friendly, economic and cultural relations between Tunis and Lybia, the confirmation of the 1896 Convention concerning the protection of the Italians in Tunis, the demarcation of the frontier between French Somaliland and Italian East Africa, the revision of the 1936 Agreements concerning Italian participation in the use of the Port of Jibuti and the Jibuti-Addis-Ababa railway, the position of the Italians in France and the anti-Fascist activities of the Italian émigrés residing in France, the exchange of military information regarding armaments and fortifications in the Mediterranean, the general relations between the two fleets, etc.

The Spanish crisis has done more than any other event to render nugatory these negotiations, which have now reached a deadlock.

The cause of the prolongation of the Spanish war in the past—and this cause is presumably still operative—is no secret: it is the enormous supplies of war material and man-power which have been delivered to the Spanish Reds over the Pyrenean frontier, since Franco's advance to the Mediterranean. Without these supplies the war would, in all human probability, be over or nearly over to-day. The semi-official "Giornale d'Italia" and other Italian—and even French—newspapers have from time to time published all details of the French (and other) supplies, etc. which have entered Spain via the Pyrenees.

In his speech at Genoa, Mussolini drew a clear distinction, on the strength of these facts, between the attitude of the two countries, when he said that they were on different sides of the barricades, and already at that time expressed doubt as to the possibility of bringing the negotiations to a successful conclusion, as "over there they desire the victory of Barcelona, while we earnestly desire and hope for the victory of Franco."

CONTENTS

of the Resolution adopted on July 5th, 1938 by the Non-Intervention Committee together with the Plan thereto Annexed for the Withdrawal of Foreign Volunteers from Spain, the Recognition of Belligerent Rights, and the Observation of the Spanish Frontiers by Land and Sea

(For complete text, see the English Command Paper "Spain No. I (1938) Cmd. 5793", London, H.M. Stationery Office)

The following Plan has been sent to both Spanish Parties with a view to ascertaining their attitude in regard to it. It will not be regarded as definitively accepted until both have indicated their assent. From the date on which they do so the time-limits which the Plan fixes for its fulfilment will begin to run. The Red-Spanish Government has in the meanwhile communicated its Reply dated July 26th.

I. RESOLUTION

The Resolution begins by reaffirming the obligations entered into by the different Governments under the Agreement of February 16th, 1937, in regard to such matters as the prohibition of the despatch of volunteers, the enforcement of the control on the Spanish frontiers by land and sea, and the arrangements made in the exchange of notes of August-September 1936 in respect of the prohibition of the delivery of arms. The Resolution further extends the prohibition of entry to include political agitators. It contains a reference to the nine points of the English Plan of July 14th 1937 dealing with the withdrawal of foreign volunteers, the recognition of the belligerent rights of the two parties, and the additional measures of control embodied in the van Dulm-Hemming Report. In conclusion it contains a supplementary obligation to the effect that the parties to the Agreement shall also prohibit their ships from carrying war material to Spain from ports other than those of their own country.

II. ANNEX

The Annex, which is in the nature of regulations in execution of the Resolution, is in seven Parts.

Part 1 contains the reaffirmation referred to above of the arrangements of August-September 1936 and February 1937, i.e. with regard to the list of contraband war material, the import of which into Spain is forbidden. The list specifies 15 categories of war material. The Agreement of February 1937 is also extended in such a way as to impose on the parties to the Agreement an obligation to scrutinise application by their own nationals to pass through Spain with the same degree of care as that applied to applications by such nationals for authority to visit Spain.

Part 2 contains details of the prohibition of the entry of political agitators.

Part 3 contains an extension of the Non-Intervention Agreement to prohibit the carriage of war material to Spain by ships proceeding from ports other than those of their own country.

Part 3 contains the Plan for the withdrawal of foreign volunteers from Spain.

The withdrawal of the volunteers from Spain is to take place under the supervision of an "International Board for Non-Intervention in Spain" (hereinafter referred to as the "Board") and an "International Council for Non-Intervention in Spain" (hereinafter referred to as the "Council"). The following countries are represented on the Board, the Chairman of which is the Dutch Admiral van Dulm: United Kingdom, France, Germany, Italy, Greece, Norway, Poland, Portugal and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. The financial execution of the Plan will be subject to the supervision of the Council. The withdrawal of volunteers will be entrusted to two Commissions, each of which will consist of three persons appointed by the Non-Intervention Committee with four General Staff officers and other staff attached.

The two Commissions, one of which will be attached to the Nationalist and the other to the Red Headquarters, will not be in direct relations with one another, but will each be kept fully informed by the Board in London of the progress of the Plan in the other portion of Spain.

The foreign volunteers will be transferred to Evacuation Areas to be established at points situated outside, but in the vicinity of, the ports of Palamos, Carthage, Malaga and Cadiz at a steady rate of not less than 2,000 men per day. If the numbers of foreign volunteers serving with the two Spanish parties are equal, each Spanish party will hand over 1,000 foreign volunteers daily to the Commission concerned, who will be distributed in detachments of 500 each between the four Evacuation Areas above-mentioned. Should it be found that there is a larger number of foreign volunteers serving with one Spanish party than the other, the numbers to be handed over by the former will be increased in a proportion fixed by the Board.

TIME-TABLE OF WITHDRAWAL

The time required for the completion of the entire operation is conceived as follows:

From the so-called "zero date", i.e. the date of acceptance of the Plan by both Spanish parties, the two Commissions will at once proceed to Spain and draw up their estimates of the number of volunteers, in conjunction with the Spanish authorities, according to four categories viz. Navy, Army, Air Force, Civilians.

As soon as the progress of the work permits, the Commissions will report to London as to the date on which they will be in a position to start the actual counting of the volunteers. They will at the time report as to the numbers of wounded, sick, prisoners of war and women volunteers. As soon as the two Commissions have completed their estimates, members of each will meet in a "Joint Commission", whose task it will be to determine the proportion between the numbers of volunteers on Red and White territory respectively. The Non-Intervention Committee will thereupon inform the two Spanish parties that the withdrawal of the volunteers is to begin, and will request them to take all necessary steps to facilitate the process. The above preparatory work is to be completed by the 45th day.

The 46th day is the date on which the first daily quota of volunteers, not being sick, wounded or prisoners of war, is drafted into the Evacuation Areas. An identical quota will follow on each following day.

The first drafts of volunteers in the Evacuation Areas to the country to which they are return (home country or country of refuge) will take place on the 51st day.

The evacuation of all foreign volunteers from both parts of Spain is to be completed on the 100th day.

As from the 101st day (or earlier, if the fit and active volunteers are already all in the Evacuation Areas) the transfer of sick and wounded, prisoners of war and women volunteers to the Evacuation Areas is to take place, and to be completed not later than the 135th day.

Thereafter, the Evacuation Areas are to be closed within 7 days, i.e. by the 142nd day, leaving only a small care and maintenance staff, the rest of the staff to be transferred to France and Gibraltar. By the 147th day the staff of the two Branch Establishments of the Commissions in the Spanish Possessions and Dependencies are also to leave Spain.

Between the 101st day (by which date the evacuation of all fit and active volunteers is to be completed) and the 149th day, the Commissions are to verify that no foreign volunteers remain unevacuated, and to draw up their final reports when they have done so.

On the 150th day the Commissions withdraw to France and Gibraltar.

Between the 151st day and the 156th day the International Committee will consider the final reports of the Commissions, and decide that the scheme has been fully carried out.

On the 157th day the Commissions will be disbanded. On the 164th day the whole operation of withdrawal of the volunteers will be completed.

DETAILED PROVISIONS

What is meant by the term "foreign volunteer"?

The answer is :

(a) All persons who on July 18th 1936 were nationals of any of the countries which are parties to the Non-Intervention Agreement, and were engaged either directly or indirectly in the Spanish conflict.

(b) Any stateless persons, formerly the nationals of any of the countries above-mentioned, who have engaged either directly or indirectly in the Spanish conflict since July 18th 1936.

The Annex further deals with the case of political exiles or stateless persons who before the conflict were nationals of one or other of the countries above-mentioned but were habitually resident in some non-European country. Such persons are to rank as volunteers, if they belong to the military forces of either Party, or are under the orders of such forces, or are engaged in the maintenance of services essential to the conduct of the military operations, or are active as advisers, propagandists, or experts, or are engaged in the arms trade with either Party, with the exception of persons serving in medical or sanitary organisations or organisations of an established international character. "Repatriation" volunteers, who are nationals of countries which are parties to the Non-Intervention Agreement, will be returned to their respective countries, provided they did not leave them under an expulsion order or similar instrument. Volunteers who rank as political exiles or stateless persons, or are unable to return to their home country or to the country of their last permanent residence, are to be offered to the different countries which are parties to the Non-Intervention Agreement and, in the event of no country being prepared to receive them, are to be held in the Evacuation Areas until such time as the Non-Intervention Committee has taken a decision as to their future. Volunteers who refuse to leave Spain are to be withdrawn subject to the same conditions.

The financial arrangements of the Plan provide for division of the expenditure according as it is incurred :

(a) By the running of the international machinery,

(b) By the actual withdrawal (Evacuation Areas, maintenance costs, etc.),

(c) By the repatriation of the volunteers by sea.

Expenditure under (a) is to be divided between England, France, Germany, Italy and the U.S.S.R. Expenditure under (b) is to be borne by Germany, England, France and Italy only. Expenditure under (c) is in principle to fall on all Governments in proportion to the number of volunteers of their nationality.

Volunteers are to be repatriated via one or other of the following ports according to their country of destination, viz. London, Hamburg, Lisbon, Marseilles and Genoa.

Part 5. — Recognition of Belligerent Rights.

When the withdrawal of foreign volunteers is "working satisfactorily", the States parties to the Non-Intervention Agreement are prepared to give the Spanish Parties belligerent rights at sea in respect of ships of war or aircraft, in accordance with the established rules of international law. As there are at present no rules of international law relating to war in the air, the rights relating to naval war are to be applicable to the air arm mutatis mutandis.

The expression "working satisfactorily" is to mean such time as the evacuation of 10,000 volunteers by the Party with the smaller number of volunteers to the Evacuation Areas, and the simultaneous evacuation of volunteers by the other Party in the prescribed proportion, are complete. If the process of evacuation goes according to plan, that is to say, if 1,000 volunteers are evacuated daily to the Evacuation Areas by the Party with the smaller number of volunteers, with a corresponding evacuation according to the prescribed proportion by the other Party, from the 46th day onwards, the first day the recognition of belligerent rights will be the 57th day.

Contraband.

The contraband lists adopted by the two Spanish Parties are to be brought into line with the list approved by the Non-Intervention Committee, subject to amendment at any time. It is open to the belligerent Parties to propose further amendments to the Non-Intervention Committee.

The rights of the belligerents may not be exercised in relation to ships of the countries parties to the Non-Intervention Agreement, where such ships are carrying Observing Officers or have been granted a certificate in lieu thereof by the Board. The Spanish Parties are however free to visit such ships in order to verify that they are entitled to fly the flag of a country party to the Non-Intervention Agreement, or to ascertain that the Observing Officer is on board. The same privilege extends to vessels engaged on behalf of the Board in the repatriation of volunteers from the Evacuation Areas, which fly the Non-Intervention Pennant.

In addition to ships carrying contraband, any ship will be deemed to be "unneutral" which takes a direct part in hostilities, or is engaged in the transport of troops of either Spanish Party, or is engaged in the transmission of intelligence (e.g. by wireless), or is directly chartered by the official authorities of either Party, or has on board an Agent of either Party with authority to direct her movements and is at the exclusive disposal of the authorities of one of the Spanish Parties. Such ships will rank with ships carrying contraband as blockade-runners, and the naval forces of the respective Spanish Parties concerned will be entitled to treat them accordingly.

Neutral shipping which does not enter any Spanish harbour will not be interfered with by the belligerents, even though it passes near to Spanish coasts, if it is following established shipping routes. This provision includes a prohibition of mine-laying along such neutral shipping routes.

Part 6. — Observation of the Spanish Frontier by Land and Sea. The observation of the land frontiers commences from the day on which the Commissions begin the counting of the volunteers, it being understood that this date may be expected to be fifteen days after the date of the final adoption of the Resolution. Observation on the land frontier will remain in operation in the first instance for 30 days, i.e. to the 45th day after the final adoption of the Resolution, when it will lapse if the withdrawal of foreign volunteers has then not actually commenced. It is however understood that the French Government will agree to a further period of grace of 10 days, if the failure to begin the actual withdrawal of volunteers is due to purely technical difficulties.

In addition to the observation on the land frontier, the whole sea frontier is to be under observation: for which purpose Observing Officers will be permanently established in the eight Spanish harbours of Bilbao, Huelva, Cadiz, Malaga, Carthagena, Alicante, Valencia and Barcelona.

The observation on the Franco-Spanish land frontier will be exercised in winter by 184 Observers, and in summer by 144 Observers. On the frontier between Gibraltar and Spain it will be exercised by 6 Observers, and on the frontier between Spain and Portugal in accordance with an arrangement concluded between Great Britain and Portugal in March 1937. For the observation at sea there will be 560 Observers.

The system of observation at sea by Observers appointed by the Board to accompany ships of the States parties to the Non-Intervention Agreement will be carried out in the manner followed since March 8th, 1937.

The reinforced observation at sea will begin not later than the resumption of the land observation.

Provision is made in principle for observation from the air of the land and sea frontiers, if found practicable.

1938 ASSEMBLY OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

Where does the League of Nations stand? What is the object of another Assembly? — These two questions jump to the eye when one studies the programme of the September sessions of the Council and the Assembly. One seeks in vain, among the many items, for any which could arouse great interest outside the League in virtue either of its subject or of the persons of those who were instrumental in placing them on the agenda. It is a repetition of the old game with which the League has, for years now, been eking out its existence, whereby every session has had to deal with the remains left over by its predecessor. This eternal adjournment of every question has not, of course, been calculated to facilitate or simplify its tasks, but merely placed upon it the additional burden of the consciousness of its own incapacity to act. By means of open adjournment or resolutions which were tantamount to adjournment, the League has meandered along through the years and it has been the curse of its policy that it has tended more and more to get over difficulties by shunning realities. With extraordinary imperturbability and indifference it has continued to weave with the old threads, which have long since proved too frail to surround the world with a network of peace, but have become a spider's web in which the great ideals have been caught and left to rot. Hardly a single attempt has been made to deal with the present confusion in the world by clear thinking or heroic remedies. Ever and again, the splendid palace in the Ariana Park with its outwardly imposing proportions has proved itself an illusion, a mirage, a Fata Morgana of the policy for which it was originally intended.

This development was due not to the impossibility of fulfilling the far from utopian ideals embodied in Wilson's peace programme, but rather to the way in which this programme was at the Paris Conference codified in the Covenant, which closely associated the League with the Peace Treaties imposed on the vanquished there, and finally to the desire of the dictators of 1919 and their successors to maintain the war mentality which stood sponsor to the League when it was founded and to make of the League the complaisant tool and exponent of their policy of perpetuating those treaties of violence. Then again, there was the tendency of certain elements, who claim the monopoly of true peace organisation and consequently also the direction of this instrument, to do spade work for certain ideologies of the most dangerous kind, whereby this "peace instrument" would finally be enabled to set half the world and the nations of the world against the other half—which tendencies caused Germany and Italy to leave the League. The fanfares of peace ideology became violent trumpetings of defiance against "breakers of the peace", to whom all those outside the League are held ipso facto to belong.

With all its patent admissions of organic weakness, the League lost not only its external authority, but also its confidence in its own viability and the disappearance of all real political activity gave rise here and there to grave doubts as to the justification for its existence. At any rate this development led to the emergence of two phenomena:

The number of its supporters steadily dwindled and the tendency of countries to place themselves unconditionally under the subjective direction of Geneva and its machinery has already, in the case of a number of States, given place to a spirit of independence and the desire for self-determination.

Secondly, European and extra-European policy have for long been determined without reference to Geneva by powerful groups, some of whose members never belonged or no longer belong to the League and in which an attempt is being made more successfully to deal with the chaotic state of Europe and the world than had been possible by means of a policy of collective action. At any rate the dream of a League of Nations responsible for keeping international peace like a policeman has been dreamed for the last time.

An unimpeachable witness—one of the saints whose statues should adorn the columns of Geneva, the former British Foreign Minister, Eden, expressed that fact when he said, in a speech in January 1937:

"The world cannot be saved by covenants and treaties, or by political ideologies or by speeches, however much such speeches may breathe the spirit of peace."

All this fits Geneva like a glove and constitutes a declaration of bankruptcy for the pactomania, in which Geneva specialized. The British Prime Minister, Mr. Chamberlain, meant this and nothing else when, in his speech in the House of Commons on October 21st 1937, he disposed of the Opposition attacks on the Government's League policy by saying that there was no point in repeating parrot-like that one believed in the League of Nations, when the League was not in a position to carry out its duties and the last speeches of Mr. Chamberlain and Lord Halifax, which are given at the end of this issue, are also inspired by the same considerations. The great ideological weapon forged in Versailles has now gone blunt in the hands of those who thought to use it to guard a world which was to be unchangeable for all time.

France has also—much against her will it is true, followed this English change, although references to loyalty to the Geneva League are never absent from the speeches of French statesmen. Indeed, in her last act of foreign policy, the conclusion of a Treaty with Turkey concerning the Sanjak of Alexandretta, she had no qualms about going over the head of the League which holds the Syrian Mandate and with this bilateral agreement disavowed her hitherto loudly vaunted faith in collective agreements, outside of which there could be no salvation—and that in order to settle a dispute which the League had been unable to settle.

* * *

The two chief Members of the League, England and France, have thus declared that it is better for the present not to burden the League with the practical solution of political conflicts. This exclusion of the League is stated to be temporary and the League is to be regarded, so to say, as the latent candidate for the post of guarantor of a universal ideal. Those who entertain such hopes forget that, in the meantime, the obligatory meetings have become the happy hunting-ground of gamblers who are not concerned with ideals, but with very material things which have nothing whatsoever to do with a genuine League of Nations policy. It is becoming more and more obvious that these two Powers have their hands full in the League endeavouring to stem the destructive activities of these gamblers and have, during the last few sessions, suffered a patent defeat.

During last year's Assembly and the two sessions of the Council this year, a number of Members officially drew a line under a period in which the League was misused in various quarters. Statements were made to the effect that it could not be the duty of the League to defend to the last ditch the interests of certain Powers arising out of the dictated Peace Treaties and that the League was not created in order to politicize against States outside. Its activities were reviewed and it was found that it was not able to arrive at a practical solution of any political conflicts, but on the contrary that its interference in local disputes only made them worse and threatened to cause them to spread to the common danger.

No-one was able seriously to pick holes in the arguments of these Members. Indeed the patience of many of them has for so long been abused that, with the exception of the Soviet Union, not a single member got up to brand as "desertion" the demand for a release from dangerous and immeasurable entanglements under the Covenant. On the other hand, it was, in view of the serious mistakes made by the League, too late to reverse the action of these States in freeing themselves from their obligations in the matter of sanctions by an appeal to their membership of the League. The fact that the return to independence, self-reliance or some other form of neutrality characterized the great development which had been mainly caused by the Geneva experiments or "test cases", was, with the sole exception of the case of Switzerland, simply noted in silence.

We publish in this issue a summary of the attempts of the so-called neutral States to free themselves from the collective system of Geneva—at any rate, as some of them say, for a time, until prospects are better with regard to the revival of the League. Even this qualification does not however alter the question: "Where does the League of Nations stand", which is rightly regarded as a matter affecting all Europe, in view of the fact that out of twenty-three European countries—not including Soviet Russia—twenty have, by their attitude during the sanctions war against Italy, in statements made after the collapse of sanctions, in parliamentary resolutions and at conferences, passed a crushing judgment upon the practice of that institution. We see from this that only three States Members can still boast of not being "deserters" and of continuing the struggle for the preservation of Geneva collective security unimpaired within the framework of Article 16: these three countries are France, Red Spain and Czechoslovakia, who, partly through alliances concluded in violation of the principles of the League and partly through ideological affinities, enjoy the support of the Soviet Union.

The South American States, with the exception of Colombia and Mexico, have drawn the logical conclusions from these considerations. Ten of them have left the League or given notice of their intention to do so, while the rest have, like the European neutrals, exposed the contradiction between the lack of universality and the demand for the retention of the machinery of sanctions. The coming Pan-American Conference at Lima will presumably become a demonstration which will at least show points of resemblance to the Conference of the Oslo States, if it does not go beyond that Conference in the matter of results. If we look through the list of Members of the League, to see what countries remain since the retreat of the British Dominions, whose attitude is tending more and more to coincide with that of the British Government, we find the three new members—Egypt, Iran and Iraq and also Siam, whose attitude is not yet clear or who lean towards the English view or plead for Article 16, as do also Afghanistan and Liberia. Finally there remain China and Abyssinia, who represent an inglorious chapter in the history of the League, which, in the case of Abyssinia, reaches the grotesque, inasmuch as the Negus was thrown over, while the fiction of his State, embedded in the rigid provisions of the Covenant, continues to haunt the halls and corridors of the League Palace, as does the office of the long since faded Disarmament Conference, which drags on from session to session and is artificially kept alive by further adjournment.

* * *

Under these circumstances, we are entitled to wonder what point or sense there can be in sending responsible statesmen, whose holidays and week-ends have recently been so unnecessarily interrupted, to Geneva for three weeks, though in many cases this journey in September is very sensibly combined with holiday plans. Then there is a Secretariat and a report by the Secretary-General which, under the terms of the Covenant, must be discussed even if its does not contain anything that is not already known. The truth is that these sessions are prescribed by the Rules of Procedure. Certainly no-one would have cause for indignation if, which is not likely, a member were to propose to adjourn the Council and the Assembly. There could scarcely be any objection to such a step under the terms of the Covenant, for, just as every member is at liberty for weighty reasons to ask that a session be convened, so any reasons which might make it appear expedient to call for an adjournment should be accorded equal consideration. As however, in Geneva as elsewhere, miracles do not happen but only strange things, we can drop this speculation, although, if it were realized, it might be regarded as greater evidence of the strength of the League than the convening of obligatory sessions under the terms of the Covenant.

* * *

At the coming session, Moscow will again have both feet in Geneva. Only two items of the agenda will dominate the discussions at this session (and they will be accompanied by all the boosting to which the procedure of the League lends itself when properly handled): the separate motions of the Chinese and the Red Spanish Government—the latter on the question of the protection of the civilian population against bombing from the air. In the former case, geographical considerations will probably prevent the Soviet Union from trying to launch a second League war, while in the latter case it will move Heaven and earth to obtain collective action against the "rebel", Franco, for which purpose the slogan "Protection of the civilian population" is eminently suitable. Perhaps however—and this would indeed be a ray of light piercing the clouds of Geneva—these discussions will reveal what most unbiased people outside Geneva have known for a long time, namely from whom the civilian population has suffered most—from White Spain, where unavoidable warlike operations unfortunately affect non-combatants as well as combatants, or from Red Spain, where, from sheer hatred and love of destruction, innocent people are most cruelly massacred in true Muscovite fashion.

OSLO VERSUS GENEVA

Neutrality aims within the League of Nations

Silence has been maintained as to the fact that, ever since the League of Nations was set up, there have been experts in international law who have predicted what has now become an actual political possibility: namely that the next war will be caused by Geneva, as the idea of collective security is a false idea. To draw a line under the history of the world in the name of collective security, in the interests of one's own hegemony, was not only senseless, but also immoral. In a way, it is no bad thing that the science of international law has, during the League's twenty years of activity, accumulated abundant material which goes to prove this statement.

The fact that the League of Nations has existed at all for twenty years is due to the illusion that, when it was set up, something completely new was created, which the world had not known before. In face of the present admission of its failure as a genuine practical instrument for the prevention of war or for a serious clearing of the international decks for peace, many at any rate are coming to realize more and more the very high standard reached by the Constitution of the Nations during the years of the great Peace Conferences of the Hague. By confining themselves to what was possible of attainment in this world, those concerned managed, by means of legislation concerning war and neutrality, to build up a realistic peace constitution. War was tamed and converted into a process strictly limited in space and hedged round with regulations as to the form which it was allowed to assume: the peaceful civilian population was excluded from the sphere of influence of military operations, the weapons of war were restricted, the rights and duties of the neutrals were regulated and the treatment of prisoners of war and the wounded was rendered more humane. Regulations governing publicity provided that the commencement of the war should be clearly marked by a declaration of war. It is true that this great work of peace was temporarily destroyed through the Great War, but, after the war was over, pacifist fanatics and utopians, by attempting the impossible, destroyed the possible. They desired an illusory peace constitution whereby war would be entirely abolished and for this purpose they organized the "war against war", created the flexible notion of the "aggressor" and regarded "neutrality" as treason. Everything was denounced as an attack on "peace" which aimed at changing the sacred "Status quo" of which the League of Nations became the guarantor.

That was the sort of "progress" provided by the League of Nations. It was natural and inevitable that the "vanquished" should have first recognized the Geneva instrument of "collective security" as the expression of the association of interests of the "victors". As however the Covenant of the League of Nations formed an integral part of the Peace Treaties of 1919, there was time and to spare for others to come to a realization of the fact that the conception of the Geneva peace guarantee was apt to vary with the interests of those Powers which had the greatest influence on that instrument. Everyone knows by whom the decisive influence was wielded in Geneva up to 1934: the Powers which failed to honour the undertakings which they had given in the matter of disarmament under the treaties and Article 8 of the Covenant of the League of Nations. It was in that year (1934) that Soviet Russia joined the League and the eyes of those who had, even after the collapse of the Disarmament Conference, continued to hug the illusion of a League of Nations as a guarantee of peace, were from that time gradually opened wider and wider from session to session. Then, with the Abyssinian War, the ball was finally set rolling and the attempts to abandon collective for individual security became more and more the main subject of the increasingly intensive debates on the "Sanctions Article" 16. As no agreement could be reached on that Article, it was proposed, in order to save the façade, that the Covenant should be reformed, which proposal was, when it came to be discussed, defeated by the efforts of those who desired that the sanctions clauses, which had failed to supply a basis of agreement, should be amplified in the direction of greater severity towards "aggressors". The political interpretations employed in the attempts to justify this course, as also the fanatical hatred with which the League of Nations was misused by certain Powers under Soviet direction as an instrument in the hands of the "democracies" against "Fascism", finally exposed the complete unsuitability of Geneva as a responsible mediator in the interests of peace.

The first to abandon all hope of obtaining from Geneva any help in clearing up or solving European complications were the small so-called "neutral States" which had in 1920, in the honest belief that the League of Nations was a better instrument of peace than the pre-war instrument, sacrificed the great advantages of a classic neutrality on the altar of Geneva. Although these States have not yet entertained the idea of leaving the League of Nations, they have, without reference to the League or its Covenant and in no uncertain terms, stated in resolutions and declarations that their diminished confidence in Geneva has compelled them to adopt neutrality as their policy and that this course seemed to be indicated not only as the logical conclusion from considerations of "realpolitik", but also, according to their general position, their geographical situation and their historical traditions, as a happy and more or less open return to normal relations with all Great Powers. Any more detailed consideration of this movement can therefore only strengthen the conviction that international cooperation between the nations is only possible when mutual respect and the just recognition of the conditions of existence of other peoples is recognised as the indispensable prerequisite for stable and durable relations between State and State.

If we glance at the movement towards individual security which is now in full swing, we see at once that the idea of neutrality attracts like a magnetic pole, but that not everything can be called neutrality which likes to toy with that notion. As regards the "small States", we must above all not forget that, with the exception of Switzerland, it was their purpose first of all to extricate themselves from the dangerous toils in which they became involved in Geneva. The desire to keep out of the politics and disputes of the Great Powers has of itself nothing whatsoever to do with neutrality. Though it is true that conversations were held during which the principles of classic neutrality were adduced, it is only true subject to this reservation: that these States cannot all be lumped together. Just as a special characteristic is denoted by the expression "Swiss neutrality", so Belgium, the Netherlands, Denmark, Norway and Sweden have the most varied, strongly marked and individual formulae and conceptions of neutrality, which alone are sufficient indication of the extent to which we have departed in theory and in practice from the pre-war idea of neutrality.

The probable attitude of these States in a future war—one of the most acute problems of the day—is directly bound up with the various questions connected with neutrality. We have only to think of the number of theories which are, in the United States alone—also a "classic" land of neutrality, put forward by the various warring parties as the one and only positive foreign policy, to realize how difficult it is, or is made, even for the neutral States to decide to tread the royal path of clear neutrality in the classic meaning of the term, which the American John Quincy Adams defined in the following pithy terms: "the neutral", he said, "avoids any appreciation of the rights or wrongs of a dispute". This is the highest conception of classic neutrality, which could only grow out of the recognition of the justice of the cause of both belligerents and, as a means of localizing the war, fulfilled an indisputable function of peace.

1. Switzerland's return to complete neutrality

To-day, Switzerland is the only country that can be said to have returned to neutrality in the most comprehensive sense of the term and—what will puzzle future historians most—for ever. In the case of Switzerland, it is no longer possible to create a legal confusion in regard to the obligations of a Member of the League of Nations in the matter of the sanctions apparatus of Article 16 of the Covenant.

We have already in previous issues dealt at length with the question of Swiss neutrality and the documentary evidence bearing upon it. It only remains for us to say in this connection that the liberation of Switzerland from her obligations in the matter of sanctions under the terms of the Council Resolution of May 14th, 1938 was communicated by the Federal Government on May 19th and 20th to Switzerland's neighbours—Germany and Italy. The official form of this exchange of notes goes to show that the process was one in which the formal side, while indispensable, assumed a place of subsidiary importance: it constituted at once a solemn notification and a cordial and unreserved acknowledgement and confirmation of the restoration of Swiss neutrality which is of great importance both for Switzerland's two neighbours and general European policy.

Germany's attitude to the "complete neutrality of Switzerland" has never wavered and found expression once more in the conversation between the Führer and Chancellor of the Reich and the Swiss Altbundesrat Schulthess on February 25th, 1937, when the former said: "we shall always, no matter what happens, respect the inviolability and neutrality of Switzerland: of that I can assure you most definitely, nor have I ever given anyone any reason to think the contrary".

Thus was the foundation-stone of peaceful relations between the German and Swiss Governments solemnly consecrated, as we are reminded once more by the terms of the reply of the German Foreign Minister, Herr von Ribbentrop, to the Swiss declaration. In this way, all former doubts were set at rest and malicious assertions refuted. Such respect for neutrality is best preserved by complete impartiality and lack of constraint in the relations between the countries which meet on a neutral frontier, and this implies the exercise of restraint in the expression of views which may arise out of the different forms of Government to be found on the two sides of the frontier. Neutrality must be fostered. This is not a concern of the Governments only: the political principle of neutrality must find expression in the life of the peoples concerned.

Identical notes addressed by Switzerland to Germany and Italy.

As Your Excellency is aware, Switzerland is ever inspired by the earnest wish to persist in the policy of neutrality which she has pursued for more than four centuries and scrupulously to observe the engagements relating thereto which are contained in the Treaties of 1815.

The Resolution of the Federal Government of March 5th, 1920 concerning the accession of Switzerland to the League of Nations, which was decided by referendum on May 16th of that year, was only drafted after the Council of the League had solemnly stated in its Declaration of London of February 13th, 1920 that the permanent neutrality of Switzerland as an international obligation for the preservation of peace was not at variance with any provision of the Covenant of the League of Nations.

The Declaration of London expressly states that Switzerland is under no obligation to participate in military operations or to allow foreign troops to pass through its territory or to tolerate preparations for military operations thereon. On the other hand, she was accorded no exemption from participation in the economic and financial measures provided for in Article 16 of the Covenant. As experience has shown the uncertainty of the distinctions which it was thought possible in 1920 to draw between the various measures mentioned in that Article, the Federal Council addressed a memorandum to the Council of the League of Nations on April 29th, 1938 which I was privileged to communicate semi-officially to the Ministry for Foreign Affairs, announcing the intention of Switzerland no longer in any way to participate in the application of the provisions of the Covenant of the League relating to sanctions, in view of her permanent neutrality. The Council of the League adopted a resolution on May 14th in which it noted this intention and stated that Switzerland would not be required to participate in sanctions.

The Swiss Confederation is thus released from any and every obligation which could give rise to any doubt as to her unshakable determination to remain neutral in all circumstances.

German reply of June 21st, 1938.

Monsieur le Ministre,

Your predecessor informed me in his note of May 20th that Switzerland, in the earnest wish scrupulously to observe her traditional policy of neutrality and the obligations arising therefrom, had approached the Council of the League of Nations with a view to the adoption of a resolution, which released Switzerland from any obligation to participate in the application of the provisions of the Covenant of the League relating to sanctions. To this I have the honour, on behalf of the German Government, to reply as follows:

The German Government has noted with the greatest interest that the efforts of the Swiss Government to obtain release from obligations which were in fact calculated to jeopardise the neutrality of Switzerland have been successful. The German Government welcomes this result, as it regards the unqualified preservation of Switzerland's neutrality as an important factor ensuring European peace. The Swiss Government can therefore rest assured that its desire to observe neutrality, to which it has once more testified, will always meet with the corresponding desire on the part of the German Government to recognise and respect that neutrality. I need only refer to the declarations with which the Swiss Government is acquainted, in which the German Government has already expressed its views on this subject in the clearest possible terms.

I have, etc.

Ribbentrop.

The Italian reply is couched in similar terms.

Official communication of the Swiss Federal Council of June 24th, 1938.

The Swiss Ministries in Berlin and Rome were asked to inform the German and Italian Governments that the Federal Council had addressed a Memorandum to the Council of the League of Nations dated April 20th, 1938, informing it of Switzerland's intention no longer in any way to participate in the application of the provisions of the Covenant relating to sanctions, in view of its (Switzerland's) desire to maintain permanent neutrality. At the same time it was mentioned that the Council of the League had adopted on May 14th, a resolution in which it had taken cognizance of that intention and stated that Switzerland would not be asked to participate in sanctions.

The German and Italian Governments replied to this communication on June 21st in almost identical terms. Both expressed their satisfaction that Switzerland should have freed herself from obligations which might have jeopardised her neutrality and stated that Switzerland's desire to remain neutral would always be met by a corresponding desire on their part to recognize and respect her neutrality, which they regarded as a valuable factor of peace in Europe. Both the German and the Italian Governments referred to the statements which they had already made on that subject and took that opportunity once more to confirm.

The Federal Government noted with lively satisfaction the statements of the German and Italian Governments which had been communicated through the usual diplomatic channels and instructed its representatives in Berlin and Rome to convey its thanks for the friendly understanding reflected in these statements and for the valuable assurances contained therein.

2. The change in Belgian foreign policy towards self-reliance and independence.

The changes which Belgian foreign policy has undergone have, together with Switzerland's action, been of the greatest international importance as regards the general movement of the small States towards neutrality. Belgium was always exposed to greater dangers than other countries during European conflicts. After the war, she entered upon an all too close association with France and, in spite of the first-rate authorities on the theory of League of Nations law which she produced, was by her membership of the League inevitably drawn into the wash of French security policy, identified as it was with the policy of collective security, which the League was called upon to carry out as the instrument mainly of the victorious Powers. Not until the conclusion of the alliance between France and Soviet Russia, succeeded shortly after by that between the Soviet Union and Czechoslovakia (May 1936) which increased the interference of the Soviet Union in the workings of European policy still further than the accession of that country to the League of Nations had already done, did Belgium come to realize that it was high time for her to take steps to avoid being implicated in a possible fresh dispute between the Great Powers. The denouncing of the Treaty of Locarno gave Belgium an opportunity of preparing for her neutralization. On October 14th, 1936, King Leopold III delivered his memorable speech in which he declared his intention of releasing Belgium from her one-sided obligations and henceforth, with Holland and Switzerland, adopting an attitude of the strictest neutrality. In April 1937 Belgium obtained, after laborious arguments with Great Britain and France on the guarantees promised by those Powers after the German withdrawal from Locarno, the recognition of her neutrality and release from the military obligations arising out of her alliance with France and the Treaty of Locarno. On October 13th, 1937, Belgium's neutrality was granted, after an exchange of notes, by Germany also.

Belgium's relations with the League of Nations had already been loosened by the step which she took in conjunction with the other small States in the now famous Declaration of the "seven neutrals" of July 1st, 1936. This declaration, it will be remembered, dealt with the consequences of the unsuccessful sanctions war against Italy. The Governments in question reminded the League that certain Articles of the Covenant—in particular the Article on disarmament—had remained a dead letter, while others, such as Article 16 dealing with sanctions, had been applied and pointed out that, as long as the Covenant was not applied consistently and in toto, sanctions must inevitably be governed by the general rules of 1921.

That declaration was the first stage in the escape from the uncertainty attaching to the collective obligations of Geneva. Belgium, more than any other country, was endangered by Article 16, under the terms of whose 3rd paragraph she was required to allow foreign troops to march through her territory. When on April 29th, 1937 Belgium asked the Assembly of the League, through her Foreign Minister M. Spaak, for an official interpretation of the mechanism of sanctions and stated in advance that the right of troops to march through a foreign country could only be enforced with the consent of the country concerned, this view naturally met with opposition from the principle Powers. It is noteworthy that Spaak's declaration almost exactly coincided in time with similar statements made by the Netherlands Foreign Minister, Jonkheer de Graeff, at a meeting of the First Chamber on March 17th, 1937. The latter stated inter alia that the so-called ex-neutrals had made it known in their Geneva Declaration of July 1st, 1936 that in future they would most definitely take the view that they were under no obligation automatically to apply sanctions against an aggressor. There was absolutely no obligation to take military sanctions and they must reserve their attitude with regard to the question of according to foreign troops the right to pass through their country. It would be nothing short of suicide for a small country to allow foreign troops which were proceeding against one of its powerful neighbours to pass through its territory. That view was not at variance with the provisions of Article 16. As no State Member of the League was committed to military action, there could be no obligation to permit other countries to take action which must inevitably lead to complications of a military nature.

While it was finally agreed that Belgium was not automatically committed to active participation in a League war, an attempt was made, in the matter of the transit of troops, to confuse the issue. France in particular took her stand upon the unconditional character of the obligation under Article 16, paragraph 3 and managed, by means of a press campaign which was even carried on in Belgium itself, to give the impression, in spite of the rejection of the French thesis by Spaak, that the question had been solved in accordance with the French view. On the other hand the German declaration, it should be remembered, stated in the clearest terms that the obligation of non-aggression would become null and void in the event of Belgium taking part in any sort of military operations against Germany.

Thus the only "ambiguity" was on the French side and France will have to swallow the fact that, by the Belgo-German exchange of notes of October 13th, 1937, the balance was in fact restored in the Belgian question. Europe can be certain that Belgium sincerely desires to pursue a policy of neutrality in complete independence in the sense of the declarations of King Leopold III and the present Head of the Government.

In the meantime the Geneva institution has received so many rebuffs that the attempts on the part of these countries to free themselves from their collective obligations under the Covenant can hardly meet with any further opposition, apart from the tactless insults of the "apostle of the League of Nations", Litvinov. The election of Belgium to a seat on the Council had no effect on the new Belgian foreign policy, which only made its position still clearer in the direction of the loosening of relations with Geneva. Thus M. Spaak, in his speech in the Chamber on March 17th, 1938, referred to Chamberlain's statement to the effect that the League of Nations in its present state was incapable of furnishing any collective security, that it behoved them to be under no illusions on that score and that that applied especially to the smaller countries. Spaak invoked that statement as a justification of his own policy and said that it proved that the course he was pursuing was the right one. He could not be expected to make a confession of faith in the League if he did not possess such faith. As Foreign Minister, he had no right to found the foreign policy of his country on an ideology which was already falling into disrepute.

The meetings at Oslo, which we discuss below, furnished an occasion for the provisional "winding up" of Belgium's policy with regard to the League and it was Spaak who at those meetings summarised most pertinently the views of the neutral Powers. He said that a system of collective security which did not rest on a universal organisation was ineffective and powerless: "This has compelled us to give to the Covenant of the League of Nations an interpretation which corresponds to the practice of the States Members of the League and confines our obligations to the limits of what is possible."

Belgium's neutrality has thus in many respects become an established fact. Let us however conclude our appreciation of this question of neutrality by repeating (without any desire to qualify in a negative sense what we have said) that, from a strictly scientific point of view, it is not possible to use the word "neutrality" in the classic sense in the case of Belgium any more than in that of most of the present neutrality movements. It is also true that there is no technical expression which would serve to distinguish Belgium's present legal status from her former neutrality. It is significant that Belgium was accorded, under the terms of the Treaty concluded between the Five Great Powers—France, Great Britain, Austria, Prussia and Russia on November 15th, 1831 (which was subsequently replaced by the Treaties between the Great Powers and Belgium and Holland and between these two States on April 19th, 1839) the character of a neutral State and thus in some sort suffered a restriction of sovereignty. Belgium lost the jus ad bellum which every sovereign State enjoyed according to the international law of that day and was thus restricted in her freedom to conclude treaties, inasmuch as she lost the right to conclude any such treaties as could under certain circumstances commit her to war, while in return she was guaranteed the protection of the Great Powers, which also involved a diminution of legal status.

None of these characteristics are present to-day. Belgium's sovereignty is in no way restricted and potentially she retains the right to conclude alliances and make war, nor is there any element of protection. In his proclamation of October 14th, 1936, King Leopold stated that Belgium would in future pursue a policy whose object it would be to preserve her independence, to keep her outside all groups and avoid any participation on her part in disputes between her neighbours. At the same time she will herself defend her frontiers against any attack and prevent her soil from being misused for hostile activities against another country.

3. Hollands neutrality problem.

As regards the neutrality problem of the Netherlands, it is significant how relatively few statements have emanated from Netherlands Government circles. This attitude of reserve maintained in international communications goes to show that the Dutch people and their Government have scarcely departed at all from the traditional principles underlying their policy in regard to neutrality (in spite of their accession to the League of Nations) which is due to the fact that here, as in the case of Switzerland, there is an accumulation of historic and valued liberties of which those concerned will under no circumstances allow themselves to be deprived. While the neutrality movement of Belgium for instance has tended in the direction of a restoration of independence in the matter of foreign policy, the same aspirations have taken rather a different form in the Netherlands, inasmuch as they consist there in the determination to maintain in all things a position of independence of other countries and a particular shade of neutrality which is in some sort determined by the idea of independence.

The Netherlands have been called upon to fight for their neutrality less than other neutrals. They joined the League of Nations because the work of the League during the first few years held the promise of an extension of the machinery of arbitration and with it the peaceful solution of international disputes and for this reason the Netherlands accepted the obligations contained in the Covenant, so to say, as part of the bargain.

In any appreciation of the policy of independence towards Geneva pursued by the Netherlands, it is sufficient to bear in mind that they adopted a negative attitude to attempts made by Lord Robert Cecil in 1922/23 to extend the obligations of the Members of the League in the matter of guarantees and later maintained an attitude of critical reserve in regard to the Geneva Protocol of 1924. The discussion during the Locarno negotiations of the question of the inclusion of the Netherlands in the system of Locarno came as a surprise to many. When it became known that the French Government had, in its instructions to its delegation, recommended the inclusion of the Netherlands in the Locarno system, the then Foreign Minister, Jonkheer van Karnebeek, stated that his Government had never received any invitation to participate in the Locarno Conference.

In 1927, Jonkheer Beelaerts van Blokland became Foreign Minister. Possibly for a time he was inclined to adopt a rather less negative attitude to the question of sanctions. In any case the initiative taken by him in Geneva in 1927 in the matter of a fresh study of the problem of "arbitrage, sécurité et désarmement" was calculated to support that supposition, but he immediately stated that any such intention was as far from his mind as from that of his predecessor, and when, in 1929, the efforts to bring the Covenant of the League into harmony with the provisions of the Kellogg Pact began, Beelaerts himself sought to justify the need for extreme caution, as opposed to certain wishes expressed by the more radical elements in Parliament, by invoking the aversion felt by the Dutch people for any fresh obligations in the matter of sanctions and he behaved with equal reserve during the debates on the first Sino-Japanese dispute at the 1932 Assembly of the League of Nations.

In May 1933, Jonkheer de Graeff took over at the Ministry for Foreign Affairs and soon had occasion to state his views on the principles of Netherlands foreign policy when the then British Prime Minister, Baldwin, in his speech in the House of Commons on June 30th, 1934, which created such a sensation, made his famous remark about England's frontier being the Rhine. In de Graeff's budget speech in the Second Chamber on November 20th, 1934, he referred to Baldwin's speech in the following terms:

"Baldwin's famous remark about the frontiers of the British Empire, which, for the purpose of defending the country from attack, are to be transferred from the cliffs of Dover to the Rhine, was mentioned in the preliminary budget report and in the speeches of some deputies. During the speeches of the Deputies Vliegen and van Dijk, I noted with great satisfaction that they—like the Government—took that remark very calmly and did not attach to it the far-reaching significance with which it has been invested by part of the Dutch and foreign Press. As already stated, the Government had no occasion to ask the British Government for further explanations on the subject and I am in the happy position of being able unreservedly to reassure the Chamber on this point, in so far as this may be necessary. Our Minister in London, as appears from one of the reports received from him during the last few days, was unable to suppress his perfectly natural and under the circumstances justifiable curiosity and took the opportunity of a chance meeting to obtain information from the fountain-head itself, Mr. Baldwin, who told him that his only intention in making the remark to which exception had been taken was to express the truth that, in view of the present development of air communications, the danger of an air attack could not now be regarded as imminent only from the time when enemy aircraft were sighted on the frontiers of the United Kingdom, as in the last war, but that, in view of the great velocity now attained, the necessary warning signals would have to be given when the aircraft were reported to be over the Rhine. It had never occurred to him in that connection to think of any sort of collaboration with the Netherlands or any other Power with a view to the laying out of military aerodromes outside British territory. I have nothing to add to this "authentic" interpretation, but I would repeat once more, in view of the absurd and obstinate rumours concerning military agreements between our country and other countries, that the Netherlands will never relinquish their traditional policy and that it is a mistake to think that Netherlands territory could ever be made available for the defence of another State. We will always be prepared to bear the cost of preserving our own independence—as foreign countries are perfectly well aware—and we do not wish our country to sail in the wake of any European State or group of States."

De Graeff employed similar arguments in the First Chamber at the beginning of February 1937 in regard to the statement contained in Adolf Hitler's speech in the Reichstag on January 30th, 1937. The following is the text of his remarks taken from the parliamentary report:

Statements by the Foreign Minister, M. de Graeff

I

The Minister for Foreign Affairs replied to a written question by M. van Vessem (Nationaal Socialistische Beweging) based on a passage from the German Chancellor's speech of January 30th:

Our Government has not received any assurance from the German Government, addressed to it directly, in the matter of the recognition of Holland as inviolable neutral territory. The passage from the German Chancellor's speech must obviously refer to earlier public pronouncements.

II

The Minister for Foreign Affairs has now replied to the further question put by the member of the First Chamber, van Vessem. The question was whether the Minister was prepared to say to what earlier public pronouncement of the German Führer and Chancellor the following extract from his speech of January 30th obviously, in the opinion of the Minister, referred:

"The German Government has further assured Belgium and Holland that it is prepared at all times to recognize and guarantee those States as inviolable neutral territories."

The Minister stated that he assumed that the passage in question referred to the German Chancellor's communication of March 7th, 1936 to the effect that the German Government was prepared to conclude a pact of non-aggression between Belgium, Germany and France subject to the guarantee of Great Britain and Italy and to admit Holland as a party to such a treaty, if we so desired and the other States concerned agreed thereto. While the Minister is unable to explain the said passage from the German Chancellor's speech of January 30th of this year in any other way, he realizes that the communication of March 7th, 1936 and the text of the passage of which mention has been made on several occasions are not of equally far-reaching importance.

The explanations received from the German Government have confirmed the correctness of the above-mentioned assumption.

Further it appears that the German Chancellor's statement is to be regarded as an offer which is to apply in the event either of a new Western Pact being concluded and a settlement of the question being incorporated in its provisions, or of a settlement by treaty in some other form being reached, should a Western Pact not be concluded.

We thereupon informed the German Government that, while entirely appreciating the good intentions reflected in the offer, we could never entertain the idea of concluding with any country a treaty concerning the inviolability of our frontiers.

Inviolability is for us an axiom and not a suitable subject for a treaty to be concluded by us.

* * *

On March 17th, 1937, de Graeff made the following statement in the First Chamber with reference to the Declaration of the Neutrals of July 1st, 1936:

"It is clear that Article 16 of the Covenant cannot be held to place any Member of the League of Nations under an obligation to take military action. If this is so, however, it cannot oblige a Member of the League to tolerate actions by other States which would make military action unavoidable for that Member."

De Graeff further stated with regard to economic and financial sanctions against an aggressor:

"As in the case of military sanctions, we wish to reserve the right in future to form an independent judgment as to whether we shall participate in economic sanctions or not, and we desire in this way to be in a position to decide for ourselves whether participation in economic sanctions would harm the economic interests of our country to such an extent that it would be an irresponsible act on our part to join the boycott of the aggressor State."

Holland's participation in sanctions was also decided upon under de Graeff's leadership with the unanimous consent of Parliament, which regarded itself as under an obligation in the matter, as it did not wish to be disloyal to the Covenant. However, the turn taken by those sanctions caused the Netherlands Government to abandon, during the discussions on the reform of the League which followed the breakdown of sanctions, the attitude of reserve which it had hitherto maintained.

As early as the end of March 1936, the Netherlands Premier, Dr. Colijn, replied as follows, during the negotiations on the Defence Budget in the First Chamber, to the question whether the Netherlands, as a Member of the League of Nations, would, under certain conditions laid down by the League, have to accord to foreign troops the right to pass through their territory:

"In the event of action being taken against any State within the framework of League procedure, the Netherlands also will have to be convinced that that State is the aggressor and even then we can refuse to allow troops to march through our country against that State. We can only be required to allow troops to pass through if the Council of the League of Nations has unanimously decided who the aggressor is and the Netherlands Government agrees with its view."

This important statement by the Netherlands Premier was not open to any other interpretation than that the Netherlands reserved the right to reexamine even a unanimous decision by the Council in regard to the aggressor, before finally deciding as to their own attitude on the question of foreign troops being allowed to pass through their country. There is no doubt that Dr. Colijn wished, in making this statement, to proclaim, for the benefit both of his own compatriots and of foreign countries, his earnest desire to pursue an unconditional and independent policy of neutrality.

When, after nine long meetings of the Assembly of the League of Nations in the autumn of 1936, the above-mentioned discussions on the reform of the League exhausted themselves for the most part in generalities, the remarks of the Foreign Minister de Graeff found ready listeners especially among the other small States Members of the League. He pointed out that salvation was now being sought in the extension and strengthening of regional agreements, but that the Netherlands had always declined to participate in regional alliances of a political and military character and would therefore, at that juncture also, maintain the utmost reserve in the matter. Side by side with that idea, there was another idea that was gaining ground. There was talk of abolishing sanctions altogether and converting the Covenant into a Consultative Pact. That might appear to be a retrograde step, but they should nevertheless ask themselves the question whether such a change might not be justified, if the universality of the League could be achieved in that way. For many States, the system of sanctions was an obstacle in the way of their collaboration in Geneva. The same view was expressed by M. Patijn (who succeeded M. de Graeff as Foreign Minister) during the debate on the Foreign Affairs Budget in the Second Chamber on November 30th, 1937.

That these statements were the expression of serious conclusions long since arrived at in Holland was shown by the affinity between such conceptions and the judgment of the great Dutch statesman and savant, Professor Struycken, on the League of Nations, contained in a work on the principal characteristics of Netherlands policy published in 1923, shortly before his death. "The power of the League of Nations", he says, "is still small, but our policy must be directed—not towards extending that power as quickly as possible, but on the contrary towards preventing the power of the League from increasing more rapidly than its legal machinery... Our motto must be: better a weak League than a powerful League which is not guided by justice".

The Netherlands finally learned from what happened in the Abyssinian war the lesson that even economic sanctions must either involve danger of war or remain ineffective and that a considerable weakening of the provisions of Article 16 was therefore indicated. As no change in the text of Article 16 is to be expected, the hope is cherished that it may be possible to achieve this object by way of the interpretation of that Article. This was stated by de Graeff in his speech in the Chamber on March 17th, 1937 (which we mentioned above in connection with Belgian policy in regard to neutrality) when he added that not only the ex-neutrals but other countries also were inclined to favour the method of interpretation. This view was confirmed by the Oslo Conference.

"The system of compulsory sanctions raises the question for the small States, whether membership of the League of Nations is not fraught with grave dangers for them."

It was in these unvarnished terms that de Graeff summarized his views with regard to the most recent development.

The prestige enjoyed by Dutch statesmen is shown by the fact that, at the last discussions of the Committee for the Reform of the League, the Netherlands delegate, M. Rütgers, was appointed Rapporteur for Questions connected with Article 16 on sanctions. We published an account of this report in our issue No. 6/7. Although, M. Rütger had to exercise restraint in regard to the expression of his own opinions, mention is made in this report also of the necessity for a decision bearing upon the interpretation of Article 16 in the direction of limiting the obligations under that Article, the reasons adduced in support of this view being lack of universality, the non-fulfilment of Article 8 on disarmament and the disputes concerning the territorial status quo established at Versailles.

In a speech in the 28th Committee in January of this year, M. Rütgers expressed his own view or that of his Government, as published in our issue No. 9. M. Rütgers mentioned among other things that a change in the practice of the League had been effected by tacit agreement, the result of which had been that the League had developed from a society based on the principle of obligatory coercion into one based on optional coercion. Although his further statements did not imply any disagreement with provisional practice, they did create a legal situation which is difficult to reconcile with the "policy of independence" laid down. Membership of the League of Nations—that is, acceptance of Articles 10 and 16 of the Covenant—involved, for the Netherlands also, a break in this policy. In the above-mentioned speech, M. Rütgers defined the view of his Government in the following unequivocal terms: "the Netherlands Government" he said, "has never desired and does not desire to-day a return to the former system of general neutrality. It still supports the system of collective security." He then referred to the manner in which practical policy must necessarily develop in view of present conditions and said: "That need not however prevent us from looking facts in the face and the fact is that the obligation to apply sanctions, as incorporated in the Covenant on the strength of hopes which have not been fulfilled and under conditions which no longer hold good to-day, cannot be regarded as any longer existing. We can say that this obligation is now dead and buried, but we must not forget that burial contains in itself the idea of resurrection".

* * *

Almost simultaneously with Rütger's statement in Geneva, another prominent Dutchman, a former League of Nations High Commissioner in Danzig, J. A. van Hamel, discussed the problem of Netherlands neutrality in an article in the January 1938 issue of the American periodical "Foreign Affairs" entitled "Can the Netherlands be neutral?" The striking thing about his remarks, as compared with the theoretically official view, is the greater frankness of exposition, by which we are enabled to perceive the determination of the Netherlands (not expressly admitted) to return in ever greater measure to the basic principle of neutrality. We will quote a few important passages from this article verbatim, as they are, in our opinion, calculated to throw into relief the probable future course of Netherlands policy:

"We hear from all sides the question: 'Can the Netherlands be neutral?' The reply is: 'What else at the present time can she be?' More and more she is coming back to the fundamental principle of neutrality which, after a long experience with other policies, she took as her guiding doctrine in the nineteenth century—a self-determined neutrality, begotten both of her strong sense of national independence and of her good will towards all her neighbors. She is coming back to this attitude deliberately, by the force of circumstances, after a brief sojourn in that quite different atmosphere of collective security which the Covenant of the League of Nations for a time engendered in Europe."

The establishment of the League profoundly changed the Dutch people's conception of their international position. Under the spell of the League spirit they prepared to abandon the attitude of neutral reserve to which they had learned to look for safety. They willingly shouldered the burdens of League membership in the belief that through the general acceptance of these obligations everybody's peace would be protected. True, from the beginning a few eminent skeptics expressed misgiving. The absence of the United States and of Germany was felt to leave bad gaps in the new front against war. Nevertheless, non-militarist Holland, peaceful and pacifist Holland, commercial Holland, idealistic and unsophisticated Holland, greeted the new plan with satisfaction and on the whole placed her confidence in it. The general assumption prevailed that the old principles of neutrality had been superseded, for under the Covenant the Netherlands would have to side against an aggressor. The time-honored freedom of the neutral to trade with both belligerents would no longer redound to Holland's national prosperity. Her territory would not be closed to the passage of military and naval force acting under international sanction. Even her own armed force might have to participate in collective enterprises.

Holland never quite regarded these various possibilities as practical realities: the mere fact that they existed as hypotheses was supposed to be sufficient guarantee that they never would be given actual application. The juridical force of the collective menace was believed to be so imperative that law-breaking need not again be feared. The Dutch people have a very firm belief in the value of contractual obligations and in the strength of the written word. The majority of them therefore regarded the League of Nations as a definitive safeguard against international mischief. They readily went in for reduction of armaments, for arbitration and conciliation, and for all the rest of the League's program. It became old-fashioned to refer to "neutrality". And after Germany entered the League in 1926, all seemed to be for the best. A few years later came the bitter disenchantment. Collective security failed to prevent energetic governments from taking warlike action to gain their private ends. The Dutch took part in the application of sanctions against Italy, and were sadly disillusioned by the League's failure in this affair. The national state of mind altered profoundly as a result. The Dutch again found their national bark adrift in an unscrupulous and dangerous world. Holland realized that she must reconsider her plans for the defense of her vital interests.

Now the potential dangers which she faces are of two kinds: possible direct aggression by a strong Power, and the possibility that in a conflict between other belligerents she will be prevented from remaining neutral. It may be said in general that, so far as Europe is concerned, Holland is less fearful of deliberate aggression than of violations of her neutrality. The same cannot be said of the Netherlands East Indies, which lie more directly in the expansionist path of other Powers. True, the risk of aggression in Europe cannot be ruled out entirely.

What the Dutch want most is to maintain a clearly defined and rigorous neutrality. They see their country surrounded by Great Powers involved in endless complications. They see themselves as a buffer or as a possible corridor for one side or another in case those complications lead to war. They also see in the Pacific Ocean an arena of conflict. There too the Dutch East Indies are situated at the crossways, much as the mother country is in Europe. Holland does not attribute deliberate warlike intentions to any government; but she knows that if the general situation becomes delicate, her own position will be delicate also.

As the best safeguard of her national existence, Hollands has therefore returned to self-chosen and self-imposed neutrality.

It should be understood that Holland's desire to recapture her previous position of neutrality does not reflect any wish to disavow League principles as such. Her people remain sympathetic with the League's objectives and understand that to resign their membership might be taken as a repudiation of its ideals. They would not want this. But at present they can count on very little security as a result of League intervention and they therefore would not join in any eventual League action. Recent events have shown that other members hold exactly the same views. Better times for the League may perhaps come again. Holland is alive to the fact that great countries like England and France still attach importance to the League. But the Joint Declaration made in July 1936 by the Dutch Government in conjunction with other "smaller" governments clearly stated that Holland must consider herself virtually free from the stipulations of the Covenant concerning collective economic, political or military action. This also implies freedom from the proviso concerning the passage of troops or of naval units acting for the League. The principle that Holland's territory is inviolable is thus reestablished."

These States can certainly not be blamed for not having carried their aspirations in the matter of neutrality to the point of leaving the League of Nations. They were, apart from those who were vanquished in the World War, the only ones who believed sincerely and without arrière-pensée in the League of Nations and its ideals and staked everything on the realization of those ideals. To-day this attitude signifies a sacrifice which, as clearly intimated in the above-mentioned statements by Chamberlain, is unlikely to bring with it any compensatory advantage. Moreover it is questionable whether such a gesture, which would be mainly moral, could in any way affect an institution which is regarded, even by these States, as nothing more nor less than a ruin or at the best as completely impotent.

4. The aspirations of the Nordic States in the matter of neutrality

During 1938 the policy of the Nordic States with regard to neutrality has, under the influence of considerations of realpolitik, suffered remarkable changes in its development away from earlier and more general and theoretical conceptions. The breakdown of the Disarmament Conference, the greater extent to which the Baltic and the Arctic Ocean have been drawn into the sphere of European politics, the effects of the Franco-Soviet Alliance, the war waged by the League of Nations against Italy and finally the statement of the British Prime Minister, Mr. Chamberlain, to the effect that small States should not allow themselves to be lulled by false hopes, as if Geneva could guarantee their security: these are substantially the factors of realpolitik which have in recent times led to an ever closer association of the Nordic States. Originally such association was confined to occasional conferences of Ministers of the three Scandinavian States—Denmark, Norway and Sweden. In April 1937, Finland was brought into closer contact with this circle and this marked the conclusion of the first stage of Nordic cooperation. The former improvised arrangements grew into a firm connection fostered by meetings at regular intervals. In the statement broadcast on April 27th, 1937, the Foreign Ministers of these four States especially stressed the idea of Scandinavian solidarity, which was naturally made the subject of the most varied interpretations. In several statements the public was informed that the association between those States was not based on a formal treaty and was not of a military character, but on the contrary stood out in strong contrast to ententes and blocs. These meetings were in the main spoken of as purely Scandinavian affairs, the question of neutrality in the event of European conflicts being accorded increasing prominence in the light of the general political development. This collaboration coincided in point of time almost exactly with that of other neutral States. The famous "Statement of the seven neutrals" of July 1st 1936, which was submitted to the League of Nations after the breakdown of sanctions by the three Scandinavian States together with Switzerland, the Netherlands, Belgium and Spain, widened the circle and finally the so-called "Oslo States bloc", whose original object was the establishment of general rules for a common economic policy, ended by creating a closer political association between Luxemburg, the Netherlands, Denmark, Norway, Sweden and Finland. The first political conference of the Oslo States was held in Copenhagen from July 22nd and 24th, 1938. It was decided to hold another meeting in Geneva before the beginning of the Assembly of the League in September so that it is to be expected that the declarations of Copenhagen will be one of the principal subjects of discussion during the coming debates in Geneva.

That the developments summarized above have not proceeded without a certain amount of friction must be obvious to all. The question of neutrality and relations with the League of Nations represent different problems for each of these countries, as is proved most clearly by the fact that the results of Oslo (which must be regarded as the last stage), while constituting a fresh political factor, did not involve the rejection of existing legal obligations under the League Covenant.

As regards the Nordic States, the disputes about collective security have given rise to far-reaching differences of opinion which have not yet been removed. It is not long since these States were torn in two between a conception of collective security hitherto defended with theoretical passion and the equally strong desire to free themselves from these ties.

One of the most important starting points for the practical considerations bearing upon the attitude to be adopted in future towards collective security was provided by the visits of the Scandinavian Ministers to Moscow. These visits brought a note of discord into the "Scandinavian Quartett", formed in 1935 to produce harmonious collaboration between Norway, Denmark, Sweden and Finland. Directly it became necessary to make a serious stand against what had hitherto existed as a hypothesis only—the inclusion of Nordic territories in the area covered by the maps of certain General Staffs—the various countries were caught, for longer or shorter periods according to the geographical position and their particular political and ideological bias, in the trap of collective security, the advantages of which were depicted to them in such bright colours by Moscow and whose illusion the Nordic Countries have been less anxious than other neutrals to discard.

While Sweden and Finland, as the immediate neighbours of the Soviet Union, at first offered less resistance to the temptations of Moscow, the others, Denmark and Norway perceived in such a friendship the danger of being harnessed to a collective system of which they could not foresee the outcome.

The "Isvestia" indirectly confirmed those fears at the time, when in a leading article it raised the question whether it was to the interest of small States to conclude bi-lateral agreements with potential aggressors in order to protect their neutrality. It was the policy of the "Fascist" States to recommend their small neighbours to place a neutral garland of that sort round them, but it was unlikely that those aggressive countries would, when the time came, respect the territorial integrity of the small countries. The latter could not therefore protect their independence and territorial security by means of neutrality, but only by a strengthening of the "potentiels de paix" or "peace front" of the other States.

However, after this short intermezzo, the steady poisoning of the international atmosphere and the incomplete and inconsistent decisions of the League of Nations immediately gave a further stimulus to the neutrality policy of the Nordic countries, as shown by a number of demonstrations in the different parliaments, by statesmen and in the Press.

A good definition of the Nordic conception of neutrality was furnished by the Swedish Foreign Minister, M. Sandler, in the following statement to the Press on the occasion of his visit to Paris on March 20th, 1937:

"People imagine that the Nordic countries are a neutral group, but I admit that I, for my part, do not much care for that expression, as it is apt to be confusing. The necessary distinction is not always drawn between the legal and the political idea of neutrality. The legal conception of neutrality applies to war-time and neutral policy to peace-time. Speaking for myself and for my country, I prefer to speak of "neutral attitude", which may be defined as follows: Sweden is against a policy of alliances and not prepared to allow herself to be involved in combinations which would have the effect of hampering her freedom of action when she most needed it. Instead of neutral States, one should speak of States without alliances." M. Sandler supplemented and amplified these remarks in his great speech at Upsala on November 6th 1937.

The predominant view was expressed in the Liberal "Stockholms Tidningen" in July 1937, when it said that the task of keeping the Spanish Civil War within bounds was a matter for the Great Powers concerned: "Sweden's foreign political interests are confined to the Nordic and Baltic States; we have no cause to commit ourselves in any way outside the clearly defined geographical limits of this area."

At the same time, the "Göteborgs Handels och Sjöfartstidning" came out still more unmistakably in favour of Sweden immediately leaving the League of Nations and expressed the fear that the small countries would, if they remained in the League any longer, be obliged to play the dangerous and humiliating role of pawns in the English political game: "We shall become puppets in a game played according to rules which do not correspond to any accepted legal standards. We are running the risk of being involved in complications which do not concern us, but only affect the interests of the Great Powers and have nothing to do with justice or injustice. Collective security has been replaced by collective insecurity."

On June 17th, 1938, the Swedish Parliament approved by 153 votes to 43 a report of the Foreign Affairs Committee, which contained the following passage:

"The Committee desires most strongly to support the attitude adopted by the Swedish Government in the 28th (Reform) Committee in the matter of the freedom of action of States Members of the League with regard to Article 16. Naturally the Swedish Government will continue to adopt this attitude during discussions on the problem of sanctions within the framework of the League of Nations and in further discussions in the 28th Committee and on all other occasions. It is clearly desirable for Sweden to reserve her freedom of action in the matter of sanctions and this was generally recognized by the States Members to be compatible with a loyal interpretation of the present position. It will be for the Government however, in consultation with the Foreign Affairs Committee and with other Governments with which our country commonly collaborates in the League of Nations, to decide as to the time when and the form in which such recognition can best be accorded."

The same intention on the part of Norway was expressed in King Haakon's Speech from the Throne in February 1938. "Norway" he said "must always regard it as one of the tasks of her policy to keep the country out of all warlike entanglements."

The great speech of the Norwegian Foreign Minister, M. Koth, during the debates on foreign policy in the Storting in July 1937 had already left no doubt that Norway did not wish on any account to participate in the political disputes for power in Europe. M. Koth stated with brutal frankness that the League of Nations also had become an instrument of the Great Powers in the pursuit of their own interests and the small States would therefore be compelled to review their position at Geneva. The most important condition of their remaining in the League was that their neutrality should not be jeopardized by the provisions of Article 16 relative to sanctions, which had given a totally new significance to the conception of neutrality. The gist of his remarks was that Norway and the rest of the North must under all circumstances remain neutral and should regard it as the sole task of their foreign policy to keep clear of any war in Europe.

On May 31st, the Norwegian Parliament adopted the following Resolution :

"With reference to the statements contained in the Speech from the Throne to the effect that it must ever be the aim of Norwegian policy to keep clear of warlike entanglements, the Storting holds fast to the principle that the country has a right to preserve complete and unconditional neutrality in any war which Norway does not regard as a proper subject for action by the League of Nations."

As regards Denmark, her desire for neutrality is evidenced by the fact that she did not follow the example of her Nordic friends in the matter of armaments—a fact which has called down upon her head many a reproach from the latter. In reply to the reproach that Denmark was going her own way without reference to the Scandinavian family, the Danish Premier, M. Stauning, said that military assistance had never been accorded to Denmark in times of emergency by her Nordic neighbours: indeed Sweden, Norway and Finland would not be in a position to do so. The members of the Nordic group could only give one another moral support. A member of the Minister's entourage expressed this by saying that it was no use "dressing up dwarfs as giants". Denmark's neutrality policy was based on her impartiality and on the Declaration of the Neutral States of July 1st, 1936, which was generally regarded as a moral release from the League of Nations. The Foreign Minister, M. Munch, who holds the view that the idea of the League of Nations must continue to be fostered in the direction of the universality of the League and its mission of conciliation, has always warned those concerned against making it into a league of States with similar political and social tendencies. In an interview published in the "Nationaltidende" of June 15th, 1938, he explained the fact of the smaller States remaining in the League by saying that it was a safeguard against the League becoming an alliance.

The statements in which M. Munch described the reasons for and aims of the Copenhagen Conference contained the following passage :

"Our countries form neither an alliance nor an entente. Each has her own problems. We are however sufficiently united by our common will to peace. We are determined to keep outside all disputes which might arise between the various political groups. We abhor the idea of a world war, but, if such a war were to break out, we would do our utmost to avoid being drawn into it..."

Finland also, having eluded Russian pressure, has been steadily moving nearer to the views of the other Northern countries. After the Nordic neutrality rules came into force for Finland at the beginning of June, the President of the State, M. Kallio, stated in Parliament on May 20th, 1938, with express reference to the Nordic orientation of the country, that Finland reserved full freedom of action as regards the application of the provisions of Article 16.

An important practical step in the direction of neutrality is constituted by the military neutrality rules drawn up between Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Iceland and Finland and published on May 27th, after the signing of a declaration in Stockholm.

These rules substantially represent the redrafting and modernization (necessitated by the development of the technique of war) of the old neutrality rules of 1912, which again are based on the provisions of the Hague Convention of October 18th, 1907 concerning the rights and duties of neutrals in maritime warfare. The new rules deal mainly with questions of the admission to neutral ports and territorial waters of warships belonging to belligerents and their rights and duties during their stay. The provisions regarding submarines, aircraft and wireless are new and couched in much sharper terms.

The following is the text of these rules, as published in the Geneva "Journal des Nations" of July 14th:

DECLARATION OF NEUTRALITY

On May 27th, 1938, the representatives of Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden signed the following declaration in Stockholm.

The Governments of Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden,

Considering that it is desirable that the neutrality rules to be applied by them in a war between foreign Powers should be couched in identical terms,

Have, on the basis of the Declaration of December 21st 1912 on the same subject agreed upon between Denmark, Norway and Sweden, drafted the attached texts of neutrality rules, as they are to be established by each of the said Governments severally."

They agree that, in the event of one or other of these Governments desiring to alter the said rules on the strength of its experiences, as provided for in the Hague Convention concerning the rights and duties of neutral Powers in maritime warfare signed on October 18th, 1907, it shall not make such alteration without, if possible, advising the four other Governments in advance in sufficient time to render possible an exchange of opinions on the matter.

In confirmation whereof, the undersigned, having been empowered in writing by their Governments, signed the above declaration and affixed their seals thereto.

Done at Stockholm, on May 27th, 1938.

In pursuance of the above declaration, the same Governments published the Neutrality Rules in June. The texts vary as regards the provisions relating to territory, but are almost identical as regards the principles which they incorporate. It will therefore suffice to reproduce one of the texts only—that of Denmark's Neutrality Rules.

Neutrality Rules.

Article 1. Warships belonging to the belligerents will be granted access to the harbours and other territorial waters of the Kingdom, subject to the following exceptions, restrictions and conditions.

Article 2. 1. Warships belonging to belligerents are denied access to the harbour and roadstead of Copenhagen and to the harbours and other waters which have been declared to be war harbours or belong to the areas under the protection of the coastal defence organizations.

2. Warships belonging to the belligerents are also denied access to inner waters, the entrance to which is blocked by submarine mines or other methods of defence.

By inner Danish waters is meant the harbours, the approaches to harbours, gulfs and bays and the waters which lie between and this side of those Danish islands, islets and reefs, which are not permanently under water. Nevertheless in the part of Danish territorial waters situated in the Cattegat, the Great and Little Belt and the Sund, which forms the natural commercial routes between the North Sea and the Baltic, only the harbours and the approaches to the harbours and the roadstead of Copenhagen are deemed to be inner waters.

3. Armed submarines belonging to the belligerents are forbidden to enter or remain in Danish territorial waters.

This prohibition shall not however apply to ships passing without unnecessary delay through the zone of the outer Danish waters which form the natural commercial routes between the North Sea and the Baltic in the Cattegat, the Great and Little Belt and the Sund, with the exception of the roadstead of Copenhagen, through which no ships shall be allowed to pass in view of the fact that it comes under the category of inner waters; nor shall it apply to the passage of submarines which are compelled as a result of the state of the sea or of damage suffered to enter the forbidden waters and make known the cause of their presence in those waters by means of an international signal. The said submarines must leave the forbidden waters as soon as the cause of their entry has been removed. In Danish territorial waters, submarines must always fly their national flag and, except in cases of most urgent necessity, may only proceed on the surface.

4. The King reserves the right, where there are special circumstances and in order to command respect for sovereign rights and to maintain the neutrality of the Kingdom, to forbid access to Danish harbours and other zones deemed to be Danish territorial waters, in addition to those, access to which is already forbidden by the above-mentioned provisions, subject to the observance of the general principles of international law.

5. The King similarly reserves the right to forbid access to Danish harbours and docks to any warships belonging to the belligerents which have failed to abide by the provisions issued by the competent Danish authorities or have violated the neutrality of the Kingdom.

Article 3. Pirate ships may not enter Danish harbours or remain in Danish territorial waters.

2. Access to Danish waters is also forbidden to armed merchantmen belonging to the belligerents, when their arms are intended for purposes other than defence.

Article 4. 1. Warships belonging to the belligerents are forbidden to remain in Danish harbours or in Danish docks or other Danish territorial waters for more than 24 hours, save in cases of damage or of running aground as a result of the state of the sea or in the cases enumerated under Nos 3 and 4 above. In such cases, they must leave as soon as the causes of delay have been removed. In the case of damage suffered or of running aground, the competent Danish authority shall fix a time-limit which shall be sufficient to allow of the damage being repaired or the ship being rendered seaworthy. No extension of the period of stay over and above 24 hours will be accorded, if it appears that the ship cannot be made seaworthy within a reasonable period or if the damage has been caused by a warlike act of the adversary.

The above provisions relating to the limit of stay do not apply to warships exclusively engaged on a religious, scientific or humanitarian task or to military hospital ships.

2. The greatest number of warships of a belligerent Power or several allied Powers allowed to remain at the same time in a Danish harbour or dock, or in harbours or docks of the same coastal district of Denmark if that coast is divided into districts for the purpose, is three.

3. If warships of the two belligerent Parties are in a Danish harbour or dock at the same time, at least 24 hours must elapse between the departure of a vessel of the one Party and that of a vessel of the other Party, the times of departure being reckoned according to the times of arrival, in so far as the state of the vessel which arrived first is such as to allow of an extension of stay being granted.

4. A warship of the belligerent Powers may not leave a Danish harbour or dock, in which there is a merchant vessel belonging to the adversary, earlier than 24 hours before the departure of the merchant vessel. The competent authorities shall so regulate the departure of the merchant vessel as to avoid an unnecessary extension of the period of stay of the warship.

Article 5. 1. Warships of the belligerents may only repair damage in Danish harbours and docks in so far as this is absolutely necessary for their safety. They may in no case increase their military strength. In repairing damage clearly caused by warlike acts of the adversary, no assistance of any kind which the damaged vessels could obtain on Danish territory may be claimed. The competent Danish authorities shall determine the nature of the repairs to be carried out. The repairs must be carried out as quickly as possible and within the time-limit provided for in Article 4, 1.

2. Warships of the belligerents are forbidden to use Danish harbours or other Danish territorial waters in order to renovate or strengthen their military equipment or armaments or to enlarge their crews.

3. Warships of the belligerents may only take in supplies in Danish harbours or docks in order to satisfy their normal peace requirements.

4. In Danish harbours and docks, warships of the belligerents are, in the matter of supplies of fuel, subject to the same regulations as other foreign vessels. They may therefore only ship enough fuel to enable them to reach the nearest harbour in their own country and in no case any quantity exceeding that required for filling up their bunkers or their receptacles with liquid fuel. After filling up with fuel in one of the harbours or docks of the Kingdom, they may not take in a fresh provision in its harbours or docks within the next three months.

Article 6. War vessels of the belligerents are required to employ the services of pilots appointed for the purpose in all cases in which the employment of such services is compulsory. In other cases, they may not employ such pilots save in case of emergency or to escape a danger of the sea.

Article 7. 1. It is forbidden to bring prizes of foreign nationality into one of the Danish harbours or docks, save in cases of unseaworthiness, stormy weather at sea or lack of fuel or food. Any prize brought into a Danish harbour or dock for the above-mentioned reasons must leave immediately after such cause has been removed.

2. No prize court may be set up by a belligerent on Danish territory or on a ship in Danish territorial waters. The sale of prizes in a Danish harbour or dock is also forbidden.

Article 8. Military aircraft of the belligerents, with the exception of air ambulances and aircraft carried on warships, shall not be allowed on Danish territory, save under the terms of other provisions to be applied to certain areas in accordance with the general principles of international law.

The said aircraft may without unnecessary delay pass through the Danish outer territorial waters which connect the North Sea with the Baltic by way of the Cattegat, the Great and Little Belt and the Sund, and the air above that route. No aircraft is allowed to pass through the roadstead of Copenhagen or the air above it. In all cases, aircraft must, when passing, keep as far away from the coast as possible.

2. Aircraft transported on warships by belligerents may not leave those ships, as long as they are in Danish territorial waters.

Article 9. 1. Warships and military aircraft of the belligerents must observe the sovereign rights of the Kingdom and abstain from all actions in violation of such neutrality.

2. All hostile acts are forbidden within Danish territorial frontiers, including the holding up, searching and seizure of vessels and aircraft, whether these belong to neutrals or to the adversary. Any ship or aircraft seized must immediately be freed with officers, crew and cargo.

Article 10. Police and harbour police regulations regarding health, pilots, Customs, navigation and aviation must be strictly observed.

Article 11. The belligerents are forbidden to use Danish territory as a basis of military operations against their adversaries.

Article 12. The belligerents and persons in their service are forbidden to construct or use wireless stations on [Danish territory, or any other apparatus capable of being employed as a means of communicating with the belligerent land, maritime and air forces.

2. The belligerent Powers are forbidden to use their portable wireless stations for communications on Danish territory, whether they belong to the fighting forces or not, save in the case of emergency or for communicating with the Danish authorities through a Danish land or coastal wireless station or a wireless station on a vessel belonging to the Danish navy.

Article 13. All observations of movements of troops, operations or defensive measures of a belligerent which can be made from aircraft or in any other way, in order to communicate them to other belligerents, are forbidden on Danish territory.

Article 14. 1. The belligerents are forbidden to set up fuel depots on the territory of the Kingdom or on board any ships stationed in its territorial waters.

2. Vessels or aircraft which are obviously proceeding for the purpose of supplying the fighting forces of the belligerents with fuel or other necessities are forbidden to supply themselves in Danish harbours or docks with any quantity thereof exceeding their own requirements.

Article 15. The equipping or arming on Danish territory of a ship intended to be used against one of the belligerents or to participate in warlike operations is forbidden. Any aircraft used for attacks upon a belligerent, or carrying any apparatus or material whose works or method of employment is such as to enable it to attack, is forbidden to leave Danish territory, if there is any reason to suspect that it is to be used against a belligerent Power. It is also forbidden to carry out work on an aeroplane with the intention of enabling it to depart for the above-mentioned purpose.

Now that we are acquainted with the results of the anxiously awaited Conference of Ministers of the Oslo Powers in Copenhagen of July 22nd-24th, 1938, it is interesting for the sake of comparison, to review the various opinions, desires and hopes expressed before and since that Conference.

That was the first time that, on the proposal of the Norwegian Foreign Minister, M. Mowinkel, the Oslo group had gone beyond the consideration of economic aims and met to discuss problems of foreign policy. The question of further adherence to the League of Nations was, it is clear, at once the cause and the subject-matter of these secret deliberations, the results of which had to be deduced by the public from a communiqué couched in very general terms and from after-dinner speeches and statements to the Press by those who took part in the deliberations.

It is true that before the Conference—probably to mitigate the contrast between the demonstrations in Parliament and the probable poverty of final achievements—it was pointed out that this meeting must only be regarded as the starting point of common action, for the demonstrations in the parliaments of the various countries were calculated to give the impression that they had achieved or were about to achieve a great change in their League policy—both factual and in its bearing upon international law. As no League of Nations could in practice do anything against such decisions, the question of the form in which such change would receive its international legal character was ignored.

There were indeed two examples of how boldly to achieve so-called "equality of treatment in neutrality": Belgium and Switzerland.

On the occasion of the coming conference, the most widely read Scandinavian paper, the Liberal "Stockholms Tidningen" requested the responsible statesmen of the Netherlands, Belgium and Switzerland to state their views on what was to be the principal subject of discussion at the Conference: namely, the tendency of the small nations to move away from the Geneva policy of "collective security" or, to express it in a positive form, their return to the old policy of neutrality. The Netherlands Premier M. Colijn, the Belgian Premier M. Spaak and the Swiss Federal Councillor M. Motta replied to this request. Each of these three statesmen, speaking for his own country, pointed out that it had been necessary to return by way of armed neutrality to a policy based on individual responsibility. They now called themselves "free from alliances" because they desired to be independent of every combination, including the association of interests represented by the League of Nations.

M. Colijn remarked that collective security was an impossible idea to-day.

Belgium and Switzerland had managed by steadfastness and tenacity to obtain recognition of their claims. The object of the meeting in Copenhagen could therefore only be to proclaim for the others also the urgent necessity of regaining their unrestricted neutrality.

On the day on which the Conference opened, the Copenhagen "Berlingske Aftenavis" summarized at length the essential points to be discussed. It said:

"The seven States are inspired by the common hope that the forces of agreement and collaboration in the world may be able to continue to determine developments, and they for their part, will be prepared to make their contribution. They have a common guiding principle in foreign policy—neutrality. Their characteristics and position show many points of difference which influence their views and attitude in the changing situations in which they are placed, but they are united in the desire not to be participants in the general political game, but to maintain their impartiality in regard to the opposing parties. It must be the aim of their policy to strengthen their position and to render it so clear and unequivocal that there may be no doubt in regard thereto and that it may inspire confidence. It will be their aim at the Copenhagen Conference clearly to lay down and elucidate the conditions and prerequisites of neutrality policy and the possibilities in regard to securing the maximum protection for that policy. Thus the question of membership of the League of Nations and the obligations arising therefrom will form one of the main subjects of discussion. Not only is the League of Nations going through a period of weakness, but it must be established upon an entirely new foundation, if it is to be enabled to make a contribution to international cooperation. In the circumstances, it is necessary, if the dangers and difficulties of membership of the League are not to be too unfairly disproportionate to the value of participation in its work, that it should be made abundantly clear that the impartial neutrality at which the Oslo States are aiming will not be restricted by their League obligations, or in other words that there is no possibility of of their being compelled, as a result of those commitments, to take part in any conflicts which might arise between the Great Powers. It is a matter of common knowledge that the prerequisites for the application of the sanctions paragraph are no longer present, but the small neutral States must guard against the possibility of being faced, in different circumstances, with an attempt to revive obligations, the fulfilment of which would involve the sacrifice of their freedom of action and cause their neutrality policy to be regarded with distrust."

What were the results of the Conference?

The communiqué issued on the negotiations reads as follows:

"The Foreign Ministers of Belgium, Denmark, Finland, Luxemburg, the Netherlands, Norway and Sweden met in Copenhagen on July 23rd and 24th in order jointly to examine the international situation. They are aware that this situation gives cause for disquietude, but remain confident that the nations and their statesmen will take all necessary steps to find peaceful solutions of the present serious disputes.

The countries represented at Copenhagen are prepared actively to participate in any attempt to bring about international conciliation in a spirit of impartiality and independence with regard to the various combinations.

The Foreign Ministers are not insensible of the dangers attending the armaments race and are unanimously of opinion that every possibility of concluding an international agreement which will put an end to this race must be examined. They are determined in particular to support every endeavour to prepare a convention relating to bombing from the air.

The Ministers are convinced that the continued collaboration of their countries with the League is justified and declare that their Governments are determined to observe a definite policy designed to favour an interpretation of the sanctions system which will, in view of the present position and the practice of the last few years, deprive it of its compulsory character. They are of opinion that this non-compulsory character should apply not only in the case of particular groups of States, but in that of all Members of the League.

The Ministers are persuaded that it is in the interests of the League that this right of free judgment should be expressly laid down and they are prepared to examine in this sense the report of the 28th Committee, which is to be submitted to the Assembly for its consideration. Finally, they desire that the League of Nations shall to a greater extent than before concentrate on the prevention of conflicts and on international cooperation.

The Ministers agree to leave in force the agreements on questions of common interest which have been signed by them."

This communiqué certainly came as a disappointment to many. The Copenhagen "Berlingske Tidende" for instance was by no means edified thereby and said that "its emptiness was covered by an ornamental exterior." Most importance was attached to the statement that the countries concerned desired to remain outside disputes. The intention to dissociate themselves from the attempts at political activity in Geneva may also fairly be deduced from the terms of the communiqué. The view that Article 16 should be non-compulsory, not only for certain groups of States i.e. the neutrals, but for all Members, is certainly of importance in connection with the coming discussions in Geneva and would seem to imply a wish to restrict the sphere of activity of certain States for whom that Article is not sufficiently compulsory.

Article 16 was of course the main subject of discussion at the Conference. In the meantime the question has been shelved, but has not on that account ceased to exist for those States. The "dead Article 16" will possibly now, after that Conference, exercise the minds of the Nordic peoples more than ever, for it seems to us that such a result as that achieved is to be attributed to some extent to negative considerations of a personal nature.

Many of the Ministers concerned, such as Lange, Mowinkel, Hambro, Munch, Koth and Sandler are not only statesmen of their countries, but also persons who for twenty years have been as much at home in Geneva as in their own capitals. Their personal relations with international circles and the fact that, by dint of presiding over every kind of League Committee for years, they became in some sort the creators and interpreters of League of Nations law was no doubt in part responsible for their not claiming any "special rights", such as those which Switzerland and Belgium obtained as a result of the determined attitude adopted by them. In this connection, the arguments put forward after the Conference by the Copenhagen "Politiken" to explain Munch's view seem to us very significant: it was not expedient to demand express recognition by the League of the attitude of the treaty-free States to the sanctions system as, if it were demanded and not granted, the position of those States in the League would be weakened and a refusal of this demand would inevitably and automatically lead to their withdrawal from the League.

The doubts as to how far it was expedient and possible to go and the fact that the Copenhagen Conference generally gave the impression that it was for the time being only a question of putting out feelers in the direction of real neutrality seem to be weak points in the Conference, which the adversaries in Geneva will certainly not be slow to exploit, unless the preliminary Conference which has been planned manages to make the position still clearer in this respect. Then and then only could Copenhagen be regarded as a milestone.

THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT AND THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

From the speeches of the British Foreign Minister, Lord Halifax, in the House of Lords on February 17th and 24th, 1938

In so far as the speeches had been concerned with the League of Nations, there had been those who had found fault with the Government's policies for being too weak and who would have liked to go farther and act with far greater firmness, in connexion with Article XVI, and there had been those who frankly regarded that article and the other articles connected with it as dangerous and provocative and as genuine hindrances to international cooperation.

A statement made by Lord Arnold, in arguing the case for isolation, was sufficiently important to deserve specific reference. He said: "In isolation there is a very good chance of keeping out of the next war, whereas under League policy there was no such chance at all. Under League policy, whether war comes, wherever it is or whatever it is about, Great Britain is bound to be in it, and not only in the next European war but in all European wars."

He really cannot believe that that statement in these simple terms is true, and I am sure that on reflection he would agree that in these simple terms it is apt, to one less informed than himself, to be dangerously misleading.

It is important, I think, for me to remind your lordships how the Foreign Secretary some 15 months ago defined quite clearly the military obligations of this country in a speech at Leamington. He there defined them in specific terms. I make this assertion with complete precision that there are no other military commitments for this country and that in every other case his Majesty's Government would be wholly free to act as they might in all the circumstances of the time think right.

I do not think that it is either possible, or even always desirable, for any country to state precisely when it would or would not feel it right to enter upon armed resistance. I am quite certain it is not possible.

While I share, as we all do, repugnance to war and the need for public opinion being behind any war, I cannot feel that it is either politically practicable or morally justifiable for the country to pretend that it can disinterest itself in what goes on in the great world outside.

The broad purpose of foreign policy of any Government of this country must be to pursue that which was the greatest of all British interests—namely, peace, and if at any time 100 per cent. success in that pursuit is impossible—and that is not a matter that lies wholly in the hands of the British Government—it will still remain the object of the British Government to protect as much as possible the cause of peace.

But inasmuch as the world never stands still, we have to be on our guard to see that the assertion of those principles is not distorted into an attempt to obstruct all change, which is one of the primary laws of all human life. Not the least of the problems confronting us to-day is to make provision for the security of peace which must not exclude peaceful revision and change where such may rightly be required.

* * *

Last Thursday (February 17th) I spoke in this House on general foreign policy and the League of Nations. Every word of that speech was approved by the then Foreign Secretary. I can assure your lordships that what was our policy last week remains our policy to-day, and foreign nations would be seriously mistaken who thought that recent events betokened any change. In the course of that speech—also approved by the then Foreign Secretary, I said this:—

“Let us not forget that, whatever be the place in our philosophy we give to the League of Nations, the League of Nations itself is only a great means to the greater end of international peace, and if it is possible to reach agreements which really offer international appeasement through machinery other than the League, I can hardly suppose there would be any member of the League so short-sighted as to grudge their conclusion.”

On Tuesday last in the House of Commons the Prime Minister addressed himself to rebut this charge of desertion of the League of Nations, and spoke with great frankness upon the question of collective security. While Lord Cecil was arguing with great vigour and great force upon how terrible a thing it was for the Prime Minister to have used words suggesting to smaller nations that they could no longer rely upon collective security, the thought was passing constantly in and out of my mind whether he was quite oblivious and careless of the danger of the possibility of deceiving small nations into reliance upon support which would not, in fact, be forthcoming.

I have seen the history of Abyssinia. I believe that this country honestly tried to do its best, with other members of the League of Nations, to deal with Abyssinia. I know that those members of the League and this country failed. I know that the result of that failure was to deceive the Emperor of Abyssinia into expecting that he was going to get support greater than in fact he did receive, and I do not want to see that experience repeated.

From the speeches of the British Prime Minister,
Mr. Neville Chamberlain, in the House of Commons on March 24th and April 8th, 1938

For a long time a majority of the people of this country have cherished the belief that in the League of Nations we had found an instrument which was capable of enforcing and maintaining peace. Some recent words of mine have in some quarters been taken to mean that there has been a sudden change in the attitude of his Majesty's Government, not only to the thesis that the League could give us security, but to the League itself; that we had thrown over the League, and that we had abandoned it as one of the principal elements in our policy.

I do not deny that my original belief in the League as an effective instrument for preserving peace has been profoundly shaken. That arises from the present condition of the League itself. But it has not arisen from any recent events. As long ago as June, 1936, speaking in London, I referred to the failure of the policy of collective security to prevent war, or to stop war when it had once begun, or to save the victims of aggression. I went on to say:

There is no reason why, because the policy of collective security, in the circumstances in which it was tried, has failed, we should therefore abandon the idea of the League and give up the ideals for which the League stands. If we have retained any vestige of common sense, surely we must admit that we have tried to impose upon the League a task which was beyond its powers to fulfil.

I have not changed the views that I expressed nearly two years ago. I have not ceased to believe in the possibility that the League might be so revived and so strengthened as to serve as an effective instrument for the preservation of peace. But I say that is not the position to-day.

It may be contended that I am giving too restricted an interpretation of the phrase “collective security”. After all, for practical purposes it is not necessary for collective security to ensure the cooperation of every one of the 58 nations which still remain members of the League, provided that we can get the cooperation of a sufficient number to present a front of overwhelming power to any potential aggressor. Indeed, it might be plausibly argued that to deal with a smaller number of nations and to dispense with the somewhat slow and cumbersome machinery of Geneva might be a way of dealing with the problem of the lightning strokes of modern war or warlike operations, far simpler than the older method of collective security through the League as a whole.

I think that from the practical point of view there is much to be said for a proposition of that kind. I would make only two observations upon it. The first is this: However completely we encase such a proposal as that in the Covenant of the League, however wholeheartedly the League may be prepared to give its sanction and approval to such a project, as a matter of fact it does not differ from the old alliances of pre-War days, which we thought we had abandoned in favour of something better.

A second observation that I would like to make is that the value of such alliances as that as a deterrent to possible aggression must obviously depend upon their military efficiency—upon the numbers and equipment of the forces that can be mobilized, on their distribution in relation to the area in which they might have to be employed, and on the amount of preparation and coordination of plans which it might be possible to achieve beforehand.

But there is one conclusion which, I think, emerges from that brief review. I stress it because it seems to me to be a corollary both of the failure of the League for the moment to provide us with collective security, and also of the conditions which would alone make any form of collective security effective as a deterrent. The conclusion I draw is this: that if Great Britain is to make a substantial contribution towards the establishment of what I have described once again as our greatest interest, she must be strongly armed for defence and counter-offence.

If ever the time comes when the world establishes an international police force which will inspire us all with full confidence in its capacity to keep the peace, then there will be no need for us to trouble our heads about our own defence; it will be done for us. But until that day comes—and I am afraid it is a great way off yet—we must think first of the safety of this country and the safety of the peoples for whom we are responsible.

No, believe me, the Government have a very clear and definite foreign policy, which they keep always before them, and which they continue to pursue by various methods according to the circumstances of the time. The object of that policy is to maintain peace and to give confidence to the people, if that be possible, that peace will be maintained so that they may all go about their occupations free from a sense of menace lurking always in the background.

Our policy is based upon two conceptions. The first is this: That, if you want to secure a peace which can be relied upon to last, you have got to find out what are the causes of war and remove them. You cannot do that by sitting still and waiting for something to turn up. You have got to set about it. You have got to inform yourself what are the difficulties, where are the danger spots, what are the reasons for any likely or possible disturbance of the peace; and, when you have found that out, you must exert yourself to find the remedy.

The second conception is this: In any armed world you must be armed yourself. You must see to it that your preparations, or defensive and offensive forces, are so organized and built up that nobody will be tempted to attack you, but that, on the contrary, when your voice is raised for peace it will be listened to with respect. These, then, are the two pillars of our foreign policy—to seek peace by friendly discussion and negotiations, and to build up our armed forces to a level which is proportionate to our responsibilities and to the part we desire to play in preserving peace.

I may be asked: "Where in all this does the League of Nations come in?" "Why don't you call in collective security to your aid?" "Must we take it that those splendid ideals which animated us when the League was started have got to be abandoned?" We have never mocked at the League. We do not yield to anyone in our devotion to those great and splendid ideals. We still intend to seize every opportunity that we can find to build up and strengthen the League and to restore it to a condition in which it may once again become an effective instrument for the preservation of peace.

But to-day we have got to face the facts as they are. To-day, before we attempt to impose upon the League, from which some of the most powerful countries in the world have become alienated, the formidable task of preserving peace, we must do a little clear thinking. Collective security can only be attained by the willingness and the capacity of the members of the League to take collective action of a kind which is effective enough to stop aggression. Is the League in such a state as to be able to do that to-day?

A little while ago I asked the Opposition in the House a question—and mind you this was before the recent events in Austria. I asked them whether they could name one single small State in Europe to-day, which, if it were menaced by a powerful neighbour, could rely upon the League alone to give it collective security. They did not—they could not—answer that question, because they knew the only honest answer would be that there was no such State, because there was no such collective security available. That is not to be disloyal. The true disloyalty to the League lies in pretending that the League to-day is capable of functions which are clearly beyond its power. Do not let us be guilty of that kind of disloyalty.

Do not let us either abandon the idea of a bigger and better League in the future. Let us rather seek to create a new atmosphere of good will in the world, because that is the essential preliminary of a League that will work.

From Lord Halifax's speech in the House of Lords on July 27th, 1938

Two years ago the League of Nations had, by its withdrawal of sanctions against Italy, acknowledged its incapacity in that instance to stop a war. As a result of political developments since the foundation of the League it had become clear, even to the most loyal League supporter, that a system, which not only provided a code of international behaviour but sought to enforce that code in the world, could not be expected to function in all cases successfully unless one primary condition was fulfilled.

That was that all the principal Powers should wholeheartedly be in the League and all be subject to a general system of limitation of armaments. Until they could get a system under which all nations were prepared to forgo the statement of their sovereignty and accept universal arbitration, it was impossible for Lord Davies's court of equity to be expected to function successfully. All that could not happen unless all nations were disarmed and an international force had the field to itself.

If they had those two things happening, they would never solve the problem, unless nations believed that every other nation would keep the rules. The world to-day was not ready to make those things, which were the ideals of them all, actually real at the present time. The question arose whether it was better to preserve on paper a general and wide obligation although they might know that when the test came it might well not be found capable of fulfilling it, or better to recognize the facts and make the best of them and not lay a greater burden on the nations than they were willing to sustain. The League was to-day faced with the necessity of taking a decision that would affect its whole future.

If he thought the League was done, he would be a pessimist. In that matter he was disposed to be more optimistic than a noble lord who had spoken. He did not believe that it was beyond human ingenuity to devise means whereby the ideals of the League were preserved; with, on the one hand, its practical limitations recognized and, on the other, the way left open to make the fullest use they could, now and in the future, of its immense potentialities as an instrument of peace.

There were certain principles which must underlie a solution such as that. The primary object of the League was to prevent war. That was the negative way of stating it. The positive way was that the League should provide means of depriving any State of a legitimate excuse, if such there be, for resorting to force. Secondly, they should do all they could for the establishment of the rule of just law by strengthening the machinery for the examination and adjudication of disputes.

Thirdly, they must find means for removing potential causes of disputes and redressing injustices through the ventilation of grievances and the active pressure of public opinion. They had all on previous occasions said that human affairs could never remain static, but the change that might be natural and right must be effected by peaceful means, if the cure was not to be ten thousand times worse than the disease.

It was to that attempt to make those principles effective that this country stood pledged and by that obligation we intended to stand to the limit of our power, because we knew that on the acceptance of that more excellent way which those principles enshrined the future of the world in fact depended.

THE STRUGGLE OF THE SUDETEN GERMANS FOR FREEDOM AND THE RIGHT OF SELF-DETERMINATION

Extract from the Speech by the Führer and Reich Chancellor Adolf Hitler at the Reich Party Congress at Nuremberg on September 12th, 1938

For 15 years, Germany endeavoured in vain to obtain the most natural and the simplest human rights, but these rights were denied to the German people and Empire, although the Germany of that time was not governed by Nazis, but by democrats and marxists. When the National-Socialist State had had enough of this continual oppression and ill-treatment and finally established equality of rights on its own initiative, these people complained of this on the sanctimonious ground that all that could have been achieved by mutual understanding. For 15 years they most cruelly opposed the most natural interests of the people and affronted the most elementary human dignity, drew up dictated treaties and compelled Germany to accept them by holding a pistol at her head, and then complained with a hypocritical show of indignation of "one-sided" breaches of sacred laws and the violation of still more sacred treaties. Without ever troubling about the opinion of the inhabitants, they subjected whole continents by brutal violence to their yoke. But, when Germany asks for her colonies back, she is told by those who are suddenly so concerned at the fate of the poor natives that they could not dream of relinquishing them under any circumstances to such a fate. At the same time, they have no objection to making the natives in their own colonies see reason by means of aeroplanes and bombs: that is to say, to compel the dear coloured compatriots to continue to suffer the foreign yoke which they detest. Of course these, unlike the brutal bombs employed by the Italians in the Abyssinian war, are civilizing bombs.

* * *

Thus in the National-Socialist Reich of today we are faced with the same forces and phenomena with which we as a party had during 15 years occasion to become acquainted. The general expression of the hostility of the democratic countries to Germany leaves us cold. Indeed, why should we be treated better than the Reich before us? I frankly admit that I prefer to be insulted by someone who cannot plunder me than to be plundered by someone who sings my praises. We are being insulted to-day, but we are, thank God, in a position to prevent any attempt at plundering Germany or doing her violence. The State that existed before us was plundered for 15 years. But for this it was praised as being a brave and democratic State.

But it becomes unbearable for us at a moment when a great German people, apparently defenceless, is delivered to shameless ill-treatment and exposed to threats. I am speaking of Czechoslovakia.

This is a Democratic State. It was founded on democratic lines by forcing other nationalities without asking them into a structure manufactured at Versailles. As good democrats they began to oppress and mishandle the majority of the inhabitants. They tried gradually to enforce on the world their view that the Czech State had a special political and military mission to perform in the world. The former French Air Minister, M. Pierre Cot has only recently explained this to us. According to his opinion, the task of Czechoslovakia is in the case of war to bombard German towns and industrial works. This mission, however, is in direct contrast to the vital interests, to the wishes, and to the conception of life of the majority of the inhabitants of this State. But the majority of the inhabitants had to be quiet, as any protest against their treatment was regarded as an attack on the aims of this State, and was therefore in conflict with the Constitution. This Constitution, as it was made by Democrats, was not rooted in the people, but only served the political aims of those who oppressed the majority of the inhabitants. In view of these political aims, it had been found necessary to construct this Constitution in a manner giving the Czechs a predominant position in the State. He who opposes such encroachment is an enemy of the State, and, according to Democratic conceptions of the State, an outlaw. The so-called nation of the Czechs has thus been selected by Providence, which in this case made use of those who once designed Versailles, to see that no one rose against this purpose of the State.

Should, however, someone belonging to the majority of the oppressed people of this nation protest against this, the nation may knock him down with force and kill him if necessary or desired.

If this were a matter foreign to us, and which did not concern us, we would regard this case as so many others, merely as an interesting illustration of the democratic conception of people's rights and the right of self-determination, and simply take note of it. But it is something most natural which compels us Germans to take an interest in this problem. Among the majority of the nationalities which are being suppressed in this State there are 3,500,000 Germans. That is about as many persons of our race as Denmark has inhabitants. These Germans, too, are creatures of God. The Almighty did not create them that they should be surrendered by a State construction made at Versailles to a foreign Power which is hateful to them, and he has not created the 7,000,000 Czechs in order that they should supervise 3,500,000 Germans or act as guardians for them, and still less to do them violence and torture.

The conditions in this nation are unbearable as is generally known. Politically over 3,500,000 people were robbed in the name of the right of self-determination of a certain Mr. Wilson, of their self-determination and of their right to self-determination. Economically these people were deliberately ruined and afterwards handed over to a slow process of extermination. The misery of the Sudeten Germans is without end. They want to annihilate them. They are being oppressed in an inhuman and intolerable manner and treated in an undignified way.

When 3,500,000 who belong to a people of almost 80,000,000 are not allowed to sing any song the Czechs do not like, because it does not please the Czechs, or are brutally struck for wearing white stockings because the Czechs do not like it and do not want to see them, and are terrorized or maltreated because they greet with a form of salutation which is agreeable to them, although they are greeting not the Czechs but each other, when they are pursued like wild beasts for every expression of their national life this may be a matter of indifference to several representatives of our democracies, or it may possibly even be congenial because it only concerns 3,500,000 Germans. I can only say to the representatives of the Democracies that this is not a matter of indifference to us; and I say that if these tortured creatures cannot obtain rights and assistance by themselves they can obtain both from us. An end must be made of depriving these people of their rights. I have already said this quite clearly in my speech of February 20. It was a short-sighted piece of work when the statesmen at Versailles brought the abnormal structure of Czechoslovakia into being. It was only possible to violate the demands of millions of another nationality so long as the brother nation was itself suffering from the consequences of the general maltreatment of the world.

To believe that such a régime could go on sinning without hindrance for ever is only possible through a scarcely credible degree of blindness. I declared in my speech on February 20 before the German Reichstag that the Reich would not tolerate any further the continued oppression of three and a half million Germans, and I hope the foreign statesmen will be convinced that these are no mere words.

* * *

The National-Socialist State has consented to very great sacrifices indeed, very great national sacrifices for the sake of European peace. Not only has it not cherished so-called thoughts of revenge, but on the contrary it has banished them from all its public and private life. In the course of the seventeenth century France took Alsace and Lorraine from the old German Reich in the midst of peace. In 1870 to 1871, after a hard war which was forced upon her, Germany demanded these territories back, and obtained them. After the World War they were lost again. The Minster of Strasbourg meant a great deal to us Germans. When we decided finally to renounce it, it was for the purpose of serving the cause of European peace in the future. Nobody could have forced us to give up these ideas of revenge of our own accord if we had not wanted to do so.

We have given them up because we wanted once and for all to end this eternal dispute with France. At other frontiers also the Reich ordered the same determined measures to be taken, and adopted the same attitude. National-Socialism advanced, truly supported by the spirit of responsibility. We shouldered voluntarily the greatest sacrifices in the form of claims surrendered in order to preserve peace for Europe in the future, and above all in order to pave on our part the way for a reconciliation of the nations. We have acted far more than merely loyally. Neither in the Press, nor in films, nor on the stage was propaganda carried out contrary to these decisions. Not even in literature was an exception tolerated.

In this spirit I myself made an offer for the solution of the questions at issue in order to remove the tension in Europe, but this solution was rejected for reasons which we are to this day unable to understand. We ourselves voluntarily restricted our power in an important field in the hope never to have to cross swords again with the nation in question. This was not done because we could not have built more than 35 per cent. ships, but it was done in order to make a contribution towards the final lessening of tension and appeasement in a serious situation. As a great patriot and statesman in Poland was prepared to conclude an agreement with Germany, we immediately assented and implemented an arrangement which means more for European peace than all the talk of the Geneva League put together.

Germany had definitely become reconciled to a large number of her frontiers. Germany is determined to accept these frontiers as unalterable and definite, and thereby to give Europe the feeling of security, of peace. This self-restriction of Germany is obviously interpreted by many people as a sign of Germany's weakness. I wish to put this view right to-day.

I think it would hardly serve European peace if I left any doubt about the following:—The acceptance of these frontiers does not mean that Germany is disinterested in all European problems, and particularly that she is indifferent to what is happening to 3,500,000 Germans and that she does not feel with them in their plight. We quite understand that the French and the British defend their interests in the whole world. I may assure the statesmen in Paris and London that there are also German interests which we are determined to defend in all circumstances. May I remind you of my speech in the Reichstag in 1933, when for the first time I stated before the world that there may be national questions where we see our way clear before us and which I would take it upon me to fulfil, in spite of all distress and danger that may be connected with them.

No European nation has done more for peace than Germany. No nation has made greater sacrifices. But it must be realized that these sacrifices also have their limits, and that the National-Socialist State must not be confused with the Germany of Bethmann-Hollweg and Hertling.

If I make this statement here, it is done especially because in the course of this year an event took place which forced us all to subject our attitude to a certain correction. In this year, as you know, after endless postponement of any kind of plebiscite had occurred, local elections at any rate were to take place in Czechoslovakia. Even in Prague people were convinced of the untenable nature of the Czech situation. They were afraid of the Germans joining up with the other nationalities. They thought that at last measures must be taken to influence the result of the election by bringing pressure on the conduct of the elections. The Czech Government discovered the idea that the only effective thing to do was brutal browbeating. To give effect to this they decided to make a demonstration to the Sudeten Germans of the forces of the Czechoslovak State. Above all, the brute force of Czech power must be displayed to warn them against representing their national interests and make them vote accordingly. In order to make this demonstration plausible before the election, Dr. Benesh and the Czech Government invented the lie that Germany had mobilized troops and was about to invade Czechoslovakia.

I have the following statement to make on this subject to-day. There is nothing new about making such lying statements. Last year the Press in other countries published the false news that 20,000 German soldiers had landed in Morocco. The Jewish fabricators of these Press lies hoped to bring about a war by this means.

A statement to the French Ambassador sufficed to put an end to this lie. Also the Ambassador of another Great Power was immediately informed that there was not a word of truth in this Czech statement. This statement was repeated a second time and immediately brought to the notice of the Prague Government. But the Prague Government needed this lie as a pretext for their own monstrous work, and terrorist oppression in influencing the elections. I can assure you in addition that, first, at that time not a single German soldier more was called up;

secondly, not a regiment, or any other formation, marched to the frontier. At this time there was not one soldier who was not in his peace-time garrison. On the contrary, the order was given that anything that might appear like pressure on the Czechs on our side was to be avoided.

In spite of this, this base campaign took place in which the whole of Europe was mobilized, with the object of holding elections under military pressure: brow-beating the citizens, and thus depriving them of their right to vote. A moral justification was needed so that no one should shrink from the unscrupulousness of plunging a great State and all Europe into a great war.

As Germany had no such intention, and indeed on the contrary was convinced that the local elections would confirm the rights of the Sudeten Germans, nothing was done by the Reich Government. That, however, was made the occasion for saying, after nothing had happened, that Germany had drawn back in consequence of the agitation of the Czechs and the intervention of Great Britain and France. You will understand that a Great Power cannot suddenly submit a second time to such a base attack. In consequence I took the necessary precautions. I am a National-Socialist, and as such I am parrying every attack. I know exactly that by yielding to such an irreconcilable enemy as Czechoslovakia, this enemy could never be reconciled, but only be incited to a still higher opinion of itself. The old German Reich is a warning for us. In its love of peace it went as far as self-sacrifice without thereby being able to prevent war.

Conscious of this I took very serious measures on May 28:

1. The strengthening of the Army and the Air Force was on my order considerably increased forthwith, and immediately carried out.

2. I ordered the immediate extension of our fortifications in the west.

I may assure you that since May 28 the most gigantic fortifications that ever existed are under construction there. With the same aim in view I have entrusted the Inspector-General of German Road Constructions, Dr. Todt, with a new task. He has accomplished one of the greatest works of organization of all time.

On the construction of the defences in the west there are now working 278,000 workmen of Dr. Todt's army. In addition, there are a further 84,000 workmen and 100,000 men of the Labour Service, as well as numerous engineer and infantry battalions. The German railways are taking to these districts daily 8,000 trucks of material, apart from the materials transported by motor vehicles. The daily consumption of gravel is more than 100,000 tons. Before the beginning of winter Germany's fortifications in the west will be finished. Their power of defence is already in existence to its full extent. After completion it will comprise 17,000 armoured and concrete fortifications. Behind this front of steel and concrete, which is laid out in three, and partly in four, lines of a total depth of up to 50 kilometres, there stands the German people in arms.

These most gigantic efforts of all times have been made at my request in the interest of peace. In no circumstances shall I be willing any more to regard with endless tranquillity a continuation of oppression of German compatriots in Czechoslovakia. Herr Benesh indulges in tactics and speeches. He is trying to organize negotiations to clear up questions of procedure on the lines of Geneva and to make small concessions. This cannot go on for ever. This is not a matter of phrases but of right, that is of violated right. What the Germans demand is the right of self-determination which every other nation also possesses. It is not up to Herr Benesh to give to the Sudeten Germans gifts. They have the right to claim a life of their own just as much as any other people. If the Democracies, however, should be convinced that they must in this case protect with all their means the oppressors of the Germans, then this will have grave consequences!

I believe I am serving peace the more if I do not leave any doubts about this. I have not raised the claim that Germany may oppress three and a half million French, or that three and a half million English shall be surrendered to Germany for oppression. But I demand that the oppression of three and a half million Germans in Czechoslovakia shall cease and be replaced by the free right of self-determination. We would regret it if thereby our relations with other European nations should suffer harm. However, we are not to be blamed. Moreover, it is up to the Czechoslovak Government to discuss matters with the authorized representatives of the Sudeten Germans and to bring about an understanding in this or in that way. My business, and the business of us all, however, is to see to-day that right does not become injustice in this case, for German comrades are concerned.

Moreover, I am not willing to allow a second Palestine to be created here in the heart of Germany by the actions of other statesmen. The poor Arabs are defenceless, and perhaps deserted. The Germans of Czechoslovakia, however, are neither defenceless nor are they deserted.

I believe I must state this, especially at this Party Convention, in which for the first time the representatives of our German Austrian Legions take part. They know best how much pain it causes to be separated from the mother country. They, too, will be the first to understand the meaning of my statements to-day. They will also agree with me most enthusiastically if I state before the entire nation that we would not deserve to be Germans if we were not willing to adopt such an attitude and to bear the consequences in this or that way arising from it.

If we remember the exacting demands which in past years even small nations believed they could address to Germany, then the only explanation which we can find is their scant willingness to see the German Reich as a State which is more than a temporary upstart.

Standing in Rome in the spring of this year I realized how the history of mankind is viewed and judged in intervals which are too short and therefore inadequate. The history of a millennium comprised only a few successions of generations.

What becomes exhausted in the present can rise up again in the same time. The Italy and the Germany of to-day are proof of this. They are rejuvenated nations, which one may describe as new in this sense. But this youth does not rest on new soil but on old historic soil. The Roman Empire begins to breathe again. However, though historically infinitely younger, it is likewise no new creation in its national new form. I had the insignia of the old Reich brought to Nuremberg in order to induce not only my own nation but also the whole world to consider that more than a thousand years before the discovery of a new world a mighty Germanic Deutsches Reich existed. Dynasties came and disappeared. The outer forms have changed. The people to-day have been rejuvenated, but substantially they always remained the same. The German Reich has slumbered for a long time; the German People have now awakened and taken their 1,000-year-old Crown to themselves. For us who are the historical witnesses of this revival there is a proud joy and a humble sense of gratitude to the Almighty. For the rest of the world it should equally be a suggestion and a lesson, a suggestion that they should study history again from a higher vantage point, and a lesson not to fall into their old mistakes again.

The new Italian Roman Empire and the German Empire are, in all truth, very old creations. People do not need to love them, but no power in the world can any more remove them.

Comrades, National-Socialists, in this hour the first Party Day of Greater Germany comes to a close. We are all filled with the powerful historical impressions of these days. Your national pride and your confidence have been strengthened in the face of this demonstration of the strength, resolution, and determination of our nation. Go on again in that trustful confidence which you for almost two decades have borne in your hearts as German and National Socialists. You have the right to be able to carry your German heads raised once again in pride. We all have the duty never to bow them again to a foreign will. May this be our pledge, so help us God.

OBLITERATED TRACKS

1. Extracts from the Messages and Declarations of President Wilson.

(a) "The peoples of Austria-Hungary should be accorded the freest opportunity of autonomous development . . . The day of territorial conquest and aggrandizement is gone by; as is also the day of secret covenants . . . Every peace-loving nation which . . . wishes to live its own life and determine its own institutions should be assured of justice and fair dealing by the other peoples of the world as against force and selfish aggression."

This is the wording of Point 10 of President Wilson's fourteen points, which he announced as a basis of a new community of nations in his message to Congress on January 8th 1918.

In his address to Congress on February 12th he further emphasised this point in the following words:

(a) "Peoples and provinces are not to be bartered about from sovereignty to sovereignty as if they were mere chattels and pawns in a game.

(b) Every territorial settlement involved in this war must be made in the interest and form a benefit of the populations concerned, and not as a part of any mere adjustment or compromise of claims amongst rival States.

(c) All well-defined national aspirations shall be accorded the utmost satisfaction that can be accorded them without introducing new, or perpetuating old, elements of discord and antagonism that would be likely in time to break the peace of Europe and consequently of the world."

"The impartial justice meted out must involve no discrimination between those to whom we wish to be just and those to whom we do not wish to be just. It must be justice that plays no favourites and knows no standards but the equal rights of the several peoples concerned."

Lastly, in his speech at Washington's grave on July 4th 1918 he said:

"The settlement of every question, whether of territory or national sovereignty, of economic arrangements out of political relationship, must be made upon the basis of the free acceptance of that settlement of the material interest or advantage of any other nation or people which may desire a different settlement for the sake of its own exterior influence or mastery.

What we seek is the reign of law based upon the consent of the government, and sustained by the organized opinion of mankind."

2. Extracts from the Constitution of the Czechoslovak Republic of February 29th 1920.

Preamble to the Constitution.

"We, the Czechoslovak people, with the intention of consolidating the complete unity of the people, of introducing a just order in the Republic, of ensuring the tranquil development of the Czechoslovak home country, of promoting the common good of all citizens of the State and of securing the blessings of freedom for future generations, have adopted in the National Assembly of February 29th 1920 the Constitution of the Czechoslovak Republic in the following terms:

We, the Czechoslovak people, hereby declare our endeavour that this Constitution and all the laws of our country may be carried out in the same manner in the spirit of our history as in the spirit of the modern rules involved in the principle of self-determination, for we desire to join the League of Nations as a well-formed, peace-loving, democratic and progressive member."

§ 128 of the Constitution.

1. All citizens of the Czechoslovak Republic are entirely equal before the law and enjoy the same civil and political rights without regard to their race, language or religion.

2. The difference in religion, faith, confession and language does not form any hindrance for any citizen of the Czechoslovak Republic within the limits of the general laws, especially for appointment to the public service, to offices and dignities or the exercise of any trade or profession.

3. Extract from the Minorities Protection Treaty of September 10th, 1919

Chapter I, Article 1. Czechoslovakia undertakes to recognise the provisions contained in Articles 2-8 of this Chapter as a fundamental law. No law, decree or official measure shall be in contradiction or opposition to these provisions and no law, decree or official measure shall in future be valid except them.

Articles 2-8 prescribe the rights granted to the minorities without distinction of race, religion, confession, language, and birth. Equal civil and political rights. No discrimination in admission to public positions, offices and dignities or in the exercise of the various occupations and trades. No restrictions in the use of language. Equal legal and actual treatment and the same guarantees as for the other Czech nationals. Facilities in education in order to safeguard the mother tongue and adequate grants from public funds for education, instruction and charitable purposes.

4. Promises

In addition, there are the promises made to the Sudeten German national group by the leaders of the Czech people in numerous speeches, memoranda, articles and books, both before and after the founding of the Czechoslovak Republic, in which they referred convincingly to the particularly humane form of Czech democracy and pointed out that they would regard and treat the Germans as "equals among equals". They said it was contrary to Czech views regarding humanity and democracy to oppress other races on account of the people to which they belonged, their race or their nationality. It would therefore not occur to the Czech Government in any way to slight the German minority, as the greatest and most important in the State, or to hinder or prejudice the majority in its national and cultural possessions and in its development. The Germans would naturally have the possibility, in proportion to their numbers, to cooperate in Government and other official offices.

These were fine theoretical foundations on which the Czechoslovak State was erected nearly twenty years ago. After a period of less than twenty years they have been dissipated under the practice of the Czech theory of the national State and their place has been taken more and more by another principle based on this theory, namely the absorption and assimilation or extermination and destruction of the minority by the people of the State.

The State form created by Messrs. Masaryk and Benesh with their swarm of official historical and geographical acrobats, with the assistance of their friend Tardieu, thus did not become a genuine democracy of "equals among equals" but, as the French periodical "La Griffe" wrote on April 23rd 1938, a "harlequin mantle with Czechs as the centre piece surrounded by Germans, Slovaks, Hungarians, Poles and Ruthenes, who were torn against their will from their own countries." The penalty is now being paid, as the "Pesti Hirlap" wrote on the same day, that Benesh and his assistants used forged maps, forged statistics and twisted historical facts in order to persuade the Great Powers to assist in an "unviable abortion".

The inscription on the standard of the President of Czechoslovakia, the device of the Czechoslovak State arms, which is also cut in stone on the Huss memorial in the ancient Ring in Prague, and which is worded: Truth is Victorious, today arises as a Mene Tekel against its originators; the curse of that evil act committed twenty years ago in the hate-filled atmosphere of Paris, at present weighs not only on this unhappy State but also on Europe with its Governments and on the League of Nations, which with criminal toleration, ignorance or carelessness neglected to heal and remove in time this festering wound in the body of the peoples and States of Europe which has now come to a head so dangerously.

TRUTH IS VICTORIOUS 1918—1938

Twenty Years of Sudeten German Distress Twenty years of Czech Democracy and Minorities Policy

The following statements are based in the main on three excellent publications taken from the voluminous Sudeten German and Czechoslovak literature: "Czechoslovakia in the mirror of statistics" by Erwin Winkler, 1937, Publishers H. Frank, Carlsbad and Leipzig, "Thirty years of Sudeten German adverse balances (Verlustbilanz) 1918-1938" by F. W. Essler, University Publisher Wilhelm Braumüller, Vienna and Leipzig and "Why Sudeten German autonomy?", a résumé of the development of the German-Czech problem since February 18th 1937, by Mons, 1938, Publishers Karl H. Frank, Carlsbad and Leipzig. What makes these publications appear peculiarly suitable for our purpose is the fact that the information contained in them is based for the most part on purely official Czech data and thus provides an entirely impartial description of the plight of the Sudeten Germans and, to express it mildly, the utter lack of sympathetic understanding evinced by the Government departments at Prague, until the spring of 1938, in regard to the wishes and requirements of this group of 3 ½ million Germans.

There were three claims put forward by the Sudeten Germans: until the revolutionary events of September: complete self-determination in respect of their own affairs, an adequate share in political decisions of importance for the entire State, reparation for the injustice done in the past to moral, cultural and economic possessions.

A really objective judgment as to the justice and extent of these claims can only be formed by calling to mind the great losses suffered by the Sudeten German people in the twenty years from 1918 to 1938 in all spheres of human and national life and work. It is a superficial judgment to state that the Sudeten Germans are fighting merely for a share in the power of the State. What has been happening in Sudeten German territory is much more than that: it is a fight for existence in the fullest meaning of the word, a struggle for bare existence by an entire national group in order to protect their most primitive vital and human rights against the attack of a foreign opponent. It was a defensive struggle against an opponent who knew how to make use of all State means of power and compulsion and of all the possibilities that are bound up with the exclusive possession of these means, as against which the Sudeten Germans were unable to oppose either power or compulsion, but only their proper right and their indomitable determination to live and resist.

The following particulars, which are taken almost exclusively from official Czech sources and reports which have been previously published without contradiction and without any doubt being raised as to their accuracy, show the devastation caused by that mischievous historical lie and that false political myth which Konrad Henlein in his Karlsbad speech of April 24th, 1938 seriously and insistently stigmatised as the real cause for the disturbance of Central European appeasement; this was the origin of the completely sterile national State ideology which arose out of compulsory historical ideas, prejudices and illusions and which, in its policy of expansion, aimed at extending the Czech demographic frontier at any price—even at the price of European peace—up to the historical frontiers of Bohemia, Moravia and Silesia.

The Racial Distribution of the Peoples in Czechoslovakia

The following tables give firstly a review of the citizens of Czechoslovakia according to their race and, secondly, particulars regarding the settlement districts of the individual races in the provinces of the Republic, both on the basis of the last census of July 1st, 1930.

It will be observed from these tables that at the last Czechoslovak census 3,231,688 nationals were German and that, together with the foreigners of German race, the total was 3,318,445. The importance of this figure will be seen by a comparison with the other small countries of Europe. For instance, the total population of Latvia is only 1.9 millions, and of Lithuania only 2.48 millions. The population of the whole of Norway, at 2.87 millions, is far smaller than that of the Sudeten German territories. The total Sudeten German population is about the same as that of the Irish Free State.

Not a Minority, but a National Group.

The most important fact from the German point of view is that the Sudeten population is not scattered, but has for centuries lived as a compact settlement and has everywhere been in direct touch with the territory of the German Empire. This territory runs in an unbroken line along the German frontier to the Hungarian frontier. It surrounds the Czech territory and, with the exception of the Hungarian and Polish frontiers, all the border districts of Czechoslovakia are German. It is therefore entirely misleading to regard and treat (or rather ill-treat) such a territory as a minority. Minorities are racial enclaves, or scattered portions of a nation embedded in a foreign nation. This in no way applies to the Sudeten Germans and their territory is not an enclave (that is, an insertion), but an offshoot. It is a country connected at all points with the territory of the Reich and artificially separated from it against the will of the population—not by racial, but by political and strategic frontiers. The whole significance of the history of the Sudeten Germans until the present day has lain in their attempt not to allow themselves to be depressed to the level of an ethnical minority, but to maintain their position as a people in the political sense. Consequently, from the outset, the Sudeten German question has been a problem—not of the Germans within the Czech nation, but of the Germans living side by side with the Czechs in the same State. Therefore the solution of this problem called for other methods than the mere execution of measures for the protection of a minority, as Masaryk admitted in his message of October 1928, when he said: “in solving the minority problem in Czechoslovakia, the usual models must be discarded. Other countries have national minorities, but our minorities are of a different character. There are States whose total population does not exceed the number of our German co-citizens, who are on a high economic and cultural level”. The unique character of the problem was also unconsciously conceded by his successor, Benes, in the much discussed memorandum III, which he submitted to the Peace Conference in 1919. In that same year, Masaryk even went so far as to admit that in theory that the Sudeten Germans might demand the right of self-determination, but added that the most essential prerequisite was lacking: namely, that they were not a people, but only colonists and emigrants. The whole Czecho-German problem is therefore based on the question: “Are the Sudeten Germans a people? An ethnical community becomes a political nation (and this is what is meant by the word people) when it develops, out of the consciousness of a historical or future common destiny, the common political will to preserve its species. It is immaterial when such will is formed. Many of the peoples composing the new States of Europe have only developed this will since the war, while in the case of the others the process of development from a linguistic unit to a political nation is not yet complete. Consequently, even if the Sudeten Germans had only evinced the will to become a people in October 1918, they would have as much claim to international recognition as the Estonians, the Latvians or the Lithuanians. In point of fact however they have been a people for centuries. Their demand for national autonomy in the new State was therefore historically, geographically and culturally justified and sanctioned moreover by the "right of self-determination", which has, since 1919, been regarded as the sacred motto of the international community of people. Furthermore, this demand constituted, from the point of view of the elimination of causes of unrest in Europe, a question of European importance and its satisfaction was indicated in the interests of the new State itself and was therefore in no way incompatible with loyalty to the State.

The overwhelming majority of Czech politicians however understand by loyalty the recognition of the State as a Czech national State and consequently of the predominance of the Czech nation over a German ethnical minority and demand abstention from the use of national political weapons against the prevailing system. The whole policy of the Czechs since 1918 follows logically from this conception. This policy is to eliminate the dangers inherent in Czecho-German differences by assimilation or, if necessary, destruction of the German element. Hence the idea spread by these politicians that there is no compact German territory, but only a mixed territory, whereby the impression is given that this mixture is caused by the German element. Implicit in this phraseology is the moral justification for the artificial Czech encroachment upon the German territory and even for the attempts at czechification of the presumably germanized, originally Slav population. It is argued in all seriousness that this "restoration" is only "an act of compensatory justice". All these conceptions are based on the historical legend of the German interlopers in the Czech State, the usurpation of originally Czech national property by the German colonists and—especially important—the consequent economic and social discrimination against the more numerous indigenous Czech population. They say in effect: "The State should belong to us and the land with all its riches." Therefore is principle every Czech established in pure German territory is a descendant of the original legendary owner, while the millions of Germans are the descendants of the usurpers.

From this conception of the national State as the possession of the Czech people inevitably follows the uniformity of collaboration between the State, the Communes and the Czech nationalist political, cultural, social and economic organizations, all of which see to it that the masses are made to subserve the interests of this system. The German is thus faced not only with the free national organizations of the Czechs, the bureaucracy and legislation, but with a comprehensive uniform front. As the Czechs know from experience that this strict concentration of all the national forces is their strongest weapon, they hinder, stifle or weaken any similar assemblage of forces on the German side and whatever still remains from the Austrian days of the national German corporations with official, professional or economic functions.

The years which have elapsed were therefore only stages in this struggle. The Czech politician Klofac unconsciously admitted the relative nature of the Czech success in 1918-1919 in the following pithy statement: "We Czechs only require a few decades of uninterrupted development to consolidate the Czech national State."

What this means in detail will be seen by the following particulars.

The Demographic Expansion of the Czechs.

Clear proof of the demographic expansion of the Czechs is provided by comparing the results of the censuses of 1910, 1921 and 1930.

Taking the entire Sudeten territory separately, the increase in population was as follows:

	1910	1921	1930
Germans	3,026,981	2,638,795	2,832,779	i. e. 87.4% of all nationals of German race.
Czechs	142,442	256,353	366,153	i. e. 3.8% of all nationals of Czech race.

In the other districts of the historical provinces, i.e. in the Czech majority districts, including the German enclaves with 69 majority communes, the population was as follows:

	1910	1921	1930
Germans	465,381	324,623	348,005
Czechs	6,193,191	6,474,410	6,975,367

This shows that the Germans, both in their own settlement districts and in the Czech districts, at first decreased and then again increased, while the Czechs, both in their own and in the German settlement districts, on the whole increased by various percentages. In their own settlement districts they increased from 1910 to 1921 by 4.5%, and from 1921 to 1930 by 7.7%. In the German settlement districts, however, they increased from 1910 to 1921 by no less than 80% and from 1921 to 1930 by more than 30%.

It is therefore a fact that the Czechs in the German settlement districts show a much greater increase than in their own settlement districts.

This increase in the Czechs cannot be regarded as natural on the basis of the excess of births, but there was a considerable immigration of Czechs into the German majority districts which were already densely populated. The density of the population of the entire German majority district is 115.3 inhabitants per square kilometre, while that of the remaining territory, including the large towns, is only 102.3 per square kilometre. This is of all the greater importance in view of the low fertility of the German districts and of the fact that the Sudeten district is covered by forests to the extent of 33.7%.

Tens of thousands of Czechs have left Czech districts in one decade and at the same time tens of thousands of Czechs are to be found as an immigration surplus in the German districts. The increase of the Czechs in the German majority districts according to the census figures from 1910 to 1921 and from 1921 to 1930, and the departure of Czechs within the same decades from a number of Czech districts show that this increase considerably exceeds the natural surplus of births and also what might be called "natural" immigration. These census figures indicate clearly an abnormal immigration of Czechs into the German majority districts and the regular pumping of Czech elements into the German districts, in other words a demographic expansion of the Czechs. This process has by no means diminished in the period from 1930

The Compact German Language District Its Divisions

to 1938 for which census figures are not available, but the communal and parliamentary elections during these years, including the last communal elections of May 1938, frequently showed a fresh increase in Czech votes; the Czech press in writing about the last communal elections made no secret of the fact that this had been artificially brought about by State measures and did not disguise their joy at Czech penetration into the German communes.

The Penetration of the Czechs into the Spheres of Life of the Sudeten German Territory and People.

This purely numerical penetration of the Czech population, however, also signifies a simultaneous penetration of Czechism into all the spheres of life of this districts and its national life, which is promoted by State measures of so-called "professional" expansion, i.e. a penetration into the ownership of land, the professions, education etc.; the possibility of this was naturally increased by the demographic Czech expansion in German majority districts so that in a number of communes which formerly had a German majority a Czech majority was created and thus the self-administration of these communes passed into Czech hands.

The so-called Agrarian Reform.

The first result of the migration of Czechs into German districts was the transfer of German land into Czech ownership; the smallest number of these transfers were the result of natural acquisition, and they were due to the planned purchase of German estates by the agrarian reform of 1919 with the assistance of various Czechisation societies. This agrarian reform led to the seizure in the completely German linguistic area alone of 840,218 hectares, or about 31% of this area. Of these estates 400,000 hectares have passed into Czech hands, while the total loss of expropriated German land in the entire territory amounted by the end of 1931 to about 600,000 hectares. In addition to the notorious so-called residue estate owners who were for the most part not land-dwellers, consideration was given for the most part to Czech colonists who were also not land-dwellers but were favoured not so much on account of their suitability as landowners but because they were Czechs. They carried the Czech element still further into the German district, brought hand-workers and traders in their train and penetrated the German district with Czech minorities.

In addition there was the expropriated private forest property. Considerable parts of this valuable national property were transferred to other hands and steps were taken as far as possible to prevent German communes and districts from obtaining parts of the expropriated forests in their territory. They were to be placed in "sure" hands and were given to some remote Czech commune in so far as the State did not take the greatest share.

The results of the agrarian reform were clearly reflected in the distribution of occupations in agriculture. During the period of the agrarian reform (1921-1930) the foundation of the German peasants declined while the Czech peasants increased appreciably. The independent German landowners and lease-holders declined in Bohemia by 2310, in Moravia-Silesia by 1210 and in all the Sudeten districts by 3520, while during the same period the number of Czech landowners and lease-holders rose in Bohemia by 11,049, in Moravia-Silesia by 6,478, the total increase being 18,527.

But, even without the intervention of the authorities or without land expropriation, German estates are constantly transferred to Czechs and are for the most part systematically acquired for national reasons by Czechisation societies and by Czech companies, corporations and individuals sent out by them.

The Placing of Germans at a Disadvantage in respect of Government Orders and Public Tenders.

Two further aspects of Czech expansion are the placing of Germans at a disadvantage in the case of Government orders and public tenders.

In the German majority districts, the Germans represent 84.3 % of the population and the Czechs and other races 15.7 %. But in the same districts in the period from January 1st, 1933 to November 30th, 1936, German contractors received only 18.1 % of Government orders, while Czech contractors received 81.9 %. In the period from March 1st, 1937 to October 1st 1937 20.8 % (32 contracts) were placed with German firms, 68.1 % (105 contracts) with Czech firms not belonging to the district and 11.1 % (17 contracts) with so-called mixed firms. From March 1st 1937 to January 20th, 1938 in the German majority area 23.3 % of the public works and supplies were placed with German firms, 69.2 % with Czech firms and 7.5 % with mixed firms.

In all these cases it could not be determined whether the placing of such public works and the capital expenditure involved were in just relationship to the orders given in Czech districts. The Government either gave no information whatever or did not supply figures.

The Decline in Sudeten German Economy.

The decline in the Sudeten German economy is disposed of by the Czechs in a stereotyped manner by a reference to the "crisis". But this crisis was to say the least increased by the above-mentioned measures and by all the other accompanying phenomena of Czech expansion, i.e. the crowding out of the Germans from the land, from their work and from official positions, by the resultant decline in German purchasing power, by the displacement of industry, taxation policy and other circumstances.

The values lost to Sudeten German economy by events and measures which were more or less openly dependent on national ulterior motives, by substitute and uneconomic industries, by various pressure on suppliers and contractors in the case of Government orders, can scarcely be calculated. Space is lacking to describe the national expansion in the economic sphere, to explain the manifold forms which it assumed and to enumerate the economic losses which this expansion involved. The attempts to nationalise economy in the widest sense of the word began immediately after the end of the War, and in the period from December 1918 to April 1920 the revolution parliament that had been appointed created the legal and administrative conditions to put into effect the national theory of the Czech people's first-born rights in the State in the wide economic field. In view of the mass of material we must confine ourselves to enumerating the most important measures. By means of the connections between the Government and the organised Czech masses, to which reference has already been made, the Czechs were informed in good time of the intention to separate the currency in 1919 and to repudiate the war loans, so that the entire force of the losses was borne mainly by the Germans. The distress of the German industry which was thus caused was utilised by Czech capital to set up and purchase works. The same applies to other branches of industry. In addition the Government deliberately encouraged newly founded and frequently unsound Czech undertakings as against old established firms, often with a worldwide reputation. The decisive factor during this period was the economic policy of the State, which subordinated economic necessities to the aims of foreign policy. As the German industry was an export industry in the fullest sense of the word, it was particularly badly hit by this policy,

The Change in Professions and Occupations.

It is clear that this Czech expansion gradually involved a change in professions and occupations that was unfavourable to the German element. The systematic penetration of Czech elements into individual groups of professions and occupations is in turn a contributory cause of the demographic expansion of the Czechs in the German area.

According to the official publication "Tschechoslowakische Statistik", Volumes 23 and 116, the increases and decreases in the various professions and occupations in the State in the case of Czechs and Germans in the period from 1921 to 1930 were as follows :

	Germans %	Czechs %	Total Average %
Independent	— 2.8	— 0.7	+ 0.2
Officials	+ 1.0	+ 21.8	+ 15.5
Workers (employees, workers and home workers)	+ 9.8	+ 27.8	+ 24.7
Apprentices	— 17.5	— 1.2	— 4.1
Day labourers	+ 14.2	— 51.3	— 17.5

The table shows that the position in the case of the professions and occupations listed was more unfavourable for the Germans than for the whole State averaged. While for example the "Independents" in the whole State increase by 0.2%, in the case of the Germans they show a decrease of 2.8%. While the "Officials" in the whole country increased by as much as 15.5%, in the case of the Germans they increased by 1% only. "Workers" in the whole State increased by 24.7, but in the case of the Germans only by 9.8%. "Apprentices" in general show a decrease, viz. of 4%; but in the case of the Germans the figure is 17.5%.

In the case of the Czechs the figures are very much more favourable, especially in the case of officials. The average increase of officials for the whole State is 15.5%; but the increase in the case of the Czechs is 21.8%.

If the comparison is made between Czechs and Germans only in the different occupations, the disproportions are even more conspicuous. German officials increased by 1%; but their Czech colleagues increased by 21.8%. German workers increased by 9.8% : Czech workers by as much as 27.8%. Czech apprentices decreased by 1.2% : but the decrease in the case of German apprentices, i.e. in the younger generation of handicraftsmen, was no less than 17.5%.

There is only one case in which the Germans show a higher figure than the Czechs ; and that is in the case of day-labourers. This, the lowest social class, shows a decrease in the case of the Czechs of as much as 51.3%, as compared with an increase of 14.2% in the case of the Germans.

It may be said therefore that the Czechs are forcing their way into the socially higher classes, especially the class of officials. The Germans here show a decrease, and go instead to swell the ranks of the day-labourers or even to the worst category of all, viz. the unemployed, in which their percentage is very much greater than that of the Czechs.

The case of the State officials and State employees is even more striking. That the Germans are not represented in the service of the State in proportion to their numbers in the population is admitted even by the other side. The real fact is that there has been a definite policy of reducing the number of Germans in the public services.

Thus from 1921 to 1930 the reduction of the number of Germans in Government service in the Sudeten districts was : Post Office 4045 or 41.2 %, railways 1710 or 48.5 %, army 1780 or 70.4 %, other administrations (without education) 7362 or 49 %, making a total of 31,293.

State jobs and official posts are thus a fruitful field of Czech expansion. But the fact that it is the service of the State—which according to its Constitution claims, and is under obligation, to treat all nationalities alike—in which Czech professional predominance is conspicuously evident is clear proof of the fact that the State is nothing other than the patron and protector of Czech expansion.

Czech Cultural Policy.

The main lines of Czech cultural policy are clear enough. The design is to lower the cultural level of the German masses by the closing down of German schools or the conversion of higher into lower grade establishments. The erection of schools for Czech minorities is made a pretext for admitting German children with a view to indoctrinating them with Czech ideas as a prelude to assimilation. German technical schools are closed in order to diminish the opportunities for technical training. German secondary schools are closed in order to diminish the numbers of the German higher classes and therewith the proportion of Germans in the governing class. As the admission of Germans to the public service is for practical purposes out of the question, the exercise of the liberal professions is made difficult by every kind of linguistic chicanery and administrative regulations. Access to German secondary schools is obstructed in the hope of making it possible to close more schools. The German university institutions are placed at a disadvantage by inadequate grants, by the postponement of appointments, by financial pressure against the appointment of teaching staff from outside the country. Instruction of young Germans in mining and forestry is made impossible in order to reserve all such posts for Czechs. The former freedom of students to go to Germany or Austria for study is made difficult in order to loosen the cultural bonds with the German race as a whole. German students' aid societies receive the minimum of support. Obstacles are put in the way of recognition of foreign degrees and other academic qualifications. Participation in German or Austrian cultural associations or conferences is prohibited or made difficult, in order to sever the connection with German life and thought. Similar attempts are made in the schools to reshape the outlook of the schoolchildren in a Czech nationalist sense.

A particularly instructive chapter in the history of cultural Czechisation and expansion is the case of public education. It is not merely that between the years 1921 and 1930 the German teachers' profession decreased by 580 teachers in Bohemia and 909 in Moravia and Silesia, while the Czechs increased by 3998 in Bohemia and 3595 in Moravia and Silesia—in other words that there were 1489 fewer German teachers and 7953 more Czech teachers in the Sudete countries as a whole during the period. Hand in hand with this development went the losses of the Germans in schools in the historic provinces.

The number of German schools in these provinces was :

In the year 1918 3512 primary schools.
In the year 1937 3158 "

The loss was therefore 354 schools.

The number of classes in the German primary schools was :

In the year 1918 11,068 classes.
In the year 1937 8752 "

A loss of 2316 primary school classes.

In the same area the number of German secondary schools was :

In the year 1918 108 schools.
In the year 1937 70 "

A loss of 38 secondary schools.

The number of German teachers' training colleges was :

In the year 1918	19 colleges.
In the year 1937	10 »

A loss of 9 out of 19 teachers' training colleges.

The position in the case of the Czech educational institutions was very different. Large numbers of German children attend Czech schools. They are given an education which is alien to them, are estranged from their own people, and modelled as future elements of the Czech nation. The number of German children in Czech educational institutions on October 1st, 1937 was as follows :

In all, 15,382 German children were attending Czech Kindergartens, primary schools or secondary schools in the Sudete provinces.

The distribution between the different types of school was as follows :

Kindergartens	2631
Public primary schools . .	1918
Minority and private primary schools	5454
Minority and private secondary schools	3053
Public secondary schools .	2326

The first thing that strikes the eye in the above figures is the fact that the majority of the German children concerned were not attending public schools but Czech minority and private schools.

Minority schools in the strict sense of the term as defined by law are schools within the language area of the other race. The Czech private schools are nearly all secondary schools in the wider sense of the term. They are privately conducted minority schools planted in German territory by Czech educational associations or Czechising societies (Jednotas). Many of them are taken over, sooner or later, by the State. The Kindergartens in the above table may also be called minority establishments. Those of them which are attended by German children are nearly all in German-speaking districts.

Adding together the number of German children attending the public and private Czech minority schools enumerated in the above table, we find that 11,138 German children were attending Czech minority schools, i.e. Czech schools in German-speaking districts. These 11,138 children represent 72.4 % of all the German children attending Czech schools.

This astonishingly large percentage of German children in Czech minority schools, i.e. in schools which the Czechs themselves regard as one of the best instruments of their expansionist policy, in districts where German schools are also available is the result of systematic effort. There are, it is true, a few minority schools for German children in Czech districts. In Bohemia in 1921 there were 14 such schools ; and by 1936 the number had increased by two ! The numbers of Czech children attending such schools is infinitesimal.

To complete this picture of the minority schools, take the province of Bohemia alone ; and, to simplify the matter and to confine ourselves to official figures, take the public Czech minority schools alone.

There were in Bohemia :

In 1921 . .	428 such schools with	38,583 schoolchildren.
In 1936 . .	850 »	26,509 »

The fact that the number of these schools, all publicly owned institutions, doubled their number in the course of 15 years—representing an increase of 98.6 %—while at the same time the number of schoolchildren attending them was lower by one-third, is sufficient proof that schools of this kind are no more and no less than strongholds of massed Czech penetration into German districts.

The decrease in the total of schoolchildren in these public schools since the year 1921 is explained by the fact that since 1921 the building of similar minority schools by private organisations, by the Czech educational associations and by the Jednotas has been in full swing. The decrease in the numbers of schoolchildren in the public schools in Bohemia was made good many times over by the numbers of schoolchildren in the private minority schools erected in the meanwhile.

Here again, the huge increase in the number of German children forming part of the total is a staggering feature.

The numbers in these schools were :

	German Children	Total Schoolchildren	Percentage
In the year 1918	784	38,583	2.3
In the year 1936	5067	26,509	19.1

It was German children therefore in the public Czech minority schools who made good the transfer of Czech children from the public schools to the schools of the Jednotas. Whereas in 1918 every fiftieth child in the public minority schools in Bohemia was German, in 1936 every fifth child in these (Czech) schools was German. So far had the process gone.

The same applies to the private institutions of the Czechisation association as to the State Czech minority schools and the same conditions obtain in Bohemia and elsewhere, for the spirit and the aims and objects of the whole system of Czech minority schools are everywhere identical. The cultural, racial and economic permeation of the German territory is pursued, among other methods, through the schools.

How is it that such large numbers of German children attend these purely Czech invasion schools in German districts ?

Apart from the long distances between the German schools and the accessibility of the Czech schools, which is deliberately arranged, the reason why German parents send their children to Czech schools is for the most part to be found in the fact that they are obliged to do so !

In very many cases fathers can only obtain employment if they send their children to Czech schools or would lose their employment if they did not do so. The methods of economic pressure employed by the zealous frontiersmen are infinite in their variety : loans are accorded or called in, according to which school the children attend, lease and rent are made to depend on that and the Czech school also offers tuition fees, exemption from school expenses and other relief and facilities. The need is great and so many Germans give in. Then again the attendance of Czech schools by German children is connected in innumerable cases with the fact that the fathers are State officials. Indeed, in hundreds of cases a man's employment by the State involves the Czechification of his children in a Czech school. Souls are angled for in a manner which on one occasion was even condemned by Dr. Hodza himself.

Agents of Czechisation.

The agents of this Czech penetration into the field of German life and work are, first and foremost, the State officials, Conscious of their mission as Czechs, and armed with the authority of the State, and at the same time members or officials of a Czechisation society they carry on infinite and indefatigable detail work ; secondly there are the Czechisation societies themselves which find their clearest expression in the largest formations of this kind, the Jednotas, which form the clearing house of all individual forces of Czech expansion. They are the elements of attack on the German space and their successes hitherto have been due not least to cooperation with the State authorities and to assistance and encouragement from Government offices ; on which they exercise the greatest influence as regards appointments. The importance of the fact that the agents of the State authority are in most cases identical with the agents and executive organs of these Czechisation programmes, as drawn up in the progress reports of these societies and unions, can hardly be over-estimated. They all work for the same object: not only to maintain the Czech positions in the German districts, but above all to strengthen and increase them.

Summary.

Summed up in a few headlines, the results of the solemn promises made by the founders of the State and the method of enforcing the Constitution and the boasted legislation for the protection of minorities present the following picture:

Confiscation of over 600,000 hectares of German land, discrimination against the Sudeten Germans by "election geometry" and in the application of the system of proportional representation in the legislative bodies, gradual expulsion of Sudeten Germans from posts as officials of the State and the provinces, wholesale closing down of German schools, economic and social neglect of the German districts and consequent creation of an abnormally large amount of unemployment through the national crisis added to the effects of the world economic depression, exclusion of the Germans from Government contracts, Czechisation of the big industrial undertakings formerly in German hands and transfer of some of these to Czech districts, artificial encouragement of Czech industries at the expense of German industries, provision of Czech districts with new industries and one-sided enforcement of the regulations governing place of business in the case of new industries in favour of Czech districts, ruthless assessment and collection of taxes against the Sudeten Germans and correspondingly liberal treatment of Czech concerns, one-sided financial support and subsidizing of Czech concerns and financial institutions, refusal to accord similar state grants to German institutions of this kind, harsh discrimination against German cultural associations in favour of the Czechs, severe and increasingly restrictive employment of the censorship against the Germans as regards press, clubs and meetings, refusal to accede to German applications for the establishment of private schools, establishment of innumerable Czech schools in German territory and the holding out of inducements to German children to attend them owing to the insufficient number of Czech children, encouragement of Czech denationalization associations and toleration of unrestrained Czech expansionist activities employing State authority against Sudeten German property, creation of artificial Czech minorities in the German districts by transfer of large numbers of Czech officials and workers to those districts (preferably those with several children), discouragement of German cultural aspirations, czechification of place names, discouragement of the national education of Germans through the school curricula, dissolution of German parties and exclusion of more than half the German deputies in the legislative bodies between 1933 and 1935, ruthless enforcement in the German districts of the "Law for the protection of the State" with all the hardships entailed thereby, etc.

The Disastrous Responsibility of Geneva.

In this connection a few words may be said about the minority policy of the League of Nations and its disastrous indifference to the fate of the minorities.

As a sort of substitute for the abandoned right of self-determination, the protection of the national, religious and cultural minorities was in a number of cases transferred to the League. This task was not mentioned in the Covenant but merely in the Paris Peace Treaties and in a number of annexed treaties concluded mainly with the Austrian succession States.

There were good reasons for this. Only certain countries were to be placed under an obligation, while the main Powers would not permit of any supervision. For this reason the Covenant does not say a word about the minorities and their fundamental rights are nowhere enumerated or determined.

The minority protection of the League, as laid down in these treaties, does not however arise from any humanitarian or ethical reasons, but is based on political considerations. It was intended to contribute to the maintenance of the Paris Treaties. A protagonist of the protection of minorities, Mr. Murray, South African delegate at the second and third Assemblies of the League, stated in the latter on September 5th, 1922:

"We must take care that all elements of the population are satisfied with the new division of territory in Europe, for otherwise this new division of territory cannot be lasting."

But even this prophetic statement was, as we have seen, unable to cause the Czech Republic to treat its minorities properly and justly or to cause the League itself to see that right was done.

What is understood in Czechoslovakia by minority protection has been stated with admirable frankness by Professor Mayr in his textbook on Czechoslovak public law:

"...that the engagements of the minorities treaty assumed in the Peace Treaty are not binding and therefore in practice ineffective...., that they are ineffective in theory for the simple reason that they are in conflict with the sovereignty of the Czechoslovak State as the sole source of the legal order."

The League of Nations paid no attention to, or dealt inadequately with, the numerous serious complaints of the Germans in Czechoslovakia, and at the present time this gives the Czech press occasion to state in many cases that this attitude of the League is a proof of the good treatment of the minorities.

We may mention two examples of Geneva minorities policy from the early stages of the Czechoslovak Republic:

There is the characteristic case of the memorandum sent to Geneva in August 1920 by the German deputies and senators of the Prague National Assembly, containing serious charges against the Czechoslovak Government for violation of the provisions for the protection of minorities. It was not only not attended to but was not published.

This memorandum pointed out in the first place that the Czechoslovak State had been created by the victorious principal Powers against the will of about six million people, and therefore in open conflict with the right of self-determination and in accordance with the right of the stronger. The provisions of the Peace Treaty of St. Germain aiming at protection for the minorities were in no way calculated to protect the Germans from ill-treatment and oppression, for the will was lacking to carry out the provisions honestly and to do justice to the spirit of the Treaty. The memorandum goes on to show in detail that the legislation in the Czechoslovak State unhesitatingly violated these provisions both formally and materially. German schools were closed out of hand as superfluous and the buildings and premises used for Czech education. The provisions of the new Language Law regarding the use of Czech by the authorities were filled with the same lust for power and hatred of everything that was not Czech, and must necessarily be regarded by the Germans not only as a humiliation and provocation, but could in many cases not be put into effect. In this state of affairs, the German deputies and senators made the following charge before the whole world: "The Czechoslovak Republic, in the first year and a half of its existence, supported by national chauvinistic officials and the power of bayonets, has carried on the most brutal policy of Czechisation in legislation and administration; it has suppressed unscrupulously all real democracy and all non-Czech populations; it has robbed them of any influence on the direction and administration of the State, so that it has become a denationalised, imperialistic and Chauvinistic State, in which the minority is governed by the majority; it is a retreat of reaction and a permanent danger for the peaceful further development of Central Europe. As the sole nominated representatives of four million Germans in the Czechoslovak Republic, therefore, the German deputies and senators request the Council of the League of Nations to cause the Czechoslovak Government to carry out the obligations towards its national minorities which it assumed in the Treaty of St. Germain and to despatch an impartial international commission to Czechoslovakia in order to examine the complaints of the German millions."

The complaints that came from Czechoslovakia were heart-rending. Read for instance the "Complaint of German large estate owners in the Czechoslovak Republic, who have received notice of the confiscation of their property as from January 1st, 1923, addressed to the League of Nations". The German League of Nations Union of that time, which handed this memorandum to the Secretary General in September 1922, described it in its covering note in the following words: "This memorandum raises a protest against the execution of the agrarian laws which is directed almost exclusively against non-Czech landowners and the denationalisation of large German tracts of land by the Czechoslovak Government which is thereby involved, since these Government measures represent a violation of the rights of the German minorities ... guaranteed by the Treaty of St. Germain."

The same note further states:

"The undersigned Union, in bringing this complaint before the Council of the League of Nations, considers that it should not let this opportunity pass of again drawing the attention of the Council to the intolerable conditions under which the German population of the Czechoslovak Republic, consisting of three and a half millions, have been living for nearly four years. Their highly developed educational system is deliberately pressed down to a constantly lower level, their linguistic rights, which are in any case strictly limited by law, are still further restricted by the practice of the State authorities, their banking and insurance systems are constantly subject to Czechisation by means of violent Government measures, the German officials, who are in principle practically excluded from the central authorities, are gradually being ousted even from the lower authorities in the purely German districts, the German place names are Czechified against the will of the German communes, the sphere of activity of the German self-administration bodies is constantly restricted under the pretext of measures of administrative reform, the possibility for the young people to earn a living is reduced by a network of Government measures. The German representatives in both houses of the National Assembly are precluded from any serious cooperation by the fetters of rules of procedure framed for this purpose, by the language regulations and by the closed front of the Czech majority parties which adopt an attitude contrary to all parliamentary custom. The gloomy feeling of impotent despair has taken possession of our compatriots, who are now also to be violently expelled from their soil."

This was the position, not only until 1923 but also subsequently. The League of Nations remained silent. It was also silent when the notorious Machnik decree of 1934, which was based on military reasons, drew a safety cordon round the Sudeten German territory to a depth of 25 kilometres, thus inflicting a fearful blow on the Sudeten Germans and striking at their very heart. Geneva gave no support to the Germans in Bohemia in their struggle against their oppressors, although that struggle had only one aim, namely equality of rights as laid down in the treaties. On the contrary, Geneva encouraged Czech policy to continue its methods of violence and measures of oppression.

If at the present time the racial struggle has become an acute danger for European peace, the League of Nations bears a great share of the blame, since it delayed action at the right time.

Matters of the Past ? — No !

Now it will certainly be objected that all these things belong to the past and that matters are in many respects very different now. The Czech press is never tired of saying that the German minority is better treated in Czechoslovakia, than are the minorities in any other country. The Germans, they say, enjoy in reality far more rights than they entitled to under the Agreement for the Protection of Minorities.

To reply to this it is sufficient to point out that it was the distress in the German frontier districts, the policy of denationalization carried on by the Czech storm associations, the "personal policy" pursued by the Government Departments, the State police and even by the military, which is inspired exclusively by Czech nationalist considerations, the fact that hundreds of thousands of people are faced with the prospect of never again finding a livelihood as Germans and the consequent bitterness and despair, that led to that tremendous revolution in Sudeten German policy as a result of the elections of May 19th, 1935, out of which the Sudeten German party founded by Conrad Henlein on October 1st, 1933 emerged not only as the only Sudeten German party qualified to speak with authority, but as the strongest party in the Czechoslovak State. In spite of this, it was not asked to form the Cabinet or even consulted with regard to its formation, but the Government simply decided that the Sudeten Germans should continue to be represented by the same parties which had just suffered such a signal defeat. This crass violation of the basic principles of democracy was the real starting-point of all the subsequent complications and was responsible for the fact that the Sudeten German problem has since become increasingly acute and dangerous.

The winter of 1935-36 with its tremendous unemployment figure enormously increased distress and consequently the danger of social unrest. Out of 662,000 unemployed in the whole country, 330,000 were a charge upon the Sudeten Germans alone: that is to say, although the Sudeten German population constituted $22\frac{1}{3}$ per cent of the total population, the proportion of unemployment was something like 49 per cent. The bitterness was increased by the policy of the Government. As a rule, local Sudeten German unemployed were not used for emergency work, which was entrusted in nearly every case to Czech contractors, who obtained their labour from distant Czech districts. Thus the Sudeten German unemployed usually had to stand idle and watch the emergency work in their own districts being carried out by Czech labour from outside. Under the pressure of these conditions and in view of the lack of comprehension still prevailing in Prague and of the warnings uttered in foreign countries which were beginning to wake up to the position, the German parties in the Government—the so-called "activists"—began to realize the dangerous part which they were compelled to play, in view of their share of responsibility for the state of affairs. Even they came to see more and more clearly that an amicable solution of the problem would only be possible, if a sincere effort were made to establish German rights on the basis of self-determination. They moved for the first time on April 26th, 1936 and finally even the Government realized that the convenient formula, whereby it had always endeavoured to deny the existence of this problem by saying that the State had given the Sudeten German everything that it was under an obligation to give them, would no longer suffice.

On August 19th, 1936, President Benes delivered his speech at Reichenberg in which, for the first time, he admitted that mistakes had been made, which should not be repeated.

The Collapse of the "Action of Appeasement" of February 18th, 1937 and its Cause.

The first step was taken by the Czech authorities on February 18th, 1937, when Cabinet decrees were issued announcing the principle of proportional representation as a measure of "national pacification". Here again, the Sudeten German Party did not participate. The negotiations were carried on behind close doors and only after they had already been concluded were the representatives of the Sudeten Germans invited to give their assent, which they declined to do. On February 20th the result of the negotiations between the whole Government and the three German parties in the Government were communicated to the press in the form of a statement by the official Czechoslovak Press Bureau.

This statement throws a significant light on Prague's idea of the right solution of a question on which "the very existence of the new State depends, as it goes to the roots of all State institutions". The essential terms are as follows:.... the Government... has examined,... is devoting its whole attention and its every effort... draws the attention of all departments... will—now as in the past—see to it... it recognizes... it will be enabled... it regards it as axiomatic... has taken all measures... is prepared, does not exclude the possibility of a more detailed consideration... will be at pains to remove any defects... is consistently loyal to the principles of a strictly equitable policy in regard to minorities..."

Thus we see that the statement consisted of nothing but cheap phrases, which certainly appeared to be conciliatory, but no one of which represented a legal obligation upon either the Government of the time or any future Government. The concessions made by the Government were expressed in the form of promises which were legally non-committal and morally binding upon the Government of the time only, while, as regards their subject-matter, they consisted partly of a repetition of earlier concessions and partly of the observance of the terms of the Constitution. For the rest they were ambiguous. They in no way constituted a first step for a later readjustment of principle between the nations composing the State, but constituted for the Germans an obstacle in the way of any subsequent demand for a comprehensive solution of the kind. They took no account of Sudeten German requirements, inasmuch as they did nothing to remove the main causes of complaint and the real causes of the national dissension.

The German parties also soon came to realize this, especially as they interpreted the provisions of the agreement in a different sense from the Czechs. The two sides understood different things by the agreement and opinions clashed, as was apparent as soon as the first practical work was undertaken. A few weeks later the representatives of the activists expressed their dissatisfaction and disappointment in sharply worded statements and demanded that the premises of concessions should be kept. The warning of the representative of the Christian-Social Party, Schütz, had almost a prophetic ring: "A State", he said, "whose statesmen are not strictly truthful, is digging its own grave", and on November 17th, 1937, the leader of the German Social-Democrats, Deputy Jaksch, attacked the use of the monstrous "Fremdwort", "proportionality", in the following terms: "German officials are more difficult to find in a Government office than a needle in a haystack." Again, during the debate on the budget at the end of the year, Landbund Deputy Böhm confirmed the continual national and economic discrimination against the Sudeten German element. There were 40,000 fewer Sudeten German State officials than there would have been if their number had corresponded to the percentage of Sudeten Germans to the total population. If it was not possible to make good the discrimination against the Sudeten German element from one day to another, it was hoped that that would be done as soon as possible. In the Government's opinion however, it was obliged to observe the strict percentage of $22\frac{1}{3}$ in the case of new appointments only, which meant in theory that a fair proportion of Sudeten Germans to the total number of officials (600,000) would only be reached after the last supernumerary Czech officials had been pensioned off—that is to say, after the expiration of a normal official career, in 30 to 40 years.

The more than meagre results of the nominal application by the Government after February 18th of the principle of proportionality in the matter of contracts for public works and the appointment of officials and employees, which made it appear that no effect whatsoever had been given to that principle, caused the so-called German Government parties, which were elected in 1935 by rather less than 30% of the Sudeten Germans, to state again and again that the promises of February 18th had not been kept, although those parties "had made concessions bordering on self-sacrifice". During the parliamentary debate on the budget held from November to the beginning of December, a Deputy of one of the German "splinter parties" criticized the system applied in the case of appointments, the liquidation of financial institutions, the giving of contracts for constructional work and deliveries, the attempts to obtain adherents by offering inducements (Seelenfang), and the subjection of German farmers in the frontier districts to petty vexations in the matter of language and of the building of Czech minority schools. He demanded that policy should be determined by the Government and not by the "Jednotas": "a reasonable national and State policy is not to be found in the throttling of the German language, the imperilling of German livelihood or the suppression of German cultural aspirations".

On the expiry of the "year of grace" for which Dr. Hodza asked in his address to the press on March 13th, 1937, he (Dr. Hodza) endeavoured in vain to make much of the results achieved. The collapse of the policy of February 18th, (which was caused not only by administrative defects, obtuseness, arbitrary measures and lack of good will on the part of the bureaucracy and the absence of clear aims to be achieved within a definite period of time, but also—and especially—by the faulty structure of this Government decree and the attempts to make good a national injustice by purely administrative methods) was too obvious. The failure of the policy of February 18th was inevitable, inherent in its structure and unavoidably bound up in the whole system. This policy was wrecked, as Deputy Jaksch said, on the rock of a narrow conception of the national State, which those concerned continued to entertain, instead of adopting the only method which could have yielded the desired result—that of political and linguistic equality of treatment of the different nationalities.

There was however one good thing about this policy—that last disappointed hope of the activists: it led, even in the matter of parties, to the formation of a united front of the Sudeten German element. Peasants Party, Christian-Social Party and Industrial Party (Gewerbepartei) dissolved themselves, withdrew their Ministers from the Government and joined the Sudeten German Party.

Words and Deeds.

From March 1st to May 22nd, 1938.

Such is the title of a volume which appeared from the firm Karl H. Frank at the end of May 1938, the purport of which is summarised by the publisher in a short Foreword as follows.

The beginning of March 1938 marks the commencement of a new stage in the history of the Sudete-German problem. On April 24th 1938 the Sudete-Germans gave new expression to their claim for recognition of their nationality and admission of their rights to live and develop on that basis. Since the beginning of March the Czechs for their part not merely admitted the existence of the Sudete-German problem, but held out hopes through their Government—with special emphasis on the point in foreign countries—of action in the sense of a final solution of the problem.

How was it then that, at the very time when the Government was working on a full and complete settlement of the problem, the actual tension became increasingly worse, culminating in those days around May 20th when the whole world held its breath?

The following pages are a contribution to the answering of that question.

While behind closed doors, at green baize tables and on clean sheets of paper, negotiations were proceeding for a solution—of which, incidentally, we (i. e. the parties principally affected) are still without knowledge—the practical position diverged further and further from the theory. Of this practical position, that is to say, of the stark realities of everyday in the Sudetan lands during this “conciliation period”, it is now proposed to give some account.

In the pages which follow news from the daily Press of the Czech Republic during the period in question is reproduced in chronological order as it was published during the period in question. The passages quoted are either extracts or complete and literal translations of news which appeared in the Press after it had been passed by the Censor. (Censors of this number of our periodical, please note!)

It goes without saying that much more, very much more, happened during the period than appeared in the Press. The Press could only make a selection. It goes equally without saying that everything which appeared in the Press cannot find reproduction in these pages. What does appear in these pages represents therefore a selection from a number of occurrences in the Sudete-German country from day to day.

It must moreover be remembered that the Censorship greatly restricted, or entirely prohibited, the publication of a large number of other occurrences; and from the moment when these occurrences reached their culminating point, i. e. from about May 22nd onwards, reports of further incidents were banned entirely by the Censorship. Accordingly the selection which follows stops at the date in question.

In the case of some of the events here recorded, official reports were issued which conflict with the reports that appeared in the Sudete-German Press. Considerations of censorship make it impossible to discuss these official reports.

The collection of these various utterances from the Press shows with positively staggering clearness how since the date March 1st 1938, that is to say, the date on which (in their own words) the Prague Government began to study intensively the solution of the Sudete-German problem, the penetration, assimilation and oppression of the Sudete-Germans by the Czechs continued in just the same manner as before. After that date, as before, public works in German territory were entrusted to Czech contractors and Czech workers from other parts of the Republic: German workers, employees and tradespeople continued to be subjected to national pressure: and the process of Czech penetration of German districts was deliberately and conspicuously greatest in those cases where the livelihood of the population was dependent on the State or State undertakings.

The economic expansion was accompanied by cultural and political expansion. Czech schools continued after March 1st 1938, as before, to be erected in German districts; and Czech political and cultural influence continued to exert itself in the Sudete lands.

The everyday situation in these parts of the Republic was coloured and conditioned by hundreds of small acts by agents of the Czech State as well as by the Czech civilian population pushed into these districts. There was no remission of the policy of pin-pricks after March 1st 1938 any more than before. On the contrary, the number of incidents increased in the districts in question; and an irresponsible Press saw to it that the process was uninterrupted.

The seriousness of the position increased when these incidents began to assume the character of mass demonstrations against the German element, when they began to lead with increasing frequency to the use of force and bloodshed, and it was seen that the executive and the military were being used in these connections. Excesses of this kind became more and more frequent after March 1st 1938, that is to say, during the “conciliation period”. The number of persons injured rose steadily; and it was precisely in this period that the Sudete-Germans were called upon to mourn their first dead.

Such were the realities, such was the practical position, in Sudetia during the period in which the final solution of the Sudete-German problem was the object of negotiation and discussion and paper proposals.

The subsequent development since May 21st is still fresh in the minds of all. This period again resembled the preceding one. While Prague was still discussing and negotiating over the mythical nationality statute, the second, third and fourth plan, which were out of date before they saw the light of publicity, while the Hradchin and Kolovrat Palace under greater or less pressure from abroad hesitatingly and unwillingly made one concession after another when such concessions were no longer able to solve the problem, frontier guards, gendarmerie, police and militia out in the country gave further proofs of the importance attached by the Government to these inadequate concessions.

With unexampled calm, loyalty and discipline, the Sudeten German people for twenty years believed and trusted in all the fine and deceptive phrases which were intended to reconcile them with the Paris act of violence. Until the very latest times, when the terrible distress and suffering would have long ago driven any other people to open revolt, the leaders of the Sudeten Germans emphasised their willingness to agree peacefully with the Government and with the Czech people upon a way out of the situation which had arisen through no fault of theirs, in order to render possible joint cooperation for the welfare of the State. In vain. They were rejected with scorn and contempt.

The ultimate development therefore could not be held back. The last act of the Sudeten German drama is now being played on the European stage. It is taking place under the device which the Czechs unfortunately only adopted in their State arms: Truth is victorious! It is victorious not only over the events of the past, but also over the subsequent oppression and suppression of the populations handed over to Czechoslovakia with violence and lies in 1919. This truth will now ultimately help the victory of that right which was so shamelessly and openly violated in Paris, i. e. the right of self-determination of the nations.

TOWARDS THE DECISION

Last Warnings and Admonitions Addressed to Prague

Text of Adolf Hitler's Speech in the Berlin Sport Palace on September 26th, 1938

Men and women of the German race.

On February 20, before the members of the German Reichstag I stated for the first time a fundamental demand of an irrevocable nature. The nation heard me and understood. One statesman failed to understand. He has been removed, and my promise of that time is redeemed. I spoke before the Party Congress for the second time about this same demand. Again the nation heard me. To-day I come before the nation and speak to the people as in the great period of struggle, and you know what that means.

There should remain no doubt for the world outside that at this time it is not one man, or one leader who speaks, but the whole German people. And if I am now the mouthpiece of the German people, I know that in this hour the whole people, millions strong, agree with every one of my words. This strengthens the nation and makes my oath their oath. Let other statesmen ask themselves whether this is also their case.

You all know the question which has exercised us during the last weeks and months. It is not so much Czechoslovakia; its real name is Herr Benesh. In this name is reunited to-day all that which moves millions, which fills them either with despair or fanatical determination.

* * *

How did this question reach such importance? My people, I will now repeat to you, as I have done before, the nature and aims of German foreign policy.

German foreign policy differs from that of many democratic countries in so far as it is based on a world political doctrine, which primarily aims at maintaining the German people and safeguarding its existence. We are not interested in suppressing other nations. We do not want to see other nations among us. We want to live our own life, and we want other peoples to do the same. This doctrine leads to a limitation and restriction of our foreign policy. Our foreign political aims are consequently not unlimited. They are not defined from case to case. They are firmly laid down in the determination that they must exclusively serve the German people, to preserve it as such in the world, and to work for its existence.

What is the position now? You are aware that at one time the German nation was filled by the expression "right of self-determination of the nations" with faith in super-State assistance and it was thus caused to waive the use of its own forces to the very last moment. You are aware that the faith inspired at that time was most outrageously abused. The result was the Treaty of Versailles. You all know the terrible results of that Treaty. It is still within the memory of all of you how our nation was deprived of its arms and how the disarmed nation was subsequently ill-treated. You know the dreadful fate that overtook and pursued us for fifteen years. And you know that if Germany has nevertheless today become great, free and strong again, she has only her own strength to thank for this.

The outside world tried as long as possible to blackmail us and oppress us. From our own people a strength has emerged to end this unworthy existence, and to show the German people a way which is worthy of a great and free people. In spite of the fact that we are now free and strong we are swayed by no hatred of other nations. We bear no grudge for the past; we know that the other people are not responsible. It is a small international clique of self-seekers, who do not recoil from yoking whole peoples into their service when necessary for their mean interests. We bear in us no hatred for the outside world, and we have proved this. The German love of peace has been hardened by the facts.

Shortly after we had begun the restoration of Germany's equality of status I proposed to the world a number of agreements as a visible sign that we harboured no wish for revenge. I proposed a limitation of armaments.

My first proposal was the demand for equality,

I said that Germany was ready—if all other countries would join in—to limit all arms and weapons, to disarm in general and, if necessary, to the last machine-gun. The world did not think it worth while to discuss my proposals.

Then came my second proposal that Germany was ready to limit her army to 200,000 men if all others would do the same, and equip it with similar weapons as other armies would have. The proposal was declined.

Germany was ready, if others would do the same, to renounce all heavy weapons, all so-called aggressive weapons, including tanks, bombers, and, if necessary, also aeroplanes as well as heavy and heaviest artillery. I went even farther. I proposed an international settlement with armies of 300,000 men for each European State. This was again rejected.

I made further proposals: limitation of air fleets, abolition of bombing, complete abolition of gas warfare, safety of the homeland which does not lie in the zone of war, abolition at least of the heaviest artillery, abolition of heaviest tanks. That, too, was rejected. It was all in vain.

After two years of making offer upon offer to the world, and achieving refusal upon refusal, I gave the order to place the German army in the best state we could reach. And I can now frankly admit we have completed our rearmament in such a way as the world has never seen before. I offered disarmament as long as humanly possible. After this had been rejected I took no harsh decisions. In this I am a National-Socialist and an old German front-line soldier.

If they do not want the world to be without arms, very well; then let the German people also bear its arms.

In the last five years I have indeed rearmed. I have used milliards of marks for this purpose. The German people must now know this.

I have seen that a modern army should be built up, equipped with the most modern equipment in existence. I gave my friend Göring the command: "Create for me an air arm which will protect the German people from every attack." Thus we built up an army of which the German people can be proud, and which the world will respect whenever it appears. We have built ourselves the best air force in the world and the best tank service.

* * *

For these five years the work has gone on night and day, in one single sphere I have succeeded in bringing about an understanding. Of this I will speak later. However, I retained the ideas of my policy of disarmament in politics. During these years I have followed a practical peace policy.

I have approached all the seemingly impossible problems with a firm determination to solve them, if conceivably possible, in a peaceful way, even when entailing greater or less danger of serious renunciations by the German people. I myself am a first-line-soldier and know how hard war is. I know the seriousness of war. I wanted to spare the German people from it.

I considered plan after plan with the aim in view of doing everything for a peaceful solution. The most serious with which I was confronted was our relations with Poland. There was a danger of running into fits of hysteria. There was the danger that the Poles and Germans would regard each other as arch enemies. I wanted to prevent this. I know that I should not have been successful if there had been in Poland a democracy on Western lines. These democracies, which are indulging in phrases about peace, are the most sanguinary war agitators. There was no democracy in Poland, but a man, and with him I succeeded within one year in coming to an understanding, which for the first 10 years removed the danger of clashes. We are all determined that this agreement shall have in its wake a lasting pacification, because the problems with which we are confronted are in eight years the same as now. We do not expect anything from one another. We recognize this. We are two nations and those nations will live and neither of them will be able to do away with the other. I recognized all this, and we all must recognize that a people of 33,000,000 will always strive for an outlet to the sea.

A way for an understanding in this respect had to be found and has been found, and this way will be further and further extended.

Certainly things became hard in the area. The nationalities and small national groups frequently quarrel among themselves, but the main fact is the two State leaderships, and all reasonable and astute persons among the two peoples and countries possess the firm will and determination to improve relations. It was a great action on my part and a really peaceful action, which is of more worth than all that chattering in the Geneva League.

I have attempted during this period gradually to bring about better and lasting relations with other nations also. We have given guarantees for the States in the West. We have assured all our immediate neighbours of the integrity of their territory as far as Germany is concerned.

That is no hollow phrase; it is our sacred will. We have no interest in breaking the peace. We want nothing from these peoples. It is a fact that these offers of ours met with ever-increasing acceptance and growing understanding. Bit by bit the peoples are freeing themselves from the blinding Geneva madness, which I should call not collective obligation to peace but collective obligation to war. They are freeing themselves from this, and begin to see problems soberly, and to be ready for understanding and desirous of peace.

I went further. I offered my hand to Britain. I voluntarily renounced ever again entering upon a naval armaments competition in order to give the British Empire a feeling of security, not because I could no longer build—let no one deceive himself about this—but simply to secure a lasting peace between the two peoples. But one thing is a preliminary condition here. It will not do that one party says: "I never want to wage war with you, and for this reason I offer you voluntarily to restrict my arms to 35 per cent."; and the other party declares from time to time: "I shall wage war again when it suits me."

This will not do. Such an agreement is only morally justified if both nations promise one another solemnly never again to want to wage war against one another. Germany has this will. Let us all hope that those who are of the same will will gain the upper hand in the British people.

I went further. I immediately told France after the return of the Saar districts to Germany, which was to be decided by a plebiscite, "there exist no more differences between France and us." I said that Alsace-Lorraine did not exist for us. This people has not been asked for its opinion during the last 10 years. We feel that this people is the most happy people, that the inhabitants of these regions are a joyous people so long as no one thinks of conquering them.

We all do not want a war with France. We do not want anything in France. When, thanks to a loyal interpretation of the treaties by France, the Saar region was returned to the Reich I at once assumed frankly that now all territorial differences with France had been settled, and we have no longer any differences with France.

Alsace-Lorraine does not exist any more for us. The best relations will prevail between France and Germany so long as the two people are working together.

After this definite renunciation of Alsace-Lorraine I turned to another problem. This was easier to solve, as their world-political doctrines had a common basis, which offered a way to a quick mutual understanding. I refer here to the relations between Germany and Italy.

The solution of this problem is only partly due to me. For the rest it is due to that unique and great man which to have as its leader is the fortune of the Italian people. Our relations have left the sphere of purely economic or political utility; they have outclassed treaties and alliances and have become a real and strong union of affections. An axis has formed itself represented by two peoples which have found themselves in a close and indissoluble friendship.

Also in this respect I have removed from the world a problem which no longer exists for us. It may be bitter for individual people, but above all there stands the interest of the whole German people, and this is to be able to work in peace. This whole activity, my racial comrades, is not a phrase incapable of proof, but this activity is strengthened by facts, which no political liar can evade.

Two problems remained. Here I had to make a reservation. Ten million Germans were outside the frontiers of the Reich in two self-contained areas—Germans who wanted to return to the Reich as their home. This figure of 10,000,000 represents no trifle. It represents a quarter of the inhabitants of France. And if France had not for 40 years given up her claim upon the few millions of French in Alsace-Lorraine, then, before God and the world, we have the right to maintain our claim upon these 10,000,000.

And somewhere there is a point, my racial comrades, at which concessions must stop, because otherwise it becomes weakness.

I had no right to stand before German history if 10,000,000 were to be simply sacrificed as unimportant. I should, then, have had no moral right to be the leader of the German people.

I have indeed, taken upon myself enough sacrifices. Here was a point beyond which I could not go. How right that was has been proved, first by the plebiscite in Austria and by the whole story of the reunion of Austria with the German Reich. A glowing avowal was made at that time, an avowal such as the rest of the world certainly did not hope for. However, we then witnessed this avowal. To the democracies a plebiscite is superfluous, even pernicious, in the moment in which it does not lead to that result for which the democracies hoped.

Nevertheless, this problem was solved for the good fortune of the whole greater German people.

* * *

Now the last problem which must be solved and which will be solved confronts us. It is the last territorial claim which I have to make in Europe, but it is the claim from which I do not recede and which I shall fulfil. God willing.

The history of this problem is this. In 1918 Central Europe was torn to pieces under the motto "self-determination of the people" and was remodelled by a few foolhardy or mad statesmen. Without paying consideration to history or to the origin of nations, to their national will, their economic necessities, Central Europe was atomized at that time and the so-called new nations were formed at will.

The Czech State owed to this its existence. This Czech State began with one original lie. The name of the father of that lie was Benesh. Then Herr Benesh appeared at Versailles and gave the assurance that there existed a Czechoslovak nation. He had to invent this lie in order to give his insignificant number of compatriots a somewhat bigger and thus more justified volume; and the Anglo-Saxon statesmen who in matters of geography and race are not always so well-informed did not consider it necessary to examine Herr Benesh's statement. Otherwise, they would have seen at once that there was no such thing as a Czechoslovak nation, but that there are Czechs and Slovaks and that the Slovaks do not want to have anything to do with the Czechs.

So these Czechs finally through Dr. Benesh, annexed Slovakia. As this State did not appear to be capable of life, they took without a second thought 3,500,000 Germans, in spite of their right to self-determination and their will to self-determination. As this was not enough, a million Hungarians must be added, then Carpathian Russians, and finally a few hundred thousand Poles...

As I speak to you here and now I naturally sympathize with the fate of these oppressed peoples. I sympathize with the fate of the Hungarians, Slovaks, Poles, and Ukrainians. But I am naturally only the mouthpiece of the fate of my Germans.

When Herr Benesh brought this State together with lies, he solemnly promised to divide the State according to the Swiss system of Cantons, for among the democracy statesmen there were some who had qualms of conscience. We all know how Herr Benesh put into force this system of cantonization. He now began his system of terror. Even in those days the Germans tried to protest against this oppression and outrage. They were shot down, and since then a war of extermination has been carried on. In these years of Czechoslovak peaceful development well nigh 600,000 Germans had to leave Czechoslovakia for a very simple reason—because they otherwise would have had to perish from starvation. The whole development from 1918 to 1938 alone showed one thing quite clearly: Benesh was determined simply to exterminate solely the German element. He succeeded in doing this to a certain degree. He cast innumerable people into the deepest distress. He managed to make millions of people timid and cowed under the continual employment of terror. He slowly succeeded in closing up the mouths of millions.

At the same time a clarification began with regard to the task of the State as seen from an international angle. It was no longer concealed in the least that the nation was destined to be used if necessary against Germany. A French Air Minister, M. Cot, bluntly stated it a few weeks ago: "We need the State because German economy and German industry could be best destroyed by bombs from this State."

It was not we who sought contact with Bolshevism, but Bolshevism made use of this State in order to gain a channel into Central Europe.

And now a shameless action began. This State, which had only a minority Government, compelled the National Groups to follow a policy, which some day will force them to fire upon their own brethren. Herr Benesh stood up and demanded from the Sudeten-Germans: "When I make war on Germany, you have to shoot at the Germans. If you refuse to do it you are traitors, and I will have you shot." He demanded the same from the Hungarians, the Poles, and the Slovaks, whom he used for aims to which the Slovak people are indifferent. The Slovak people want peace and not an adventure, but Herr Benesh is able to make all these people either into traitors to the nation or traitors to their own people. They must do one of two things: either they must betray their own people and be ready to shoot at them, or Herr Benesh says "You are traitors and must therefore be shot."

That is the greatest piece of shamefulfulness that is thinkable. To force alien men in certain circumstances to shoot their own compatriots, just because a rotten, decaying and criminal State régime insists on such action. I can assure you that as we occupied Austria my first order was "No Czech needs even dare serve in the German Army." I will not place him before a conflict of conscience; I do not want him to do it.

Now, whoever sets himself against the whole aims of Dr. Benesh is persecuted. They must face terror, prisons, and they will be economically crushed. And the democratic world apostles cannot pretend that it does not all exist. In this State of Herr Benesh the consequences for the nationalities have been cruel. Again I speak here for the Germans. They have the greatest death-rate; their lack of children is the greatest, and unemployment there is most terrible; suicides are most numerous.

There is only one problem, and that is how long is this to last. For 20 years the Germans in Czechoslovakia looked upon all this.

For 20 years the German people has done the same. It could not help it because it was defenceless, and it could not help them to free themselves from their tormentors. Now look at those world democracies. If a traitor is being locked up, if a man is taken into preventive arrest for agitating from a pulpit against the State, Britain gets excited, America is outraged; but if hundreds of thousands of people are driven from their homes, tens of thousands are thrown into prison, if thousands are slaughtered, those brave democracies are not moved in the least.

We have learned in these years to despise them most truly.

In the whole time and to-day we never found a single Great Power in Europe with a man at its head who has as much understanding for the distress of our people as my great friend Benito Mussolini. We shall never forget what he has done in this time, or the attitude of the Italian people. If similar distress should ever befall Italy, I shall go to the German people and ask them to do for the Italians what the Italians have done for us. Then there will not be two States who are defending themselves, but one bloc.

* * *

I explained on February 20 of this year in the Reichstag that this (the condition of the Sudetens in Czechoslovakia) must be altered. The only result was that a more radical suppression was introduced. A still greater terrorism began, and the day of dissolutions, prohibitions, confiscations, etc., dawned. This went on until, finally, May 21 dawned, and you really cannot deny it, my racial comrades, it was a really eternal German patience that we showed at that time. This May 21 was already unbearable. I have already recently presented, at the Reich Party Day, the history of that month. In Czechoslovakia the elections were at last to take place. They were no longer to be postponed. Then along comes Herr Benesh and discovers a means of intimidating the Germans there—namely, the military occupation of the territories.

He even now wants to continue to maintain that military occupation in the hope that so long as his minions are there no one will dare to oppose him. It was that impudent lie—that Germany had mobilized—which had to do duty as a cover for the Czech mobilization, to palliate it and to provide a motive for it. What happened then you all know—an infamous international world campaign of provocation. Germany had not called up a single man. It had absolutely no thought of solving this problem by any military means. I still retained the hope that, at the very last moment, the Czechs would realize that this tyrannical régime could not be maintained. But Herr Benesh maintained the standpoint that anything is permissible with Germany; because he was protected by France and England nothing could happen to him; and because, above all, when all other help failed, he had behind him Soviet Russia.

That was the answer of this man: shoot down, arrest, and imprison all those whom he does not like for some reason or other. Thus there came finally my demands made at Nuremberg. The demands were quite clear. Now I have for the first time stated that the self-determination for these 3,500,000 at last—almost 20 years after Mr. Wilson—must come into force, and that we won't wait any longer. And again Herr Benesh has given his answer : more dead, more imprisonment, and more arrests. The German element (in Czechoslovakia) gradually began to flee.

Then came England. I clearly stated to Mr. Chamberlain what we now see as the sole possibility of a solution. It is the most natural thing one can imagine. I know that all nationalities do not wish to remain with this Herr Benesh. I myself am, in the first place, the mouthpiece of the Germans. On behalf of these Germans I have spoken and have now given the assurance that I am not willing any more to stand by calmly and without acting and see these madmen, who believe they can simply mishandle 3,500,000 people, and I have left no doubt German patience is at last at an end.

I have left no doubt that it is the nature of the German mentality to be passive and patient, but then the moment comes when one must say : That is enough.

And now England and France must place before Czechoslovakia the only possible demand, to set the German area free at last and to give it up to the Reich.

However, we are acquainted to-day with regard to the conversations which Herr Benesh conducted at that time. We arrived at decision, confronted with the threats of England and France no longer to back Czechoslovakia, if the fate of the people were not changed and the regions liberated.

Confronted with this statement Herr Benesh found a way out. He admitted, "Yes, these regions must be seceded." That was his statement. And what did he do ? It was not the region which he seceded, but the Germans he now drives out. And that is now a matter where the game ends. Herr Benesh had scarcely said this when his military subjugation once more set in and in a more severe manner. And now we see the figures : — One day 10,000, on the following day 20,000, on the next 37,000. Again two days later 42,000, 78,000. Now they are 90,000, 137,000 ; and to-day they are 214,000. Whole regions are being depopulated, villages are being burned down, and an attempt is made to smoke out the Germans there with shells and gas. And Herr Benesh sits in Prague and is convinced that "Nothing can happen to me. Behind me there stands England and France." I believe, my racial comrades, that the time has now come when we must speak most plainly.

If anyone suffers for 20 years such a shame, such a disgrace, and such misfortune, nobody will be able to say that he is not peace-loving. If anyone shows intelligence as we have done nobody can say that we are eager for war. Herr Benesh is backed by 7,000,000, but here stand a people of 75,000,000.

I have now placed at the disposal of the British Government a Memorandum with the last and final German proposal. This proposal is nothing else than the realization of that which Dr. Benesh has already promised. The contents of this proposal are very simple : That region which is German according to the people, and wants to go to Germany in accordance with the wishes of the people, will now come to Germany. That is not at a time when Benesh has succeeded in driving out perhaps one or two million Germans, but now, and that is immediately. I have stipulated only that borderline which is just on the grounds of the material—in existence for many decades—of national and linguistic distribution in Czechoslovakia. Nevertheless, I am more just than Herr Benesh. I do not want to exploit the power which we possess. Therefore, I fixed right from the beginning that this region will be placed under German rule, because on the whole it is populated by Germans. The final drawing of the borderline, however, will rest on the racial comrades themselves who live there. I have determined that in spite of this a plebiscite shall then take place in this region, and in order that no one shall say that this plebiscite will not be just I have chosen the Saar Statute as a basis for this plebiscite.

I was willing and am willing to let there be a plebiscite in the whole region of Czechoslovakia. However, Benesh turned against this and his friends too, turned against this. Only in individual sections. All right, I gave in here.

If you consider on principle that a plebiscite should be taken only in some disputed districts, well and good, but on both sides of the language frontier, so that no one could say that the plebiscite was not correct. I was ready to agree that an international commission should control the plebiscite. I was ready to leave the drawing of this frontier to a mixed German-Czech commission. Mr. Chamberlain asked whether it could not be done by an international committee. I was ready to agree to this. I was ready to withdraw the troops during this plebiscite. I have to-day declared my willingness to invite the British Legion for this period—while the plebiscite was going on. The British Legion made me this offer to go into this area and to maintain quiet and order there. I was also prepared that an international commission should draw up a definite frontier, and I was prepared to leave the formalities to a commission consisting of Germans and Czechs.

What are the contents of this Memorandum ? They are the practical execution of what Herr Benesh has promised under the strongest international guarantees.

But something is unacceptable to Herr Benesh. He says : "This Memorandum creates a new situation." What is this new situation ? Is it because I asked that that which Herr Benesh had promised must for once be fulfilled ? This is what Herr Benesh says is the new situation. What has that man not promised during his life ! And he has held to nothing. And now for the first time he is to keep to something.

Herr Benesh says, "We cannot leave this area." So that Herr Benesh understood the cession of this area as meaning that it should be accredited to the Reich as a legal title and at the same time oppressed by Czechs.

That is over. I have now demanded that after 20 years Herr Benesh shall be forced to face the truth. He will have to hand over this area to us on October 1. Herr Benesh now places his hopes in the world. He makes no secret of this, and his diplomats make no secret of it either. They explain : "This is our hope, that Chamberlain will fall, that Daladier will be removed, that all over the world there will be upheavals, and Soviet Russia is also our hope."

* * *

He still thinks he can evade a fulfilment of his duty.

I can only say, two men face each other—there is Herr Benesh and here am I—and we are two different people. When Herr Benesh was scrimshanking through the great struggle of the peoples, I was doing my duty as a decent soldier. And to-day, once more, I stand before this man as a soldier of my people.

I have little to explain. I am grateful to Mr. Chamberlain for all his efforts, and I have assured him that the German people want nothing but peace—simply that I cannot go back once beyond the limits of our patience. I have further assured him, and I emphasize it now, that when this problem is solved, Germany has no more territorial problems in Europe.

I have further assured him that at the moment when Czechoslovakia has solved its other problems—that is, when the Czechs shall have come to an understanding with their other minorities—I shall not be interested in the Czech State any more, and that, so far as I am concerned, I can guarantee it. We do not want any Czechs any more. At the same time I now declare to the German people that so far as the Sudeten German problem is concerned my patience is at an end.

I have made Herr Benesh an offer. It is nothing more than the execution of that which he has already accepted. Now he has war or peace in his hands. He will either accept this offer now and give the Germans their freedom at last, or we shall go and fetch this freedom.

And one thing the world should note. During four and a half years of war, and in the long years of my political life, they have never been able to say I have ever been a coward.

I now come before my people as its first soldier and behind me the world must know marches a nation, and a very different nation from the nation of 1918. Whereas democratic scholars then managed to infect our people with the poison of democratic phrases, the German people to-day is not the German people of those days.

Such phrases to-day are like wasp stings to us. We are now immune against them. In this hour the whole German nation will unite itself with me. It will follow my will as its will, just as I regard its future and destiny as the measure of all my actions, and we will strengthen this united will just as we did in the fighting period—in that period in which, as an unknown, lonely soldier, I went out to conquer a Reich. I never doubted the final success and victory. A group of brave men and courageous women gathered round me and went with me, and thus I beg my German people: "Stand now behind me, man and man, and woman and woman." In these hours we all will become one sacred united will. It will be stronger than all distress and every danger. And when this will is stronger than distress and danger then will it break down distress and danger.

We are determined! Herr Benesh can now choose!

The Text of the German Memorandum

The Memorandum handed to the British Prime Minister, Mr. Chamberlain, at Godesberg on September 23rd, 1938 for transmission to the Czech Government, is worded as follows:

Reports which are increasing in number from hour to hour regarding incidents in the Sudetenland show that the situation has become completely intolerable for the Sudeten German people and, in consequence, a danger to the peace of Europe. It is therefore essential that the separation of the Sudetenland agreed to by Czechoslovakia should be effected without any further delay. On the attached map the Sudeten German area which is to be ceded is shaded red. The areas in which, over and above the areas which are to be occupied, a plebiscite is also to be held are drawn in and shaded green.

The final delimitation of the frontier must correspond to the wishes of those concerned. In order to determine these wishes a certain period is necessary for the preparation of the plebiscite, during which disturbances must in all circumstances be prevented. A situation of parity must be created. The area designated on the attached map as a German area is to be occupied by German troops without taking account of whether in the plebiscite there may prove to be in this or that part of the area a Czech majority. On the other hand, the Czech territory is to be occupied by Czech troops without taking account of whether, within this area, there lie large German-language islands, in which, in the plebiscite, a majority will without doubt give expression to its German national feeling.

With a view to bringing about an immediate and final solution of the Sudeten German problem the following proposals are submitted by the German Government:

(1) Withdrawal of the whole Czech armed forces, the police, the gendarmerie, the Customs officials, and the frontier guards, from the area to be evacuated as designated on the attached map, this area to be handed over to Germany on Oct. 1.

(2) The evacuated territory is to be handed over in its present condition (see further details in Appendix). The German Government agree that a plenipotentiary representative of the Czech Government and of the Czech Army should be attached to the headquarters of the German military forces to deal with the details of the arrangements for the evacuation.

(3) The Czech Government discharge at once all Sudeten Germans serving in the military forces or the police anywhere in Czech State territory and permit them to return home.

(4) The Czech Government liberate all political prisoners of German race.

(5) The German Government agree to permit a plebiscite to take place in those areas, which will be more definitely defined, before at latest Nov. 25. Alterations to the new frontier arising out of the plebiscite will be settled by a German-Czech or an international commission.

The plebiscite itself will be carried out under the control of an international commission. All persons who were residing in the areas in question on Oct. 28, 1918, or who were born in those parts prior to this date will be eligible to vote. A simple majority of all eligible male and female voters will determine the desire of the population to belong to either the German Reich or the Czech State. During the plebiscite both parties will withdraw their military forces out of areas which will be defined more precisely. The date and duration will be settled jointly by the German and Czech Governments.

(6) The German Government propose that an authoritative German-Czech commission should be set up to settle all further details.

APPENDIX

The evacuated Sudeten German area is to be handed over without destroying or rendering unusable in any way military, economic, or traffic establishments (plants). These include the ground organisation of the air service and all wireless stations.

All economic and traffic materials, especially the rolling stock of the railway system, in the designated areas are to be handed over undamaged. The same applies to all utility services (gasworks, power stations, &c.).

Finally, no foodstuffs, goods, cattle, raw materials, &c., are to be moved.

Exchange of Telegrams between Herr Hitler and Mr. Roosevelt¹

President Roosevelt to the Führer :

Washington, September 26th.

The fabric of peace on the Continent of Europe, if not throughout the rest of the world, is in immediate danger. The consequences of its rupture are incalculable.

Should hostilities break out, the lives of millions of men, women, and children in every country involved will most certainly be lost under circumstances of unspeakable horror. The economic system of every country involved is certain to be shattered, the social structure of every country involved may well be completely wrecked.

The United States has no political entanglements, it is caught in no mesh of hatred. The elements of all Europe have formed its civilization. The supreme desire of the American people is to live in peace, but in the event of general war they face the fact that no nation can escape some measure of the consequences of such a world catastrophe.

The traditional policy of the United States has been the furtherance of the settlement of international disputes by pacific means. It is my conviction that all people under the threat of war to-day pray that peace may be made before rather than after war.

It is imperative for peoples everywhere to recall that every civilized nation in the world voluntarily assumed solemn obligations in the Kellogg-Briand Pact of 1928 to solve controversies only by pacific methods. In addition most nations are parties to other binding treaties placing them under an obligation to preserve peace.

Furthermore, all countries have to-day available for such a peaceful solution of difficulties which may arise treaties of arbitration and conciliation to which they are parties. Whatever may be the differences in the controversies at issue, and however difficult of pacific settlement they may be, I am persuaded that there is no problem so difficult or so pressing for a solution that it cannot justly be solved by a resort to reason rather than by a resort to force.

During the present crisis, the people of the United States and their Government earnestly hoped that negotiations for an adjustment of the controversy which has now arisen in Europe might reach a successful conclusion. So long as these negotiations continue, so long will there remain hope that reason and the spirit of equity may prevail, and that the world may thereby escape the madness of a new resort to war.

On behalf of the 130,000,000 people of the United States of America and for the sake of humanity everywhere, I most earnestly appeal to you not to break off negotiations, looking to a peaceful, fair, and constructive settlement of the questions at issue. I earnestly repeat that so long as negotiations continue, differences may be reconciled. Once they are broken off, reason is banished and force produces no solution for the future good of humanity.

The Führer to President Roosevelt :

Berlin, September 27th

Your Excellency addressed to me in your telegram of September 26 an appeal in the name of the American people in the interest of peace not to break off negotiations concerning the conflict which has arisen in Europe, and to strive for a peaceful, honourable, and constructive settlement of the question. You may be assured that I know how to appreciate the magnanimous intentions which prompted your remarks, and that I share in every way your opinion as regards the extensive results of a European war. For this very reason I can and must renounce all responsibility on behalf of the German nation and its leaders should further developments, contrary to all my best efforts, lead in fact to hostilities.

In order to arrive at a just opinion of the Sudeten German problem, it is indispensable to turn one's attention to the events in which, in the long run, these problems and their dangers have their origin. In 1918 the German nation laid down its arms in the firm belief that the conclusion of peace with her former enemies would bring realization of the principles and ideals solemnly proclaimed by President Wilson for that purpose, and which had been equally solemnly accepted as binding by all the Powers concerned in the War. Never in history has the trust of a nation been so shamefully disappointed as was then the case. The peace conditions forced upon the vanquished nations in the treaties signed in a Paris suburb fulfilled none of the promises which had been given. On the contrary, they have created in Europe a political régime which made the conquered nations into outlawed pariahs of the world, and which must be recognized by every discerning person as untenable.

One of the points in which the character of the dictates of 1919 showed itself most clearly was the foundation of the Czechoslovak State and the drawing of its frontiers without any regard to history and nationality. In this State the Sudetenland was included, although this territory was always German and although its inhabitants, after the destruction of the Habsburg Monarchy, had unanimously declared their desire for Anschluss with the German Reich. In this way the right of self-determination proclaimed by President Wilson as the most important principle of national life was simply denied to the Sudeten Germans.

But that was not enough. The Treaties of 1919 laid upon the Czechoslovak State definite and far-reaching obligations towards the German racial group. But these responsibilities also were ignored from the first. The League of Nations failed entirely in its task of guaranteeing the fulfilment of these obligations. Since then the Sudetenland has been waging a hard fight for the preservation of its German character.

It was a natural and unavoidable development that, after the re-strengthening of the German Reich and after the re-incorporation of Austria with the Reich, the craving of the Sudeten Germans for the preservation of their culture and for closer alliance with Germany increased. In spite of the loyal attitude of the Sudeten German Party and its leaders, their disabilities in relation to the Czechs increased. It became clearer from day to day that the Prague Government were not willing to recognize the elementary rights of the Sudeten Germans. What is more, that Government tried, with ever more violent methods, to carry through the "Czechisation" of the Sudeten country. It was unavoidable that these methods should lead to ever greater and more serious tension.

The German Government at first in no way interfered in this development. Their calm reserve was maintained even in May of this year, when the Czech Government proceeded with the mobilization of their Army on the entirely unfounded pretext of German troop concentrations. The renunciation made at that time by Germany of military measures only served to stiffen the intransigence of this Government in Prague. This was clearly shown by the course of the negotiations for a peaceful settlement between the Sudeten German Party and the Czech Government. These negotiations gave the final proof that the Czechoslovak Government were far removed from treating the Sudeten problem in a fundamental manner in order to bring about a just solution.

As a result conditions in the Czechoslovak State have become unbearable in the last week, as is generally known. Political persecution and economic oppression have plunged the Sudeten Germans in nameless misery. To illustrate these conditions it suffices to point out the following. We count at the moment 214,000 Sudeten refugees, who have had to leave house and hearth in their hereditary home and seek refuge across the German frontier, because they saw in it the only and the last possibility of escaping from the revolting Czech régime of force and bloody terror.

Innumerable dead, thousands of injured, tens of thousands of detained and imprisoned persons, and deserted villages, are the accusing witnesses before the world of the outbreak of a hostility already long apparent on the part of the Prague Government (hostility which you in your telegram rightly feared); to say nothing of the systematic destruction by the Czech Government during the past 20 years of German economic life in the Sudeten German regions, which already showed every appearance of that collapse which you foresee as the consequence of an outbreak of war.

These are the facts which compelled me to declare in my speech at Nuremberg on September 12 before the whole world that the deprivation of rights of 3,500,000 Germans in Czechoslovakia must come to an end, and that if these people could find no justice or help unaided, then both must come from the German Reich. But in order to make a last attempt to reach this goal by peaceful means I made concrete proposals for the solution of the problem in the memorandum which I handed to the British Prime Minister on September 23—proposals which in the meantime have been published.

The Czechoslovak Government having already informed the British and French Governments of their agreement that the Sudeten German area should be separated from the Czechoslovak State and united with the German Reich, the only aim of these proposals contained in the German memorandum is to secure a rapid, sure, and just fulfilment of that Czechoslovak acceptance.

I feel convinced, Mr. President, that when you visualize the whole development of the Sudeten German problem from its beginnings to the present day, you will realize that the German Government have truly not lacked either patience or the sincere desire for a peaceful solution. It is not Germany's fault that there exists a Sudeten German problem and that from it have grown the present impossible conditions. The terrible fate of those human beings concerned in this problem allows of no further delay in its solution. The possibilities of reaching agreement on a just settlement are thus exhausted by the proposals contained in the German memorandum.

It now lies, not in the hands of the German Government, but in the hands of the Czechoslovak Government, to decide whether there shall be peace or war.

Sig. Adolf Hitler.

Extract from the Führer's Conversation with the English Journalist, Mr. Ward Price, on September 19th, 1938

The Czechs say they cannot hold a plebiscite because such a measure is not provided for in their constitution. To me their constitution seems to provide for one thing only—which is that 7,000,000 Czechs shall oppress 8,000,000 of minority peoples. This Czech trouble has got to be ended once and for all, and ended now. It is a tumour which is poisoning the whole European organism. If it were allowed to go on, it would continue to infect international relations until they broke down in fatal collapse.

This condition has lasted for 20 years. No one can calculate what it has cost the peoples of Europe in that time. It was the existence of Czecho-Slovakia as an ally of Soviet Russia, thrust forward into the very heart of Germany, that forced me to create a great German Air Force. That in turn led to France and Britain increasing their own air fleets. I have doubled the German Air Fleet once already because of the situation now prevailing in Czecho-Slovakia. If we failed to settle the crisis now, Field-Marshal Göring would soon be asking me to order it to be doubled again, and then the British and French would redouble, and so the mad race would go on.

Do you think I like being obliged to stop with my great building development schemes all over the country in order to send half a million German workmen to construct at top speed a huge system of defence works along our western frontier? I would rather they could be employed in constructing workers' settlements, splendid motor roads, new schools, and public welfare institutions, than in raising unproductive fortifications. But while Czech oppression of a German minority keeps Europe at fever heat I have to be ready for whatever may come. I have studied the Maginot Line, and learned much from it, but we have built something according to our own ideas which is better still, and which will stand against any force in the world, if in the event of our being attacked we chose to remain on the defensive.

All this is madness, for no one in Germany dreams of attacking France. We harbour no resentment against France; on the contrary there is a strong feeling of sympathy in Germany towards her. Nor does any German want war with Britain either.

Herr Gott, what couldn't I do in Germany and for Germany if it were not for this infernal Czech tyranny over a few million Germans. But it must stop. It shall stop.

That French Ministers should hitherto have promised to stand by Czecho-Slovakia, was a contradiction of their own past actions. France had allowed the Saar territory to vote itself out of French control, though the Saar had for France great economic, political, and strategical importance.

Yet now some people talked of bringing about a world war for a country where they had no economic or other direct interests at stake, and did so solely in order to enable the Czechs to deny to the Sudetens what the French themselves had conceded to the Saarlanders. In the same way England had let the Southern Irish have their complete autonomy, and a hundred years ago Holland gave the Belgians their independence.

The Czechs had never been an independent people until the Peace Treaties raised them to an undeserved and artificial mastery over minorities more numerous than themselves. In the Middle Ages they had been a German principality. Two hundred years before Queen Elizabeth there had been a German university in Prague.

Modern Germany had been created by the diplomatic language used in the German Emperor's government offices in that city which he made for a time his capital.

Once, indeed, during the Hussite wars the Czechs had gained a temporary independence. They used it like the Bolsheviks, burning and ravaging, until the Germans rose and crushed them.

The creation of this heterogeneous Czechoslovak Republic after the war was lunacy. It has none of the characteristics of a nation, whether from the standpoint of ethnology, strategy, economics, or language.

To set an intellectually inferior handful of Czechs to rule over minorities belonging to races like the Germans, Poles, Hungarians, with a thousand years of culture behind them, was a work of folly and ignorance.

The Sudeten Germans have no respect for the Czechs and will never accept their rule. After the war the Allied Powers declared that Germany was unworthy to govern blacks, yet at the same time they set second-rate people like the Czechs in authority over 3½ million Germans of the highest character and culture.

If a powerful Germany had existed then, this would have been impossible, and as soon as Germany grew strong again the Sudetens began to assist themselves. The Czech Government is desperately trying to get the great European Powers divided, for otherwise the Czech State cannot go on. But it is impossible to maintain so unnatural an institution by political and diplomatic cunning.

If the Czech had possessed a great statesman he would long ago have let the Sudeten Germans join the Reich, and been content thereby to ensure that continuance of autonomy for the Czechs themselves. But Dr. Benes is a politician, not a statesman.

MUSOLINI'S WARNINGS AND ADMONITIONS

Demand for the Right of Self-Determination !

The Letter to Lord Runciman of September 15th, 1938

On September 15th Mussolini published the following article in the "Popolo d'Italia" under the title "Letter to Runciman":

"When you left London a few weeks ago for Prague the world was not clear in what capacity you had gone and with what responsibility. Was your mission official? Was it unofficial? This remained wrapped in a kind of London fog. Was your task solely one of mediation, or would it at a certain moment become arbitration? Anyway, you reached Prague with a troop of collaborators and universal attention was concentrated on you.

No-one could help admiring the zeal with which you addressed yourself to your difficult task. In the last few weeks you will have read scores of memoranda and hundreds of letters, received scores of people and conferred with the leaders of all the nationalities, for there is not only the one Sudeten problem, but a Magyar, Polish and Slovak problem. There are as many problems as the nationalities with which Benes's republic was inflated at Versailles.

I believe that in your heart you reached this conclusion—as no Czechoslovak nation exists, so does no Czechoslovak State exist.

You, Mr. Runciman, have not come among a family where there prevails that minimum of cordiality and understanding found among individuals of the same blood.

The component parts of the Czechoslovak family are of different races and cannot bear one another. They are animated not by a centripetal, but a centrifugal force. Constraint alone holds them together. If that

La Lettera del 15 settembre 1938 a Lord Runciman

Quando, alcune settimane fa, lasciate Londra per dirigersi su Praga, il mondo non ebbe chiara l'idea su quel che sareste andato a fare e in quale veste e con quale responsabilità. La vostra missione era ufficiale? Non era ufficiale? Tutto ciò rimase come avvolto in una specie di nebbia londinese. La vostra opera era soltanto di mediazione o, ad un certo momento, sarebbe stata di arbitro? Comunque voi scendeste a Praga con uno stuolo di collaboratori e su di voi fu concentrata la universale attenzione.

Tutti furono costretti ad ammirare lo zelo col quale vi accingeste alla penosa fatica. Avrete letto in queste settimane decine di memoriali e centinaia di lettere, ricevuto decine di persone, conferito coi capi di tutte le nazionalità, poichè non esiste soltanto un problema sudeto, ma uno magiaro, uno polacco, uno slovacco: tanti problemi quante sono le nazionalità con le quali a Versaglia fu «inflazionata» la repubblica di Benes.

Io credo che nel vostro intimo siate già arrivato a questa conclusione: come non esiste una nazione cecoslovacca così non esiste uno Stato cecoslovacco. Voi, signor Runciman, non siete capitato in una famiglia dove c'è un minimo di cordialità e di comprensione come fra individui dello stesso sangue. No. I «componenti» della famiglia ceco-slovacca sono di razze diverse e non si possono soffrire. Essi non sono animati da una forza centripeta ma da una forza centrifuga. Solo la costrizione li tiene insieme. Se questa costrizione cessasse, il fenomeno di dislocamento della constraint ceased to exist, the phenomenon of Czechoslovak dislocation would be immediate and irresistible.

A Bohemia—a historical designation—should have been created at Versailles, with a homogeneous population of Czechs, but instead they preferred to 'blow up' (gonfiare) a 'Czechoslovakia'—a unit which had never existed—and thus created an artificial State which, from its birth, contained in itself the seeds of its own weakness and dissolution.

I believe, Signor Runciman, that you have seen the situation in the terms in which I have outlined it, and perhaps you ask what was there left for you to do? In fact, there was talk of your returning to London. But no. After Hitler's speech you were in a fine position, Signor Runciman.

You could act and accomplish something which would go down to history. The time for compromise is past. Carlsbad has been outstripped. Benes, as an old Parliamentarian, has lost the race.

You, Signor Runciman, ought simply to propose to Benes a plebiscite, not only for the Sudetens, but for all the nationalities that ask for it. Will Benes refuse the plebiscite? If so, then you could let it be known that England will think seven times seven before going to war simply to preserve a fictitious State, monstrous even in its geographical shape, so that it has been called the crocodile State and the sausage State.

If London let it be known that it would not move nobody else would move. The game is not worth the candle.

If Hitler proposed to annex 3,000,000 Czechs Europe would be right in moving, but Hitler does not even think of it. The writer of this letter is in a position to tell you confidentially that even if 3,000,000 Czechs were offered to him. Hitler would politely but calmly refuse such a present.

The Fuehrer is busy and anxious about 3,500,000 Germans, and only about them. Nobody can deny him that right. Nobody can oppose the accomplishment of such a duty, least of all we Italians, who have precedents of the same kind.

Courage, Mr. Runciman. Propose the plebiscite or rather plebiscites. It is a fine and delicate task. There are compact zones where a plebiscite means annexation, pure and simple, to the brother nations. There are zones where the races are so terribly intermingled that a clean cut is impossible.

Here the equalised canton régime or something like it could be applied. And this also would be the democratic tradition.

Once the plebiscite areas were fixed, the date, the methods and the system of control would have to be arranged: this control could be of an international character, as in the case of the Saar, where the results were satisfactory.

I have an idea, Mr. Runciman, that this letter will interest you. If this matter were settled, there would be another simplifying change in the map of Europe and a centre of Ceko-slovacchia sarebbe inevitabile e irresistibile.

A Versaglia si doveva creare una Boemia — nome storico — con una omogenea popolazione di Ceki; si volle invece gonfiare una Ceko-slovacchia — entità mai esistita! — e si creò uno Stato artificioso che recava in sé sin dalla nascita gli elementi della sua debolezza e della sua dissoluzione.

Io credo, signor Runciman, che voi avete visto questa situazione nei termini in cui io l'ho tracciata. E, forse, vi siete domandato che cosa vi restasse da fare. (Si è infatti parlato di un vostro ritorno a Londra). No. Dopo il discorso di Hitler, viene il bello, per voi, o signor Runciman. Voi potete agire e compiere qualche cosa che passerà alla storia. Non è più il tempo dei compromessi. Karlsbad è superata. Benes — da vecchio parlamentare — ha perduto la corsa. Voi, signor Runciman, dovete semplicemente proporre a Benes il plebiscito non soltanto per i Sudeti, ma per tutte le nazionalità che lo domanderanno. Benes respingerà il plebiscito? E allora voi gli potreste far sapere che l'Inghilterra ci penserà sette volte sette prima di scendere in guerra semplicemente per conservare uno Stato-finzione mostruoso anche nella sua conformazione geografica, tanto che fu chiamato a volta a volta Stato cocodrillo o Stato salsiccia. Se Londra fa sapere che sta ferma, nessuno si muove. Il gioco — qui — non vale assolutamente la candela, anche se è infilata nei candelabri massonici del Grande Oriente. Se Hitler pretendesse di annettersi tre milioni e mezzo di Ceki, l'Europa avrebbe ragione di commuoversi e muoversi. Ma Hitler non pensa ciò. Chi vi scrive questa lettera è in grado di dirvi — confidenzialmente — che qualora gli venissero offerti tre milioni e mezzo di Ceki, Hitler declinerebbe garbatamente, ma risolutamente, tanto regalo. Il Führer si occupa e preoccupa dei tri milioni e mezzo di Tedeschi soltanto dei loro. Nessuno gli può contestare tale diritto. Nessuno può opporsi all'adempimento di tale dovere. Meno di tutti noi Italiani, che abbiamo dei precedenti in materia.

Coraggio, mister Runciman. Proponete il plebiscito, anzi i plebisciti. E un compito magnifico e delicato. Ci sono delle zone compatte, dove il plebiscito significherebbe l'annessione pura e semplice ai popoli fratelli; ci sono delle zone — viceversa — dove le razze si sono terribilmente frammischiate ed un taglio netto è impossibile. Qui potrebbe entrare in scena il regime delle così dette cantonalizzazioni paritarie o qualche cosa del genere. Il che sarebbe, fra l'altro, nella tradizione democratica.

Fissate le zone del plebiscito, rimarrebbero da stabilire la data, le modalità, il controllo, che potrebbe essere di carattere internazionale come già avvenne con risultati soddisfacenti nel plebiscito della Saar.

Ho l'impressione, mister Runciman, che questa lettera vi interesserà. A vicenda conclusa ci sarebbe un'altra modificazione semplificativa nella carta geografica d'Europa e la disorder and anxiety would be eliminated. Prague, after peaceful "deflation", would be stronger and more secure and could proceed on its way with less effort, because no longer hampered by the dead weight of hostile nationalities. While it is practically impossible for Italy to pursue a policy of friendship with the present Czechoslovakia, she could do so with the Bohemia of tomorrow. Thus the new politico-territorial situation would provide a greater measure of equilibrium and fresh possibilities and—most important of all—Europe would be spared a war.

Millions of people regard the avoidance of a war as indispensably necessary.

eliminazione di un focolaio di disordine e di inquietudine. Praga, pacificamente «deflazionata», sarebbe più forte e più sicura e camminerebbe più spedita, poiché non avrebbe più al piede la palla di piombo delle nazionalità ostili. Mentre per l'Italia è praticamente impossibile fare oggi una politica d'amicizia con la Ceko-slovacchia attuale, ciò sarebbe possibile con la Boemia di domani. Così la nuova situazione politico-territoriale determinerebbe nuovi equilibri e nuove possibilità e soprattutto l'Europa farebbe l'economia di una guerra.

Milioni di uomini pensano che questa economia è strettamente necessaria.

From his Speeches to the Italian people

Trieste, September 18th.

Triestines!

For the fourth time I have the good fortune, the honour and the joy to address you. The first time was in 1918 when the vibration of the great event accomplished by victory was to be seen and felt in the atmosphere of your city. I returned in 1920 and 1921 when we were tormented by the questions of a peace that was mediocre and in some respects wrong, while the Trieste Fascist fighting units were energetically and heroically clearing your city of the many, too many, remnants of the old regime.

After many years I again return to you and have been able to see at a glance and recognise the tremendous progress made by your and our Trieste.

I have not come to raise your moral as was foolishly stated by the quill-drivers on the other side of the Alps and of the sea. You do not need this, for your moral is always high. Neither have I come to emphasise the interests and feelings of your city to the Italians, for the Italians of many generations have the name of Trieste in their hearts. I have come to see what you have done and to get an idea as to how the stages towards the attainment of this aim can be accelerated. I have come to hear you and to speak to you.

In the history of Trieste there are no particular phases which have not been also phases in the history of the common fatherland.

In 1866, when the young Kingdom of Italy, in a military alliance with Prussia, extended its frontiers to the Isonzo, superficial observers might have regarded the fate of Trieste as sealed. Sixteen years later Trieste responded with the gesture of Oberdan, while irredentism inflamed the whole Italian youth. In 1914 the Dual Monarchy cast the die, played the highest stake and lost. You experienced four years of waiting which, in their significance, were longer than the preceding fifty years. Then came victory and, with it, the political reunion with Italy. I say political reunion, because we were always spiritually united. Twenty years later, in March 1938, occurred that fateful event which, as you are all aware had been outlined since 1878. Millions of people desired it, and no one opposed it. Trieste was confronted with a new situation, but Trieste is prepared to face it and overcome it. Trieste knows that geography is not a matter of opinion and in the long run avenges itself

Trieste, 18 settembre

E' questa, o triestini e triestine, la quarta volta che ho la ventura, l'onore e la gioia di rivolgervi la parola. La prima fu nel dicembre del 1918, quando nell'aria della vostra città e nelle vostre anime c'era ancora, visibile e sensibile, la vibrazione del grande evento che si era compiuto con la Vittoria. Tornai nel 1920 e 1921, quando eravamo tormentati dalle questioni di una pace mediocre e per alcuni aspetti storta, mentre lo squadristmo triestino ripuliva energicamente ed eroicamente la vostra città dai molti, dai troppi reliquati dell'antico regime.

Dopo molti anni torno tra voi e sin dal primo sguardo ho potuto riconoscere il grande, il poderoso balzo innanzi compiuto dalla vostra, dalla nostra Trieste.

Non sono venuto tra voi per rialzare il vostro morale, così come gli stilopennivori d'oltre monte e d'oltre mare hanno scioccamente stampato. Non ne avete bisogno perchè il vostro morale fu sempre altissimo. Nè sono venuto per sottolineare dinanzi agli italiani gli interessi e i sentimenti della vostra città, perchè gli italiani da parecchie generazioni hanno il nome di Trieste nel cuore.

Sono venuto per vedere ciò che avete fatto e per vedere altresì come sia possibile di bruciare rapidamente le tappe per giungere alla mèta. Sono venuto per ascoltarvi e per parlarvi.

Non ci sono svolte particolari della storia di Trieste che non siano svolte, fasi, cicli della comune storia della Patria. Quando nel 1866 il giovane Regno d'Italia alleato militarmente con la Prussia fermò i suoi confini all'Iudrio, sembrò ai superficiali che il destino di Trieste fosse sigillato. Sedici anni dopo Trieste risponde col gesto di Oberdan, mentre l'irredentismo infiammava tutta la gioventù italiana. Nel 1914 la duplice monarchia getta i dadi, tenta la partita suprema: la perde. Quattro lunghi anni di attesa per voi, o triestini, più lunghi del cinquantennio precedente. Viene la Vittoria. Voi siete ricongiunti politicamente all'Italia, politicamente perchè spiritualmente lo foste in ogni tempo.

Vent'anni dopo, nel marzo del 1938, si compie un evento fatale, che si delineava già dal 1878, come voi ben sapete.

on all those who think it is. Trieste counts on your force. Trieste cannot, does not and will not evade the new tasks.

Triestines!

There are moments in the life of nations when the men who lead them must not decline their responsibility but must proudly assume it in full. What I am going to tell you now is not dictated solely by the policy of the Rome-Berlin axis, which has its historical justification, nor even by sentiments of friendship towards the Magyars, the Poles and the other nationalities of what may be called Mosaic State No. 2.

What I am going to tell you is dictated by a feeling of responsibility which I would call more than Italian, namely European. When the problems which history sets us are combined with such a degree of harassing complexity, the solution that must be imposed is the simplest, the most logical, the most radical, what we Fascists call totalitarian.

When faced with the problem which is at present tormenting Europe, the solution has only one name: Plebiscites. Plebiscites for all nationalities that demand them, for the nationalities that were constrained in what was intended to be the Great Czechoslovakia which today reveals its organic inconsistency.

But there is another thing to be said. Sometimes events move with the speed of an avalanche and then immediate action must be taken to avoid disorders and complications. The need for rapid action must have been understood by the British Prime Minister, who hastened from London to Munich, a flying messenger of peace, for delay not only does not help the solution, but determines the fatal clash. This solution is already beginning, despite the campaign of Moscow which penetrates into the hearts of the European peoples.

We trust that in this last hour a peaceful solution may be reached. We hope that, if that is not possible, the eventual conflict may be limited and circumscribed. But if that cannot be done and a front is formed universally for or against Prague, know that the place of Italy is already chosen.

Treviso, September 21st.

If Czechoslovakia is today in a position that might be called delicate, the reason is that it was not simply—at present it is possible to say “was”—Czechoslovakia, but rather Czecho-Germano-Polish-Magyar-Ruthene-Roumanian-Slovakia.

I must today urge that from the moment when this problem is faced, it must be solved comprehensively.

Padua, September 24th.

Comrades!

In Gorizia I stated that even if the horizon was brighter any optimism regarding the European situation must be regarded as premature. In Treviso I announced that the British Prime Minister was piloting the ship of peace towards the port, but I did not say that it had arrived. Today I add that the position resembles the weather today; this morning the sky was grey, but there are signs that the sun will soon break through.

It seemed as if with Prague's acceptance of the Franco-British plan the situation could be considered as drawing to a close. But, as often happens in so-called democratic States, the Government which had accepted the plan and had the moral responsibility for putting it into effect has resigned. It has been Milioni di uomini lo hanno voluto, nessuno si è opposto. Trieste si trova di fronte ad una nuova situazione, ma Trieste è pronta ad affrontarla e a superarla; Trieste sa che la geografia non è un'opinione e si vendica a lungo andare di coloro che tale la stimano. Trieste conta sulle sue forze, Trieste non può voltare, non volta, non volterà mai le spalle al suo mare.

Triestini!

Vi sono dei momenti nella vita dei popoli in cui gli uomini che li dirigono non devono declinare le loro responsabilità, ma devono fieramente assumerle in pieno. Quello che sto per dirvi non è soltanto dettato dalla politica dell'asse Roma-Berlino, che trova le sue giustificazioni storiche, contingenti, nè soltanto dal sentimento di amicizia che ci lega ai magiari, ai polacchi e alle altre nazionalità di quello che si può chiamare lo Stato mosaico numero due.

Quello che sto per dirvi è dettato da un senso di coscienza che vorrei chiamare più che italiano, europeo. Quando i problemi posti dalla storia sono giunti ad un grado di complicazione tormentosa, la soluzione che si impone è la più semplice, la più logica, la più radicale, quella che noi fascisti chiamiamo totalitaria.

Nei confronti del problema che agita in questo momento l'Europa la soluzione ha un nome solo: PLEBISCITI. Plebisciti per tutte le nazionalità che li domandano, per le nazionalità che furono costrette in quella che volle essere la grande Cecoslovacchia e che oggi rivela la sua inconsistency organica.

Ma un'altra cosa va detta, ed è che a un certo momento gli eventi assumono il moto vorticoso della valanga, per cui occorre fare presto se si vogliono evitare i disordini e complicazioni.

Questo bisogno del fare presto deve essere stato sentito dal Primo Ministro britannico, il quale si è spostato da Londra a Monaco, messaggero volante della pace, perchè ogni ritardo non affretta la soluzione, ma determina l'urto fatale. Questa soluzione sta già, malgrado la campagna di Mosca, penetrando nel cuore dei popoli europei.

Noi ci auguriamo che in queste ultime ore si raggiunga una soluzione pacifica. Noi ci auguriamo altresì che se questo non è possibile il conflitto eventuale sia limitato e circoscritto. Ma se questo non avvenisse e si determinasse pro o contro Praga uno schieramento di carattere universale, si sappia che il posto dell'Italia è già scelto.

Treviso, 21 settembre

Se oggi la Cecoslovacchia si trova in un momento che si potrebbe chiamare delicato gli è perchè non era semplicemente — ormai si può dire «era» — Cecoslovacchia, ma Ceco-tedesco-polacco-magiario-ruteno-romeno-slovacchia.

Ora insisto perchè dal momento che si affronta questo problema lo si risolva in modo integrale.

replaced by a General whom all declare to be a great, too great a friend of Moscow. The first act of the new Government was to proclaim general mobilisation. In the face of this fact which comes on top of the regime of terror established by the Czechs in the Sudeten German regions, Germany has given a supreme proof of moderation. She has sent her demands to Prague and given a time limit until October 1st for a reply. The Prague Government has therefore exactly six days time to find the path of reason. It would be truly absurd and even criminal if millions of the people of Europe were to hurl themselves at one another simply to maintain the overlordship of M. Benesh over eight different races.

But it would be a very grave mistake to give a false interpretation of this patient attitude of Germany. In the democratic countries irresponsibility holds sway, for everyone tries to shift the responsibility on to the opposition party or on to his neighbour. In the so-called totalitarian States such shifting of responsibility is impossible.

The problem with which the conscience of the peoples is now faced must be solved in a complete and definite manner. There is still time for such a solution, and if a conflict should nevertheless break out there is a possibility of localising it. But in the last few days certain more or less influential parties and tendencies in the Western countries seem to have thought that the time has come to settle accounts with the totalitarian States. In this case these parties and tendencies will not find themselves faced by two separate countries, but by two countries which will form a single bloc.

Blackshirts!

If my speeches were speeches in the traditional sense of the word, I should refrain from adding to their number in your city so renowned in the fields of art and of heroism. But they are, in point of length at least, not so much discourses as direct "contacts" with the soul of the people.

Yesterday began what might be called the week of expectation and of passion for Europe. It is now universally recognized that mistakes were made in the peace treaties of 1919. I recognized that as early as the end of 1921, but would ask you not to attribute prophetic powers to me, as such are not characteristic of our race.

It was not difficult at that time to foresee what has in fact been happening in the last few days. What should be done when a mistake has been made? Rectify it! According to the wisdom handed down to us from antiquity, to err is human, but to persist in error is diabolical. Those concerned not only refuse to rectify the blunder of the inordinate distension of Czechoslovakia, but are seeking to maintain it.

And for that, the nations of Europe are to fly at one another's throats! Until the contrary is proved, however, I will not believe that what would be one of the most tragic paradoxes in the annals of the human race will happen.

Nevertheless, men conscious of their responsibilities cannot ignore any hypothesis, however absurd it may appear.

Up to the present Italy has taken no military measures, but, if the others continue to call up reservists and mass them on the frontiers and to concentrate their fleets, none of you will be surprised if Italy takes her own steps.

We have given the world proof of our resolution and of our will. We conquered the Empire, not only by fighting against the Abyssinian armies prepared and led by Europeans, but also by resisting the economic assault decreed by 52 States.

Camerati!

A Gorizia io dissi che pur essendovi una schiarita all'orizzonte, ogni ottimismo per quanto concerne la situazione europea doveva essere considerato prematuro. A Treviso annunciavo che il Primo Ministro britannico stava pilotando la navicella della pace verso il porto, ma non dissi che vi sarebbe arrivato. Oggi aggiungo che la situazione ha gli aspetti di questa giornata: stamattina era molto grigio, fra poco potrebbe spuntare il sole.

Pareva che con l'accettazione da parte di Praga del piano cosiddetto franco-inglese di Londra, si potesse considerare avviata la situazione all'epilogo. Ma è accaduto quello che accade sovente nei regimi cosiddetti democratici. Il governo che, avendo accettato quel piano aveva l'obbligo morale di restare in carica per farlo applicare, si è viceversa dimesso; il suo posto è stato occupato da un generale che tutti dichiarano molto, troppo amico di Mosca. Il primo atto di questo nuovo governo è stata la proclamazione della mobilitazione generale. Davanti a questo fatto che si aggiunge al regime di terrore che i Cèchi hanno instaurato nei territori dei Sudeti, la Germania ha dato una prova suprema di moderazione, ha mandato delle richieste a Praga ed ha dato tempo sino al 1 ottobre per avere una risposta.

Ci sono, dunque, esattamente sei giorni di tempo perchè i governanti di Praga ritrovino la via della saggezza. Perchè sarebbe veramente assurdo, e aggiungo criminale che milioni di europei dovessero scagliarsi gli uni contro gli altri semplicemente per mantenere la signoria del signor Benes su otto razze diverse.

Ma sarebbe grave, gravissimo errore dare una falsa interpretazione a questo atteggiamento longanime della Germania.

Gli è che in regime di democrazia domina l'irresponsabilità perchè ognuno pensa di scaricare le responsabilità sul partito opposto, sul suo vicino.

Nei regimi cosiddetti totalitari questo slittamento di responsabilità è impossibile.

Il problema, ora che è posto innanzi alla coscienza dei popoli, deve essere risolto in maniera integrale e definitiva. C'è il tempo per questa soluzione, e se un conflitto dovesse comunque scoppiare c'è la possibilità di localizzarlo. Ma accade in questi giorni che partiti e tendenze più o meno imperanti nei paesi d'ell'occidente, ritengono che questo sia il momento opportuno per fare i conti con gli Stati totalitari. In questo caso questi partiti e tendenze non si troveranno di fronte a due paesi, ma a due paesi che formeranno un blocco solo.

Camicie Nere!

Se i miei fossero discorsi nel significato tradizionale della parola, io mi guarderei dall'aggiungerne un altro alla serie, in questa vostra città, splendente nei campi dell'arte e in quelli dell'eroismo. Ma i miei, almeno dal punto di vista della loro brevità, non sono discorsi, sono piuttosto prese di contatto immediato con l'anima del popolo.

Si può dire che è cominciata da ieri quella che si potrebbe chiamare la settimana di attesa e di passione dell'Europa. E' universalmente riconosciuto, oramai, che nei trattati di pace del 1919 furono com-

The more paper accumulated on the desks of Geneva, the more convinced I became that the Italian people would never for a moment waver.

Today the protagonists of sanctions have disappeared from the horizon. Many of them have fallen into oblivion, or are covered with shame.

The Italian people are, after four years of severest ordeal, ready as never before to face what may come. The Italian people have in these days, my comrades, but one face: the face of calm and determination. That is the face of a strong people.

Verona, September 26th

Blackshirts of Verona!

With this majestic concourse of people accompanied by such a superb array of forces, my visit to the people of Venetia and my pilgrimage to the sacred fields of our most glorious battles ends.

Our adversaries, to whom I alluded the other day before a seething mass of the Blackshirts of Belluno—those adversaries assembled beneath the signs of the triangle and of the hammer and sickle had in these last days given open expression to their miserable hopes.

These multitudes who have responded with one voice to my demands demonstrate for all to see—that never before was there such complete, intimate and profound communion of thought between Fascism and the Italian people. This Italian people is not disorganized and soulless like many other peoples: it is powerfully united, spiritually armed and ready for material armament.

The development of the events which hang suspended over men's heads at this time enables us to sum up the position today.

The efforts made by the British Prime Minister to arrive at a solution of the present problem deserve to be recognized and appreciated. The patience displayed by Germany also deserves recognition.

The German "memorandum" is not a departure from the general lines approved in London and it is obvious that, if the Czechs were left to their own devices, they would be the first to recognize that it would not be worth while to start a war, as to the issue of which there could be not doubt.

Now that the problem has been raised by the irresistible forces of history, it must be solved in its triple aspect: German, Magyar and Polish.

If there is a man in Europe at this moment who is better qualified than any other to realize what must now happen, that man is the President of the Czechoslovak Republic. He was one of the most determined, if not one of the principal underminers of the Dual Monarchy of the Habsburgs.

At that time he spoke of a Bohemian solution, and expressly advocated this in this review "The Czechoslovak Nation". He went round discussing this idea in every place including Geneva.

Geneva is in the condition which doctors call comatose. All those who oppose Italy will end like that.

The talk indulged in at that time was weak and facile.

That has been proved by the history of the last twenty years.

Events can only develop as follows: there are still a few days in which to find peaceful solution. If such a solution is not found, it would seem that no human power can prevent a conflict. If that conflict breaks out, it may be localized for a time.

I still believe that Europe will not expose itself to fire and sword and scald itself, in order to boil Prague's addled egg.

Europe is faced with many tasks, but surely the least urgent of these is to increase the number of cemeteries so frequently to be met with on the frontier of States.

messi degli errori. Io l'ho riconosciuto fin dal 1921. Vi prego, tuttavia, di non attribuirmi delle qualità profetiche, perchè i profeti non appartengono alla nostra razza.

Era facile fin d'allora prevedere quello che sta accadendo in questi giorni. Ora, dinanzi ad un errore che cosa si deve fare? Ripararlo. Perchè secondo la nostra sapienza antica, errare è umano ma perseverare nell'errore è diabolico. Ora non solo non si vuol riparare quell'errore che si commise gonfiando smisuratamente la Cecoslovacchia, ma si vuol mantenere quest'errore.

E per questo i popoli di Europa dovrebbero precipitarsi gli uni contro gli altri. Ora, fino a prova contraria, io non credo che si possa verificare questo che sarebbe uno dei più tragici paradossi della storia umana.

Tuttavia gli uomini coscienti della loro responsabilità non possono respingere nemmeno quelle che potrebbero apparire le ipotesi più assurde.

Fino ad oggi l'Italia non ha preso alcuna misura di carattere militare, ma se gli altri continuano a richiamare dei riservisti, ad ammassarli alle frontiere, se ci sono dei concentramenti di flotte, nessuno di voi, è chiaro, si stupirà se anche l'Italia prenderà le sue misure.

Il mondo ha già avuto la prova della nostra risoluzione e della nostra volontà. Noi ci siamo conquistati l'Impero non solo lottando contro gli eserciti abissini preparati e guidati dagli europei, ma resistendo all'assedio economico che era stato decretato da cinquantadue Stati. Più si ammucchiavano le carte sui tavoli di Ginevra e più io ero sicuro che il Popolo italiano non avrebbe mai minimamente vacillato.

Oggi tutti coloro che furono i protagonisti delle sanzioni sono scomparsi dall'orizzonte. Molti di essi sono caduti nell'oblio o si sono umiliati nella vergogna.

Il Popolo italiano, dopo quattro anni di severissime prove, è pronto come non mai ad affrontare quelle successive. Il Popolo italiano in questi giorni, o camerati, ha un volto solo: il volto della calma e della decisione. Questo è il volto di un forte Popolo.

Verona, 26 settembre

Con questa maestosa adunata di popolo, accompagnata da uno schieramento superbo di forze, si chiude il mio viaggio tra le genti del Veneto e il mio pellegrinaggio sui campi sacri delle nostre gloriose battaglie.

I nostri avversari, coloro ai quali io allusi l'altro giorno davanti alla fremente adunata delle Camicie Nere di Belluno, i nostri avversari raccolti sotto i segni del triangolo e della falce e martello avevano in questi ultimi tempi dato corpo alle loro pietosissime speranze.

Queste moltitudini che hanno risposto in modo univoco alle mie domande dimostrano a tutti, dico a tutti, che mai come in questo momento fu totale, intima, profonda la comunione tra Fascismo e popolo italiano. E questo popolo italiano non è disorganizzato e senza anima come molti altri popoli; è potentemente inquadrato, armato spiritualmente e pronto ad esserlo anche materialmente.

Lo svolgersi degli eventi che tengono in questo momento sospesi gli animi, ci permette oggi di fare il punto della situazione.

Bisogna riconoscere e apprezzare gli sforzi che il Primo Ministro britannico ha compiuto per dare una soluzione al problema dell'ora.

There is however a third eventuality to be faced: that the conflict assumes such a character as to involve us directly. In that event we shall have, and can have, no hesitation.

I should add that these three phases may follow one another with great rapidity.

It is useless for the diplomats to exhaust themselves in trying to save Versailles. Versailles and the Europe constructed at Versailles, often in monumental ignorance of geography and history, are in their death throes. Their fate will be decided this week, and this week there may arise the new Europe: the Europe of justice for all and reconciliation between the nations. We who bear the emblem of the victors, are for the new Europe.

Bisogna uguale riconoscimento fare per la longanimità di cui ha dato prova fin qui la Germania.

Il « memorandum » tedesco non si discosta dalle linee che erano state approvate nella riunione di Londra. E' di tutta evidenza che se i Cèki saranno lasciati a contare sulle loro forze saranno i primi forse a riconoscere che non vale la pena d'impegnare un combattimento sul cui esito finale non può esistere dubbio alcuno.

Dal momento che è stato posto dalle forze irresistibili della storia il problema che ha un triplice aspetto: tedesco, magiaro, polacco, deve essere integralmente risolto.

Se vi è uomo in questo momento in Europa che è il più indicato a rendersi conto di quello che succede, quest'uomo è il Presidente della repubblica cecoslovacca. Egli è stato uno degli artefici più ostinati, se non maggiori, della disgregazione della duplice monarchia asburgica.

Allora egli parlava di una nazione boema. La sua rivista che si intitolava: « La Nazione cecoslovacca » sosteneva ciò esplicitamente. Ed egli stesso lo andava dichiarando dovunque ivi compresa Ginevra.

Ginevra è in quello stato che i medici chiamano comatoso. Tutti quelli che si oppongono all'Italia devono finire così.

Ora le parole pronunciate in quel tempo furono labilissime. Questi venti anni di storia lo honna dimostrato.

Lo sviluppo degli avvenimenti può svolgersi secondo queste linee: ci sono ancora alcuni giorni di tempo per trovare una soluzione pacifica. Se questa non si trova, e quasi sforzo sovrumano poter impedire un conflitto. Se questo scoppia, in un primo tempo può essere localizzato.

Io credo ancora che l'Europa non vorrà mettersi a ferro e fuoco, non vorrà bruciare se stessa per cuocere l'uovo imputrito di Praga.

L'Europa si trova di fronte a molti bisogni, ma certamente il meno urgente di tutti è quello di aumentare il numero degli Ossari che sorgono così frequenti sulle frontiere degli Stati.

Vi è tuttavia da prevedere il terzo tempo: quello nel quale il carattere del conflitto sarà tale che ci impegnerà direttamente. E allora non avremo e non permetteremo nessuna esitazione.

Debbo ancora aggiungere che la successione di questi tre tempi può essere straordinariamente rapida.

E' inutile che i diplomatici si affaticino ancora per salvare Versaglia. L'Europa che fu costruita a Versaglia, spesso con una piramidale ignoranza della geografia e della storia, questa Versaglia agonizza. La sua sorte si decide in questa settimana. E' in questa settimana che può sorgere la nuova Europa: l'Europa della giustizia per tutti e della riconciliazione fra i popoli.

HOME TO THE REICH !

A Testament and its fulfilment

The official declaration of the German Deputies and Senators in Prague of June 1st and 9th, 1920

"As the chosen representatives of the oppressed German people in the Czechoslovak State, we hereby make the following solemn declaration before the people of this State, all Europe and the whole civilized world, on the occasion of our entering the Czechoslovak Parliament:

On the strength of the Treaty of St. Germain-en-Laye, a State has come into being in the middle of Europe, containing about 6½ million Czechs and, among others, nearly 4 million Germans. Our representations before and during the peace negotiations were in vain: in vain our universal desire to determine the destiny of our territory in our own way. Equally in vain was our contention that such an amorphous State did not correspond to Wilson's 14 points or to the conception of democracy; that it could never know any peace and, composed as it was of impossibly heterogeneous elements, would always constitute a threat to European peace.

We representatives of the German people in the Czech State declare that the conditions and bases adopted by the Allied Powers when drafting the peace treaties were false, that this State was created at the cost of historical truth and that the Great Powers in question were deceived as to the real state of affairs.

The treaty concluded on September 10th 1919 between the Czechoslovak Republic (represented only by members of the Czech nation) and the Allied and Associated Powers is based on the assumption that the people of Bohemia, Moravia and part of Silesia as also the people of Slovakia decided of their own free will to combine and did in fact so combine in a permanent alliance in order to create a uniform, sovereign and independent State to be called "the Czechoslovak Republic".

We maintain on the contrary that the Germans of Bohemia, Moravia and Silesia and the Germans of Slovakia never desired to unite with the Czechs or to form an alliance for the formation of the Czechoslovak Republic. Austrian Reichstag deputies elected in 1911, in the German Sudeten districts in 1919 expressly declared after the collapse of Austria, as the properly constituted representatives of those districts and the spokesmen of the universal will of the population (clearly expressed in innumerable popular meetings and decisions of Communes) that they desired to belong to German Austria as German Bohemia, Sudetenland, German South-Moravia and Böhmerwaldgau respectively. The Czechoslovak Republic was thus the result of a one-sided desire of the Czechs and it illegally occupied these German districts by force of arms. The population of the German Sudeten districts were never consulted and, as far as they were concerned, the peace treaties merely sanctioned a state of affairs founded on force and not on law. Even the scant measure of protection which the Allied and Associated Powers thought to accord to the Germans has been rendered nugatory by the arbitrary proceedings of the Revolutionary Assembly. The whole Czechoslovak legislation, including the imposed Constitution, constitutes an open violation of the Treaty concerning the Protection of Minorities. We hereby solemnly state that we will never recognize any of these laws as morally binding upon us. For us Germans, who took no part in the conclusion of any agreement concerning the creation of this State, its form of Government, its relations to ourselves and that of the nations composing it to one another, the fundamental political rights and liberties of its inhabitants and its relations with the other States of Europe are today so many unsolved problems. We demand that those problems be solved simply and solely on the basis of true democracy and unhindered national freedom.

We consequently reject the fable of the purely Czech State, the Czechoslovak nation and the Czechoslovak language as being clearly opposed to the facts. We will never recognize the Czechs as our masters or submit to them as slaves in this State. Injustice can never become justice, though it prevail for a thousand years, unless it is recognized by the victims themselves by a free decision and we herewith solemnly proclaim that we shall never cease to demand self-determination for our people, that we regard this as the first principle governing all our acts and our relations to this State and that we regard the present position as unworthy and impossible of reconciliation with the principles of modern development. We hold it to be our sacred duty to bequeath this legacy to those who come after us.

In faith whereof, we hereby append our signatures.

Done at Prague, June 1st and 9th, 1920."

Proclamation by Conrad Henlein on September 15th, 1938

Compatriots !

Realizing that you have placed your confidence in me and fully conscious of my responsibility, I declare before world opinion that, with the use of machine-guns, armoured cars and tanks against the defenceless Sudeten Germans, the system of oppression employed by the Czech people has reached its climax. The Czech people have thereby shown, for all to see, that it has become definitely impossible to live with them in the same State. The experience of a régime of violence extending over a period of twenty years and in particular the heavy toll of victims during the last few days place me under an obligation to state:

1) that in 1919, we were deprived of the right of self-determination solemnly promised to us and forced into the Czech State against our will.

2) that, although we have never relinquished our claim to self-determination, we have made every attempt, at the cost of very heavy sacrifices, to ensure our existence in the Czech State.

3) that all attempts to induce the Czech people and their responsible authorities to come to an honourable and just arrangement have been wrecked on the rock of their implacable will to destruction.

In this hour of Sudeten German distress, I say to you, the German people and the whole civilized world:

We wish to live as free German men and women! We want peace and work in our home! We want to go home to the Reich!

God bless us and our just fight!

SOLUTION AND DELIVERANCE

A Documentary Report on the Settlement of the Czechoslovak Crisis

The Munich Agreement

Text of the Agreement between Germany, the United Kingdom, France and Italy

Concluded at Munich on September 29th, 1938

Germany, the United Kingdom, France, and Italy, taking into consideration the settlement already agreed upon in principle concerning the cession of the Sudeten German districts, have agreed on the following conditions and procedure and the measures to be taken, and declare themselves individually held responsible by this agreement for guaranteeing the steps necessary for its fulfilment :

1. The evacuation begins on October 1.
2. The United Kingdom of Great Britain, France, and Italy agree that the evacuation of the region shall be completed by October 10, without destruction of any of the existing installations, and that the Czechoslovak Government bear the responsibility for seeing that the evacuation is carried out without damaging the aforesaid installations.
3. The conditions governing the evacuation will be laid down in detail by an international commission composed of representatives of Germany, the United Kingdom, France, Italy, and Czechoslovakia.
4. The occupation by stages of the predominantly German territories by German troops will begin on October 1. The four territories marked on the attached map will be occupied by German troops in the following order :— The territory marked No. 1 on October 1 and 2, the territory marked No. 2 on October 2 and 3, the territory marked No. 3 on October 4 and 5, the territory marked No. 4 on October 6 and 7.

The remaining territories of predominantly German character will be ascertained by the aforesaid international commission forthwith and be occupied by German troops by October 10.

5. The International Commission referred to in paragraph 3 will determine the territories in which a plebiscite is to be held. These territories will be occupied by international bodies until the plebiscite has been completed. The same Commission will fix the conditions in which the plebiscite is to be held, taking as a basis the conditions of the Saar plebiscite.

The Commission will also fix the date at the end of November on which the plebiscite will be held.

6. The final determination of the frontiers will be carried out by the international commission. This commission will also recommend to the four Power—Germany, the United Kingdom, France, and Italy—in certain exceptional circumstances minor modifications in the strictly ethnographical determination of the zones which are to be transferred without plebiscite.

7. There will be a right of option into and out of the transferred territories, the option to be exercised within six months of the date of this agreement. A German-Czechoslovak commission shall determine the details of the options and consider ways of facilitating the transfer of populations and certain questions of principle arising out of the said transfers.

8. The Czechoslovak Government will within the period of four weeks from the date of this agreement release from the military and police forces any Sudeten Germans who may wish to be released, and the Czechoslovak Government will within the same period release Sudeten German prisoners who are serving terms of imprisonment for political offences.

Munich, September 29th, 1938.

Supplementary Declaration

The heads of the Governments of the four Powers declare that the problems of the Polish and Hungarian minorities in Czechoslovakia, if not settled within three months by agreement between the respective Governments, shall form the subject of a further meeting of the heads of Governments of the four Powers here present.

Munich, September 29th, 1938.

Annex to the Agreement

His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom and the French Government have entered into the above agreement on the basis that they stand by the offer contained in Paragraph 6 of the Anglo-French proposals of September 19 in relation to an international guarantee of the new boundaries of the Czechoslovak State against unprovoked aggression.

When the question of the Polish and Hungarian minorities in Czechoslovakia has been settled Germany and Italy for their part will give a guarantee to Czechoslovakia.

Supplementary Declaration

The heads of the Governments of the four Powers agree that the Commission provided for in the Agreement of today's date shall consist of the Secretary of State of the Foreign Office, the Ambassadors of the United Kingdom, France and Italy accredited to Berlin and a member to be appointed by the Czechoslovak Government.

Munich, September 29th, 1938.

Supplementary Declaration

All questions which may arise out of the transfer of the territories shall be considered as coming within the terms of reference of the International Commission.

Munich, September 29th, 1938.

A EUROPEAN ACT OF PEACE

Joint Declaration by Hitler and Chamberlain of September 30th, 1938

No More War between the Two Nations

The Führer and Reich Chancellor and the British Prime Minister, after their conversation today, issued the following joint declaration:

"We, the German Führer and Chancellor and the British Prime Minister, have had a further meeting to-day and are agreed in recognising that the question of Anglo-German relations is of the first importance for the two countries and for Europe.

We regard the agreement signed last night and the Anglo-German Naval Agreement as symbolic of the desire of our two peoples never to go to war with one another again.

We are resolved that the method of consultation shall be the method adopted to deal with any other questions that may concern our two countries, and we are determined to continue our efforts to remove possible sources of difference and thus to contribute to assure the peace of Europe.

Munich, September 30th, 1938.

Statements by the French Premier Daladier and Field-Marshal Göring on the Significance of the Agreement

The Victory of Peace

A Historic Date in the Life of Europe

Munich, September 30th.

The French Premier, Edouard Daladier, made the following statement to the Paris representative of the Deutsche Nachrichtenbüro:

"I believe that the Munich meeting may become a historic date in the life of Europe. Thanks to the great comprehension of the representatives of the western Great Powers, war has been avoided and the peoples have been assured of an honourable peace.

I was glad to be able to note myself that no feeling of hatred or enmity against France rules in Germany. You can be sure that the French also have no feeling of enmity to Germany and have not had such a feeling even in the time of diplomatic tension and military preparations which we have just experienced and overcome.

The two nations must learn to understand each other in all cordiality and I am glad to be able to devote my energies to this necessary and fruitful entente.

I have already thanked the Führer, Field-Marshal Göring and the Reich Foreign Minister von Ribbentrop for the cordiality of their reception.

Please transmit my thanks also to the population of Munich."

Munich, September 30th, 1938.

Field-Marshal Göring today received one of the special correspondents of the Havas agency in Munich in order to express his pleasure that a matter which had so long kept Europe in suspense was finally settled.

"The statesmen gathered together in Munich have just won a great victory, the victory of peace. As a journalist living in Berlin, you will have observed in the last few weeks of increased tension that no feeling of hatred or chauvinism against France has made itself felt in Germany. Nothing should prevent our two great nations, who have such great respect for each other, from living peacefully side by side.

I am particularly glad to know that the French ex-combatants also take part in the international control in Czechoslovakia, for wherever the ex-combatants are there will be peace and justice.

I believe that the four countries which have taken part in the Munich meeting can be satisfied with the result achieved."

In the course of the interview Field-Marshal Göring paid a special tribute to the loyalty displayed by President Daladier during the Munich conversations.

Statement by Field-Marshal Göring to the British Journalist Ward Price on September 30th.

The Beginning of a New Era in Europe

"To-day is a day of triumph—the triumph of reason and peace. Now that the difficult and dangerous question of Czechoslovakia has been solved by direct personal contact between the heads of the Governments of the four great European Powers, it should surely be possible to settle, by the same method, any future difficulties that may arise.

The settlement concluded in Munich, will prove to have even greater importance than the solution of the Sudeten problem. It is not a question of whether Germany has made concessions on some points, or Britain and France on others. The supreme significance of the conference lies in the fact that the way has at last been found to end international difficulties swiftly and peaceably.

We look now forward to peaceful relations with Czechoslovakia.

The Munich agreement marks the beginning of a new era in Europe."

THE DELIVERANCE OF THE SUDETEN GERMANS FROM THE FETTERS OF VERSAILLES

Extract from Adolf Hitler's Speech in the Berlin Sport Palace on the Occasion of the Opening of the Winter Relief Work 1938 on October 5th, 1938

My Germans and Comrades.

Six years ago when I took over the leadership of the Reich, one of our so-called statesmen of that time said: "This man has now taken the decisive step. Hitherto he was popular when he was in the opposition. Now he must rule, and we will see what has become of his popularity in six or eight weeks."

Since then, not six weeks, but nearly six years, have passed, and I believe that these six years have been among the most decisive in German history. The characteristic feature of this period has been the extraordinary unanimity of the German people. Anything that I have been able to attain in these six years has only been possible because the entire German people stood behind me. The problems with which we were faced could not be overcome by a single man. It was only possible to deal with these questions when one could speak, and if necessary act, on behalf of the entire German people.

We have perhaps realised this most in the months, weeks and days that lie behind us. On May 28th I set myself a great aim. It was a grave decision at that time. I believed in its realisation, and could only believe in it because I knew that the German people stood behind me and was prepared for every effort.

This unanimity is the result of an organised new German community. That is what is meant by that we National Socialists call the national community. Without this German national community it would have been impossible to master all the tasks which have been dealt with in the last few weeks.

There are many who do not understand this and who perhaps imagine that this must be the case. This is so in particular with those who do not themselves possess the strength of heart to tackle such problems. They cannot imagine that the force which has made all this possible is exclusively the force of the German national community which stands behind me, on which I can rely, and of which I know that it will not forsake me even in the worst time.

In the last few months and weeks I have undoubtedly received great help in foreign politics and in my last speech in this hall I thanked the man who stood as a true friend behind Germany: Benito Mussolini. He threw the entire force not only of his own genius but of the power behind him into the scale of a just solution.

I must also thank the other two great statesmen who at the last minute recognised the historic hour, declared themselves ready to act in order to solve one of the most burning questions of Europe and thus enabled me to offer my hand for an understanding.

But above all, my thanks go to the German people. They never abandoned me during these long months.

They have borne with stern resolution all the measures which were necessary to put into effect the just demands of the Reich. It will remain one of our people's titles to glory that, at a time when hundreds of thousands were called to work and other hundreds of thousands of our men were called to arms, there was no panic buying in Germany, not a man went to the savings bank, not a woman doubted, but the entire nation proved to be a single compact community. I must say frankly: I am proud my German people.

I hope that in a few days the Sudeten German problem will be definitely solved. By October 10th we shall have occupied all German territories that belonged to us.

This will put an end to one of the most serious crises of Europe, and then all of us, not only in Germany, but also outside, can in this year for the first time really rejoice at the Christmas festival. It will be for us all a true festival of peace.

But it is all the more important at the present time to take the greatest care of our German national community, to fight for it, to strive after it and to make sacrifices for it. For even happiness is not given to men for nothing, but must be won by hard endeavour.

We have not attained this national community by chance. It has been erected by arduous work, first in the ranks of the National Socialist Party from which it subsequently spread to conquer the whole German nation. This German national community is in fact socialism applied in practice, and therefore National Socialism in the highest sense of the word. Everyone is under an obligation to contribute his share. But we are all subject to the precept: No one in the world will help us, unless we help ourselves.

This programme of self-help is as proud as it is manly. It is different from that of my predecessors, who constantly ran round begging for help, first at Versailles, then at Geneva, then at Lausanne or elsewhere at some Conference or other.

It is a matter for pride that we Germans are today determined to solve our problems ourselves and to help ourselves.

We must also admit to how infinitely many of our compatriots, nameless, unknown people, we owe thanks. Many hundreds of thousands of German workmen have in the last few months been suddenly torn from their occupations. One day the order came: Pack your bag, you must go to the west. A giant army of workers went out and built a wall of concrete and steel in order to protect us all and the whole of Germany. They had to leave their wives and children behind them, they had to leave their work, they had to take up new and often difficult work, they had to live in encampments and accept many living inconveniences. It is true that we tried to make all this bearable for them, but nevertheless we are grateful to all of them and also to the hundreds of thousands who moved into our barracks and our military exercise fields. We are also grateful to all the women who had to let their husbands and sons go. We thank all those who make sacrifices for us, who are quite unknown, nameless working German people. But now, thanks to all these sacrifices, we are witnessing a great historical turn of events. At this moment we must also remember those who for twenty years, in an apparently hopeless position, believed fanatically in Germany and never abandoned their German national feeling.

It is so easy here in the heart of the Reich to have German national feelings. But it is terribly difficult, in the face of constant persecution, not to be led away from such feelings and to remain fanatically true to them, as if release were coming the next day. But now the hour of release has arrived.

I myself have now cast a first glance in these territories and have been deeply struck by two impressions.

In the first place, I have often known the exultation and enthusiasm of joy. But here for the first time I saw the joy of tears among hundreds of thousands of people.

In the second place I saw terrible distress. When in England Duff Cooper or Mr. Eden say that injustice has been done to the Czechs, then these men should merely see what really happened there. How is it possible to twist the truth to this extent. I have seen entire villages that were under-nourished and entire towns suffering from poverty.

My comrades, we have now a great duty of honour to fulfil. We must accept these people in the circle of our national community and help them. Help is now necessary. That is a small token of gratitude that the German who has hitherto been able to live in the safe haven of the Reich can offer. A small sacrifice is demanded from everyone.

But I expect that everyone will fix his sacrifice according to his means and that the wealth here will show a brilliant example. It must be our pride to remove distress completely in the shortest possible time.

In a few years I want to see not a single rickety child in this country. We will devote our whole energy to caring for and raising the standard of these German comrades.

We will all consider how much we owe to this German national community, this community of mutual sacrifice. It has enabled me to solve a burning problem finally without a struggle.

What sacrifices this struggle would have caused. Let us learn from the past. Let us remember that once Germany collapsed because this community did not exist; it will only then be clear to us that no sacrifice can be too great for this community.

In this community, in which the greatest force of the nation finds expression, I also see the strongest guarantee of peace. So long as the German people appears before the world as such a community, no one will dare lightly to declare a feud against our people. They will then all realise that they are not up against one man but against a great powerful nation.

In the history of our people the year 1938 will be a great, unforgettable, proud year. In this year the last shameful pages have been torn out of the fateful book that was once allotted to us at Versailles. Later historians will state that the German nation again rose to the level of a great and honoured nation, and that our history again became a worthy history. But it is also my belief that in this year the greatest social relief organisation must show similar results.

I expect that the winter relief work of 1938 will be in accordance with the historical greatness of this year.

It must be the ambition of all to contribute to such a monumental success, in order to show that the expression "national community" is no empty phrase.

We know that all human endeavours depend for their ultimate success on the blessing of providence. But we also know that providence only helps those who prove worthy. I believe that we have experienced so much good fortune this year that it is the duty of all of us to make our sacrifices voluntarily to this good fortune. By these sacrifices we also show our thanks to providence that has protected our people from deep distress and has in this year given to millions of Germans the greatest joy of their lives.

THE MUNICH AGREEMENT BEFORE THE BRITISH AND FRENCH PARLIAMENTS

Extract

from Mr. Chamberlain's Report to the House of Commons on September 28th and October 3rd, 1938

To-day we are faced with a situation which has had no parallel since 1914. To find the origins of the present controversy it would be necessary to go back to the constitution of the State of Czechoslovakia with all its heterogeneous populations. No doubt at the time when it was constituted it seemed to those then responsible that it was the best arrangement that could be made in the light of the conditions as they then supposed them to exist.

I cannot help reflecting that if Article XIX of the Covenant providing for the revision of the treaties by agreement had been put into operation as was contemplated by the framers of the Covenant instead of waiting until passions became so exasperated that revision by agreement became impossible we might have avoided a crisis. Therefore for that omission all members of the League must bear their responsibility.

I am not here to apportion blame among them. The position that we had to face in July was that a deadlock had arisen in the negotiations which had been going on between the Czechoslovak Government and the Sudeten Germans and that fears were already entertained that if it were not speedily broken the German Government might presently intervene in the dispute.

For his Majesty's Government there were three alternative courses that we might have adopted. Either we could have threatened to go to war with Germany if she attacked Czechoslovakia, or we could have stood aside and allowed matters to take their course, or finally we could attempt to find a peaceful settlement by way of mediation. The first of these courses we rejected. We had no treaty liabilities to Czechoslovakia. We always refused to accept any such obligations. Indeed, this country, which does not readily resort to war, would not have followed us if we had tried to lead it into war to prevent a minority from obtaining autonomy or even from choosing to pass under some other Government.

The second alternative was also repugnant to us. However remote this territory may be, we knew, of course, that a spark once lighted there might give rise to a general conflagration. We felt it our duty to do anything in our power to help the contending parties to find agreement.

We addressed ourselves to the third course, the task of mediation. We knew that the task would be difficult, perhaps even perilous, but we felt that the object was good enough to justify the risk, and when Lord Runciman had expressed his willingness to undertake our mission we were happy to think that we had secured a mediator whose long experience, well-known qualities of firmness, of tact, and of sympathy, gave us the best hopes of success. That in the end Lord Runciman did not succeed was no fault of his, and we, and indeed all Europe, must ever be grateful to him and to his staff for their long and exhausting efforts on behalf of peace, in the course of which they gained the esteem and the confidence of both sides.

On September 21 Lord Runciman addressed a letter to me reporting the results of his mission. The letter is printed in the White Book as document No. 1.

The House will see that during August Lord Runciman's efforts had been directed, with a considerable degree of success, towards bringing the Sudeten and Czechoslovak Government negotiators closer together. In the meantime, however, developments in Germany itself had been causing considerable anxiety to his Majesty's Government.

But early in August we received reports of military preparations in Germany on an extensive scale. These measures could not fail to be regarded abroad as equivalent to partial mobilization, and suggested that the German Government were determined to find a settlement of the Sudeten question by the autumn.

In these circumstances his Majesty's Ambassador in Berlin was instructed in the middle of August to point out to the German Government that these abnormal measures could not fail to be interpreted abroad as a threatening gesture towards Czechoslovakia. They must, therefore, increase the feeling of tension throughout Europe, and that they might compel the Czechoslovak Government to take precautionary measures on their side. The almost certain consequence would be to destroy all chance of successful mediation by Lord Runciman's mission and perhaps endanger the peace of every one of the Great Powers of Europe.

This, the Ambassador added, might also destroy the prospects of the resumption of Anglo-German conversations. In these circumstances it was hoped that the German Government might be able to modify their military measures in order to avoid these dangers.

To these representations Herr von Ribbentrop replied in a letter in which he refused to discuss the military measures referred to, and expressed the opinion that the British efforts in Prague had only served to increase Czech intransigence. In face of this attitude his Majesty's Government, through the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who happened to be speaking at Lanark on August 27, drew attention again to some words I had used on March 24 in this House. He declared that there was nothing to add to or to vary in the statement which I had made. Perhaps I may just refresh the memories of hon. members by reading that statement of March 24 once again:—

"Where peace and war are concerned, legal obligations are not alone involved, and, if war broke out, it would be unlikely to be confined to those who had assumed such obligations. It would be quite impossible to say where it would end and what Governments might become involved. The inexorable pressure of facts might well prove more powerful than formal pronouncements, and in that event it would be well within the bounds of probability that other countries, besides those which were parties to the original dispute, would almost immediately become involved. This is especially true in the case of two countries like Great Britain and France, with long associations of friendship, with interests closely interwoven, devoted to the same ideals of democratic liberty, and determined to uphold them."

Towards the end of August further events occurred which marked the increasing seriousness of the situation. The French Government, in consequence of information which had reached them about the moving of several German Divisions towards their frontier, took certain precautionary measures themselves, including the calling up of reserves to man the Maginot Line. On August 28 Sir Neville Henderson had been recalled to London for consultations. A special meeting of Ministers was held on August 30 to consider his report and the general situation.

On the 31st he returned to Berlin, and he gave Baron von Weizsäcker, the State Secretary at the Wilhelmstrasse, a strong personal warning regarding the probable attitude of his Majesty's Government in the event of German aggression against Czechoslovakia particularly if France were compelled to intervene. On September 1 the Ambassador saw Herr von Ribbentrop and repeated to him, as a personal and most urgent message, the warning he had already given to the State Secretary of the previous day.

In addressing these personal warnings through Sir Neville Henderson, and in making the reference to Czechoslovakia contained in the Chancellor's speech on August 27, his Majesty's Government desired to impress the seriousness of the situation on the German Government without risking a further aggravation of the situation by any formal representation which might have been interpreted by the German Government as a public rebuff, as had been the case in regard to our representations on May 21. His Majesty's Government also had to bear in mind the close approach of the Nazi party congress at Nuremberg, which was to open on September 5 and to last until the 12th.

It was to be anticipated that the German Chancellor would feel himself compelled to make some public statement regarding the Sudeten question, and it therefore appeared necessary, in addition to warning the German Government of the attitude of his Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, to make every effort in Prague to secure a resumption of negotiations between the Czechoslovak Government and the Sudeten representatives on a basis which would give hope of a rapid and satisfactory settlement.

Accordingly, his Majesty's Minister at Prague saw Dr. Benesh on September 3, and emphasized to him that it was vital in the interests of Czechoslovakia to offer immediately and without reservation those concessions without which the Sudeten question could not be immediately settled. His Majesty's Government were not in a position to say whether anything less than the Carlsbad programme would suffice. They certainly felt that the Czechoslovak Government should go forthwith and unreservedly to the limit of concession. Lord Runciman strongly supported Mr. Newton's representations to Dr. Benesh, and both Lord Runciman and Mr. Newton drew Dr. Benesh's attention to the importance of reaching a settlement before Herr Hitler's expected pronouncement at Nuremberg, and to the dangerous international situation resulting from the German military preparations.

Dr. Benesh responded to these expectations which were made in the best interests of Czechoslovakia, by putting forward proposals afterwards known as the Fourth Plan, which were communicated to the Sudeten German representatives on September 6. In Lord Runciman's opinion this plan embodied almost all the requirements of the eight Carlsbad points and formed a very favourable basis for the resumption of negotiations. In forming this opinion he was guided partly by his own examination of the Czech Government's plan, and partly by the favourable reception that was accorded to it by the Sudeten negotiators.

Since the opening proclamation of the Nuremberg Congress had not contained any reference to the Czechoslovak question, and the recent attitude of Herr Hitler and other leading German personalities indicated that Germany welcomed the continuation of negotiations in Prague, the prospects of a satisfactory solution of the Sudeten question on the basis of autonomy within the Czechoslovak State appeared not unpromising on the publication of the Czechoslovak Government's Fourth Plan on September 7.

The publication of the Fourth Plan was unfortunately, however, immediately followed by a serious incident at Mährisch-Osttau. It would appear from the investigations of the British observer that the importance of this incident was very much exaggerated, but the immediate result was a decision on the part of the Sudeten leaders not to resume negotiations until this incident had been liquidated. Immediate measures were taken by the Czechoslovak Government to liquidate it, but further incidents took place on September 11 near Eger, and in spite of Lord Runciman's efforts to bring both parties together negotiations could not be resumed before Herr Hitler's speech winding up the Nuremberg Congress on September 12.

On September 9 the Cabinet met to consider the situation, and decided to take certain precautionary naval measures, including the commissioning of mine-layers and mine-sweepers, and on September 11 I made a statement to the Press, which received widespread publicity, stressing in particular the close ties uniting Great Britain and France, and the probability, in certain eventualities, of this country going to the assistance of France. On the morning of September 12 the Cabinet met again. They decided that no further action could usefully be taken before Herr Hitler's speech at Nuremberg that evening.

In his own speech on September 12 Herr Hitler laid great stress on the defensive military measures taken on Germany's western frontier. In his references to Czechoslovakia he reminded the world that on February 22 he had said that the Reich would no longer tolerate further oppression or persecution of the Sudeten Germans. They demanded the right of self-determination, he said, and they were supported in their demand by the Reich. Therefore, for the first time, this speech promised the support of the Reich to the Sudeten Germans if they could not obtain satisfaction for themselves, and for the first time he publicly raised the issue of self-determination. He did not, however, close the door on further negotiations in Prague, nor did he demand a plebiscite.

As the speech was also accompanied by pacifying references to Germany's frontiers with Poland and France its general effect was to leave the situation unchanged, with a slight diminution of the tension. The speech, however, and in particular Herr Hitler's reference to German support for the cause of the Sudeten Germans, had an immediate and unfortunate effect among those people. Demonstrations took place throughout Sudetenland, resulting in an immediate extension of the incidents which had already begun on September 11. Serious rioting occurred. Martial law was immediately proclaimed in the affected districts. On the evening of September 13 Herr Henlein and other Sudeten leaders assembled at Eger and sent a telegram to the Czechoslovak Government declaring that they could not be responsible for the consequences of martial law and the special Czech emergency measures if they were not immediately withdrawn.

Attempts made by Lord Runciman's mission to bring the Sudeten leaders into discussion with the Czechoslovak Government failed, and on September 14 Herr Henlein issued a proclamation stating that the Carlsbad Points were no longer enough and that the situation called for self-determination. Thereupon Herr Henlein fled to Germany. In these circumstances Lord Runciman felt that no useful purpose would be served by his publishing a plan of his own.

The House will recall that, by the evening of September 14, a highly critical situation had developed in which there was immediate danger of the German troops now concentrated upon the frontier entering Czechoslovakia to prevent further incidents occurring in Sudetenland, and fighting between the Czech forces and the Sudeten Germans, although reliable reports indicated that order had been completely restored in those districts by September 14. On the other hand, Czechoslovakia might have felt compelled to mobilize at once and so risk provoking a German invasion. In either event German invasion might have been expected to bring into operation French obligations to come to the assistance of Czechoslovakia and so lead to a European war in which this country might well have been involved in support of France.

In those circumstances I decided that the time had come to put into operation a plan which I had had in my mind for a considerable period as a last resort. One of the principal difficulties in dealing with totalitarian Governments is the lack of any means of establishing contact with the personalities in whose hands lie the final decisions for the country. So I resolved to go to Germany myself to interview Herr Hitler and find out in personal conversation whether there was yet any hope of saving the peace. I knew very well that in taking such an unprecedented course I was laying myself open to criticism on the ground that I was detracting from the dignity of a British Prime Minister and to disappointment and perhaps even resentment if I failed to bring back a satisfactory agreement. But I felt that in such a crisis, where the issues at stake were so vital for millions of human beings such considerations of that kind could not be allowed to count. Herr Hitler responded to my suggestion with cordiality, and, on September 15, I made my first flight to Munich, and from thence I travelled by train to Herr Hitler's mountain home at Berchtesgaden.

I confess I was astonished at the warmth of the approval with which this adventure was everywhere received but the relief which it brought for the moment was an indication of the gravity with which the situation had been viewed. At this first conversation, which lasted for three hours, and at which only an interpreter was present besides Herr Hitler and myself I very soon became aware that the position was much more acute and much more urgent than I had realized.

In courteous, but perfectly definite terms, Herr Hitler made it plain that he had made up his mind that the Sudeten Germans must have the right of self-determination and of returning if they wished to the Reich. If they could not achieve this by their own efforts, he said, he would assist them to do so, and he declared categorically that rather than wait he would be prepared to risk a world war. At one point he complained of British threats against him, to which I replied that he must distinguish between a threat and a warning, and that he might have just cause of complaint if I allowed him to think that in no circumstances would this country go to war with Germany when, in fact, there were conditions in which such a contingency might arise.

So strongly did I get the impression that the Chancellor was contemplating an immediate invasion of Czechoslovakia that I asked him why he had allowed me to travel all that way, since I was evidently wasting my time. On that he said that if I could give him, there and then, an assurance that the British Government accepted the principle of self-determination, he would be quite ready to discuss ways and means of carrying it out; that if, on the contrary, I told him that such a principle could not be considered by the British Government, then he agreed that it was of no use to continue our conversations. I, of course, was not in a position to give, there and then, such an assurance; but I undertook to return at once to consult my colleagues, if he would refrain from active hostilities until I had had time to obtain their reply. That assurance he gave me, provided, he said, that nothing happened in Czechoslovakia of such a nature as to force his hand; and that assurance has remained binding ever since.

I have no doubt now, looking back, that my visit alone prevented an invasion, for which everything was ready; and it was clear to me that, with the German troops in the positions they then occupied there was nothing that anybody could do that would prevent that invasion unless the right of self-determination were granted to the Sudeten Germans, and that quickly. That was the sole hope of a peaceful solution.

I went back to London next day. That evening the Cabinet met, and it was attended also by Lord Runciman, who at my request had also travelled from Prague that same day. Naturally his Majesty's Government felt it necessary to consult the French Government before they replied to Herr Hitler, and accordingly M. Daladier and M. Bonnet were invited to fly to London for conversations with British Ministers on September 18.

During these conversations the representatives of the two Governments were guided by a desire to find a solution which would not bring about a European war and therefore a solution which would not automatically compel France to take action in accordance with her obligations. It was agreed that the only means of achieving this object was to accept the principle of self-determination, and accordingly the British and the French Ministers in Prague were instructed to inform the Czechoslovak Government that the further maintenance within the boundaries of the Czechoslovak State of the districts mainly inhabited by Sudeten Germans could not continue any longer without imperilling the interests of Czechoslovakia herself and of European peace. The Czechoslovak Government were therefore urged to agree immediately to the direct transfer to the Reich of all areas with over 50 per cent. Sudeten inhabitants. An international body was to be set up to deal with questions like the adjustment of frontiers and the possible exchange of populations on the basis of the right to opt.

The Czechoslovak Government were informed that to meet their natural desire for security for their future his Majesty's Government would be prepared as a contribution to the pacification of Europe to join in an international guarantee of the new boundaries of the Czechoslovak State against unprovoked aggression. Such a guarantee would safeguard the independence of Czechoslovakia by substituting a general guarantee against unprovoked aggression in place of the existing treaties with France and Soviet Russia, which involved reciprocal obligations of a military character.

In urging this solution upon the Czechoslovak Government the British and French Governments took account of the probability that the Czechoslovak Government would find it prefe-nable to deal with the problem by the method of direct transfer rather than by means of a plebiscite which would involve serious difficulties as regards other nationalities in Czechoslovakia. In agreeing to guarantee the future boundaries of Czechoslovakia against unprovoked aggression his Majesty's Government were accepting a completely new commitment as we were not previously bound by any obligations towards Czechoslovakia other than those involved in the Covenant of the League.

The Tchechoslovak Government replied on September 20 to these representations by suggesting that the Sudeten dispute should be submitted to arbitration under the terms of the German-Czechoslovak Arbitration Treaty of 1926. The British and French Ministers in Prague were, however, instructed to point out to the Czechoslovak Government that there was no hope of a peaceful solution on this basis, and in the interest of Czechoslovakia and of European peace the Czechoslovak Government was urged to accept the Anglo-French proposals immediately. This they did immediately and unconditionally on September 21.

That Government resigned on September 22, but it was immediately succeeded by a Government of national concentration under General Sirovy, Inspector-General of the Army, and it has been emphasized in Prague that this Government is not a military dictatorship and has accepted the Anglo-French proposals.

We had hoped that the immediate problem of the Sudeten Germans would not be further complicated at this particular juncture by the pressing of the claims of the Hungarian and Polish minorities. These minorities have, however, consistently demanded similar treatment to that accorded to the Sudeten minority and the acceptance of the Anglo-French proposals involving the cession of the predominately Sudeten German territories has led to a similar demand for cession of the territories predominantly inhabited by Polish and Hungarian minorities being advanced by the Hungarian and Polish Governments.

However, on September 22 I went back to Germany, to Godesberg on the Rhine, where the Chancellor had appointed a meeting place as being more convenient for me than the remote Berchtesgaden.

Once again I had a very warm welcome in the streets and villages through which I passed demonstrating to me the desire of the German people for peace. On the afternoon of my arrival I had my second meeting with the Chancellor.

During my stay in London the Government had worked out with the French Government arrangements for effecting the transfer of the territory proposed and also for delimiting the final frontier. I explained these to Herr Hitler. He was not previously aware of them, and I also told him about the proposed guarantee against unprovoked aggression.

On that point of a guarantee he made no objection, but said he could not enter into a guarantee unless other Powers, including Italy, were also guarantors. I said I had not asked him to enter into a guarantee, but I had intended to ask him whether he was prepared to conclude a pact of non-aggression with the new Czechoslovakia. He said he could not enter into such a pact while other minorities in Czechoslovakia were still unsatisfied, but hon. members will see that he has since put his views in a more positive form, and said that when they are satisfied he will then be prepared to join in an international guarantee.

At this particular time, however, no further discussion took place between us on the subject of a guarantee. Herr Hitler said he could not accept the other proposals I had described to him on the ground that they were too dilatory and offered too many opportunities for further evasion on the part of the Czechs. He insisted that a speedy solution was essential on account of the oppression and terrorism to which the Sudeten Germans were being subjected, and he proceeded to give me the main outlines of the proposal which he subsequently embodied in a memorandum, except that he did not in this conversation actually name any time limit.

Hon. members will realize the perplexity in which I found myself, faced with this totally unexpected situation. It was a profound shock to me when I was told at the beginning of the conversation that these proposals were not acceptable and that they were to be replaced by other proposals of a kind which I had not contemplated at all.

I felt that I must have a little time to consider what I was to do. Consequently, I withdrew, my mind full of foreboding as to the success of my mission. I first, however, obtained from Herr Hitler an extension of his previous assurance that he would not move his troops pending the results of the negotiations. I, on my side, undertook to appeal to the Czech Government to avoid any action which might provoke incidents.

I have seen speculative accounts of what happened on the next day which have suggested that long hours passed while I remained on one side of the Rhine and Herr Hitler on the other because I had difficulty in obtaining this assurance from him about the moving of his troops. I want to say at once that that is purely imaginary. There was no such difficulty. I will explain in a moment what did cause the delay, but the assurance was given readily and it has been, as I have said before, abided by right up to the present time.

We had arranged to resume our conversation at half past eleven the next morning, but in view of the difficulties of talking with a man through an interpreter and of the fact that I could not feel sure that what I had said to Herr Hitler had always been completely understood and appreciated by him, I thought it would be wise to put down on paper some comments upon these new proposals of his and let him have them some time before the talks began.

Accordingly, I wrote him a letter, which is No. 3 in the White Paper, which I sent to him. I sent that soon after breakfast and it will be seen that in it I declared my readiness to convey the proposals to the Czechoslovak Government, but I pointed out what seemed to me to be grave difficulties in the way of their acceptance. On the receipt of this letter the Chancellor intimated that he would like to send a written reply. Accordingly, the conversations were postponed.

The reply was not received until well into the afternoon. I had hoped that this delay might mean that some modification was being worked out, but when I received the letter, which is No. 4, I found to my disappointment that, although it contained some explanation, it offered no modification at all of the proposals which had been described to me the night before. Accordingly I replied, as in document No. 5, asking for a memorandum of the proposals and a copy of the map for transmission to Prague, and intimating my intention to return to England.

The memorandum and the map were handed to me at my final interview with the Chancellor, which began at half-past 10 that night and lasted into the small hours of the morning, an interview at which the German Foreign Secretary was present as well as Sir Neville Henderson and Sir Horace Wilson, and for the first time I found in the memorandum a time limit. Accordingly, on this occasion I spoke very frankly. I dwelt with all the emphasis at my command on the risks which would be incurred by insisting on such terms, and the terrible consequences of a war if war ensued.

In spite of these plain words, these conversations were carried on on more friendly terms than any that had yet preceded them, and Herr Hitler informed me that he appreciated and was grateful for my efforts, but that he considered that he had made a response since he had held back the operations which he had planned, and that he had offered in his proposal to Czechoslovakia a frontier very different from the one which he would have taken as the result of military conquest.

I think I should add that before saying farewell to Herr Hitler I had a few words with him in private, which I do not think are without importance. In the first place he repeated to me with great earnestness what he had said already at Berchtesgaden—namely, that this was the last of his territorial ambitions in Europe, and that he had no wish to include in the Reich people of other races than Germans.

In the second place, he said again very earnestly that he wanted to be friends with England, and that if only this Sudeten question could be got out of the way in peace he would gladly resume conversations. It is true he said, "There is one awkward question, the Colonies, but that is not a matter for war," and, alluding to the mobilization of the Czechoslovak Army, which had been announced to us in the middle of our conversations and had given rise to some disturbance, he said, about the Colonies, "There will be no mobilization about that."

* * *

I returned to London on September 24, and arrangements were made for the German Memorandum and map to be communicated directly to the Czech Government, who received them that evening. On Sunday, the 25th, we received from M. Masaryk, the Czech Minister here, the reply of the Czech Government, which stated that they considered Herr Hitler's demands in their present form to be absolutely and unconditionally unacceptable. This reply was communicated to the French Ministers Mr. Daladier and Mr. Bonnet, who arrived that same evening and exchanged views with us on the situation.

Meanwhile, as a last effort to preserve peace I sent Sir Horace Wilson to Berlin on the 26th with a personal message to Herr Hitler to be delivered before the speech that Herr Hitler was to make in Berlin at 8 o'clock that night. The French Ministers entirely approved this initiative and issued a communiqué to that effect at midday. Sir Horace Wilson took with him a letter—No. 9 on the White Paper—from me pointing out that the reception of the German Memorandum by the Czechoslovak Government and public opinion in the world generally had confirmed the expectation which I had expressed to him at Godesberg.

I therefore made a further proposal with a view to rendering it possible to get a settlement by negotiation rather than by military force—namely, that there should be immediate discussions between German and Czechoslovak representatives in the presence of British representatives. Sir Horace Wilson arrived in Berlin on the afternoon of the 26th, and he presented his letter to Herr Hitler, who listened to him but expressed the view that he could not depart from the procedure of the Memorandum as he felt conferences would lead to further intolerable procrastination.

I should tell the House how deeply impressed on my mind by my conversations with Herr Hitler and by every speech he has made is this rooted distrust and disbelief in the sincerity of the Czech Government. That has been one of the governing factors in all this difficult story of negotiation.

The next document in the White Paper refers to a conversation which I had with M. Masaryk as to whether the Czechoslovak Government would take part in such conference as I had proposed to Herr Hitler, and the Czech Government replied accepting the proposals under certain conditions which are set out in their letter.

* * *

Now the story which I have told the House brings us up to last night. About 12.30 I received from Herr Hitler a reply to my letter sent by Sir Horace Wilson. It is printed in the White Paper. The reflection which was uppermost in my mind when I read his letter to me was that once more the differences and the obscurities had been narrowed down still further to a point where really it was inconceivable that they could not be settled by negotiations.

So strongly did I feel that, that I felt impelled to send one more letter to the Chancellor. I sent him the following personal message:

"After reading your letter I feel certain that you can get all essentials without war and without delay. I am ready to come to Berlin myself at once to discuss arrangements for transfers with you and representatives of the Czech Government, together with representatives of France and Italy if you desire. I feel convinced that we can reach agreement in a week. However much you distrust the Prague Government's intentions, you cannot doubt the power of the British and French Governments to see that the promises are carried out fairly and fully and forthwith. As you know, I have stated publicly that we are prepared to undertake that they shall be so carried out. I cannot believe that you will take the responsibility of starting a world war which may end civilization for the sake of a few days' delay in settling this long-standing problem."

At the same time I sent the following personal message to Signor Mussolini:

"I have to-day addressed a last appeal to Herr Hitler to abstain from force to settle Sudeten problem, which I feel sure can be settled by a short discussion and will give him the essential territory, population, and protection for both Sudetens and Czechs during transfer. I have offered myself to go at once to Berlin to discuss arrangements with German and Czech representatives, and, if the Chancellor desires, representatives also of Italy and France. I trust your Excellency will inform the German Chancellor that you are willing to be represented and urge him to agree to my proposal, which will keep all our peoples out of war. I have already guaranteed that Czech promises shall be carried out and feel confident full agreement could be reached in a week."

In reply to my message to Signor Mussolini I was informed that instructions had been sent by the Duce to the Italian Ambassador in Berlin to see Herr von Ribbentrop at once and to say that while Italy would fulfil completely her pledges to stand by Germany, yet, in view of the great importance of the request made by his Majesty's Government to Signor Mussolini, the latter hoped Herr Hitler would see his way to postpone action, which the Chancellor had told Sir Horace Wilson was to be taken at 2 p.m. to-day, for at least 24 hours so as to allow Signor Mussolini time to re-examine the situation and endeavour to find a peaceful settlement.

In response Herr Hitler has agreed to postpone mobilization for 24 hours. Whatever views hon. members may have had about Signor Mussolini in the past, I believe that every one will welcome his gesture of being willing to work with us for peace in Europe.

This is not all. I have something further to say to the House yet. I have now been informed by Herr Hitler that he invites me to meet him at Munich to-morrow morning. He has also invited Signor Mussolini and M. Daladier. Signor Mussolini has accepted and I have no doubt M. Daladier will also accept. I need not say what my answer will be.

Mr. Chamberlain on the Declaration of September 30th, 1938

At the beginning of his second speech in the House of Commons on October 3rd, Mr. Chamberlain first gave a short account of the Munich meeting and its result, and went on to express his thanks to the other three statesmen.

"The German Chancellor, in consenting at the last moment to discuss with the representatives of the other Powers, made a real and substantial contribution.

With regard to Signor Mussolini, his contribution was certainly notable and perhaps decisive. It was on his suggestion that the final stages of mobilization were postponed for 24 hours to give us an opportunity of discussing the situation, and I wish to say that at the conference itself both he and the Italian Foreign Secretary, Count Ciano, were most helpful in the discussions. It was they who, very early in the proceedings, produced the memorandum which Mr. Daladier and I were able to accept as a basis of discussion. It think that Europe and the world has reason to be grateful to the head of the Italian Government for his work in contributing to a peaceful solution.

M. Daladier has in some respects the most difficult task of all four of us because of the special relations uniting his country and Czechoslovakia, and I should like to say that his courage, his readiness to take responsibility, his pertinacity, and his unfailing good humour were invaluable throughout the whole of our discussion."

"Ever since I assumed my present office my main purpose has been to work for the pacification of Europe, for the removal of those suspicions, and those animosities which have so long poisoned the air. The path which leads to appeasement is long and bristles with obstacles. The question of Czechoslovakia is the latest and perhaps the most dangerous. Now that we have got past it I feel that it may be possible to make further progress along the road to sanity.

My right hon. friend (Mr. Duff Cooper) has alluded in somewhat bitter terms to my conversation last Friday morning with Herr Hitler. I do not know why that conversation should give rise to suspicion, still less to criticism. I entered into no pact. I made no new commitment. There is no secret understanding. Our conversation was hostile to no other nation. The object of that conversation, for which I asked, was to try to extend a little further the personal contact which I had established with Herr Hitler and which I believe to be essential in modern diplomacy.

We had a friendly and entirely non-committal conversation, carried on, on my part, largely with a view to seeing whether there could be points in common between the head of a democratic Government and the ruler of a totalitarian State. We see the result in the declaration which has been published in which my right hon. friend finds so much ground for suspicion. What does it say?

There are three paragraphs. The first says that we agree in recognizing that the question of Anglo-German relations is of the first importance for the two countries and for Europe. Does anyone deny that? The second is an expression of opinion only. It says that we regard the agreement signed last night and the Anglo-German Naval Agreement as symbolic of the desire of the two people never to go to war with one another again. Once more I ask. Does anyone doubt that that is the desire of the two peoples?

What is the last paragraph?

We are resolved that the method of consultation shall be the method adopted to deal with any other questions that may concern our two countries, and we are determined to continue our efforts to remove possible sources of difference and thus to contribute to assure the peace of Europe.

Who will stand up and condemn that?

I believe there are many who will feel with me that this declaration signed by the German Chancellor and myself is something more than a pious expression of opinion. In our relations with other countries everything depends on there being sincerity and good will on both sides. I believe that there is sincerity and good will on both sides, and that is why to me its significance goes far beyond its actual words.

If there is one lesson which we should learn from the events of these last weeks it is this—that lasting peace is not to be obtained by sitting still and waiting for it to come. It requires active positive efforts to achieve it. No doubt I shall have plenty of critics who will say that I am guilty of facile optimism, and that a better plan would be to disbelieve every word that is uttered by rulers of other great States in Europe. I am too much of a realist to believe that we are going to achieve our paradise in a day. We have only laid the foundations of peace. The superstructure is not even begun.

For a long period now we have been engaged in this country on a great programme of rearmament which is daily increasing in pace and in volume. Let no one think that because we have signed this agreement between the four Powers at Munich we can afford to relax our efforts in regard to that programme at this moment. Disarmament on the part of this country can never be unilateral. We have tried that once, and we very nearly brought ourselves to disaster. If disarmament is to come it must come by steps, and it must come by the agreement and the active cooperation of all countries. Until we know that we have obtained that cooperation, and until we have agreed on the actual steps to be taken, we here must remain on guard.

When, only a little while ago, we had to call on the people of this country to begin to take those steps which would be necessary if an emergency should come on us, we saw the magnificent spirit that was displayed. The naval reservists, the Territorial Army, the Auxiliary Air Force, the Observer Corps obeyed the summons to mobilize readily. We must remember that most of these men gave up their peace-time work at a moment's notice to serve their country. We should like to thank them.

We should like to thank also the employers who accepted the inevitable inconvenience of mobilization. I know that they will show the same spirit of patriotic cooperation in taking back all their former employees when they are demobilized. I know that although the crisis is passed they will feel proud in the knowledge that they are employing men on whom the State can rely if a crisis should return.

While we must renew our determination to fill up the deficiencies that yet remain in our armaments and in our defensive precautions so that we may be ready to defend ourselves and make our diplomacy effective yes, I am realist, and I say with an equal sense of reality that I do see fresh opportunities of approaching this subject of disarmament opening up before us, and I believe that they are at least as hopeful to-day as they have been at any previous time. It is to such tasks, the winning back of confidence, the gradual removal of hostility between nations until they feel that they can safely discard their weapons one by one, that I would wish to devote what energy and time may be left to me before I hand over my office to younger men.

Lord Halifax on the "Miracle of Munich" Extract from his speech in the House of Lords on October 3rd, 1938

It is just eight weeks ago since my noble friend, Lord Runciman, with such great public spirit, went out in the hope if not in the expectation of finding some way of accommodation in Czechoslovakia. His Majesty's Government and the world owe to him and his staff a great debt—and certainly it was through no lack of effort on their part that his mission failed.

The noble viscount then reviewed the course of events, and referred to the "miracle" of Munich. He continued:—

"From the first two principles, I think, have been in conflict in the British mind. The first has been the necessity, in the light of what has been the liberal inspiration of every political experiment our own people have made, of somehow meeting the claims preferred on behalf of the German populations, and, secondly, has been the feeling that whatever might be said about these abstract claims their determination by force was in the long run destructive of European order and of those relationships between nations on which alone security can rest.

It has accordingly been the purpose of his Majesty's Government to do their best to distinguish where there must be distinction, to reconcile where they might be reconciled those two conflicting claims. We were accordingly prepared to go to unusual lengths in placing pressure upon a friendly and independent Government to accept the Anglo-French proposals for full cession of Czech territory down to the German majority population line. These proposals had been based as to the execution of their detail—the adjustment of frontiers, the questions arising out of the exchange of populations on the basis of the right to opt—by an international body, including a Czech representative, and it was partly because the Godesberg Memorandum had not any equivalent provisions for those vital purposes that we felt it was impossible to press their acceptance upon the Czechoslovakian Government."

* * *

After contrasting the Godesberg Memorandum with the plan agreed to at Munich the noble viscount continued: I shall be asked by noble lords opposite why we consented to the omission of Russia. I would venture to repeat here what I said to the Soviet Ambassador a day or two ago. Five days ago it seemed to us vital if war was to be avoided somehow or other to get matters on a basis of negotiation, but if we were to face the facts—and nothing was to be gained but everything was to be lost by not facing them—we were obliged to recognize that in present circumstances the heads of the German and Italian Governments would almost certainly—at least not without preliminary discussion, for which there was no time—be reluctant to sit in conference with a Soviet representative.

But the fact that it was impossible if we were to talk to the German and Italian Governments in those days at all to include the Soviet Government directly in the conversations in no way signified any weakening of the desire on our part, any more no doubt than on that of the French Government, to preserve our understanding and relations with the Soviet Government.

* * *

The other matter on which I must speak is the guarantee referred to in the annex to the Munich agreement and which found a place in the Anglo-French proposals on September 19. There we said that his Majesty's Government would be prepared as a contribution to the pacification of Europe to join in an international guarantee of the new boundaries of Czechoslovakia against any unprovoked aggression. One of the principal parts of such a guarantee would be the safeguarding of the independence of Czechoslovakia by the substitution of a joint guarantee against unprovoked aggression in place of the existing treaties involving reciprocal obligations of a military character.

I understand and largely share what will be the feeling of many of your lordships as to the assumption by this country of a new and difficult commitment concerned, as it may be held, with something that is not a direct or vital interest of this country. I can anticipate from another quarter the criticism that a guarantee given at the very moment that existing treaty and Covenant obligations had failed to prevent the quasi-forcible disruption of the Czechoslovak State proclaimed by inference its own futility.

Both criticisms are weighty and must be met. As to the first, we felt that if we were, in conjunction with the French Government, to press the Czechoslovak Government to accept proposals so drastic as those which we thought it right to lay before them in the Anglo-French plan in order to preserve Europe as a whole from war, we were bound ourselves to make a counter-contribution to balance the reduction of Czechoslovakia's defensive strength. In no other circumstances, I think, could we have felt morally justified in pressing that Government to go so far.

Lastly the guarantee itself is reinforced and buttressed by two other vital elements. Germany and Italy have expressed their readiness to guarantee Czechoslovakia when the other minority questions have been settled; and, secondly, Great Britain and Germany have mutually expressed a desire to resolve any difficulties that may arise between them through consultation. In these circumstances I hope that your lordships will be prepared to take the view that we were right to feel a moral obligation to play our part in this guarantee even in face of the natural objection that we were taking on behalf of this country a new liability.

There are of course a great many questions connected with this guarantee that will require more careful consideration than it has yet been possible to give them. Such will be whether these forms should be joined up further, what States should be invited to assume those obligations, and the circumstances in which these obligations should be held to arise. These matters and possibly others will be matters for an early exchange of views between the several Governments concerned.

It must not be forgotten that, in the event of war, whatever forces the French, Russians, and we might have been willing to employ, nothing could have saved Czechoslovakia from devastation, or have protected many thousands of her sons and daughters from sudden death. We could, no doubt, have engaged in a war of indefinite duration, but if we had won no statesman drawing the boundaries of the new Czechoslovakia would have redrawn them as they were left by the Treaty of Versailles.

That brings me to the question of treaty revision for which Article 19 of the Covenant purported to make provision. I have said before that unless we can regard the world as being set in a mould rigid and unalterable we were bound to expect change—change that would always be right if justice and peace were all we sought. Yet we must in fairness admit that the provisions of Article 19 have not been made effective.

I do not underestimate the gravity of the events which in such swift passage have crowded one upon the other in the last few weeks. I am conscious of all that has to be added to the debit side, but if the whole matter is fairly weighed I cannot doubt, for Czechoslovakia herself as for the world, where the balance rests. And apart from the sheer avoidance of the catastrophe of war and all that would have meant for men and women and children of every nation that would sooner or later have been dragged to take a part in this dance of death, there are certain things of which we should be utterly wrong to underestimate the significance.

The mutual confidence between the French Government and ours, strong as it was before, emerges stronger from these days. Beyond that we have witnessed the emergence of forces more powerful than we expected to condemn resort to war. From every part of the world, led by the President of the U.S.A. and given constructive form in the response to the Prime Minister's request by Signor Mussolini, the moral point was made clear that, when brought to the very edge of disaster, the feelings of all nations, not only our own, have drawn back from the edge and shown faith in the power of negotiation.

Is it a small thing that the German and British Governments declare they will never permit war between one another and their determination to employ the method of consultation in any differences that may rest between them? No man, of course, can predict the future and no declaration can absolve a nation like ours from doing whatever is necessary to secure itself against all eventualities, and, indeed, one of the principal lessons of these events is that the diplomacy of any nation can only be commensurate with its strength and that if we desire this country to exercise its full influence in world affairs the first thing we have to do is to ensure that it is in all ways fully and rapidly equipped to do so. I have no doubt that at the appropriate time your lordships may wish to give fuller consideration to the issues involved in that principle.

There will, no doubt, be those people who will maintain that immediately to attach weight to such declarations as that to which the German Chancellor and the Prime Minister have set their names is to lay up for ourselves certain and disastrous disappointment. Time alone will show. I have never felt able to take the view of the inevitability of war which is perhaps very easily taken by those who are fortunate enough to have no final responsibility. He is a very rash man who would attempt to write history before the time. Rejoicings in all countries have shown how the people have acclaimed these results of the method of conference which brought them back from the very brink of war.

There has been in Germany a spontaneous outburst of public feeling. Herr Hitler has had a great triumph, and I for one would grudge him nothing of the triumph which he knows to be accorded not only for what he has gained but for the contribution which he made to settlement through agreement in preference to the arbitrament of catastrophic war. When I see in Munich not only a conference at which hard terms were imposed on Czechoslovakia but an occasion on which it was found possible by discussion to effect a real abatement in the claims made and in which all the nations taking part contributed to win a real victory for reason and understanding over the forces of unreason, hatred, and mistrust—there is not one of your lordships who will not hope that what has been done will prove only a beginning of more promising approach to other problems which may stand in the way of friendly and fruitful cooperation.

In the final sitting of the House of Commons on October 6th, the motion to approve Mr. Chamberlain's policy was adopted by 366 votes to 144, that is to say with a majority of 222 votes.

THE WORLD CHANGED BY MUNICH

FRANCE MUST TAKE ACCOUNT OF THE NEW SITUATION

Extract from M. Daladier's statement in the French Chamber on October 4th, 1938

In the course of the last few weeks, the world wondered with anguish whether it was not going to be plunged into war. Today, in rendering to you an account of our action, I can say that in this crisis we have saved the peace.

When our Government was formed, the Sudeten problem had already arisen. The realisation of the Anschluss had suddenly made it acute. The Czechoslovak Government had already announced the publication of a nationalities statute, and Herr Henlein formulated the demands of the Sudeten Germans in eight points.

The drama had begun. From the very first we have tried to prevent events from drawing us into the irreparable. At that time I publicly defined the position of my Government on various occasions. I said: "We are animated by two equally strong sentiments: the desire not to be forced into military action and the wish not to go back on our word if this hope was unfortunately disappointed."

In London M. Bonnet and I, at the end of April, informed the British Government of our anxiety and the manner in which we contemplated an appeasement in Central Europe. We were glad to note that the British Government were not indifferent to these problems. We together fixed the bases of cooperation. In our view we should not wait before taking action until the facts had been accomplished and until we had to suppress them with bloodshed or to submit to them with shame. We should rather forestall events and endeavour to prevent them.

We were therefore able to take common action immediately the crisis of May 21st arose, and I would remind you that that crisis was overcome thanks to the effective assistance rendered by the good will for peace of all the Powers concerned.

From the end of the month of May to the beginning of September there was a kind of international truce. But in the Sudeten area rising passions were preparing fresh events.

Then, in a spirit of friendship we advised the Czechoslovak Government to make considerable, just and rapid concessions to the Sudeten Germans within the framework of the State. The action of the British Government went parallel with our own. Lord Runciman's mission to Prague gave rise to a great hope by bringing about direct contact between the Czech statesmen and the leaders of the Sudeten Germans.

It should however be noted that the proposals of the Czech Government, which were constantly enlarged, and the claims of the Sudeten Germans, which constantly became more far-reaching, never synchronised.

At the beginning of September, after the closing speech of the Nuremberg congress, and Herr Henlein's announcement of the breaking off of negotiations between the Sudeten German delegates and the Government at Prague, the situation seemed for the first time to be irreparably compromised.

The German claim was violently affirmed. It was based on the people's right to self-determination. It was addressed to the popular conscience by means of the descriptions contained in the German press of the terror which was said to reign in the Sudeten districts.

Were the forces of war to be victorious over the forces of peace? I never thought for a moment of abandoning myself or my country to a blind fate which would have made the march of events independent of the will of man.

In the night from September 13th to 14th I got into touch with Mr. Neville Chamberlain. I told him that it was advisable to substitute direct meetings between the responsible men for the procedure of diplomatic steps and notes. The British Prime Minister, who also had the same feeling, proceeded to Berchtesgaden.

Through his conversation with Herr Hitler, Mr. Chamberlain was able to judge and estimate the extent of the German claims. On Sunday, September 18th, he informed us of his impressions and convictions. We met in London and discussed the question. We examined the maps. The British Government informed us of the opinions of Lord Runciman. I do not need to say with what emotion we learned that the British observer had sincerely concluded that it was impossible to make the Czechs and the Sudetens live together any longer, while all our efforts had been directed towards the evolution in Czechoslovakia of a federalism which would have ensured the integrity of the territory. But we had to face facts. We were faced by the following alternative: We had either to say "No!" to the German claims and thus force the Czech Government into an uncompromising attitude and the German Government into aggression and bring about an armed conflict which would have soon meant the destruction of Czechoslovakia. Or we could try to find a compromise. If the first hypothesis had proved correct, who could say that the integrity of Czechoslovakia would have been maintained after a terrible coalition war, even a victorious war? We have chosen peace.

The Franco-British plan of London was the result of that choice. But at the same time as we submitted painful proposals to Czechoslovakia, we gave her the undertaking of Great Britain to join with us in an international guarantee.

On leaving London we had the feeling that our plan would raise an indignant protest in Prague and would be accepted in Berlin. The Czech Government, with heroic devotion to the cause of peace, accepted the plan. But at Godesberg, Herr Hitler in his interview with Mr. Chamberlain and in his memorandum made fresh demands in the form of methods of application.

Thus the development of the negotiations towards a compromise, which had begun by the decision of Mr. Chamberlain and myself to bring about direct contact with the German Government, was checked in the night from September 23rd to 24th. During the days that followed Europe advanced hastily towards a rupture.

* * *

During these days of anguish, two main currents appeared in our country. Both were found within each party and within each tendency and it may even be said that, as events progressed, they fought for a place in the conscience of every Frenchman. Some placed their hope in negotiation, others in uncompromising firmness.

As for myself, as head of the Government, from the first minute I recognised in both movements the infallible instinct of the French people. I felt that truth lay in the synthesis of these two currents and not in their contradiction.

What the people of France desired was to avoid the irreparable. The irreparable was German aggression. That aggression, under the terms of the treaty, would have set the aid and assistance of France in motion. We should have asked you to meet the engagements of France.

In order not to be surprised by an act of violence, we decided, in view of the development of German preparations, to take a number of military measures which were not intended as a kind of provocation but which aimed at enabling the country to meet all eventualities. We took all steps for effective defence. Our military leaders placed our forces in a position to fulfil their supreme duty towards our country.

In London, where we again conferred with the British Government, General Gamelin gave technical details as to the measures we had taken and on those which circumstances might compel us to take.

Both British and French were decided as to their common desire for peace and their common desire to oppose an aggression.

On the evening of September 26th it was stated in an official press communiqué in London that, if Germany attacked Czechoslovakia, France would come to her assistance and that "Great Britain and Russia would certainly be at the side of France".

While the powerful, generous and reasonable voice of President Roosevelt issued an appeal for a pacific settlement from the United States, Mr. Neville Chamberlain, in complete agreement with ourselves, addressed a further communication to Chancellor Hitler.

On September 27th Sir Horace Wilson returned to London bringing the reply of the Führer. It left little scope or time for negotiation. In the House of Commons Mr. Chamberlain himself stated that the Chancellor had informed the British messenger that he was determined to act on the following day, September 28th, at 2 p.m.

We had only a few hours left. Mr. Chamberlain's broadcast speech warned the world of the seriousness of the situation. We resolved to make a last effort. In the night from the 27th to the 28th we asked our Ambassador in Berlin to request Chancellor Hitler for a personal audience and our Ambassador in London to request Lord Halifax to instruct the British Ambassador in Rome to ask Signor Mussolini to support the idea of convening a conference.

At 11.15 a.m. on September 28th M. François Poncet was received by Chancellor Hitler and, on behalf of the French Government, made definite proposals for immediate and practical application. Herr Hitler did not reject these suggestions, but reserved the right to give a written reply.

On his side, Mr. Chamberlain proposed a last effort for the meeting in Germany of the heads of Governments of the four great western Powers. M. Mussolini forcefully and successfully supported this request. He obtained a decisive result, namely the adjournment of German mobilisation for 24 hours.

* * *

Herr Hitler immediately issued invitations for the Munich meeting.

I accepted this invitation. It was not a case of entering into questions of procedure or formulating counter-proposals. It was a case of saving the peace which some people had thought was definitely destroyed. I said "Yes!" and I regret nothing. I should have preferred that all the Powers concerned should be present. But rapid action was necessary; the least delay might be fatal. Was not a frank conversation with Herr Hitler and Signor Mussolini of greater value than all the proposals or all the written discussions?

You are aware of the results of the Munich meeting, which was more in the nature of a useful conversation than a formal conference.

We have avoided recourse to force. There is no doubt whatever that we have brought about in four countries the plebiscite of peace. In view of the spontaneous warmth of the reception given in Berlin, Rome, London and Paris by the people of the four capitals to the heads of the four Governments, and the innumerable testimonies which reached them all from the towns and villages of their countries, how is it possible to doubt for a moment the immense relief felt by the people and their attachment to peace?

It was an effective victory of peace, a moral victory of peace; that is the first point which I wish to stress.

It was also a human victory, since the Munich agreement, thanks to mutual concessions and the good will of all, is a definite improvement on the Godesberg memorandum.

* * *

And now, gentlemen, why have we succeeded in stopping war at the very moment when it seemed ready to break out? Why, in view of the real sacrifices to which we have agreed, have we been able to place to our credit a certain number of guarantees and advantages no less real than I have just described to you?

Because, in these difficult negotiations, we have always shown our desire for justice and our loyalty. Because we have negotiated as men for whom the negotiations were not only an inevitable phase of this great international drama, but the veritable path of peace.

I must add immediately, with the same conviction, that if our negotiations have been successful we owe it above all to the fact that we based them on the manifestation of our strength. Let no one misunderstand me; I do not mean that our strength was a means of intimidation or pressure. It is impossible to think of intimidating Germany any more than of intimidating France. But to give proof of one's force is to place oneself in a position to discuss as between equals. It is only possible to discuss with a man or with a nation if one has first won his respect.

I felt the respect of Germany for France on my arrival at Munich.

Here I must render to the country the homage which is its due. At the first call, with admirable spontaneity in which seriousness took the place of the enthusiasm of former times, young troops and former combatants of the great war hastened to the colours and in a few hours reconstituted that insuperable barrier which has always protected the destiny of the fatherland. On our frontiers to which the soldiers came like a flood the population which would have had to suffer most accepted without a murmur the burdens of security placed upon them by the military authorities. I thank them in the name of France.

The respect that our country imposed during this time on all the nations surrounding it, that respect which is based on the memory of fights that have divided or united us, that respect which one ex-combatant can refuse to another ex-combatant whatever the colour of his uniform during the war, that respect which is always inspired by a nation that is both virile and pacific—it is our duty to feel that respect for the great nation that is our neighbour, that was our adversary and with which we desire to establish a durable peace.

No doubt our conceptions of life differ profoundly from those which inspire Germany and Italy today. But other countries whose conceptions are also different from ours live on good terms with us. Whatever political forms they have adopted, the peoples have an identical love of peace. The important matter at the present moment is to unite all the pacific good will that exists in the world. If I have just recalled the feelings which the people of France have for the people of Germany, and which many of my predecessors have stressed from this platform, that does not mean that we contemplate abandoning existing cooperation. There is no question of our substituting new friendships for old friendships. In the interest of peace we wish to add to these old and well-tried friendships the support of new or renewed friendships. I know that in this work we can count on the friendship of France and Great Britain, which recent events have made still more confident and active.

* * *

May I admit, Gentlemen, that the other day when I arrived at Le Bourget, in the midst of the spontaneous joy of the people of Paris, which corresponded to the joy of the peoples of Berlin, Rome and London, I could not help feeling a sort of uneasiness? It occurred to me that peace is not a definite conquest, but must be defended from day to day. I am, of course, sensitive to the expressions of joy of the people. But, as the head of the Government, I must only think of the future of the country. A peace that has been saved cannot be the signal of abandonment; on the contrary, it must mark a fresh advance of the energies of the nation.

I say with all the conviction of which I am capable that if the country was to give up, and if the maintenance of peace was merely a matter of carelessness for it, we should go rapidly towards an anxious future. For my part I cannot agree to lead France towards such a future. The most precious possession, and the one which permits of every hope, has been conserved for us. We have peace. Let us keep it and establish it on unshakable foundations.

It is possible that at Munich the world changed its appearance in the space of a few hours. France must respond to this new situation by having a new feeling of her duties.

The greatest crime towards the country would be to give polemics the preference over determination. I should perhaps be entitled more than anyone else to state what disturbed me during the last few weeks and what could endanger the efficacy of my action. I have the duty more than anyone else of setting an example. At the beginning of this statement I considered the two main currents that have traversed our country during this crisis as the convergent manifestations of one and the same will. I no longer wish to distinguish them from each other. They have mingled in that admirable movement which has caused all the sons of our country to join the colours whatever their social conditions, their beliefs and their particular convictions.

Now all Frenchmen who desire the salvation of France must consider themselves in a state of permanent mobilisation for the service of peace and of the fatherland. The first duty of everyone is to work with all his strength in the place that he occupies. We shall only maintain peace if our national production enables us to speak as equals with the peoples that surround us.

We shall only maintain peace if we have sound finances, and a balanced budget, and if we can count on all the resources of the nation.

We shall only maintain peace if we finally work out the bases of a general settlement, if we organise Europe and the world on new principles and if, after having avoided war in the centre of Europe, we push it back wherever it has broken out.

We shall only maintain peace if we consolidate the union of hearts and minds which have just been united in a common anguish. Anything that excites hatred, anything that opposes Frenchmen to Frenchmen, can in future only be considered as treason.

This country needs a moral transformation. It has been reunited for a few days around its mobilised forces; let that union not be frittered away in vain quarrels.

In order to bring this great task of restoration to a successful conclusion, the Government must be in a position to act. We have decided to ask you for the means of such action. It is for you to grant or to refuse such means. But know that the interest and very life of the fatherland is at stake.

On October 5th, 1938 a vote of confidence in M. Daladier was given in the Chamber by 535 votes to 75 (including 73 Communists).

THREE DECISIVE DOCUMENTS¹

The following three documents, extracted from the British White Book, really contain everything that was unfortunately not expressed in the above speeches. These speeches contain rich garlands for Dr. Benesh's Government and for its peace-loving, conciliatory attitude, and also regret for the hard fate that overtook the Government and the country. But one looks in vain for a single word regarding the twenty years of distress and suffering of the Sudeten Germans, the policy of oppression on the one hand and the dilatoriness and sabotage on the other hand which Prague carried on with every available means until the last days and even hours. Even on September 22nd, that is to say after the "unreserved" acceptance of the Franco-British proposals and before the Godesberg meeting, Dr. Benesh said on the Prague wireless: "We have adapted our attitude to the situation and I regard the further development without anxiety; for I have my plan and will not let myself be diverted from my path. Our people know that they must struggle and I repeat that I have a plan. Our political line is fixed and we will adapt it to the situation." This was the same attitude towards the latest development as had been observable during the months of negotiations with the Sudeten Germans, for which Dr. Benesh issued the slogan: "We will change not the spirit but the methods of our minorities policy." "Our President has a plan" was joyfully stated in the headlines of the Czech press, and these were followed by praise for the policy of plans carried on for years by which Dr. Benesh evaded a settlement of these burning problems. He thought he could still at the last moment continue this "planned" procedure by bringing in the Hague Court or some other conference, in which he could have brought into play the well-trying practice of procrastination so often used on the Geneva stage, with the inevitable result of withdrawing protection from the Sudeten Germans and endangering European peace. These three documents, therefore, throw a bright light on the justice of the demands put forward in the Godesberg memorandum.

Extract from Lord Runciman's Letter to Mr. Chamberlain on September 21st, 1938²

Lord Runciman first gives a short account of his mission and of his efforts until September 16th, the date on which he was made to realise that, in view of the development and of the increased tension between the Prague Government and the Sudeten Germans, his mission must be regarded as having failed. He concludes this part of his report with the view that the chief blame for the failure of the negotiations must be ascribed to the radical Sudeten leaders, and then continues as follows:

"I have much sympathy, however, with the Sudeten case. It is a hard thing to be ruled by an alien race; and I have been left with the impression that Czechoslovak rule in the Sudeten areas for the last 20 years, though not actively oppressive and certainly not "terroristic," has been marked by tactlessness, lack of understanding, petty intolerance and discrimination, to a point where the resentment of the German population was inevitably moving in the direction of revolt. The Sudeten Germans felt, too, that in the past they had been given many promises by the Czechoslovak Government, but that little or no action had followed these promises. This experience had induced an attitude of unveiled mistrust of the leading Czech statesmen. I cannot say how far this mistrust is merited or unmerited; but it certainly exists, with the result that, however conciliatory their statements, they inspire no confidence in the minds of the Sudeten population. Moreover, in the last elections of 1935 the Sudeten German party polled more votes than any other single party; and they actually formed the second largest party in the State Parliament. They then commanded some 44 votes in a total Parliament of 300. With subsequent accessions, they are now the largest party. But they can always be outvoted; and consequently some of them feel that constitutional action is useless for them.

Local irritations were added to these major grievances. Czech officials and Czech police, speaking little or no German, were appointed in large numbers to purely German districts; Czech agricultural colonists were encouraged to settle on land transferred under the Land Reform in the middle of German populations; for the children of these Czech invaders Czech schools were built on a large scale; there is a very general belief that Czech firms were favoured as against German firms in the allocation of State contracts and that the State provided work and relief for Czechs more readily than for Germans. I believe these complaints to be in the main justified. Even as late as the time of my mission, I could find no readiness on the part of the Czechoslovak Government to remedy them on anything like an adequate scale.

All these, and other, grievances were intensified by the reactions of the economic crisis on the Sudeten industries, which form so important a part of the life of the people. Not unnaturally, the Government were blamed for the resulting impoverishment.

For many reasons, therefore, including the above, the feeling among the Sudeten Germans until about three or four years ago was one of hopelessness. But the rise of Nazi Germany gave them new hope. I regard their turning for help towards their kinsmen and their eventual desire to join the Reich as a natural development in the circumstances.

At the time of my arrival the more moderate Sudeten leaders still desired a settlement within the frontiers of the Czechoslovak State. They realized what war would mean in the Sudeten area, which would itself be the main battlefield. Both nationally and internationally such a settlement would have been an easier solution than territorial transfer. I did my best to promote it, and up to a point with some success, but even so not without misgiving as to whether, when agreement was reached, it could ever be carried out without giving rise to a new crop of suspicions, controversies, accusations, and counter-accusations. I felt that any such arrangement would have been temporary, not lasting.

This solution, in the form of what is known as the "Fourth Plan," broke down in the circumstances narrated above; the whole situation, internal and external, had changed; and I felt that with this change my mission had come to an end.

Further, it has become self-evident to me that these frontier districts between Czechoslovakia and Germany where the Sudeten population is in an important majority should be given full right of self-determination at once. If some cession is inevitable, as I believe it to be, it is as well that it should be done promptly and without procrastination. There is real danger, even a danger of civil war, in the continuance of a state of uncertainty. Consequently there are very real reasons for a policy of immediate and drastic action. Any kind of plebiscite or referendum would, I believe, be a sheer formality in respect of these predominantly German areas. A very large majority of their inhabitants desire amalgamation with Germany. The inevitable delay involved in taking a plebiscite vote would only serve to excite popular feelings, with perhaps most dangerous results. I consider, therefore, that these frontier districts should at once be transferred from Czechoslovakia to Germany, and, further, that measures for their peaceful transfer, including the provision of safeguards for the population during the transfer period, should be arranged forthwith by agreement between the two Governments.

The transfer of these frontier districts does not, however, dispose finally of the question how Germans and Czechs are to live together peacefully in future. Even if all the areas where the Germans have a majority were transferred to Germany there would still remain in Czechoslovakia a large number of Germans, and in the areas transferred to Germany there would still be a certain number of Czechs. Economic connexions are so close that an absolute separation is not only undesirable but inconceivable; and I repeat my conviction that history has proved that in times of peace the two peoples can live together on friendly terms. I believe that it is in the interests of all Czechs and of all Germans alike that these friendly relations should be encouraged to re-establish themselves; and I am convinced that this is the real desire of the average Czech and German. They are alike in being honest, peaceable, hard-working, and frugal folk. When political friction has been removed on both sides, I believe that they can settle down quietly.

For those portions of the territory, therefore, where the German majority is not so important, I recommend that an effort be made to find a basis for local autonomy within the frontiers of the Czechoslovak Republic on the lines of the "Fourth Plan," modified so as to meet the new circumstances created by the transfer of the preponderantly German areas. As I have already said, there is always a danger that agreement reached in principle may lead to further divergencies in practice. But I think that in a more peaceful future this risk can be minimized.

This brings me to the political side of the problem, which is concerned with the question of the integrity and security of the Czechoslovak Republic, especially in relation to her immediate neighbours. I believe that here the problem is one of removing a centre of intense political friction from the middle of Europe. For this purpose it is necessary permanently to provide that the Czechoslovak State should live at peace with all her neighbours and that her policy, internal and external, should be directed to that end. Just as it is essential for the international position of Switzerland that her policy should be entirely neutral, so an analogous policy is necessary for Czechoslovakia—not only for her own future existence but for the peace of Europe.

In order to achieve this, I recommend:

(1) That those parties and persons in Czechoslovakia who have been deliberately encouraging a policy antagonistic to Czechoslovakia's neighbours should be forbidden by the Czechoslovak Government to continue their agitations; and that, if necessary, legal measures should be taken to bring such agitations to an end.

(2) That the Czechoslovak Government should so remodel her foreign relations as to give assurances to her neighbours that she will in no circumstances attack them or enter into any aggressive action against them arising from obligations to other States.

(3) That the principal Powers, acting in the interests of the peace of Europe, should give to Czechoslovakia guarantees of assistance in case of unprovoked aggression against her.

(4) That a commercial treaty on preferential terms should be negotiated between Germany and Czechoslovakia if this seems advantageous to the economic interests of the two countries.

This leads me on to the third question which lay within the scope of my inquiry—namely, the economic problem. This problem centres on the distress and unemployment in the Sudeten German areas, a distress which has persisted since 1930, and is due to various causes. It constitutes a suitable background for political discontent. It is a problem which exists; but to say that the Sudeten German question is entirely or even in the main an economic one is misleading. If a transfer of territory takes place, it is a problem which will for the most part fall to the German Government to solve.

If the policy which I have outlined above recommends itself to those immediately concerned in the present situation. I would further suggest: (a) That a representative of the Sudeten German people should have a permanent seat in the Czechoslovak Cabinet; (b) that a commission under a neutral chairman should be appointed to deal with the question of the delimitation of the area to be transferred to Germany, and also with controversial points immediately arising from the carrying out of any agreement which may be reached; (c) that an international force be organized to keep order in the districts which are to be transferred pending actual transfer, so that Czechoslovak State police, as I have said above, and also Czechoslovak troops, may be withdrawn from this area.

Hitler's Reply to Mr. Chamberlain on September 23th

Godesberg, Sept. 23, 1938.

A thorough examination of your letter, which reached me today, as well as the necessity of clearing up the situation definitely, lead me to make the following communication:

For nearly two decades the Germans, as well as the various other nationalities in Czechoslovakia, have been maltreated in the most unworthy manner, tortured, economically destroyed, and, above all, prevented from realising for themselves also the right of the nations to self-determination.

All attempts of the oppressed to change their lot failed in the face of the brutal will to destruction of the Czechs. The latter were in possession of the power of the State and did not hesitate to employ it ruthlessly and barbarically.

England and France have never made an endeavour to alter this situation. In my speech before the Reichstag of Feb. 22, I declared that the German Reich would take the initiative in putting an end to any further oppression of these Germans. I have in a further declaration during the Reich Party Congress given clear and unmistakable expression to this decision.

I recognise gratefully that at last, after 20 years, the British Government, represented by your Excellency, has now decided for its part also to undertake steps to put an end to a situation which from day to day, and, indeed, from hour to hour, is becoming more unbearable. For if formerly the behaviour of the Czechoslovak Government was brutal, it can only be described during recent weeks and days as madness.

The victims of this madness are innumerable Germans. In a few weeks the number of refugees who have been driven out has risen to over 120,000. This situation, as stated above, is unbearable, and will now be terminated by me.

Your Excellency assures me now that the principle of the transfer of the Sudeten territory to the Reich has, in principle, already been accepted. I regret to have to reply to your Excellency that as regards this point, the theoretical recognition of principles has also been formerly granted to us Germans.

In the year 1918, the Armistice was concluded on the basis of the 14 points of President Wilson, which in principle were recognised by all. They were, however, in practice broken in the most shameful way.

What interests me, your Excellency, is not recognition of the principle that this territory is to go to Germany, but solely the realisation of this principle, and the realisation which both puts an end in the shortest time to the sufferings of the unhappy victims of Czech tyranny, and at the same time corresponds to the dignity of a Great Power.

I can only emphasise to your Excellency that these Sudeten Germans are not coming back to the German Reich in virtue of the gracious or benevolent sympathy of other nations, but on the ground of their own will based on the right of self-determination of the nations, and of the irrevocable decision of the German Reich to give effect to this will.

It is, however, for a nation an unworthy demand to have this recognition made dependent on conditions which are not provided for in treaties nor are practical in view of the shortness of the time.

I have, with the best intentions and in order to give the Czech nation no justifiable cause for complaint, proposed—in the event of a peaceful solution—as the future frontier, that nationalities frontier which I am convinced represents a fair adjustment between the two racial groups, taking also into account the continued existence of large language islands.

I am, in addition, ready to allow plebiscites to be taken in the whole territory which will enable subsequent corrections to be made, in order—so far as it is possible—to meet the real will of the peoples concerned. I have undertaken to accept these corrections in advance.

I have, moreover, declared myself ready to allow this plebiscite to take place under the control either of international commissions or of a mixed German-Czech commission. I am finally ready, during the days of the plebiscite, to withdraw our troops from the most disputed frontier areas, subject to the condition that the Czechs do the same.

I am, however, not prepared to allow a territory which must be considered as belonging to Germany, on the ground of the will of the people and of the recognition granted even by the Czechs, to be left without the protection of the Reich. There is here no international power or agreement which would have the right to take precedence over German right.

The idea of being able to entrust to the Sudeten Germans alone the maintenance of order is practically impossible in consequence of the obstacles put in the way of their political organisation in the course of the last decade, and particularly in recent times. As much in the interest of the tortured, because defenceless, population as well as with regard to the duties and prestige of the Reich, it is impossible for us to refrain from giving immediate protection to this territory.

Your Excellency assures me that it is now impossible for you to propose such a plan to your own Government. May I assure you for my part that it is impossible for me to justify any other attitude to the German people. Since, for England, it is a question at most of political imponderables, whereas, for Germany, it is a question of primitive right of the security of more than 3,000,000 human beings and the national honour of a great people.

I fail to understand the observation of your Excellency that it would not be possible for the Czech Government to withdraw their forces so long as they were obliged to reckon with possible invasion, since precisely by means of this solution the grounds for any forcible action are to be removed.

Moreover, I cannot conceal from your Excellency that the great mistrust with which I am inspired leads me to believe that the acceptance of the principle of the transfer of Sudeten Germans to the Reich by the Czech Government is only given in the hope thereby to win time so as, by one means or another, to bring about a change in contradiction to this principle.

For if the proposal, that these territories are to belong to Germany is sincerely accepted, there is no ground to postpone the practical resolution of this principle. My knowledge of Czech practice in such matters over a period of long years compels me to assume the insincerity of Czech assurances so long as they are not implemented by practical proof.

The German Reich is, however, determined by one means or another to terminate these attempts, which have lasted for decades, to deny by dilatory methods the legal claims of oppressed peoples.

Moreover, the same attitude applies to the other nationalities in this State. They also are the victims of long oppression and violence. In their case, also, every assurance given hitherto has been broken. In their case, also, attempts have been made by dilatory dealing with their complaints or wishes to win time in order to be able to oppress them still more subsequently.

These nations, also, if they are to achieve their rights, will, sooner or later, have no alternative but to secure them for themselves. In any event, Germany, if—as it now appears to be the case—should find it impossible to have the clear rights of Germans in Czechoslovakia accepted by way of negotiation, is determined to exhaust the other possibilities which then alone remain open to her.

Hitlers Reply to Mr. Chamberlain of September 27th

Berlin, september 27th.

I have in the course of the conversations once more informed Sir Horace Wilson, who brought me your letter of Sept. 26, of my final attitude. I should like, however, to make the following written reply to certain details in your letter:

The Government in Prague feels justified in maintaining that the proposals in my memorandum of Sept. 23 went far beyond the concession which it made to the British and French Governments, and that the acceptance of the memorandum would rob Czechoslovakia of every guarantee for its national existence.

This statement is based on the argument that Czechoslovakia is to give up a great part of her prepared defensive system before she can take steps elsewhere for her military protection. Thereby the political and economic independence of the country is automatically abolished. Moreover, the exchange of population proposed by me would turn out in practice to be a panic-stricken flight.

I must openly declare that I cannot bring myself to understand these arguments or even admit that they can be regarded as seriously put forward.

The Government in Prague simply passes over the fact that the actual arrangement for the final settlement of the Sudeten German problem, in accordance with my proposals, will be made dependent not on a unilateral German petition or on German measures of force, but rather, on the one hand, on a free vote under no outside influence, and, on the other hand, to a very wide degree on German-Czech agreement on matters of detail to be reached subsequently.

Not only the exact definition of the territories in which the plebiscite is to take place, but the execution of the plebiscite and the delimitation of the frontier to be made on the basis of its result, are in accordance with my proposals to be met independently of any unilateral decision by Germany. Moreover, all other details are to be reserved for agreement on the part of a German-Czech commission.

In the light of this interpretation of my proposals and in the light of the cession of the Sudeten population areas, in fact agreed to by Czechoslovakia, the immediate occupation by German contingents demanded by me represents no more than a security measure which is intended to guarantee a quick and smooth achievement of the final settlement.

This security measure is indispensable. If the German Government renounced it and left the whole further treatment of the problem simply to normal negotiations with Czechoslovakia, the present unbearable circumstances in the Sudeten German territories which I described in my speech yesterday would continue to exist for a period the length of which cannot be foreseen.

The Czechoslovak Government would be completely in a position to drag out the negotiations on any point they liked, and thus to delay the final settlement. You will understand after everything that has passed that I cannot place such confidence in the assurances received from the Prague Government. The British Government also would surely not be in a position to dispose of this danger by any use of diplomatic pressure.

That Czechoslovakia should lose a part of her fortifications is naturally an unavoidable consequence of the cession of the Sudeten German territory agreed to by the Prague Government itself. If one were to wait for the entry into force of the final settlement in which Czechoslovakia had completed new fortifications in the territory which remained to her, it would doubtless last months and years.

But this is the only object of all the Czech objections. Above all, it is completely incorrect to maintain that Czechoslovakia in this manner would be crippled in her national existence or in her political and economic independence. It is clear from my memorandum that the German occupation would only extend to the given line, and that the final delimitation of the frontier would take place in accordance with the procedure which I have already described.

The Prague Government has no right to doubt that the German military measures would stop within these limits. If, nevertheless, it desires such a doubt to be taken into account the British and, if necessary, also the French Government can guarantee the quick fulfilment of my proposal.

I can, moreover, only refer to my speech yesterday in which I clearly declared that I regret the idea of any attack on Czechoslovak territory, and that under the condition which I laid down I am even ready to give a formal guarantee for the remainder of Czechoslovakia. There can, therefore, be not the slightest question whatsoever of a check to the independence of Czechoslovakia.

It is equally erroneous to talk of an economic rift. It is, on the contrary, a wellknown fact that Czechoslovakia after the cession of the Sudeten German territory would constitute a healthier and more unified economic organism than before.

If the Government in Prague finally evinces anxiety also in regard to the state of the Czech population in the territories to be occupied, I can only regard this with surprise. It can be sure that, on the German side, nothing whatever will occur which will preserve for those Czechs a similar fate to that which has befallen the Sudeten Germans consequent on the Czech measures.

In these circumstances, I must assume that the Government in Prague is only using a proposal for the occupation by German troops in order, by distorting the meaning and object of my proposal, to mobilise those forces in other countries, in particular in England and France, from which they hope to receive unreserved support for their aim and thus to achieve the possibility of a general warlike conflagration.

I must leave it to your judgment whether, in view of these facts, you consider that you should continue your effort, for which I should like to take this opportunity of once more sincerely thanking you, to spoil such manoeuvres and bring the Government in Prague to reason at the very last hour.

THE SETTLEMENT OF THE PROBLEMS OF THE NON-GERMAN ETHNICAL GROUPS IN CZECHOSLOVAKIA

The struggle of the Sudeten Germans for their national rights and their return to the Reich and the crisis in the Czechoslovak State occasioned thereby have inevitably had corresponding and natural repercussions among the other national groups after their vain attempts for decades to obtain the fulfilment of the promises made to them and the violations of Prague's treaty obligations over as long a period.

It can be a matter of surprise to no-one to-day that the mistakes and shortcomings implicit in these encroachments extending over so many years have now been avenged. Never before in history has the incapacity of a system of Government been more bitterly and unanimously condemned as has Prague's rule over foreign and even kindred populations; not only the Sudeten Germans, but also the Poles and the Hungarians and even the "State peoples" (Staatsvölker)—the Slovaks and Ruthenians—look back with feelings of contempt at the last 20 years, which they were asked to spend in the Czechoslovak Republic.

In the meantime, the world has come to realize that the solutions of Versailles, St. Germain and Trianon were blunders and that the only possible conclusion to be drawn from this, in view of the obligations assumed by the victors and later by the Czechs themselves—obligations which have not only not been honoured, but have been cynically violated, is, to deprive the Czechs of any claim to rule foreign national groups, to allow the latter to determine their own destiny, not only in the vital interests of these groups themselves, but also in order by the establishment of law and justice, to put an end to a state of affairs which had become intolerable for all concerned and whose maintenance could only have led to a catastrophe.

National-Socialist Germany, while of course primarily concerned here with its own people, respects and seeks in principle to further the rights of the other nations and national groups exposed to arbitrary treatment and persecution in the Moldau Republic and consequently takes the view that, apart from the liberation of the Germans, a general solution must be found capable of satisfying the legitimate demands of all others and thus converting what is at present an element of disturbance in Central Europe into a factor of tranquillity calculated to enable the nations to live together in peace to the benefit of all.

In our special issue (No. 17/18) we showed how, under the stimulus of Prague's so-called minorities policy, which became ever more intolerable as time went on, the nations and national groups affected formed a united front in self-defence, with a view in the first place to achieving what was then their object: namely, to obtain autonomy within the Czech State. This object was rendered nugatory by the tactics of procrastination and evasion employed by Prague in connection with the solution of the Sudeten German problem and the measures for the oppression and destruction of the German element which continued to be applied during the negotiations clearly showed that it was too late for any solution from within and that only by union with the German Reich—and that without delay—could a fresh civil war on the Spanish model, and consequently a European catastrophe, be avoided.

The Munich Agreement recognized this fact—not only in the case of the Sudeten Germans, but also in that of the Polish and Hungarian national groups, as appears from the Additional Declaration of the German and Italian Governments to the Agreement of September 29th, 1938, to the effect that they would associate themselves with the guarantee assured by France and Great Britain in respect of the future frontiers of the Czechoslovak State only after settlement of the question of the Polish and Hungarian minorities which, under the terms of the further Additional Declaration of the Four Powers, must be carried out within three months after the conclusion of the Agreement, or at the latest by December 29th, 1938.

It was therefore to be expected that, after the conclusion of the Munich Agreement, Poland and Hungary and also the Slovaks and Ruthenes (Carpathian Russians) would vigorously pursue their aims which, in the case of the first two, were no longer confined to autonomy, but were directed towards secession and reincorporation in their home countries.

THE CZECHO-POLISH DISPUTE CONCERNING TESCHEN

Poland acted with especial promptitude. The territory in question was in this instance a comparatively small one: the former Silesian County of Teschen situated on the other side of the Olza, whose Polish population is estimated in Poland at 200,000, while according to the Czech census it is only 80,000. Its main source of riches is its "black diamond fields" and, apart from the liberation of the Polish national group, its annexation adds to the strength of Poland—economically, strategically and politically.

The most important economic assets of the newly acquired Polish territories are to be found less in the predominantly agrarian district of Teschen itself than in the industrial area round Freistadt. It comprises the district of Karwin and Orlau, which, with its valuable household coal and first-rate foundry coke represented the most important metallurgical resources of Czechoslovakia and formed, together with the mining district of Zwinow-Witkovitz, an indivisible economic unit. The acquisition of this area gives Poland control of the coal and coke supply of Eastern Central Europe. Besides this industrial centre, the great foundries at Trzyniec, south of Teschen in the immediate vicinity of the Kaschau-Oderberg railway, have been incorporated in the Polish State. Further, the area between Oderberg and Jablunkau, now enclosed by the Polish frontiers, is of decisive importance from the point of view of communications. The main lines of the railway system of Eastern Central Europe intersect in this area, which forms the junction of the Hamburg-Oderberg and Leningrad-Oderberg lines, the point of departure for the railway lines to Budapest, Belgrade, Bucharest, Prague, Vienna and Trieste and the line connecting the Polish coalfields with the South and South-East. In this area is situated the Kaschau-Oderberg railway—the main line of communication between Czechia and Slovakia and hitherto a vital artery of the Czechoslovak State. Whosoever controls this area holds the key position of the highest importance from the point of view of communications. Its centre is at Oderberg—hitherto the largest railway station in Czechoslovakia, for which Poles and Czechs fought fiercely in 1918/1919. Oderberg is the gate through which the North and South-bound goods and transit traffic of a number of European States must pass and is one of the most important railway junctions of Eastern Central Europe.

This increase in economic power will naturally have political consequences. Poland's position in Southern Europe has been appreciably strengthened. Poland has in effect approached much nearer to the Danube area than appears from the geographical situation. The Polish eagle on the Jablunkau Pass may, after the elimination of Czechoslovakia as a political barrier, the practical liquidation of the Little Entente and the exclusion of Soviet Russian influence, gain in power of attraction. Poland may prove to be a factor to be reckoned with in the coming regroupment of South-Eastern Europe.

There is however a further reason for the steps taken by the Polish Government: the distrust with which Warsaw always regarded the alliance concluded between Prague and Moscow on May 16th, 1935—a distrust which even found expression in warnings addressed to Prague on the subject. This alliance, with its serious dangers for Europe and especially Southern and South-Eastern Europe, was regarded in the same light in Poland as in Germany.

* * *

The Polish Government, in the notes sent to Paris and London on September 20th and to Prague on September 22nd, drew attention to the Polish minority, as it was termed in the official communication. A semi-official communication stated more explicitly that the question was of the same nature as that of the Sudeten Germans and would have to be settled by the same methods. The sense in which that was to be understood was shown by the Polish note to Prague of September 30th which contained, among other things, a demand for the return of Teschen-Silesia by October 2nd. Prague capitulated and a Polish communiqué was issued on October 1st which read as follows:

"The Polish note of September 30th which contained inter alia the Polish Government's demands in regard to the return of Teschen-Silesia, was to-day accepted in toto by the Government of the Czechoslovak Republic. In accordance with the text of the Polish note, the territory of Teschen will be handed over to the Polish military authorities by 2 p.m. on October 2nd. The evacuation and transfer of the districts of Teschen and Freistadt will be effected within ten days.

The delimitation of the other territories and the procedure to be adopted for the plebiscite in those territories and the financial settlements involved will be dealt with by negotiation with the Czechoslovak Government. That Government will immediately take steps to release the Poles serving in the Czechoslovak army and to liberate political prisoners of Polish nationality.

The Polish Government has noted with great satisfaction the termination of a painful conflict between two nations, which has found a peaceful solution in accordance with the peaceable intentions of the Polish nation."

* * *

In the early afternoon of Sunday October 2nd, 1938, while the German troops were entering the liberated Sudetenland to the acclamations of the population, the two representatives—the Polish General Malinowski and the Czech General Hrabzsyk, who had met on the bridge over the Olza at Teschen, were preparing for the entry of the Polish forces into the territory of the former Duchy, which followed immediately afterwards. In conjunction with the political defeat of Prague accomplished by Adolf Hitler after a dispute which shook all Europe for a week, Poland was enabled by independent and determined action to achieve the object demanded ever more impetuously by the Polish people: the union with Poland of "Silesia beyond the Olza".

The chief credit for this development is due to the Polish Foreign Minister, Colonel Beck, who was not only decorated with the highest Polish order by the President of the State Moscicki, but was for the first time surrounded by a cheering throng of people outside the Brühl Palace, the President's residence in Warsaw. The time is over when such things as the dispute over the Westerplatte in Danzig in March 1933 caused Poland seriously to entertain the idea of a war of intervention against Germany, after which, in view of the vacillating attitude of France, Marshal Pilsudski swung the rudder round and piloted the Polish ship of State into the harbour of agreement with Germany. Colonel Beck long since foresaw the present position and adapted Poland's attitude thereto. He refused to listen to the blandishments of Moscow or to allow his French ally to commit him to helping Czechoslovakia. As for the warnings uttered in regard to Moscow's obligations arising out of her alliance with the Moldau Republic, he was convinced that the Soviet Union was neither able nor willing to fight and when, shortly before Poland's action, the Soviet sent a note in which it threatened to denounce the Russo-Polish Pact of Non-Aggression and to intervene if Poland marched into Czechoslovakia, he administered a sharp rebuke to Moscow.

We will close this section with an historical reminiscence. When the Conference of Ambassadors sanctioned the theft of Teschen on July 28th, 1920, the National Council of Teschen coined the phrase: "history will one day pronounce judgement on this deed." The judgement has now been pronounced. In the case of Teschen also, the wrongheaded policy of Prague did everything possible to hasten and facilitate the pronouncement of this judgement and the resultant act of repatriation.

The Theft of Teschen twenty years ago

The little province of Teschen was part of Silesia, which had belonged to Poland since the 10th century. In the 11th century several principalities, including the Principality of Teschen, came into being in Silesia as a result of the splitting up of territory for dynastic reasons, but all these principalities remained part of the Polish Kingdom. Not until the 14th century did the Principality of Teschen go to the Bohemian Crown. The relationship was however purely dynastic and the population remained Polish and continued to foster its national culture. After the seven years war, the Principality of Teschen and the province of Troppau remained with Austria and formed a special 'Crown Land' which had nothing in common with the Kingdom of Bohemia. During the Austrian period, Teschen sent Polish deputies to the Vienna Parliament. At that time, the Czechs showed no interest in Teschen.

On May 16th and 17th, 1918—during the world war—a conference of delegates of the Polish and Czech deputies to the Vienna Parliament was held in Prague to negotiate on the question of the future Polish-Czech frontier. It was agreed that this frontier should run between the territories settled with Poles and Czechs. The Polish communes were to be included in Poland and the Czech communes in the future Czechoslovakia. The disposal of the mixed communes was to be decided by a Czech-Polish commission. It should be mentioned that, during these negotiations, the Czechs never invoked the so-called historic right to Teschen of the Crown of St Wenceslas.

The Prague Agreement was however broken by the Czechs a few months later when, behind the backs and without the knowledge of the Poles, they pressed the Allied Powers to allocate to them the whole of the Province of Teschen. An agreement was concluded between France and the Czech National Council on September 28th, 1918 under the terms of which France promised the Czechs to assist them in regaining their freedom and establishing an independent Czechoslovak State within the limits of its old historic frontiers.

No-one in Poland was aware of this first breach of faith on the part of the Czechs. On October 12th, 1918 the representatives of all political parties and organisations met at Teschen and passed a resolution in which they declared in favour of union with Poland.

After the Emperor Charles' manifesto of October 16th, 1918 a National Council was formed in Teschen, with three Polish deputies to the Vienna Parliament at its head. On October 27th, 1918 this National Council summoned a Popular Assembly in Teschen, which was attended by 40,000 people, and passed another resolution demanding the unconditional surrender of the Principality of Teschen to Poland.

When on October 30th, 1918 the Heads of Communes (Ge-meinevorsteher) placed themselves under the National Council, the Austrian civil and military authorities also entrusted the National Council with the conduct of administrative affairs. It is true that in the district of Freistadt the Czechs endeavoured to seize power, but they were prevented from doing so by the Polish population. The Poles, who regarded themselves as bound by the Prague Agreement of May 18th, 1918, would not submit to the Czechs. Negotiations were held between the National Council and the representatives of the Czech population, which resulted in the conclusion at Polnisch-Ostrau on November 15th, 1918 of an agreement providing for the division of the Province subject to the consent of the Governments in Warsaw and Prague. Under the Agreement, Poland was allotted a territory of 1762 square kilometres and a population of 293,661. This population was composed, according to the Austrian census of 1910, of 207,092 Poles, 63,418 Germans and 16,433 Czechs. The Czechs obtained 519 square kilometres and a population of 141,160 : 99,171 Czechs, 26,750 Poles and 13,498 Germans.

This Agreement was noted by the Warsaw Government, and by the Narodny Vyor Ceskoslovenski, the provisional Czechoslovak Government in Prague. On November 28th, 1918, the Province was divided by a decree of the Warsaw Government into three electoral districts. The elections were to be held on January 26th, 1919.

That sufficed to make the Czechs suddenly to remember their so-called historic rights to the Province of Teschen. On December 7th, 1918, the Narodny Vyor suddenly declared that the whole of Teschen should be placed under the Prague Government and invoked in this connection the Franco-Czech Agreement of September 28th, 1918. On December 12th, the Czechs informed the Polish National Council that the Agreement of November 15th, 1918 was null and void, as, though binding upon the Narodny Vyor, it was not binding upon the Czech Government. We see how, here also, the same methods were employed as those whereby the Czechs declared the Czechoslovak Treaty of Pittsburgh invalid.

In the meantime the Czechs were preparing for the military invasion of Teschen. Poland was at that time in an extremely difficult military position, as all her available troops were fighting on her Eastern frontiers against the Bolshevik menace. In Teschen, there were only small forces of police and volunteers. In order to give their acts the semblance of legality, the Czechs endeavoured to get the Allies present in the territory, and especially French officers of the Inter-Allied Commission, on their side, which they somehow or other managed to do. On January 23rd, 1919 a Czech Colonel in French uniform went to the Polish military authorities in Teschen and demanded, in the name of the Allied Powers, that the territory of Teschen should be evacuated. When the Polish Commandant declined to act on his own responsibility, he was given two hours in which to confer with the Warsaw Government, whose reply was in the negative. The Czechs advanced even before the period of two hours had elapsed. These Czech troops were commanded by the French Colonel Gillain and other Allied officers. In spite of the intervention of the Commandant of the Allied Military Mission, General Barthelemy, who does not seem to have taken a very strong line, the Czechs crossed the Polish frontier at Oderberg at 1 p.m. on January 23rd with 16 battalions, the Poles having only two battalions available altogether. The battles, which lasted for a few days, terminated on January 30th at Skocow, where the Poles managed to hold up the Czech march. It was however impossible to take advantage of this success, as the Poles were unable to send any reinforcements to the new critical front. In any case the attitude adopted by the Allied Powers would have precluded this. Poland consequently agreed to a truce, under the terms of which the Czechs were required to evacuate part of the territory occupied by them. There were long drawn-out negotiations and various agreements, which were broken or rendered unworkable one after the other by the Czechs. Even the intervention of an inter-allied commission, which was entrusted with the settlement of the dispute, was unsuccessful. The Commission showed some understanding of the real conditions in the territory, but the Czechs, who were always backed up by the French members, rendered any arrangement impossible and opposed all the decisions of the Commission. On May 7th, 1919, the Polish representative to the Allied Commission Zamorski, protested against the systematic violation of the Agreements by the Czechs.

Finally, there was the Czecho-Polish conference at Cracow, which began on July 20th, 1919. The Poles demanded a plebiscite in the disputed area. This was opposed by the Czechs and the negotiations had to be broken off on July 28th, so that the question was referred once more to the Peace Conference. The overwhelming majority of the International Commission—England, Italy, Japan and the United States—proposed a solution approximating to an earlier decision, but France desired a solution more favourable to the Czechs and opposed the decision. Consequently, the Interallied Commission had to prepara fresh report proposing a plebiscite for the territory of Teschen. The Supreme Council finally adopted this proposal and decided accordingly that the plebiscite should be held on September 27th, 1919. A plebiscite commission was appointed, whose French chairman, Count Mannerville, turned out later to be extremely biased in favour of the Czechs. The Plebiscite Commission, which was composed of new members who had little knowledge of local conditions, played fast and loose in Teschen and did whatever the Czechs wanted. Consequently disturbances were constantly breaking out and were brutally suppressed by the Czech gendarmerie, which was retained in the country in violation of the agreements and the resolutions of the Supreme Council. On May 19th, 1920, the Commission proclaimed a state of emergency and set up military courts throughout the territory of Teschen. The Poles realized that there could in the circumstances be no question of a fair plebiscite and agreed to submit the dispute to a court of arbitration. Benes agreed and even declared himself satisfied with the person of the arbitrator. That was at the time of the Polish victories in the East and of the Polish occupation of Kiev and when, some weeks later, the fortunes of war were reversed, Prague again broke its word and withdrew its agreement to arbitration.

Poland's military position appreciably deteriorated and the Warsaw Government appealed to the Allied Powers for assistance and, in July 1920, representatives of the Allied Powers went to Spa to discuss the question. As a condition of such assistance however the Poles were required to submit to the decisions of the Supreme Council in the matter of the delimitation of their frontiers. The assistance of the Allied Powers, who took their obligations no more seriously than the Czechs, was for the most part conspicuous by its absence, as the few ammunition convoys to Poland were held up by the Czechs. The French attitude towards these treacherous proceedings was so mild that Prague saw no reason to revise its policy.

Then followed the verdict of the Conference of Ambassadors on July 28th, 1920. The province of Teschen was arbitrarily divided. Over half the territory—that is, 1270 square kilometres with 293,380 inhabitants, including all pits and factory plant—was allocated to the Czechs. Even the mountainous district of Jablonkow, in which, according to the Austrian census of 1910, there were 153 Czechs, was separated from Poland for strategic and transport reasons. 200,000 inhabitants of Teschen, who had for centuries proclaimed their racial connection with Poland not only by words but also by deeds, were deprived of the right of self-determination and handed over to the Czechs.

* * *

We will not describe in detail the twenty years of purgatory endured by the Teschen Poles. Here also, the Czechs have for the last two decades pursued their policy of czechification à outrance and employed the same methods as against the Sudeten Germans.

THE AUTONOMY OF THE SLOVAKS AND RUTHENES

Prague decided to accord full autonomy within the Republic to the Slovaks and Ruthenes (Ukrainians and Carpathian Russians) almost as promptly as it made up its mind to accede to the Sudeten and Polish demands.

The understanding with the Slovaks was reached on October 7th after negotiations between the representatives of the various Slovak parties at Ziliana on October 6th, which led to a joint declaration calling for the promulgation by October 28th at the latest of a constitutional law providing for the autonomy of Slovakia and conforming to a draft text which was also decided upon: Prague not only appointed a number of new Slovak ministers to posts in the Central Government, but also established a Government of Slovakia and appointed the Minister Dr Tiso as its Head. As the tragedy of fate would have it, the indefatigable champion of Slovak autonomy, the aged Father Hlinka, was called to his rest only a few months before and so was never to see the fruits of his twenty years struggle for the fulfilment of the Pittsburgh Agreement.

* * *

On October 11th, Prague also accepted the demands for autonomy drafted by the Ruthenes on October 8th at Ungvar (Uzhorod) on the Slovak model and set up a Government of Sub-Carpathian Ruthenia, whose Head, M. Brody, has, as a result of differences over the Hungarian question, since been deprived of his office and replaced by Father Volosin.

Here again, a long-standing injustice has been remedied. The Czechs had based their claim to Carpathian Ruthenia on various arguments. This territory, which had been oppressed by the Hungarians must on no account go back to Hungary, nor could it be annexed by Poland, as it was not known if the latter would include Eastern Galicia. Carpathian Ruthenia should form a convenient corridor between Czechoslovakia and Rumania (to complete the encirclement of Hungary) as also between Czechoslovakia and Russia or the Ukraine in the event of a rising by the last-named. The inclusion of Eastern Galicia in Poland upset the latter calculation and the Czechs finally took their stand on the decision of a "rada"—a meeting of Ruthenes at Presov which demanded the inclusion of the territory in Czechoslovakia under certain conditions. They forgot however to mention that, at about the same time, three "radas" had been held, one of which, at Huszt, demanded unconditional incorporation in the Ukraine, while that held at Ungvar (Uzhorod) demanded the maintenance of Hungarian Sovereignty. Not only was the meeting at Presov the least well attended, but it was held on Slovak territory and under the protection of Czech troops.

It is a matter of common knowledge that Masaryk's propaganda in the United States during the war was addressed to the Ruthenes among others and that the Agreement of Seranton was concluded in November 1918 with the Ruthenes living in America—an agreement analogous to the Pittsburgh Agreement, which was regarded by the Entente as the expression of a desire for the voluntary inclusion of the "autonomous Ruthene territory" in the Czechoslovak Republic on a federalist basis. Indeed, the separation of this territory from Hungary was effected on that basis. Articles 19-23 of the Czechoslovak Minorities Agreement dealt with that territory, though the claims of the Ruthenes were—already there—considerably whittled down. There was no mention of a State, but only of an autonomous unit, whose linguistic, religious, material and administrative autonomy was guaranteed under the authority of a Governor who, though responsible to the Ruthenian Diet, was appointed by the President of the State. The Ruthenes have in fact never received this autonomy. The Prague Government put off granting it again and again on all conceivable and conflicting pretexts: first it was said that the Ruthenes were not yet ripe for it or sufficiently cultured to be able to govern themselves, which was in flat contradiction to the Czech statements at the Peace Conference; then it was said that the Ruthenian Parliament could not be formed, because that province had not yet been finally delimited. When however the Ruthenians demanded its delimitation, Prague replied that it could only be carried out by the future Ruthenian Parliament. In short, the Prague Government employed the same methods against the Ruthenes as against the other foreign national groups. Time after time, public opinion was skilfully kept in ignorance of the claims and complaints of the Ruthenes, by means of a strict official censorship. This is, be it remembered, a territory of approximately 650 square kilometres and a population (in 1920) of over 600,000; of whom 62% are Ruthenes, 18% Hungarians, 3% Slovaks, 2% Germans, 2% Poles and, according to Czech statistics, 13% Jews.

THE HUNGARIAN CLAIMS

Hungary's Hardest Period

The Dictated Peace of Trianon and the Injustice of 1919-1920

1. The « Peace » Negotiations of Trianon.

In his work entitled "The Truth about the Preliminary Discussions of the Treaty of Trianon", Dr. Stephan Czako writes:

"The Great Powers, having concentrated their efforts on preparing the Treaty of Versailles, the Treaty of Trianon did not receive from them all the attention which it deserved. It is regrettable that, while the Great Powers were engaged in the work of the treaty to be concluded with the German Empire, the preparation of the conditions of peace with Hungary was literally taken over by the States adjoining Hungary. These States, which were closely concerned, raised their voices very high and took upon themselves a leading role in this work. Instead of thinking about the future peace of Europe, these States endeavoured to take as large portions as possible from the former Austro-Hungarian monarchy.

Of all the representatives of the succession States interested in dividing up the Danube Monarchy, the founders of the newly constituted Czech Republic were the most active and attached themselves faithfully to the theory propounded by the active propaganda of Mr. Benesh even before the War, the slogan of which was "Destroy Austria-Hungary".

The former monarchy has been effectively destroyed, and with it pre-War Hungary. In addition, it is a well known fact that Hungary, despoiled and abandoned among the countries of Europe, was at grips with the Bolshevik revolution immediately after the armistice."

It is indeed a well known fact that Count Karolyi, who was in power at the time of the armistice and on the arrival in Hungary of the troops of Franchet d'Esperey, ordered the Hungarian troops to retire and sink their arms, either because he relied on the promises of the Entente or because he pursued a personal ambition. "I do not want to see any more soldiers", he cried. Thus enormous territories the fate of which was not yet decided were evacuated in advance without any possibility of reconquering them. This position was henceforward not unconnected with the excessive claims of the three neighbours of Hungary which refused to leave once these territories had been occupied. It was the moment that Karolyi chose to hand over the power to Bela Kun.

In David Hunter-Miller's work entitled "My Diary at the Conference of Paris with Documents"—a valuable source for historians since it represents the first publication of the details of the negotiations, in 22 volumes, on the basis of stenographic notes—we find on page 304 of Volume IV information which tells us a good deal about the technique and the strict "punctuality" which presided over the preparatory work. There is a facsimile of a letter addressed by one of the principal delegates to Mr. Hunter-Miller. On a scrap of crumpled and partly torn paper an illegible scribble tells Mr. Hunter-Miller of certain rectifications to be made in the Hungarian frontiers. On page 338 of the same volume we find a similar scribble on a piece of paper like those used by waiters in restaurants for making out their bills. This piece of paper contained nothing other than an improvised drawing in pencil showing to what State the three Hungarian comitats of Torontal, Temes and Krasso-Szöreny should henceforward belong. These documents are sufficiently revealing; they show how carelessly the delegates scribbled on paper, without knowing the local conditions, geographical facts, the ethnographic and economic problems of the territories and populations whose fate and future existence depended on their decisions.

In his volume "Les Coupables", written in 1935, Henri Pozzi observes:

"The Conference of Trianon—in which Wilson, who was already suffering the first effects of the psycho-physiological failing which was to remove him before his time, refused to listen to Lansing and gave carte blanche to Colonel House, in which Clemenceau did not know the first word of the problems which the Conference was called upon to solve⁽¹⁾, in which Lloyd George and the Italians with all the overseas plenipotentiaries were the dupes of faked documentation⁽²⁾—the Conference gave Benesh everything he asked for without discussion.

In view of the immensity of the general report drawn up by the Chairman of the sub-committee, André Tardieu, the enormous mass of statistics, comparative returns, maps, investigations, graphs, memoranda, minutes, petitions and documents of all kinds which accompanied it, all those who were perturbed by the precipitation and the kitchen smells which they were requested to taste and approve, recoiled in terror.

Any checking or control would have been impossible. The task would have been superhuman.

This was what André Tardieu and his Slav associates counted on. Any discussion or rectification was thus avoided."

The most important of the evidence given by the notes of Mr. Hunter-Miller is the definite fact that in the meetings of the Delimitation Committee and the Supreme Council the territorial clauses of the future Treaty of Trianon were drafted in their final form at the beginning

(1) "He (Clemenceau) has no ideas regarding the future of Central Europe.... he knows little of the great questions and nothing of the files...." (R. Poincaré: "Victoire et Armistice", pp. 399 and 68.)

(2) All the documentary material supplied to us by certain of our Allies during the peace negotiations was mendacious and faked. We came to decisions on forgeries... (Lloyd George: Speech at Queen's Hall.)

of May. On the other hand it was only on December 1st, 1919 that the Supreme Council of the Allied and Associated Powers invited the Hungarian Government to send its delegates to Neuilly furnished with the necessary powers to conclude peace. As a result of this invitation, the members of the Hungarian peace delegation, with Count Albert Apponyi at their head, proceeded at the beginning of the year 1920 to Neuilly, where the peace conditions were handed to them on January 15th, 1920.

The Hungarian delegation addressed a large number of notes to the Conference containing all the details of the questions involved and representing a vast scientific value. The Conference gave its reply to the Hungarian notes on May 6th, 1920, and this reply was accompanied by the famous covering letter of M. Millerand. More than a year had thus elapsed between the day when the decisions were taken at the Quai d'Orsay, without Hungary being heard, and the date of the signature of the Treaty of Trianon on June 4th, 1920. From the meetings of the sub-committees, that is to say from January 1919, until the date of M. Millerand's covering letter (May 6th, 1920) there was time enough to study the Hungarian point of view. Mr. Hunter-Miller's notes show almost minute by minute that everything would have been useless. At Trianon the Hungarian delegation was presented with a "chose jugée" which it would in no case have had the means of modifying. In the drawing rooms of the Quai d'Orsay, M. Benesh and his friends succeeded in getting the Great Powers to accept resolutions without appeal, which could no longer be shaken by the arguments of the Hungarian delegation. The Hungarian delegation could only do one thing: sign.

But Mr. Hunter-Miller's notes also now show the meaning of M. Millerand's covering letter and fully explain it. When it is realised that the decisions taken at the Quai d'Orsay were without appeal, the tenour of M. Millerand's covering letter can cause no surprise whatever. It is also not surprising to note that the signatures under the Treaty of Trianon on the part of the Great Powers do not include any of the persons who took part in the discussion of the Hungarian problem at the Quai d'Orsay. Instead of President Wilson, who had in the meantime returned to his country where he was moreover openly disavowed, and instead of Mr. Lloyd George, M. Clemenceau and the other principal delegates, the ambassadors of the Great Powers in Paris sat round the table at which the Succession States were on the other hand represented by the same persons who had taken part eighteen months earlier in the discussions behind closed doors at the Quai d'Orsay. Mr. Wilson left before the great victory of his life, the triumph of his fourteen points, had been sealed. But as for MM. Benesh, Titulescu, Pashitch and company, they persevered to the end. It was as if they had felt that this peace was really their work. Mr. Hunter-Miller's notes show very clearly the share of the responsibility assumed by M. Benesh and his colleagues.

Mr. Hunter-Miller, the first of memorialists, shows us the modern technique of applied immorality, by means of which a mortal wound was inflicted not only on the accused who had never been heard, but also on universal moral order.

The accounts of the American diplomat show amply on several occasions that the committees of the Peace Conference decided more than once in the space of a few minutes the fate of territories with thousands of years of history and the destinies of several million people, without blinking an eyelid and without showing the slightest scruple."

* * *

While it is correct to state that the Czech delegation did not obtain all the territory which it claimed, nevertheless:

1. Hungary, which comprised 21 million inhabitants before the War, including Croatia-Slavonia, and 18 ½ millions without that territory, was reduced to 8 millions, while the Hungarians (Magyars) are a people of nearly 11 million.

2. Out of 10 ½ million inhabitants thus taken away from Hungary proper, there are more than 3 million pure Hungarians.

3. Hungary thus lost a third of her Magyars.

4. Each of the Hungarian territories annexed to neighbouring States comprises 30 % of Hungarians.

5. If we consider the whole of the territories removed from Hungary, less Croatia-Slavonia which was already autonomous in 1914, it will be seen that out of the total of 10 ½ million inhabitants which they contain, the Magyars are the most numerous, namely 3,300,000; after them come the Roumanians with 2,900,000, the Slovaks with 1,800,000, the Germans with 1,500,000, the Yugoslavs with 750,000 and the Ruthenes with 400,000.

6. Former Hungary comprised 54 ½ % of Hungarians (i.e. an absolute majority) and 10 ½ % of Germans, making a total of 65 %; there were therefore only 35 % of other races. In admitting that, in cases where the frontier could not be drawn on an ethnical basis on account of its complexity, sacrifices would be compensated on both sides, an equitable compromise should therefore have removed only 35 % of the inhabitants from Hungary. But the Treaty of Trianon removed 63 % or nearly double. Instead of being reduced by a third Hungary was reduced by two-thirds.

7. But, of these 3 million Hungarians annexed to neighbouring States, nearly two millions could have escaped from foreign domination without any kind of geographical difficulty because they are in direct contact with the Hungary of Trianon.

8. In order to destroy a Hungary in which the Hungarians formed 55 %, a territory in which there are only 48 % of Slovaks was transferred to Czechoslovakia, together with a compact block of 813,000 Hungarians in a zone in direct contact with Hungary along the entire frontier in which they form 90 % of the population, making a total of 3,568,000 inhabitants of which there are 1,865,000 (52 %) Hungarians, Germans and Ruthenes (1,072,000 Hungarians).

9. A plebiscite would never have sanctioned such transfers. The only plebiscite which took place, in a small district with a majority of foreign races, on the contrary confirmed the Hungarian desire of the population.

10. Even by waiving the plebiscite, which would possibly have given back to Hungary certain districts with other races whose interests gravitate towards her because they are too much separated economically and geographically from their national centre (Ruthenes, Eastern Slovaks, Bihar Roumanians), even by confining oneself to the ethnical limits of the compact block of Hungarian population, the rectification would give back to Hungary all round the new frontier—except on the side of Austria, on the Drave and on two or three points of the Roumanian frontier—a strip of territory of a width varying from 15 to 70 kilometres including in present Czechoslovakia the towns of Pressburg, Nyitra, Liva, Losanc, Rimaszomlab, Rozsny, Kassa, Ungva and Munkacs. This northern strip, if returned to Hungary, would indeed remove 1,000,000 inhabitants from Czechoslovakia (7 ½ % of the population), but hardly as much as 50,000 Slovaks, or less than 3 % of all the Slovaks.

The Peace Conference not only very frequently confused the peoples' right of self-determination; it also to a great extent distorted the very principle of nationality for economic or strategic reasons, by taking away strips of territory from the compact Magyar block and granting them to neighbouring States. These strips of territory, when added together, form an imposing total. These two mistakes have been combined. In other words, not only does the new frontier not coincide with that which would have been fixed by a plebiscite, but it also does not coincide with the language limit; it goes beyond this and forms a third and more internal line. It leaves outside Hungary a first zone of Hungarian territories, then a zone of territories of other races whose interests are so closely connected with Hungary that there would have been no doubt of their decision if they had been consulted. It is therefore based neither on ethnography, nor on the sentiments of the population, nor on their interests—of which moreover they are the only judges. This is the case in particular with the inhabitants of the western border of the Transylvanian Alps, which are already in the Hungarian plain, with the Ruthenes of the Southern Carpathians, and with a majority of the Eastern Slovaks, to the east of the Tatra, inhabitants of the valleys running into the upper Theiss.

In short, in the first place a secular geographic and economic unit was destroyed, namely pre-War Hungary, the Carpatho-Danubian basin, of which all the waterways except two converged towards the plain of the middle Danube and of which all the frontiers except in the east were clearly traced by nature, i.e. the chain of the Carpathians, the lower Danube, the Drave; the unity of this territory is immediately evident to anyone who glances at the physical map of Europe. In the second place, having thus created artificial and economically untenable political units, an attempt was made to catch up with nature and to enlarge these units in order to confer on them their geographical justification; the economic structure which had been destroyed on a large scale was re-formed on a small scale and the injustice of these frontiers was further exaggerated in order to give them a local economic value; Czechoslovakia was given as a "strategical frontier" the bank of the Danube and the Ipoly, while Bohemia belongs to the Elbe basin and the Slovaks themselves nowhere go as far as the Danube, the two banks of which are German above Pressburg and Hungarian below. These arbitrary frontiers were thus pushed further than arbitrary demands, in order to gain beyond them a new natural frontier.

2. The Czecho-Yugoslav Corridor.

However enormous his victory was, Benesh considered however that the essential had escaped him.

On November 6th 1918, he quoted in the "Times" the very terms of Masaryk's memorandum and renewed the demand of the Czechs for a "Corridor" which would give a direct connection through the ruins of former Hungary for the Slavs of Czechoslovakia and the Slavs of Yugoslavia and would realise the dream for which Sazonov, Izvolski and Tsarist Russia had started the War.

On December 7th Masaryk was received by M. Raymond Poincaré and pleaded the cause of the "corridor" with him. Masaryk, who had been warned by Tardieu of the sentiments of Poincaré who was in favour of maintaining an Austrian State to balance Prussianised Germany, was moreover extremely cautious and merely spoke in general terms.

A few weeks later, on January 13th and 27th 1919 in the Subcommittee for settling the fate of the Austro-Hungarian peoples, and again on February 5th at 3 p.m. in the plenary meeting of the Conference, Edouard Benesh clearly stated this demand for a common Czech-Yugoslav frontier.

His arguments, which were taken up by Vesnitch and Trumbitch, the representatives of Belgrade, were energetically supported by André Tardieu.

In order to justify the demand put forward by Edouard Benesh, André Tardieu pointed out that the existence of this corridor would make the Hungarians definitely powerless by cutting their country in two. This would give such an absolute guarantee of future peace and such certainty that no force of revenge could ever arise in Budapest against the peace dictated by the victors, that it seemed impossible to him not to comply with Benesh's wishes.

The Czechs felt sure of success.

They failed.

Indeed nothing could overcome the opposition of Lloyd George and Lord Balfour in whom the hereditary distrust of the British for Slavism was suddenly aroused, nor that of the Italians who were not unaware that Benesh and Osusky were supporting with all their strength behind the scenes the Serb claims to the Adriatic territories promised to Italy by the London agreement.

A very few months after his failure in the Conference, Benesh, who had received from Paris the assurance that the Conference of Ambassadors was taking no further interest in the conflict, proposed to the Serbs to take common military action against Hungary in order to create the "corridor" by force.

He was in agreement with Vesnitch who had just replaced the aged Pashitch at Belgrade as head of the Serbian Government and also with Trumbitch, and he had promised the Roumanians all the Hungarian territory that the Allies had refused them at Trianon.

His calculations again encountered an unexpected obstacle.

Pashitch, who was still dazzled by the good fortune with which his country had come out of the great adventure of the War, was determined to take no more risks. And the influence of Pashitch, although he was temporarily not in power, remained preponderant at Belgrade⁽¹⁾. Benesh met with a definite refusal.

3. A Fairy Tale.

At the Peace Conference, the Czech delegates always spoke of the "Czechoslovak" people and nation when they simply meant the Crown of Bohemia and its former territory including Silesia and even Lusatia; since 1526 and especially since the battle of the White Mountain (1620) this crown had however become a purely juridical notion and was included in the list of titles of the Emperors of Germany and later of Austria; moreover and more especially these former territories of the Crown of Bohemia never included Slovakia.

In addition they were impudent enough to start talking immediately of a Czechoslovak nation as if such a nation had ever existed, in spite of the fact that Czech and Slovak are two distinct languages.

The Czechs thus played two games very skilfully. By means of contradictory geographic, economic and strategic arguments (natural frontiers) on the one hand and ethnical arguments (right of self-determination) on the other hand, they obtained territories which ought never to have been granted to them; the claim to German Bohemia was a violation of the nationality principle while the claim to Slovakia was a violation of the geographic principle, since Hungary, which represents a geographic unit unparalleled in history, has always had the Carpathians as her natural frontier. But the Czechs, not content with using these two kinds of incompatible arguments, in addition violated their own principles, since, after claiming the historical and natural frontier in Bohemia and the ethnical frontier in Slovakia, went beyond the latter very definite line and, under economic and strategic pretexts, formed a new natural frontier, the Danube frontier, where the Slovaks had never been.

Under the title: "L'homme a qui tout a réussi", M. Tibor Eckhardt writes in the "Nouvelle Revue de Hongrie":

"As it was scarcely possible to base an independent State on the Czech linguistic area with its seven million inhabitants, the fiction of the "Czechoslovak national unity" had to be created. Since in the case of the Sudetens the right of self-determination was unfavourable to the Czechs, the historic right had to be invoked. But this same principle was opposed to the dismemberment of the Kingdom of St. Stephen and at once precluded all the Czech claims to northern Hungary. Accord-

(1) "Military action against Hungary, which Benesh proposed to us at the time, would have raised the whole question again. For us, it would have been madness." (Pashitch to Stefanovitch, Dec. 11, 1923.)

ingly, as regards Hungary the historic right had to be waived and economic and strategic arguments had to be put forward in order to obtain as much Hungarian territory as possible. But this was still insufficient to obtain distant Ruthenia. At this point M. Benesh was helped by the idea of the Pan-Slav corridor; when Galicia subsequently fell to Poland instead of to Russia, he still succeeded in keeping this corridor which, however, led nowhere and became a blind alley. But all these principles and rights which replaced each other at will were still insufficient to satisfy the gratuitous claims of Czechoslovakia. It was necessary deliberately to mislead the Peace Conference in order to obtain inter alia the annexation of a million of Hungarians of pure blood. Here again M. Benesh was lucky. A sad revolution had just deprived Hungary of her force of action at the very moment when the Hungarian-Czech frontiers were established. He thus succeeded in creating a veritable monster State spread out across the map of Europe, which opposed a barrier to the evolution, the economic traffic and the peaceful contact of all the neighbouring peoples. A glance at the map of Europe would have been sufficient to prove to anyone the absurdity of the new situation. But the authors of the Peace Treaties were blinded by the dust thrown up by M. Benesh. He thus succeeded in obtaining for seven million Czechs a country of fourteen million inhabitants and in creating on the basis of the right of self-determination a new State in which the majority of the population feel ill at ease and can even decree by parliamentary means the dissolution of the State. M. Benesh' work thus inherited all the faults of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy without being able to boast of its advantages; it is full of intrinsic contradictions and would never have come into being without Mr. Benesh' good luck."

As the Czechs were given everything they asked for, they would have been wrong to feel squeamish. They put forward four successive plans, each one claiming more than the last. The number of annexed Hungarians rose from 300,000 to over a million.

The Czech delegation thought it could do what it liked, so great was the influence it possessed in Paris. This influence which was due to the constant and repeated contact with all the leading circles of the Entente during the last years of the War, has survived the Peace Treaty for nearly twenty years, and it is a well-known fact that M. Benesh in particular has enjoyed at Geneva a role out of proportion to the size of his State.

In his work entitled: "Les Coupables", Henri Pozzi writes in this connection: "Despite the promises which they had received, the bargains they had concluded, the complicity which they had obtained from the two men whom they considered the masters of the Peace—Clemenceau and Wilson—the unscrupulous politicians and jobbers who spoke and negotiated at Trianon in the name of the "small allies" did not believe up to the very end in the full extent of their extraordinary luck.

"It's a fairy-tale", said Masaryk constantly in November 1918 on the "Carmania" on which he came back to Europe, where our victories were to cause, him an obscure little University professor, to be received as the head of a State.

The Czechs in particular who had done everything, made all sorts of combinations and taken all sorts of decisions for four years—both for themselves and for others—and who had so skilfully taken the place of Tsarism which had disappeared, in order to claim all the Austro-Hungarian remnants which our Government had undertaken to hand over to Russia, who had shown every audacity and every cynicism in the "preparation of the peace", and whom nothing could stop when there were no blows to be received—and there were none at Trianon, not even moral blows, since the Hungarians were never allowed to take part in the discussions—were unrecognizable to their friends.

In the face of the triumph which exceeded all their hopes, the help given them on all sides, and the ridiculous ease with which they were able to take more and more, they were somewhat disconcerted."

On this subject the following three quotations from William Martin's book, "Statesmen of the War", give an excellent summary of this position:

Dr. Benes had not much to contend with in Paris. Once the principle of the Czecho-Slovak state was accepted—and it had been accepted in advance—no one thought of refusing it the extent of territory to which it was entitled. Dr. Benes' talent lay in the way in which he convinced his hearers from the outset that he was asking for no more. And he succeeded so well that every one vied with him in zeal on behalf of his demands and that eventually he was given more than he claimed. He was even given Ruthenia into the bargain, solely because no one knew what else to do with it!

I am astounded at the way in which they give me everything I ask. It is too much. I can't decline to pass on my countrymen's claims and I am never refused anything. I ask myself how far this can go." (Dr. Benes said at the time to one of his friends.)

"Dr. Benes said to me once: 'A state is not built up in a day. My country, in order to achieve its economic and moral unity, has need of twenty years of peace.'"

4. The Victory of Injustice.

"It is sufficient to cast a glance at the map", Aristide Briand admitted on June 7th, 1921, "to see that the new frontiers of Hungary are not in accordance with justice."

Nearly all the signatories of the treaty of June 4th already shared this view.

The excesses of injustice committed at Trianon had become so evident less than a year later that the United States, in signing their separate peace with Hungary on August 29th, 1921 did so without taking account of her new frontiers.

Even in France, the Senate, disturbed by the revelations of M. de Jouvenel, M. de Lamarzelle, General Bourgeois and M. de Monzie, who had confirmed and given definite shape to the charges brought before the Chamber of Deputies on June 7th against the decisions of Trianon by M. Margaine, M. Lénail, M. Paul-Boncour and the rapporteur of the treaty himself, M. Daniélou, had refused on July 11th, 1921 to ratify definitely the Treaty of Trianon. It had only ratified it subject to the reservation that the French Government would cause all the errors and all the injustices which had been pointed out to be revised.⁽¹⁾

The British have not become revisionist through sentiment but under the pressure of evidence.

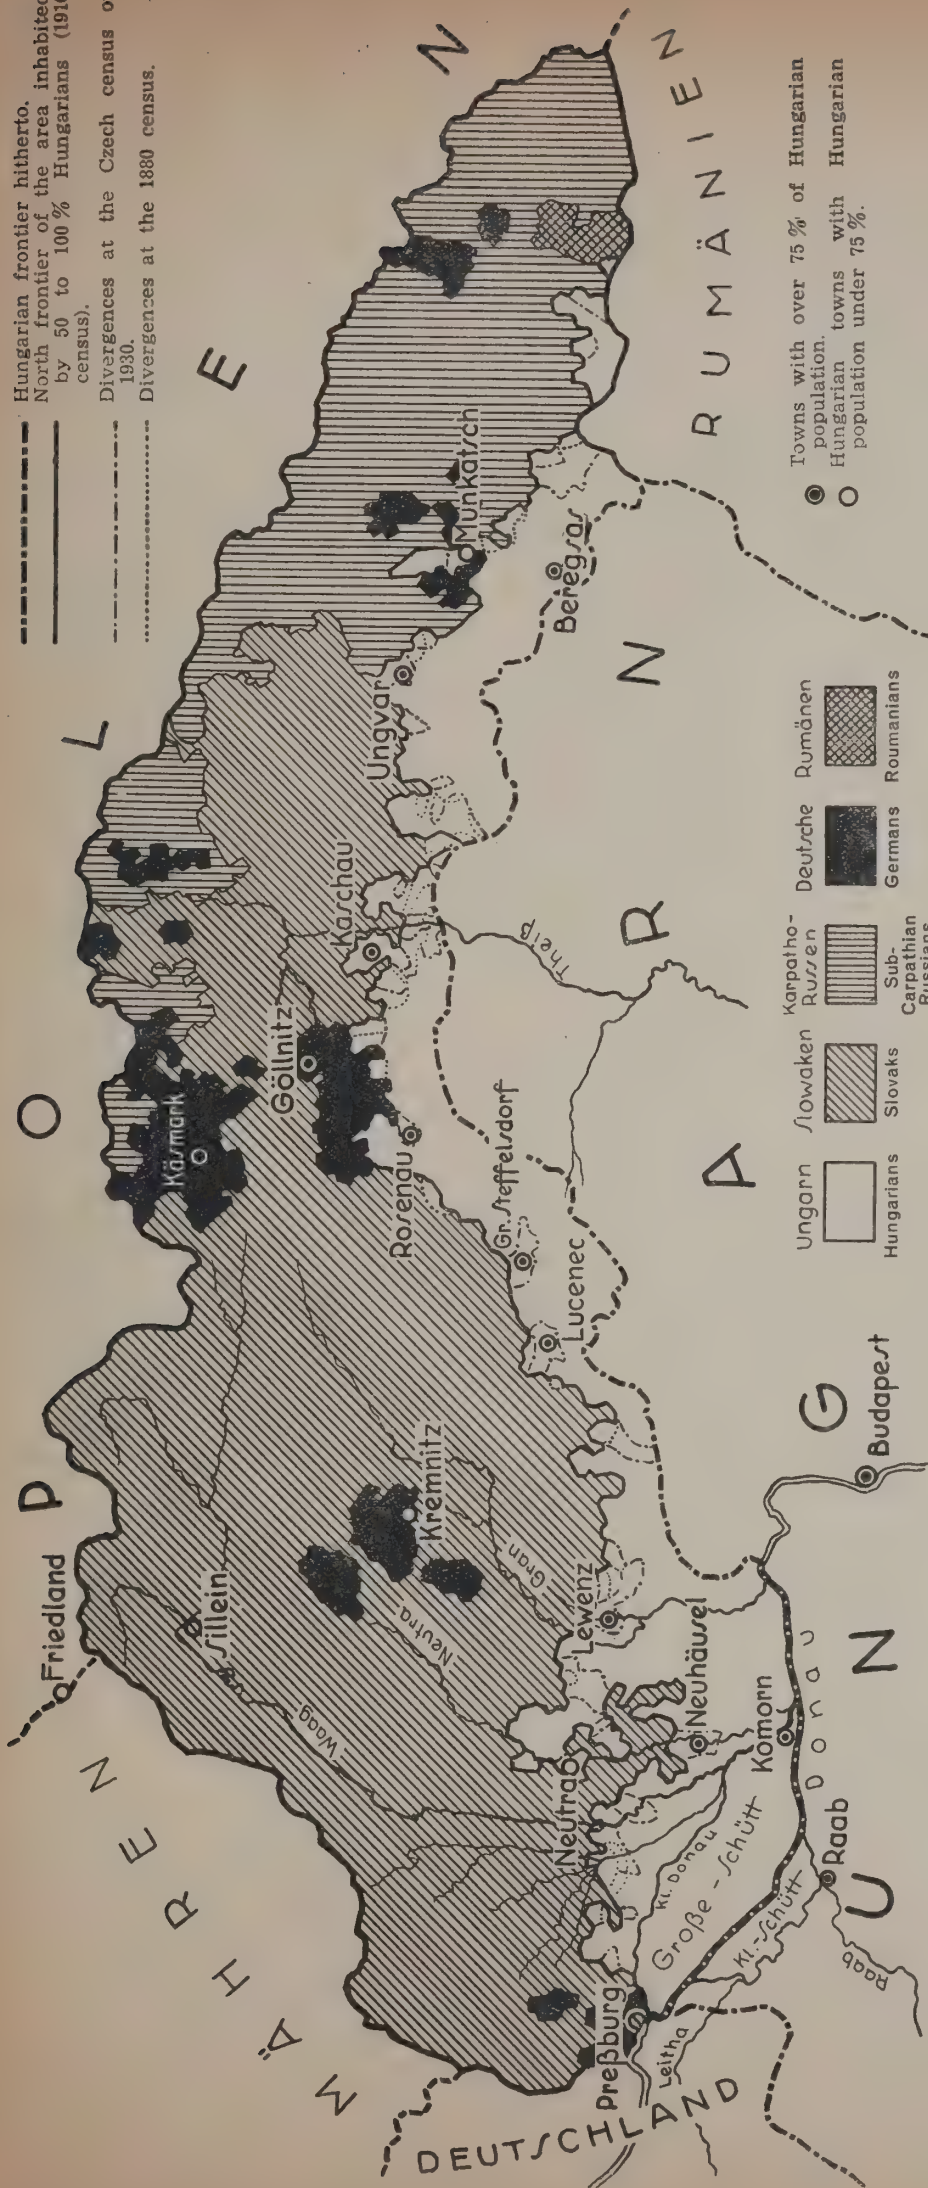

The amicable reparation of the flagrant injustices of the treaty of 1920 indeed appears to them as the sole means of avoiding the realisation of such reparation by force.

"It is not possible for England to become a guarantor of the frontiers laid down at Trianon in 1919", said the Labour Minister Philip Snowden at Locarno, and one of the loftiest and most representative consciences of British thought, Lord Asquith, added: "Let us hope that the authors of the Peace Treaty have not been so foolish as to think that they were establishing an eternal or even durable peace...."

"A great number of the Hungarian claims are justified", said Lloyd George on June 30th, 1920 to the President of the Roumanian Council, Vaida-Voevod, "and we must try to find a platform for agreement with them."

⁽¹⁾ "In the face of all those who have given their children that France may be more beautiful after the victory, I do not feel that I possess the sad courage to put my signature under such a treaty." (De Lamarzelle, July 11th 1921.)

Explanation of the Signs and Meaning of the Map

(According to Hungarian sources)

The map of modern Slovakia, reproduced on this page from Hungarian publications, gives a general picture of the districts inhabited by Hungarians on the basis of the three censuses, the figures of which were referred to in the course of the negotiations. The census figures of 1910 were taken as a basis in the occupation of the German districts of Bohemia, Moravia and Silesia and the transfer of the territories to the Reich. According to the principle laid down at the Munich meeting, these census returns were also to be applied in the case of Hungary, since it was not right that the violent demographic changes of the last twenty years should form a basis of the just settlement aimed at. Injustice cannot be taken as a legal basis. The census figures of 1880 and those of 1930 obviously give more favourable results for the views of the Czechoslovak delegation, for according to these figures not only would considerable frontier districts inhabited by Hungarians remain under Czechoslovak rule, but also eight Hungarian towns (Ěrsekújvár, Léva, Losonc, Rimaszombat, Rozsnyó, Kassa, Ungvár, Beregszaz — Neuhäusel, Lewenz, Lucenec, Gr. Steffelsdorf, Rosenau, Kaschau, Ungvar, Beregsas) which had a majority of over 75 % Hungarians according to the 1910 figures and even at the present time—after twenty years of foreign rule—have an almost purely Hungarian population.

In many places the last three lines coincide. Hungary desires with slight exceptions the 50 % language frontier of 1910, or 1918, on the basis of the same principles as those applied in the case of the Germans and Poles.

The Hungarian linguistic area comprises 12,940 square kilometres, and the area of the Schütt island 1838 square kilometres. In the linguistic area with an absolute Hungarian majority the population in 1910 was 1,034,714, and in the area of the Groszer Schütt 105,418.

5. The Covering Letter.

On May 6th, 1920, M. Alexandre Millerand, President of the Conference of Ambassadors which had succeeded the Peace Conference on May 9th, 1919, transmitted to the Hungarian Delegation the final text of the peace conditions.

It was accompanied by an autograph letter.-

"If an inquiry on the spot" wrote M. Millerand, "reveals the necessity of modifying the frontier lines fixed by the Treaty, and if the frontier commissions consider that the provisions of the Treaty contain an injustice on any point whatever, Hungary can appeal to the League of Nations."

"The Allied and Associated Powers" added the President of the Conference, "are in agreement that the League of Nations, if requested by one of the parties concerned, can offer its services to obtain by an amicable settlement such frontier rectifications as the Commissions consider desirable.... The Powers are confident that this procedure provides a suitable method of correcting any injustice in the demarcation of the frontiers...."

The undertaking was quite definite.

It is true that M. Millerand himself, fifteen years later, categorically denied the importance attached to it not only by the Hungarian revisionists but also by the former signatories of the Treaty themselves who were undoubtedly in an excellent position to know and to speak the truth.

"My letter of May 6th, 1920", said in fact the former President of the Republic to the newspaper Az Est of Budapest, "never aimed at opening the door to any possibility of revision..."

As a matter of fact, the covering letter signed by M. Millerand which promised that changes would be made in the line originally fixed at Trianon if, as a result of investigations on the spot, it was found that it did not correspond at various points to ethnical and economic requirements, remained a dead letter for the delimitation commissions.

Indeed, at the same time as the Supreme Council gave Hungary reason to hope for some concessions by means of the covering letter which left the door open for possible rectifications, it secretly cancelled this promise by a private communication to the delimitation commissions instructing them to follow as closely as possible the line of the Treaty without taking into account national, linguistic or religious considerations. Such was the duplicity of the masters of Europe.

Accordingly the commissions made only insignificant changes in a frontier nearly 2000 kilometres in length, and these were for the most part annulled by other changes made in favour of the succession States. In reply to the observations submitted by Hungary to the Peace Conference, the Principal Allied and Associated Powers replied that any change would have had more serious consequences than the disadvantages pointed out by the Hungarian delegation, that a plebiscite would not "appreciably" change the frontiers drawn at Trianon, and lastly that the ethnical conditions of Central Europe did not enable the political frontiers to be made to coincide throughout their length with the ethnical frontiers. The truth is that they have been made to coincide nowhere except at three or four points. Moreover the very letter which granted the possibility of changes precluded in advance the more important changes which would have called into question the general line laid down by the Treaty, which had to serve as a basis and remain sacred.

M. Pozzi writes on this subject:

"The Hungarians, trusting in the word of France, signed the peace on June 4th, 1920 at the Petit Palais de Trianon.

Three weeks had not elapsed before M. Millerand himself, in an imperative and "strictly confidential" document, declared null and void the undertakings which he had just assumed officially on behalf of the Allied and Associated Powers.

On June 22nd, 1920, in fact, M. Millerand gave all the delimitation commissions operating in Central Europe the order not to let themselves be guided "by any consideration whatever calculated to involve the slightest rectification in the frontier lines as established at Trianon on memoranda and documents.

None of the commissions that were thus forbidden to be guided by the "covering letter" of May 6th, had moreover as yet had this letter communicated to them.

It was never communicated to any of them."

6. The Paléologue Episode.

The ink of the treaty was scarcely dry when the offensive of the Russian armies against Poland took place.

On June 24th, 1920, the red armies were at the gates of Warsaw. The very existence of Poland was in danger and, with it, the entire work of victory.

Four days earlier, in obedience to orders from Prague, the Socialist government of Vienna decreed the economic boycott of Hungary. By starving the Magyar people, for whom the Austrian railwaymen refused to transport supplies, Prague hoped, on the eve of the decisive attack of the Russians against the divisions of Pilsudski, to bring about a popular revolution in Budapest.

Once the Polish barrier had been removed, the Bolshevik flood would irresistibly spread across Germany. Then an event occurred the consequences of which might have been incalculable for the future of Europe and the safety of our country.

By a note discussed in the Council of Ministers and approved by the President of the Republic, the French Government, which was determined at any cost to save a situation which already appeared almost desperate, asked the Hungarian Government for any military assistance which it could give against the Reds.

In exchange for the assistance which she would grant to Poland, the French Government offered Hungary the revision of the treaty which it had signed only twenty days earlier at Trianon.

"The French Government", said the note of June 24th, which was inspired and drafted by the former Ambassador at Petrograd, M. Maurice Paléologue, Secretary General of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and was handed to Admiral Horthy, Regent of Hungary, by our High Commissioner at Budapest, M. Fouchet, "in application of the Peace Treaty, and guided by the declaration included in the covering note addressed by the Allied and Associated Powers on May 6th to the Hungarian Delegation to the Peace Conference, is prepared to offer its good offices for any step towards a friendly agreement between Hungary and her neighbours with a view to eliminating all causes of friction to the common satisfaction of the Parties concerned."

It was indeed no longer the time for diplomatic phrases and half-measures.

Paris had learned from a sure source—by means of documents the origin and official character of which left no doubt as to the accuracy of their statements—that the Government of Prague had decided to facilitate the access to Hungary and Austria of the victorious Soviet armies, as soon as the Polish defeat was completed.

For this purpose a free passage would be granted to them through Eastern Slovakia and Ruthenia.

In proportion as the triumphant success of the Reds appeared to be confirmed, an intense pro-Russian agitation raised the working masses of the industrial centres of Silesia and Bohemia and gradually took possession of all the regiments of Czech nationality. Twenty towns in Bohemia celebrated the bombardment of the suburbs of Warsaw with illuminations.

In its desire to save Poland and to preserve Europe at any cost from a Bolshevik invasion, the French Government had moreover gone even further in June 1920 than appeared from reading the diplomatic phrases of the Rote.

It had in fact not hesitated to instruct its High Commissioner, M. Fouchet, to guarantee verbally to Hungary, in addition to "its good office for any step", the recovery of Ruthenia and the greater part of Slovakia in return for her military assistance to Poland.

With a unanimity which might have been surprising if one had not known by which leaders it was inspired, all the adversaries of revisionism and, in particular, the person most directly and deliberately responsible for the "mistakes" of the Treaty of Trianon, André Tardieu, have maintained the most complete silence regarding the Paléologue note and the step taken by Fouchet.

At Prague, on the other hand, a summary—forged in its essentials—of these negotiations, was published in 1921 by M. Benesh himself.

Benesh had been informed immediately by some of the informers at his disposal at the Quai d'Orsay of the despatch and exact text of the French note of June 24th. He had also been informed—both by Paris and by the intelligence service which he had succeeded in arranging with the High Commissariat at Budapest—of the tenour of the proposals transmitted verbally to the Hungarian Government by M. Fouchet. For the moment he had been cast down by the imminence and immensity of the disaster which threatened his work. But he soon recovered. On June 27th, in a personal telegram, he informed M. Ninchitch, the Serbian Minister of Foreign Affairs, of the secret negotiations entered into between the Governments of Paris and Budapest. He requested him to join him in an immediate step with the French Government. The reply from Ninchitch, which was also telegraphic and personal, only reached Benesh on July 29th. The Serbian Minister, on the advice of the aged Pashitch, who had never been able to overcome his aversion for Benesh, had prudently preferred to await the result of the battles around Warsaw. When the Russians had been put to flight, he advised Benesh to make an immediate vigorous protest to Paris. But he did not offer to take part in it. On this same 29th of July Benesh had just sent a circular note of protest against the French step to all the signatories of the Treaty of Trianon. In his haste he even addressed it to the United States, the only one of the former Allies that had not signed the Treaty. The Government of Washington was, moreover, the only one to acknowledge receipt of his protest, though without a word of comment.

At the same time Benesh had asked the Quai d'Orsay direct for explanations. Faithful to the system which he had always hitherto found successful—and which he has also since found to succeed—the Czechoslovak Minister of Foreign Affairs adopted a high tone. He demanded the immediate cessation of the negotiations between Paris and Budapest, the withdrawal and cancellation of the Paléologue note, the disavowal of the verbal offers transmitted to the Hungarian Government by the French High Commissioner in Hungary, the departure from the Quai d'Orsay of M. Maurice Paléologue, and his replacement by a man entirely devoted to himself, Philippe Berthelot.

If he did not obtain satisfaction on all these points, Benesh threatened that Czechoslovakia would abandon the French alliance.

The Russian peril, which had been crushed by Pilsudski, had disappeared. France did not wish under any circumstances to break the web of alliances and friendships on which she counted to assure her political and military hegemony against any offensive return of the vanquished and against any opposition of her war allies.

Lastly and in particular, the influence of the politicians and the great journalists who, before and during the first half of the War, had been faithful to Raffalovitch and Izvolski, but had joined up since 1917 with Czech Slavism, the heir to the imperialism and financial methods of Tsarism, was then at its height at the Elysee and Quai d'Orsay. Both intervened strongly with a view to the Prague ultimatum being accepted.

In again calling to mind events that occurred twenty years ago, we have not desired to open old wounds but merely to show how lightheartedly and even criminally the negotiators in Paris and its suburbs played with the life and fate of the nations and also with the future peace of Europe. One is almost tempted to forgive the Czechs a good many things, when one sees how easy everything was made for them and how even advantages were pressed upon them, while those who had to take the decisions did not worry about the consequences. It sounds like a bad joke when Harold Nicolson, in his book about the peacemakers, relates how the thousand-year old Hungarian Kingdom was divided up on May 8th, 1919 by tired, half-asleep diplomats and how the right of self-determination of the nations was trampled underfoot. But this fantastic picture is in entire agreement with the description given by the aged head of the Hungarian delegation, Count Apponyi, in his memoirs of the meeting on January 15th, 1920 when for the first time he stood in the clock gallery of the Quai d'Orsay before the members of the Supreme Council who were drunk with victory to the point of rudeness. Apponyi spoke not only as the representative of gagged Hungary which could be violated openly and with impunity, but also as the spokesman of world conscience to the men who had assumed a terrible burden of responsibility for the future. In his statements he warned them with prophetic words that the dismemberment of Hungary would sharpen the period of contradiction and crisis. "Never was such portentous power placed in the hands of a group of nations and their representatives, and the Conference should bear in mind that, with all its power, it would ultimately have no control over the consequences which would develop from their action." On the basis of the principle of international justice and freedom of the nations which the Allies had so loudly proclaimed, the aged Count demanded the right of self-determination. "We would sincerely and honestly submit to the decision of the nations that have lived together with us for centuries. But they must be asked."

But it was all of no use. Apponyi who, together with his delegation, was treated for weeks in Paris as a prisoner, describes in his memoirs how he had to stand facing the window like an accused person in front of the representatives of the Great Powers who sat veiled in shadow like judges on their high chairs. He could only see the sullen aspect of Clemenceau in the side light. He was listened to, but he knew that no one paid any attention to what they heard.

In order to veil their claims which were based on a policy of power, the Czechs at the Paris Conference demanded the Slovak territories in the name of the nationality principle and of the right of self-determination of the nations, together however with a considerable strip of pure Hungarian territory. They arbitrarily made these Slovak territories into a historical unit, Slovakia, which had never existed as such. The fifth of Benesh' notorious memoranda, under the heading "Some pages from the history of Slovakia", therefore contains frequent references to the "Slovak branch of the Czechoslovak nation", and even to "Slovaks as a branch of the Czech nation". This is a very arbitrary theory, for there has in fact never been a Czechoslovak State that would have brought closer together these two branches of the Slav race which are undoubtedly related to each other. The statement is moreover refuted by the fact that since Palacky all Czech historians admit that the penetration of Hungarians into the Danube basin for a thousand years prevented on the one hand the union of the Southern and Northern Slavs and on the other hand the combination of the Czechs and Slovaks to form a single State. The memorandum went on in an equally arbitrary manner, in the chapter "The Geography of Slovakia" to define the frontiers of Slovak territory artificially and in accordance with anything but the right of self-determination, naturally without being disconcerted by the fact that Slovakia as such had hitherto never existed either as a State or as a province.

It is, in fact, admitted in the memorandum that "the Magyars live in compact masses in the south-east of Slovakia", and also that "the incorporation of these territories in the Czechoslovak State might be regarded as a violation of the right of self-determination." "We admit this and leave the judgment in this question to those who are called upon to take the decision, in which they will take into account the vital necessities which arise for a nation such as the Slovaks." Then follows a comment on these vital necessities. "For centuries these Slovak territories have been subject to brutal oppression and the Magyars ultimately succeeded to a great extent in driving out the Slovak element. In now claiming this territory, it is merely a question of a reparation that has been long due to us."

The Czechs are not shy in producing arguments, and the memorandum therefore sets itself the task of replacing the "forged" Hungarian nationality statistics by its own which naturally arrive at quite different results and reduce the number of Hungarians living in Slovakia by about 400,000 while increasing the number of "Czechoslovaks" by a similar figure. But even these statistics admit that 860,000 Hungarians would remain within the new frontiers.

* * *

It was solely with a view to a power policy that the Czechs desired in 1919 to incorporate this Upper Hungarian district in their State. By so doing they deliberately drove a wedge between the old historic Polish-Hungarian frontier. They intentionally drove this wedge as far east as possible in order at first geographically and later politically to seek cover for their rear in Soviet Russia and also to obtain a direct but quite artificial connection with distant Roumania by means of a railway existing on purely Hungarian territory. In this way the ring was closed round Hungary and the germ of the Little Entente was created. In these twenty years the Czechs tried in every way to bind the annexed Upper Hungarian territory, Slovakia and Sub-Carpathian Russia, to Prague, to the head of the crocodile figure, in the knowledge that their patched Bohemian forest fortress, without the eastern territory, could not assume the desired future position in Central Europe, which, according to Benesh, implied opposition to Germany.

It was on this principle of unconditional enmity to Germany which has remained valid since the foundation of the State that the southern frontier of Slovakia against Hungary was drawn. At the Czech demand it was advanced to the Danube to include Pressburg and then cut in an easterly direction straight through purely Hungarian territory.

7. Some Examples of the Demographic Policy Pursued by the Czechs towards the Hungarians.

From the ethnical point of view, the position in Czechoslovakia, according to official figures, was as follows:

Czechs 7,446,732 (50.56%), Germans 3,318,445 (22.53%), Slovaks 2,309,972 (15.68%), Hungarians 719,569 (4.89%), Ruthenes 568,941 (3.86%), Jews 204,799 (1.49%), Poles 100,332 (0.68%), miscellaneous 53,053 (0.31%).

There were in all 14,721,813 inhabitants with six different languages not including the languages of the Roumanians, the gypsies, the Armenians and the Jews.

According to the official figures themselves, therefore, it is correct that the Czechs formed the absolute majority of the population. But these official figures were not accepted as authentic by any of the non-Czech nationalities.

As far as the Hungarians are concerned, in 1919 when the territory was transferred the figure was estimated at over a million. Of this number more than 700,000 lived in direct contact with the State of Hungary created by the Treaty of Trianon. Instead of a million, however, the Czech statistics calculated only 738,000 Hungarians in the entire territory of Czechoslovakia, and in 1930 the statistics showed only 681,000 i.e. a reduction of 57,000 or 8.4%.

In Slovakia alone, according to the Czech census of 1919, there were not more than 692,831 Hungarians, in 1920 only 634,827 and in 1930 only 371,988. The number of Hungarians in Czechoslovakia was therefore artificially reduced by the census both at the time of the signature of the Peace Treaty and also from one census to another. This result is impossible in the case of a stable, healthy and fertile population. When it is further considered that only the Hungarian officials emigrated in greater or smaller numbers after the signature of the Peace Treaty, it seems even more impossible that the bulk of the exclusively agricultural population could have decreased to such an extent, when it is notorious that this rural population remained in their villages.

While, therefore, the Hungarians in Slovakia at the time of the Peace Treaty constituted 30% of the population, they would have fallen from 21.48% according to the Czechoslovak statistics of 1920 to 17.58% in 1930, i.e. to half the original figure and would thus not have attained the percentage necessary in order to enjoy minority rights. Similarly, the absolute figure in Sub-Carpathian Russia, even according to Czech statistics, increased from 103,000 to 109,000, while the percentage fell from 17.35% to 15.44%.

By means especially of the partition of districts, the Czechs managed everywhere to bring the percentage of Hungarians below 20% so that, even in the districts where they formed a majority, they lost the advantages which the law provided for the minorities attaining this percentage in the various towns and districts.

When this position is considered more closely, it is seen that in the districts and towns in which the Hungarians formed more than 90% of the population in 1921 they dropped to 83 to 74%. In several others, where they reached the proportion 70 or 80%, they dropped to less than 66%, and thus enabled the Government to forbid the use of Hungarian as a subsidiary language in the administration of these districts. As regards, in particular, the main towns of Pressburg, Kaschau and Ungvar, the position was as follows:

In Pressburg the Hungarian population is reported to have fallen from 31,705 in 1910 (40% as against 45% Germans, 10% Slovaks and 0% Czechs) to 18,890, in spite of the absolute increase in the population between these two dates from 78,000 to 123,000; the proportion thus fell from 40% to 15% while the Slovaks or Czechoslovaks in the same period rose from 11,674 in 1910 according to the Hungarian census to 27,397 in 1919, and according to the census to 37,038 in 1921 and 60,013 in 1930.

In Kaschau the number of Hungarians fell in 20 years from 33,350 to 11,504, from 75% to 18% (the population of this town having almost doubled), while the Slovaks increased sixfold, i.e. from 6548 to 42,245 or from 14.8% to 66.04%.

The position is Ungvar is even more paradoxical, since it has a considerable Jewish population. In 1910, out of a total of 16,919 inhabitants, there were 13,590 Hungarians, i.e. more than 80%; the number is now reported to have fallen to 4499 or 17.8%. If we include the Jews which, according to the Czech census, amounted to 5897 or 23.30%, it will be seen that the total proportion of Hungarians and Jews at present amounts to only 40%, i.e. half the figure of 1910. During the same period the Slovaks, who formed only a trifling proportion of the population in 1910 (1219 or 7.2%) although their ethnical territory extended to the gates of the city, increased eightfold and now number 8030 or 31.7%, so that they are much more numerous than the Ruthenes themselves whose capital is Ungvar, (6260 or 24.74%) than the Jews (5897) or than the Hungarians (4499) who have thus been relegated to the fourth place in a purely Hungarian town.

The position is similar in the other towns. For instance the Hungarians in Neuhausel have dropped from 91.5% in 1910 to 46.46% in 1930, in Lucenec from 82.2% to 27.49%, in Gross-Steffelsdorf from 89.7% to 47.95%, in Lewenz from 90.5% to 41.1%, in Rosenau from 89.7% to 50.56%, in Neutra from 59.4% to 4.59%, in Beregsas from 96.2% to 52.21% and in Munkatsch from 73.4% to 22.54%.

On comparing the results of the censuses of 1921 and 1930 it will be seen that in these ten years all the nationalities increased except the Hungarian. The greatest increase is shown by the gypsies and the "foreigners". In Slovakia and Sub-Carpathian Russia the number of gypsies jumped from 8417 to 31,980. As regards the "foreigners" in Sub-Carpathian Russia, which is by its nature the most inaccessible territory, the official statistics show 16,230 as against 6860 in 1921 and in Slovakia 75,600 as against 42,340 in 1921.

All this is explained when it is learned that in reality the "foreigners" of these districts are no other than the original inhabitants, who in the course of years were deprived of their Czechoslovak citizenship and thus became stateless. One must also wonder how many Hungarians are included among the gypsies in order to reach the figure of 31,980 and how many are included among the Jews, the number of whom in Slovakia and Sub-Carpathian Russia amounts to no less than 156,000, while in Bohemia-Moravia, a territory three times as large and one that has always had a considerable Jewish population, there are only 30,000.

The tactics of the new masters consisted in reducing the number of persons belonging to the minorities by increasing the number of the minorities. For this reason the nationalities of gypsies and Jews were invented. At the same time the Jews were only counted among the German and Hungarian minorities, while the Jews who spoke Czech or Slovak were counted as Czechoslovaks.

Lastly it was possible by the name test to denationalise people with a stroke of the pen; thus names with a Slav sound went to increase the Czech or Slovak majority. Moreover in Czechoslovakia and Sub-Carpathian Russia, the census forms are not filled in by the inhabitants but by the gendarmes and huissiers, and the object of this procedure is to reduce as far as possible the percentage of the minorities, especially the Hungarian minority.

Finally, by means of a special law, in the entire frontier zone (to a depth of 25 kilometres) where the minorities live in compact masses, any inhabitants who are regarded as "suspicious" cannot acquire or keep either land or buildings and are also immediately driven from their homes even if their families have lived there for centuries. Lastly, the Government has established Slovak schools in the heart of the Hungarian linguistic districts in order to denationalise the young generation and to press back the language frontier as far south as possible.

THE HUNGARIAN DEMAND FOR REVISION

Nem, nem, soha! No, no, never! That is part of the inscription on the garlanded monument on Liberty Square in Budapest erected in memory of the territorial losses imposed upon Hungary by the Treaty of Trianon and that is the burden of many other inscriptions on monuments and memorial tablets. The Hungarian people have never ceased to proclaim to the world the injustice of Trianon and to demand its redressment.

The nature of these demands for reparation follows logically from the above: restitution of the territories in which Hungarians have lived and settled for a thousand years. Hungary wisely confined herself, like Czechoslovakia, to historical claims—i.e. those of the crown of St Stephen, as Czechoslovakia to those of St Wenceslas.

On September 29th, the hour of freedom struck for the Hungarians handed over to Czechoslovakia by the Treaty of Trianon and on October 9th the Czecho-Hungarian negotiations began at Komorn (Komárom). The position of the two parties had however shifted in the meantime, when, after the recognition of the autonomy of Slovakia and Sub-Carpathian Ruthenia, Prague in some sort dropped out and left the negotiations to the two autonomous Governments which, from bring friends of Hungary and members of a common front against Prague, became adversaries and fought tenaciously for as small a loss of territory as possible. They employed the same tactics as the Czechs had employed against the Sudeten Germans and submitted ever more far-reaching proposals—though in rather more rapid succession. The main subjects of dispute were possession of the towns on the Northern limits of the territory settled by Hungarians and the plebiscites in Slovakia and Sub-Carpathian Ruthenia, the latter being demanded with a view to the possible establishment of a common frontier with Poland, also desired by Warsaw. These plebiscites were however flatly refused by the autonomous Governments and M. Brody, who was disposed to favour such a plebiscite, was, as we know, dismissed by Prague.

The Komárom negotiations broke down, after the first few days, over these profound political cleavages and the differences of opinion as to whether the figures of the 1910 census should, as the Hungarians desired, be adopted when estimating the extent of the reincorporation of Hungarian populations and territory, or, as the Slovaks and Ruthenes demanded, those of 1930. A violent battle of notes ensued, intensive diplomatic activity being at the same time maintained between Berlin, Rome, Budapest, Warsaw, Bucharest and Prague, which finally, in view of the unyielding attitude of both parties and the resultant acute and dangerous tension in the territories under dispute, led to the proposal and acceptance of a Germano-Italian Court of Arbitration, which met in Vienna on November 2nd 1938 to pronounce its verdict.

1. The Munich Decisions and Hungary.

From the Broadcast Speech by the Hungarian Premier Bela v. Imrédy, of October 3rd, 1938.

"My Hungarian brothers! Mighty forces wrestled on the stage of life and the whole world watched with bated breath the headlong course of events. Then, when it seemed that nothing could any longer avert a fatal collision between the forces, the determined will, wisdom and honest insight of a few men performed a miracle in 36 hours and unravelled the situation which had appeared incapable of solution. That act of disentanglement truly deserves the epithet "peaceful", as it did not bear in itself the deadly seed of corruption and of the past but was established on the only possible basis of any lasting peace: justice.

We Hungarians are however primarily interested in the destiny of Hungary and when we examine the shape which that destiny has assumed during the last few days we see that there are two questions to which this nation's soul seeks an answer—which we must seek together and united, as in every great Hungarian issue. These two questions are: has the Munich decision had any result from the Hungarian point of view; and are we Hungarians satisfied with that decision?

Has the Munich decision had any result? Yes, my Hungarian brothers, and a very important result. Four European Great Powers have by their signatures placed on record the existence of justified Hungarian claims which must be satisfied on the occasion of the redetermination of the fate of the nationalities living in Czechoslovakia and the necessity of redressing the injustice committed twenty years ago through ignorance exploited by hypocritical propaganda, when that State was founded. We must not esteem lightly this result which but a few months ago we barely ventured anxiously to contemplate, but rejoice over it, as we are entitled to do, as a step in the right direction.

Without going into the merits of this individual or that or the part he was called upon to play within our frontiers in the achievement of this aim, we can say without fear of contradiction that a foreign policy, which has procured powerful friends for this country and has been responsible in no small measure for the fact that those friends have stretched out the hand of friendship to one another, has not been fruitless.

The support accorded to us by these two powerful and friendly nations acting in complete agreement with one another and upon which we can certainly rely in the future, brought us this remarkable result. Every Hungarian owes his sincere thanks to the Leaders of those nations—the two men of steel, who by their steadfast policy, all compelling will-power and dynamic driving-force have directed a fresh living stream into the turgid waters of European policy.

The second question also requires an answer: are we Hungarians satisfied? I can say at once that we are not satisfied, as no Hungarian can be satisfied as long as justice, in whose name the fate of the various nationalities living in Czechoslovakia must be settled afresh and who began her march at Munich, has not come into her own as regards the affairs of Hungary also.

Hungary's attitude to the settlement of the Czechoslovak question has, from the outset, rested without wavering on clear, simple and incontrovertible foundations of principle: namely, on the contention that this new settlement of the national groups living in Czechoslovakia must be effected on the basis of self-determination and equality of treatment.

We cannot be content with any decision which would be to our disadvantage. We have always kept that guiding principle before us and shall continue to do so until the question is solved. All those concerned can be quite sure that we shall shrink from no difficulties in giving effect to our view.

Hungarian policy has given many proofs that it desires to achieve its aims by peaceful means. Peaceful intentions are not however synonymous with supine resignation. The road that leads to our goal may be likened to a narrow mountain path with gaping chasms to right and left: on one side the abyss of irresponsible adventure, on the other that of cowardly abdication. I know that we have succeeded up to the present in keeping to this narrow path without giddiness or hesitation and I trust the star of my nation that we shall continue to progress along that path.

After much weary trudging, we reached the shelter of the Munich negotiations and now we set out once more upon the difficult and stony path. I know that one nation is following us. Our responsibility for remaining upon the right path is tremendous and I am aware that, in order to reach our goal, we must keep to the same path.

2. After the break-down of the negotiations at Komarom. The plebiscite in the forefront. The Hungarian reply to Prague of October 24th, 1938.

The Hungarian Government confirms in its note the statement of the Czechoslovak Government to the effect that the proposal transmitted on October 22nd was designed to form the basis of the fresh negotiations and that the possibility of subsequent alterations was reserved, and declares as follows:

1. It notes with satisfaction that the two Governments are in agreement in regard to a considerable part of the Hungarian demands and consequently proposes that the Hungarian troops be permitted to occupy the undisputed territories within a fixed period. It would not regard any further procrastination as justifiable.

2. It further notes that there are still appreciable differences of opinion between the two Governments, mainly in connection with the extent of the territories to be excluded from reunion with Hungary. The differences refer in particular to those towns which, with the exception of Pozsony (Pressburg), were inhabited by an overwhelming majority of Hungarians. It is accordingly obvious that Hungary could not waive her claim to those towns even in deference to the spirit of the Munich agreements. Nevertheless the Hungarian Government desires once more to furnish proof of the utmost conciliation in the interests of peace and therefore requests that a plebiscite be held in those districts situated between the ethnological frontier proposed by the Hungarian Government and the frontier line offered by the Czechoslovak Government, this plebiscite to be terminated by November 30th.

Only such persons would be permitted to participate in the plebiscite as were resident in the districts concerned on October 28th, 1918, or were born there before that date. In the map attached to the note, the territory still in dispute is divided into eight sections. The plebiscite would be held by sections.

The Czechoslovak troops would be required to evacuate these districts by November 1st and the administration of the districts would be handed over to international organs by November 15th.

As none of the nationalities had an absolute majority in Pozsony in 1918, the Hungarian Government proposes special conversations, to be held after the present negotiations.

Certain relatively unimportant differences of mainly local significance, to which no reference is made in the request for a plebiscite, could be settled by direct negotiation between the two Governments.

3. The Hungarian Government is desirous of establishing the foundations of such a stable position as would render possible the peaceful collaboration of all the nations settled in this part of Europe. In the opinion of the Hungarian Government, this object could be attained only if all the nationalities including the Little Russians (Ruthenes) were enabled to decide their own fate through the medium of an internationally controlled plebiscite. Only after fulfilment of this condition could Hungary assume any guarantee in respect of the new frontiers of Czechoslovakia.

4. Should the Czechoslovak Government be unable to agree to the proposals for a plebiscite, as set forth above, the Hungarian Government is, for its part, prepared to submit to arbitration both in respect of the whole territory in dispute and on the question of the right of self-determination of the nationalities mentioned in point 3. Germany and Italy would arbitrate in the most important districts, while in part of the Eastern districts the decision would rest with a court of arbitration on which, besides Italy and Germany, Poland would also be represented. Both parties would be required to state in advance that they would abide by the verdict of the court.

In conclusion, the Hungarian Government calls attention to the dangerous tension caused by the present position and to the fact that it replied to the Czechoslovak proposal within 48 hours and it expresses the hope that the Czechoslovak Government will act with similar promptitude.

The Premier, Dr. v. Imrédy, explains the Hungarian note at a Press Conference.

The Premier began by referring to the events which had led up to the crisis and proceeded to give a complete account of the negotiations carried on with the Czechoslovak Government on the question of the Czechoslovak Hungarian territories. He reminded his hearers that, side by side with the arrangements concluded during the Munich Conference in the matter of the German claims, the representatives of the four Powers present had signed an Additional Agreement concerning the Hungarian minority providing that, in the event of no agreement being reached within three months by the Governments in question in the matter of Hungarian nationality, the representatives of the four Powers present should meet again to examine and settle the question.

On that foundation, he said, is based the diplomatic action of the Hungarian Government, which began immediately on October 1st with a request to the Czechoslovak Government to resume the negotiations. After the receipt of a reply signifying the latter's consent in principle, the Hungarian Government proposed two days later that the negotiations should begin on October 6th, 1938. At the same time the Hungarian Government requested the Czech Government to proceed to the fulfilment of certain demands including inter alia the liberation of political prisoners and the handing over of two places on the frontier, the latter being required as an symbolic act or earnest of the cession of the territories to be reunited to Hungary. As a result of the resignation of the Head of the Czechoslovak State and the Government crisis in Czechoslovakia, the institution of negotiations was delayed and these began three days later—on October 9th, 1938—at Komárom. On the first day of the negotiations, the Czech Government made a satisfactory statement in regard to the liberation of the political prisoners and two frontier posts—Ipolysag and the little station of Satoraljaujhely—were handed over to the Hungarian troops.

On the first day of the negotiations at Komárom, the Hungarian delegation immediately transmitted the Hungarian proposal, since when it has not substantially departed from its terms. The Hungarian proposal is entirely inspired by the spirit of the Munich decisions. It is a matter of common knowledge that the four Great Powers took their stand on the so-called racial, ethnical principle and adopted as their point of departure the consideration—which originated in the mind of the Führer and Chancellor of the Reich—that the peaceful co-existence of the various races could be ensured in the most satisfactory manner only if the frontiers of States were made to coincide as far as possible with the ethnical frontiers. Consequently this principle must also be observed in the matter of the Czechoslovak Hungarian territories. This needs to be stressed, as the whole of our present action can only proceed on the Munich basis: that is, a racial basis. It is not a matter of applying a certain measure of historical justice or maintaining our historic claims to such territories as were torn from us, but of drawing the frontier between Czechoslovakia and Hungary in accordance with the areas settled by the various races.

The Hungarian proposal is based on the known position with regard to the population of those territories. As the territories involved are those of which we were, even from an ethnical point of view, unjustly deprived, we were compelled to go back to the position in 1918 and the Hungarian Government consequently demanded the return of those territories which were, according to the 1910 census, the last census prior to the test year (1918), mainly settled by Hungarians. The Hungarian Government immediately provided the Czechoslovak delegation in Komárom with a map in which these districts were demarcated. It further informed it that Hungary would be unable to assume a guarantee unless she were satisfied that the remaining territory of Czechoslovakia and its form of government accorded with the wishes of the populations remaining within its frontiers: that is to say, that Hungary could not guarantee the Czechoslovak frontiers, as contemplated in the Munich Agreement, before effect had been given to the right of self-determination of all the nationalities inhabiting Czechoslovakia.

Not until the fourth day of the conversation at Komárom, i.e. October 12th, did the Czechoslovak delegation proceed to deal with the proposals on their merits. The first counter-proposal made by the Czechoslovak delegation involved a departure from the principles which the Prague Government had already recognized at the earlier diplomatic negotiations and de facto recognition of which had been accorded in the form of the return of Ipolysag and the little station of Satoraljaujhely. In this first proposal, the Czechoslovak delegation contemplated granting a large measure of autonomy to those of Hungarian nationality living in Czechoslovakia. Naturally the Hungarian delegation rejected this proposal, whereupon, after a special conversation, lasting only a few minutes, the Czechoslovak delegation made a new proposal in which it offered the 'Island' of Schuett, but without the North-West end. This proposal also was immediately rejected by the Hungarian Government. The next day—the 13th—the Czechoslovak delegation produced a new proposal which, though containing far-reaching territorial concessions, were certainly not acceptable as a basis of negotiation. The Hungarian delegation then asked the Czechoslovak delegation if it had another proposal to make which would go further to meet the Hungarian claims and, as no reply was received, a short statement was read to the effect that we regarded the negotiations as closed and the same evening the Hungarian delegation left Komárom. Our attitude was perfectly natural, especially as it was obvious that, in view of the attitude of the Czechoslovak delegation, there could be no hope of achieving any useful result by further negotiation.

It is scarcely necessary for me to describe in detail the diplomatic activities of the last few days, as we all have a lively recollection of them still.

These were accompanied by military measures. We called up five more "classes", as it was to be assumed that the negative attitude of the Czechoslovak delegation was due to lack of military equality, the Czech army being on a mobilization footing, while our army is at little more than normal strength.

Under the influence of the diplomatic steps taken by the Hungarian Government, a process was set in motion which resulted in the proposal received from Prague during the night of October 22nd. That proposal constitutes a substantial approximation to those principles on which the Hungarian proposal is based. It should be mentioned that this proposal made by Prague is largely the outcome of the diplomatic action undertaken by the Great Powers with whom we are on friendly terms and that we owe the deepest thanks to Germany, Italy and Poland.

This proposal by Prague agrees, as regards large portions of the frontier, with the frontier line proposed by us. It does, it is true, claim a few mixed-language districts and adopts, in the matter of some important towns, an attitude which cannot possibly be reconciled with ethnological principles, but can only be defended on economic and political grounds. The proposal is thus negative in respect of important districts. In particular, big towns like Pozsony, Nyitra, Kassa, Ungvar and Munkacs would, according to this proposal, fall outside the frontier line and thus go to the remaining territory of Czechoslovakia.

The Premier then commented upon the communiqué issued by the Hungarian Government and made the following statement in this connection:

"The plebiscite has been demanded by the Hungarian Government, because we are conscious of the justice of our cause, the Hungarian data correspond with the facts and we are quite confident that the plebiscite will prove that our attitude is justified.

The map attached to the Hungarian note divides the disputed areas into eight sections and the plebiscite would be held for each of these sections separately.

We do not despair of being able to settle the question peaceably on the basis of those principles laid down in Munich and steadfastly borne in mind by the Hungarians from the outset. Should it however so happen that our truly peaceable proposals are not accepted, the Hungarian Government is, now as before, determined to obtain its just rights by every means at the disposal of the nation."

3. After the Rejection of the Plebiscite: The Arbitration Proposal

The Czech Reply of October 26th, 1938

The Czechoslovak Government has carefully and thoroughly examined the proposals of the Hungarian Government which Your Excellency was good enough to communicate to me in your Note No. 39 of October 24th.

The Czechoslovak Government ventures again to observe that the present negotiations can only relate to the question of the Hungarian minorities. As points 1 and 2 of the Protocol to the Munich agreement of September 29th, 1938 only mention the Hungarian and Polish minorities, other ethnical questions must remain outside the scope of the present negotiations. As far as the Hungarian minority is concerned, the Czechoslovak Government continues to be inspired by the sincere desire that a frank, speedy and complete solution should be reached. For this purpose it submitted on October 22nd proposals relating to the whole of the compact Hungarian racial area. These proposals were submitted as a general basis for the new negotiations, the possibility of subsequent modifications being reserved.

As these proposals were not found satisfactory by the Hungarian Government, the Czechoslovak Government agrees that the question of the Hungarian minority should be submitted to the arbitration of Germany and Italy as the signatories of the Munich agreement.

It should be left to these two Powers to decide whether other arbitrators are to be appointed. Should these two Powers accept the Hungarian Government's proposal relating to Poland, the Czechoslovak Government proposes that Roumania should also take part in the arbitration.

The arbitral award should fix the procedure and dates for the evacuation of the ceded territories by the Czechoslovak troops and authorities and their occupation by the Hungarian troops and authorities. The Czechoslovak Government proposes that a Commission consisting of Hungarian and Czechoslovak military experts should meet immediately in order to prepare for and accelerate the execution of the requisite measures.

The Hungarian Reply of October 28th, 1938

The Royal Hungarian Government regrets that the Government of the Czechoslovak Republic has passed in complete silence over the question of the plebiscites proposed by the Hungarian Government. This attitude on the part of the Government of the Czechoslovak Republic has surprised the Hungarian Government all the more as its proposal was entirely in accordance with the spirit of the Munich agreement by which the Government of the Czechoslovak Republic was guided in its previous negotiations.

The Government of the Republic makes the assertion in the above-mentioned Note that "the present negotiations can only relate to the question of the Hungarian minorities", since "points 1 and 2 of the Protocol to the Munich agreement of September 29th, 1938 only mention the Polish and Hungarian minorities". While it is correct that the text of these agreements only mentions the Germans, Poles and Hungarians, it can nevertheless not be denied that the agreements in question have established the principle of the right of self-determination of the peoples as the basis for the reconstruction of the Czechoslovak Republic. Consequently the right to decide their own fate by a plebiscite cannot be denied to the minorities that desire to make use of this right. The Hungarian Government, while regretting that the Government of the Republic takes a different view, feels compelled to maintain its attitude.

The Czechoslovak Government has stated in the above mentioned note that it is prepared to accept the arbitration of Germany and Italy, which, in the view of the Hungarian Government, implies the obligation to comply with the arbitral award of the Powers in question from the outset.

It is natural that the competence of the arbitrators should only extend to the contested areas and not to territories with regard to which the two Governments have already reached an agreement and the occupation of which by Hungarian troops has already been proposed in the note of October 24th.

In the view of the Hungarian Government, questions relating to the composition and activities of the Court of Arbitration should be left to the Great Powers concerned.

As regards the proposal that "the arbitral award should fix the procedure and dates for the evacuation of the ceded territories by the Czechoslovak troops and authorities and their occupation by the Hungarian troops and authorities", the Hungarian Government takes the view that this proposal can only relate to the contested areas.

Accordingly the Hungarian Government is prepared to accept the proposal regarding the initiation of direct discussions immediately between the Hungarian and Czechoslovak experts with a view to preparing for and accelerating the execution of all requisite measures. For this purpose the Hungarian Military Attaché in Prague is entering into immediate connection with the competent Czechoslovak military authorities.

The Royal Hungarian Government notes with satisfaction that the Czechoslovak Government is inspired by the sincere desire to bring about a frank, speedy and complete solution.

The Hungarian Government reminds the Government of the Czechoslovak Republic that from the beginning of the negotiations it has always attached the greatest importance to the speediest possible solution of the frontier dispute outstanding between the two States and that it has rejected any responsibility for the consequences which may ensue from any delay in the negotiations.

4. The German-Italian Court of Arbitration

The Deutsche Nachrichtenbüro reports from Berlin:

Since it has proved impossible to settle the problem of the Hungarian minorities in Czechoslovakia and the question of an equitable ethnographical boundary delimitation between Hungary and Czechoslovakia in the last few weeks by direct negotiations between the two Governments, the Hungarian and Czechoslovak Governments have applied to the German and Italian Governments with a request that they should settle these questions by arbitration.

The Reich Foreign Minister, von Ribbentrop, on the occasion of his visit to Rome, has also discussed this question with the Italian Foreign Minister, Count Ciano, and has already informed the Italian Government that Germany agrees in principle to such settlement by arbitration. The Czechoslovak and Hungarian Governments having already stated that they accept the arbitral award unreservedly as the final settlement and will put it into execution without delay, the German and Italian Governments have now decided to give the arbitral award.

The Reich Foreign Minister von Ribbentrop and the Italian Foreign Minister Count Ciano will therefore meet on November 2nd in Vienna. The Hungarian and Czechoslovak Foreign Ministers are invited to proceed to Vienna on the same date.

Germany's Demand: Moral Disarmament and Disarmament of War Agitation

1. Extracts from Three Speeches by the Führer and Reich Chancellor

Munich, November 8th, 1938.

"Today we can look back on a great historical success. It is seldom granted to one generation to fight such a great fight and in addition to experience success. That is a special reward of Providence for us all. In looking back to the past, therefore, we will more than ever take the decision not to give up our old principles and virtues. In other words, we will be watchful and observant. Our experience has been too bitter and painful for us ever to lightly place any trust in the siren voices that come from the other side.

I only believe in the rights that we ourselves are able and determined to use for our protection. In the second place, I only believe in the reward which one has earned oneself. Nothing is given gratuitously to a nation in this world.

It would be a fine thing if the world took counsel with itself and took a new path, of general pacific justice. We should be glad to see signs of such a change of heart. But for the moment all I see is a world that is arming and everywhere threatening. It is said: "We have now found a new basis for a more peaceful development; therefore we must rearm." I do not quite understand this logic, but I do not protest against it. When I read every day in foreign newspapers that our armaments profoundly disturb the surrounding world, I can only say one thing: the non-rearmament of the German nation would disturb me. The armaments of the others do not disturb me. For on one thing there can be no doubt. If the world covers itself with arms, the German people will not walk the earth armed only with the palm of peace. In that case we will do everything necessary to secure peace for ourselves.

When the complaint is made that we place too little faith in peace assurances, I must refer back to my recent speeches. We do not make so bold as to meddle with the constitutions of others. It is not my desire that National Socialist principles should be applied by others. Let them stick to their democracy and we will stick to our National Socialism. But when it is said: "we naturally meant that the dictatorships and not the German and Italian peoples should be destroyed", I can only give one reply. This could have only been said before November 1918, but not after November 1918. A collapse such as Germany experienced then as a result of her simple faith will not occur again in the next thousand years.

It is not long since there was a discussion in the British House of Commons on civil aviation, and a new civilian aeroplane was declared to be particularly useful. An opposition member shouted: "It is to be hoped that this aeroplane can carry bombs to Berlin". We know what that means. It may be said that this was only an opposition member. In reply I say that according to the constitution of the democracies, the opposition of today may be the Government of tomorrow. In fact this is commonly the case.

We are very grateful that the leading men in France and England dissociate themselves from these ideas and wish to live on good terms with Germany. We have said more than once that we want nothing from these countries but the return of the colonies that were illegally taken from us. But I have always stated that that is naturally no case for war. It is, we affirm, a question of justice and of the genuine intention of rendering possible good-neighbourly conditions. Otherwise we have no claim on these countries and we demand nothing from them. We would merely like to do business with them, that is to say, we want to carry on trade with them. When they talk of understanding, we do not know what we should come to an understanding about.

But one thing must be kept in mind. In France and England at present there are certainly men at the helm who want peace. But other men make no secret of the fact that they want war against Germany. I am compelled to state this dispassionately before the nation and to draw the consequences. Tomorrow Mr. Churchill may be Prime Minister. If a British Opposition leader states that he does not want to destroy the German people but only the régime, this comes to the same thing, for no one can destroy the régime without destroying the German people. If anyone says he wants to free the German people from the régime, I reply: "For the German people you are not competent to speak." If any man is competent to speak for the German people, gentlemen of the British parliament, I am that man.

The German régime is an internal affair of the German people, and we decline any schoolmasterly inspection. Moreover I imagine that we have achieved more than these gentlemen and that we have in the first place put our State in order, which is more than can be said of all countries in the world.

I am therefore compelled to take into consideration the mentality of those who do not rule today but who may rule tomorrow and who leave no doubt as to their inner thoughts. The German people will understand why I warn them and why I am so determined to take all measures to be assured against any attack.

I am determined to ensure the security of the Reich to the utmost and I know that the entire German people will agree with me in this. Without any doubt it means sacrifices. But it is better for us to assume these sacrifices than to have to make contributions, or as they were formerly called, reparations, to foreign countries. There can therefore only be one decision for us, namely that which I spoke of at Saarbrücken. We are at all times prepared for peace. We have also not broken the peace. But we are also at all times prepared for defence, for manly and resolute defence.

If anyone tells me that we want to make history, not by legal means but by force, I can only say that present-day Germany has not refused to acquire her rights by negotiation. Year after year we tried by negotiation to attain our rights. English Members of Parliament in particular have no right to doubt this. For we have concluded a treaty with England by negotiation. If the others did not go with us, it was not our fault. But it must be affirmed that National Socialist Germany will never go to Canossa. We do not need to do that. If the rest of the world obstinately rejects the attempt to let justice prevail by means of negotiations, then it can cause no surprise that we should secure our rights by other means if we cannot obtain them by normal means. When these British advocates of world democracy assert that we have this year destroyed two democracies, I can only ask: what is meant by democracy? Who has the right to speak in the name of democracy?

Has God handed over the keys of democracy to Messrs. Churchill and Duff Cooper?

Is this written on the tables of the law that are in the possession of the British Opposition? Democracy is, in our view, a régime that is borne by the will of the people. I became Chancellor of Germany according to the rules of parliamentary democracy. I was the leader of by far the strongest party. According to the rules of parliamentary democracy I received at that time an absolute majority and—Mr. Churchill may doubt it—at the present time the unanimous approval of the German people. I have not set aside two democracies this year but I might almost say that as an arch-democrat I have removed dictatorships, namely those of M. Schuschnigg and M. Benesh. I endeavoured by peaceful means to prevail on these two dictatorships to bring about by means of democracy the right of self-determination for the people concerned. This attempt failed. I then used the force of the German nation to restore democracy in these countries, that is to say, to give freedom to the oppressed people.

The British Members of Parliament will no doubt be well informed about the British Empire, but they are not at home in the affairs of Central Europe. They have no knowledge of the position, of the events and of the conditions. They will not and should not take this remark as an offence; we also have not such an exact knowledge of matters in India, or in Egypt, or even in Palestine.

But I should consider it advisable if these gentlemen would concentrate the vast knowledge which they possess and the unflinching wisdom that is peculiar to them at this moment—let us say—on Palestine. For what is happening there smells very much of force and very little of democracy. But I only mention this as an example and by no means as a criticism, for I am only the representative of my German people and not the advocate of others. In that I am unlike Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden, who are the advocates of the whole world.

I am only the representative of my people. Here I do everything that I consider necessary, and if Mr. Churchill asks how the head of a State can cross swords with a British Member of Parliament, I reply: Mr. Churchill, you may feel honoured. From the fact that in Germany even the head of the State does not hesitate to cross swords with a British Member of Parliament, you can see how highly British Members of Parliament are esteemed by the German people.

Moreover I am not the head of a State in the sense of a dictator or monarch, but I am the Leader of the German people. There is no doubt that I might have taken quite different titles.

I have remained true to my past and will continue to do so as long as I live, for I do not want and have no intention of being different. That satisfies me. Mr. Churchill and these gentlemen are deputies of the British people and I am the deputy of the German people. The difference is that Mr. Churchill has only received the votes of a fraction of the British people, while I may say that I represent the entire German people.

In appealing to you, my old comrades, and with you the entire German people, to be on your guard, I am fulfilling a sacred right. In these few years I have obtained great successes for the nation. The nation must understand that I am always mindful of its security. I do not wish that, at the end of my days, my eyes should close with the same gloomy prophecies as was the case with Bismarck. I wish that what has been so painfully acquired should be maintained for ever by the mighty force of the entire German nation."

Weimar, November 6th, 1938.

"It may be possible to speak of a miracle when one considers this development. All the old Party comrades who experienced this gigantic development can only look back with emotion to these and to the great events which have since occurred. But, on looking back, what appears to us almost as a miracle is nothing more than the reward for immeasurable and indefatigable work. For we National Socialists can affirm in the face of German history that never have more fervent efforts, greater work and greater sacrifices been made for the German people than in this period of the struggle of our movement for the Germans.

Now we have received our reward from Providence, just as formerly the Germany of 1918 received her reward. At that time she received her share of the blessings included under the common idea of "democracy". The Germany of that time clung to the hopes which were perhaps more strongly expressed by the American who assured us of a peace in which there would be neither victors nor vanquished. After the German people had laid down their arms in their faith in these theories, they learned that democracy in practice is not the same as in theory.

When today parliamentarians or politicians dare to assert that Germany did not keep her treaties, we can only give them one reply, namely that the greatest breach of treaty of all times was committed against the German people. Everything that was promised to Germany in the 14 points, on the basis of which the Germans laid down their arms, was subsequently broken.

In 1932 Germany was faced by definite collapse. The German Reich and people seemed to be lost. But then came the German rebirth. It began with a change in faith. While all the German parties before us believed in forces and ideals which lay outside the Reich and our people, we National Socialists steadfastly retained our faith in our own people and adhered to the ever valid principle that God helps those who are prepared and determined to help themselves.

Instead of all those international factors—democracy, popular conscience, world conscience, League of Nations, etc.—we have placed a single factor, i.e. our own people. But this people had to be freed from its division and dismemberment. Thus arose the National Socialist Party with the order and the task to remove this medley of political associations and to replace it by a single power: the power of a movement. This National Socialist Party thus became the bearer of the German national community. It was clear to us all that this national community could not be attained in a day but that for many decades and perhaps for always the individual man must be trained for this national community. We have carried on this educational work since the foundation of the Party and in particular since we came into power.

But nothing is perfect in this world, and no success can be regarded as definitely satisfactory. We will therefore not assert today that what we have attained is in itself the desired ideal. We have set ourselves an ideal, in accordance with which we are educating the German people, generation after generation. Thus National Socialism will develop more and more from a political confession to a real national education.

A second task was the movement for the creation of a selection of new leaders and the training of a new class of leaders. Only the wilfully blind can today dispute that the political leadership of the German nation is different internally and externally from what it was five, ten or fifteen years ago. The umbrella-carrying types of our former bourgeois parties are extinct and will never return. To those who still remember them with a tear in their eye, I can say only one thing: this movement has been given its present leadership as the result of a hard struggle, but the leadership of the future of which we are at present drawing the main lines has a totally different appearance. It will be a body of the firmest determination and the most unscrupulous activity, so that in 30, 40 or 50 years it will be impossible to imagine that things have ever been different. The party is the guarantor of this leadership of our people.

But our third creation is the new defensive power. From the first day I adopted a principle, namely that the German is either the first soldier in the world or he is no soldier at all.

We cannot and will not refrain from being soldiers. We will therefore be the first. As a peace-loving man, I have endeavoured to give the German people such defence and such arms as are calculated to persuade others to peace.

But there are people who reproach the hedgehog for having quills. They should surely leave this animal in peace. No hedgehog has ever attacked unless it was itself threatened. We should like to take this as an example. No one should come too near us. We want nothing but our tranquillity, our possibility of work and the right of our people to existence, we want the same rights as others claim for themselves. This should be understood particularly by the democratic States for they are constantly talking of equality of rights. If they talk of the rights of the small States, how can they be indignant if a great State claims the same rights? The assurance and guarantee of this legal claim is our National Socialist defensive power. In this sense I have made a change in our foreign policy and have approached those States who, like ourselves, have been compelled to claim their rights.

In reviewing the results of our actions today, I can only say: Judge for yourselves whether we have not attained immense results with our principles. But we will therefore never forget what made these successes possible. When certain foreign newspapers write today: "You could have got all that by negotiations", we are well aware that the Germany that existed before us did nothing else but negotiate constantly. For fifteen years they negotiated and yet lost everything. I am also prepared to negotiate, but I leave no doubt of the fact that I will not allow German rights to be curtailed either by negotiation or by any other means.

Never forget, German people, to what you owe your successes, to what movement, to what ideas and to what principles. In the second place, always be cautious and always be on your guard. It is very fine to talk of international disarmament, but I am suspicious of a disarmament in arms so long as there is no disarmament in spirit.

A certain custom has developed in the world of dividing the nations into so-called authoritarian, that is to say, disciplined, States and democratic States. In the authoritarian or disciplined States it is taken for granted that foreign nations are not abused or slandered and that there is no war agitation. But the democratic States are not democratic for nothing, that is to say all these things are permitted. In the authoritarian States incitement to war is out of place, for the Governments are obliged to see to it that none takes place. But in the democratic countries the Governments are obliged only to uphold democracy, which means freedom, if necessary, even to incite to war.

I have recently mentioned three of these international warmongers. They have felt themselves hit, not at all on the question of principle but only because I dared to mention them by name. Mr. Churchill said he is of opinion that the German Government must be set aside with the help of those internal German forces which would perhaps gladly put themselves at his disposal for that purpose. If Mr. Churchill has less to do with emigré circles, that is to say with traitors who are in the pay of foreign countries, and more with Germans, he would realise the entire madness and stupidity of his language.

For I can assure this gentleman, who seems to live in the moon, of one thing: there is no force in Germany which could turn against the present régime. In Germany there is only one force, the force of the German nation, with its leaders and followers, its defence and its arms.

But there is one thing I will not dispute with these gentlemen. We have naturally no right to demand that other nations alter their Constitutions. I have only the duty, as Leader of the Germans to take account of these Constitutions and the possibilities to which they give rise. A few days ago the deputy Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons declared: 'I desire that Germany and Italy shall be destroyed.' Naturally I cannot prevent the democratic game bringing this man into the Government in perhaps two years' time, but I can give this assurance: I will prevent him from destroying Germany. And just as I am certain that the German people will prevent the plans of these gentlemen succeeding, I know that the Italian people also will take care that they do not succeed.

I believe that from these international hopes there can only be one lesson for us, namely to stand firmly together and to stand firmly with our friends. The more we in Germany succeed in forming a single community, the smaller will be the prospects of these war agitators, the closer shall we combine with the State which is in the same position as ourselves, namely with Italy, and the less desire will they have to pick a quarrel with us.

Looking back in spirit on the year 1938, we can only be filled with the deepest pride and the greatest joy. Germany has become greater in the most natural and the most morally unimpeachable way. Millions of our compatriots whose only dream and whose only aim it was to return to Germany have entered our community. They will now help to bear the Reich and to serve it as loyal members, because they have been in the best position to judge what it means to be separated and abandoned. But this year is also a year of great obligations for us. We must learn from it and decide never to depart from the path of success.

If others speak of disarmament, we are also prepared to disarm, but on one condition, that there must first be a disarmament of war agitation. But so long as the others merely talk of disarmament, but continue their infamous war agitation, we assume that they only want to steal our arms and again to reserve for us the fate of 1918-19. Then I can tell Mr. Churchill and his friends one thing; that happened once but never again.

I began my path with a firm belief in the German people. What else would at that time have saved us from despair? I believed in the German people, in its inner value and therefore also in its future. Today that faith has been justified in a wonderful manner. In the past year it has merely been strengthened. How wonderfully our people have stood the test in the past five or six years! Has not everything been fulfilled that I prophesied from year to year and that we all yearned for? How wonderfully our people behaved in the last few weeks and months! You can believe me, my comrades, I am so proud and happy to be your Leader. Particularly in the last few weeks our German people have shown a glorious picture of firm determination such as I learned to know in the worst days of the War. There has been no nervousness, no haste, no uncertainty, no feeling of despair, but confidence and the most loyal obedience. Every single man and woman knew that destiny might demand from them the extreme effort. It was this resolution and calm which spared them the extreme effort. Destiny did not challenge us, because it knew we were strong. Let us take this as a lesson for all future time. Then nothing can happen to our dear Germany, either now or in all eternity, Germany! Sieg-Heil."

Saarbrücken, October 9th, 1938.

"In the midst of these great days and events I come to you Gau in the conviction that no one is able to show more understanding for the last few weeks than yourselves. You, men and women of the Saar, have yourselves experienced what it means to be separated from the Reich, but you have also experienced the joy of reunion. You also suffered for nearly twenty years all the pain of separation and were more than joyful when the hour of freedom finally struck and you were able to return to our common Great German Reich. Millions of Germans in Sudetenland have had the same experience and have now experienced the same jubilation with which you were formerly filled.

At the beginning of this twentieth year after our collapse, I took the decision to bring back to the Reich the ten million Germans who were still outside our frontiers.

I was perfectly aware that this return could only be achieved by our own strength. The rest of the world could not and did not wish to see that here, in opposition to the so-called right of self-determination, ten million people were separated from the German Reich and were oppressed on account of their Germanism. And they could not and did not wish to understand that these people had only one great longing: to return to the Reich.

These international citizens of the world, who have pity on every criminal who is brought to book in Germany, were deaf to the misery of ten million Germans. This world is still filled with the spirit of Versailles. Let it not be said that the world has been released from it. No! Germany has released herself from it.

A stern decision had to be taken. There were also weaklings among us, who perhaps did not understand that. But it is obviously at all times to the honour of real statesmen to take such a responsibility.

A number of conditions were necessary in order to bring about this solution.

The first was the inner unity of the nation. In taking my decision I was convinced of being the leader of a manly people. I know what perhaps many in the rest of the world and a few even in Germany do not yet appear to know, namely:

that the people of the year 1938 are not the people of 1918. No one can overlook the vast educational work carried out by our ideology. At the present day a national community has arisen of a force and strength such as Germany has never yet known. This was the first condition for the success of such a struggle.

The second was the national armament for which I have worked fanatically for nearly six years. I am of opinion that it is cheaper to arm before events than to lie unarmed at the mercy of events, and then pay out to foreign countries.

The third assumption was the making secure of the Reich, and here you yourselves are the witnesses of a mighty work which is drawing to completion in your immediate neighbourhood. I need give you no details of this. I express but one conviction—that no Power in the world will succeed in breaking through this wall.

And, fourthly, we have won for ourselves friends abroad. That axis of which people abroad have so often felt entitled to make fun has in the last two-and-a-half weeks not only shown itself to be abiding, but proved that it has survived even the worst hours.

We are happy that this work of the year 1938, the reunion of ten million Germans and about 110,000 square kilometres of territory in the Reich, could take place without bloodshed, in spite of the hopes of so many international agitators and profiteers.

In referring to the cooperation of the rest of the world in this placeful solution, I must mention in the first place the only true friend we possess today: Benito Mussolini. We all know what we owe this man. I would also mention the two other statesmen who endeavoured to find a way and who concluded with us that agreement which secured their rights for many million Germans and peace for the world.

But the experiences of these last eight months can and must only strengthen us in the determination to be cautious and to neglect nothing that must be done for the protection of the Reich.

We have opposite us statesmen who—and we must believe this of them—desire peace. But they rule in countries whose inner construction makes it possible for them to be replaced at any time by others who have not the same eye for peace. And these others are already there. In England Mr. Chamberlain only needs to be replaced by Mr. Duff Cooper, Mr. Eden or Mr. Churchill and we know for certain that the aim of these men would be to begin a new world war immediately. They make no secret of the fact, but openly express it.

We also know that in the background still lurks that Jewish international enemy who has found his State basis and expression in Bolshevism. In addition we know the power of a certain international press which only lives on lies and calumnies. That compels us to be on our guard and to be mindful of the protection of the Reich. At all times ready for peace, at all times ready for defence!

I have therefore determined that the development of our fortifications in the west, as announced in my Nuremberg speech, shall be continued with renewed energy. I will now include in these fortifications the two great areas which lay hitherto in front of our fortifications, the Aachen and Saarbrücken areas.

As a strong State we are at all times prepared to conduct a policy of understanding with our neighbours. We demand nothing from them. We desire nothing but peace. We want only one thing and this applies especially to our relations with England. It would be well if people in England would gradually give up certain airs of the Versailles period. We will no longer tolerate governessy guardianship. Inquiries by British politicians regarding the fate of Germans or citizens of the Reich within the frontiers of the Reich are out of place.

We do not trouble about similar matters in England. The rest of the world might at times have sufficient reason to worry about their own national affairs or, for instance, about events in Palestine. For our part, however, we leave it to those who feel called by God to solve these problems and merely observe with amazement how quickly they reach their solutions.

We should like to advise these gentlemen to deal with their own problems and leave us alone. This is also in the interest of world peace. We ourselves have great tasks before us. Vast cultural and economic problems must be solved. No nation can need peace more than we do, but no nations knows better than we do what it means to be weak and to be at the mercy of others.

Comrades! In this year a great work of national unity has been accomplished: the re-establishment of a proud, strong and free German Reich.

2. Speech by the German Foreign Minister, Herr von Ribbentrop, before the Foreign Press Association in Berlin on November 7th, 1938

Herr von Ribbentrop began by saying that he and his Department quite understood the special requirements of the Press. He was afraid that he would have to disappoint those who expected him to give them a detailed exposition of the aims of German foreign policy, as he was leaving almost immediately for Munich to take part in the celebrations there. He was compelled in fairness to say that recently there had been a change for the better in the reports by the foreign press correspondents in Berlin which, in his opinion, was due to increasing insight and growing appreciation of the fact that National-Socialism was a popular movement. If, as he hoped, that development continued, foreign correspondents would be fulfilling their real mission and rendering a valuable service to good relations between their countries and Germany.

"It will, however", he said, "need a great deal of good will and painstaking work to make good the damage which has in this respect been done to the German nation in past years. The result of this can be seen in the great campaign of agitation which is still being carried on against Germany abroad. The way in which the Sudeten problem was handled was an almost classical example of a campaign of agitation of this nature and of the damage which an irresponsible Press can do. I should like briefly to recapitulate what happened.

(1) The nations know that the only sensible solution is the return of the Sudetenland to Germany and that the time is more than ripe for this solution. A certain international Press proclaims the contrary to be the case, and begins a campaign of agitation to prevent this solution. The Czechs, taking courage from this invent the story of German mobilization, in order to mobilize themselves on May 21. Germany does nothing and watches this unusual game in dignified calm.

(2) The fact that Germany takes no action is immediately seized upon by these international Press agitators to accuse her of weakness and of climbing down before the threats of the Western Powers. This went so far that private visits by Germans to the Western capitals were represented as peace overtures by Germany, who was afraid of Western wrath. The attempts of Press agitators to pave the way for war against Germany become more and more open. But Germany still remains calm and prepares for every eventuality.

(3) The Führer declares that the Sudetenland must now, one way or the other, come to Germany, and makes his military preparations. The war Press abroad screams itself hoarse. At this moment, taking no notice of all this agitation, the heads of the Governments take matters into their own

You yourselves have had to experience so much suffering, that you understand that I am concerned for the future of the Reich and appeal to the entire German people to be always on their guard and prepared. It is like a miracle that we have been able to experience a new German rebirth in so few years. It might have been quite different. We will always bear this in mind and renew our determination to serve this Germany, man for man, woman for woman; we will set aside all personal interests at any moment when the greater interest of our nation and Reich demands it.

For the second time I stand amongst you. The first time your jubilation was an expression of your joy at reunion. Today you are experiencing the jubilation of other millions of Germans who have also returned to the Reich. We will all join with them in their faith in our glorious united German Reich. Germany—Sieg Heil."

hands. The Munich Agreement is brought about, the Sudetenland is allotted to Germany in complete peace. And on their return the heads of the Governments are received with loud cheers by their peoples.

One thing is quite clear; in the first place a certain international Press succeeded in the face of all justice and common sense in making a world problem out of the Czech problem, when all it concerned was the vital interests of Germany alone; in the second place—when it was clear that the iron determination of the Führer stood in the way—this Press did all it could to egg the nations on to go to war for this reason and against their will. And perhaps they might have been successful, if, instead of Chamberlain and Daladier, those war agitators whom we know only too well had been at the helm in these countries and had endeavoured to banish their fearful dreams by unleashing a preventive war.

It is to be hoped that the conclusions drawn from recent events will be that on the one hand Germany was completely prepared for such a possibility, and that, on the other hand, the success of this warmongering would have meant the destruction of the authors' unsuspecting nations.

I should like further to mention the particularly regrettable fact that during the crisis a number of Governments made no efforts to persuade the Press of their countries to report the news calmly and objectively. I am convinced that every Government can, if it wishes, make sure that news reports are true to the facts. On the other hand, we have unfortunately observed on many occasions that Governments, instead of exerting a calming influence, have even helped to increase the excitement and added fuel to the fire. We have observed with surprise that a number of Governments did a sorry service to peace by adopting a one-sided attitude and increasing the unrest and the further such Governments were removed from the theatre of events, the greater was their tendency to behave in this way. We have seen that a number of Governments issued proclamations which were not in accordance with the facts, and were also entirely unsuited to calm people's minds or to enlighten them as to the true circumstances. These proclamations were obviously intended to be a means of exerting pressure or bluffing other Governments in the course of the diplomatic discussions of the past weeks.

In this connexion I wish to state that Germany was very much in earnest during this period, and that if a solution had not been found in Munich at the eleventh hour the Führer would have freed the Sudetenland by force of arms.

A further example of the terribly destructive effect which a campaign of hate can have upon a people is provided by the story of the "Martian giants of Princeton" with which you are all familiar. Amusing as this incident is in itself, it nevertheless has a serious aspect. The mass hysteria caused by the broadcast play was, in the last analysis, only a consequence of the war psychosis produced in the American people by the references to Germany in a certain section of the Press.

I will now say a few words about the mission of the foreign correspondents in Berlin. I believe that the majority of the correspondents of foreign papers here endeavour to report reasonably and impartially. We realize too that during the recent crisis, they did not always have an easy task, and I know many cases in which reliable and impartial reports by foreign correspondents about Germany were either not printed at all by their editors at home or were printed in a distorted form. Moreover, a false report fabricated in the editorial office of a foreign newspaper was recently served up to the foreign reader as an original report from Berlin. That the attitude of this editor was in glaring contrast to the real mind of his own nation in those days and that editors of that sort entirely misestimated the feeling among the German people is abundantly clear today. I hope that this too has been realized and that in future those concerned will lend a more willing ear to the reports of the foreign press correspondents in Germany.

If it is asked how such a complete misunderstanding of a perfectly natural situation by a considerable portion of the Press is possible, I should say that—apart from the press which systematically agitates against Germany in the service of Bolshevism—the cause is to be found in the prevalence of an over-intellectual attitude on the part of those who run the papers. By seeking to approach political events in a spirit of abstract intellectuality, they apply a false criterion to such events. This often has very serious results and leads to totally false political conclusions. The true journalist must nowadays be in touch with the people. If he loses touch with the pulse or the soul of the people, he can never interpret political reality or political activity.

This naturally applies especially to foreign correspondents, as a foreign correspondent must not only keep his hand on the pulse of his own nation, but know the country in which he works inside out, its activities and its aspirations. Only in this way can he be an honest mediator between his own people and the country whose hospitality he enjoys and unless he is such a mediator he cannot be a valuable coadjutor of diplomacy. We know of so many cases in history where the work of a great journalist has been of signal importance from the point of view of the policy of his country and I therefore welcome the fact that the foreign correspondents in Berlin are gradually showing more appreciation of the activities and aspirations of the German people. I hope that in this way the work of the foreign correspondents in Germany will help more and more to reveal in its true proportions the tremendous recovery made by Germany in all fields since the National-Socialist Party came into power and to interpret future German foreign policy to the world.

Is it not perfectly natural that a strong and healthy people should in the end have refused to be oppressed and should have rallied round the Leader, when he appeared? Abstract power politics are not as our adversaries abroad often declare, the distinguishing mark of National-Socialist Germany, but the unification of our German nation and the safeguarding of that nation within the frontiers of a strong empire have always been the decisive considerations in National-Socialist foreign policy. The Führer's feat in performing this miracle in less than six years is sometimes depicted abroad as the result of "ruthless power politics". Nothing could be further from the truth, as Germany was rendered completely helpless and defenceless by Versailles. Not ruthless power politics, but an assembling in National-Socialism of all the spiritual forces of Germany on a scale unprecedented in history, the heroic determination of the German people to make every sacrifice, its belief in the Führer and its unity have freed Germany. In this way only was it possible for a world Power to arise out of the Germany of before 1933—the Germany of weakness and impotence.

Gentlemen, you have witnessed this creation of a completely new and mighty Germany. A feeling of pride fills the heart of every German today after those years of humiliation and oppression when he realizes that Germany is unassailable for all time.

In the consciousness of the inner power of her 80,000,000 people, Germany's future is now secured. Over and above this, Germany can rely on the firmly founded friendship of other Powers. The Rome-Berlin axis, the connexion of German and Italy with Japan in her successful struggle against Bolshevism, our friendly relations with Poland—those pillars of German foreign policy are to-day the guarantees of order and peace in Europe and the world.

Under the sign of this new order and of the deep friendship between Fascist Italy and National-Socialist Germany and their two great leaders, the Führer was able to accomplish the great historic act of the peaceful incorporation of Austria and the Sudetenland—10 million Germans—in the German Reich. This incorporation, without a drop of blood shed, is an event unprecedented in history, whereby the millennial desire of the German people was fulfilled.

A further sign of the confidence of the nations in this new European order and in the approach of Fascism and National-Socialism to European problems is the fact that the Hungarian and Czechoslovak Governments a few days ago appealed to the Axis Powers to bring about a settlement by arbitration in the century-old conflict over the delimitation of the northern frontier of Hungary. What the League of Nations could not accomplish in 20 years required only one day in Vienna. Thus Vienna prepared the ground for a new cooperation and peaceful reconstruction in the south-east of Europe. The arbitral award made by the Italian Foreign Minister, Count Ciano, and myself, after mature deliberation and careful weighing of all interests, has now definitely established the frontier between Hungary and Czechoslovakia on an ethnographic basis.

The award also proved that after the settlement of the Sudeten question Germany is not governed by any feeling of revenge or hatred towards Czechoslovakia, but that the German Government took pains both to safeguard the interests of friendly Hungary and to deal with Czechoslovak interests in a loyal and just manner. If the Czechoslovak Government are prepared, after the final delimitation of the frontier, to take the new situation fully into account and to undertake a complete reorientation of their policy towards Germany, it will be possible to bring about a settlement with this State and a final appeasement between the two nations.

The position of the Third Reich as a world Power is now definitely established. But this does not mean that Germany does not share the desire for a settlement between the interests of the various Powers. In this connexion it may here be recalled that it was the Führer who invited the Powers to Munich in September in order to find a peaceful way out of the crisis. In the same spirit, at the desire of the British Prime Minister, the Führer made with him on the day of his departure the famous Anglo-German peace declaration.

We were all the more astonished that the first answer to the spirit of Munich took the form of the slogan: "Peace is saved, therefore arm to the utmost." The new armament fever in several countries is accompanied by renewed efforts on the part of incorrigible war agitators. In this connexion we must note with regret that these war agitators, fearing that Germany's well-known and uncompromising legal demand for the return of the former German colonies might be fulfilled, are carrying on in the African Press an amazing propaganda against Germany and everything German.

Mr. Chamberlain and Lord Halifax have with wise insight given a clear rebuke to all these English war agitators and their endeavours to drive the nations apart. The Prime Minister of France, M. Daladier, and his Foreign Minister, M. Bonnet, have likewise made speeches in the last few weeks which have found a sympathetic echo in Germany. It may be expected that in the further pursuit of the path entered upon with England at Munich, new possibilities of better understanding between Germany and France as well will result and will take an appropriate form. In this sense the desire of the French Foreign Minister for sincere collaboration between Germany and France has been welcomed by us. The newly confirmed settlement between Italy and Great Britain is in the same direction.

This attitude on the part of the responsible statesmen in London and Paris admits of the hope that reason may after all gain the upper hand over the war agitators in the western democracies. In his speech at Weimar yesterday the Führer condemned the activities of these war agitators with relentless vigour and logic. As against these activities the German nation stands united and firm behind its Führer: strong and alert, always ready for peace but without fear of war, and always resolved to preserve the vital rights of the nation against any one.

MUNICH AND ITS REPERCUSSIONS IN THE OPINION OF THE BRITISH CROWN AND RESPONSIBLE BRITISH MINISTERS

Extracts from the Speeches from the Throne by George VI on the occasion of the closing of the Parliamentary Session 1937-38 on November 4th and the opening of the 1938-39 Session on November 8th, 1938.

"I have followed with deep anxiety the developments of the grave crisis through which Europe has just passed. Throughout the whole period My Government, in close accord with the French Government, made every endeavour both in Prague and in Berlin to ensure a lasting and peaceful settlement of the problem of the German minority in Czechoslovakia. Their efforts were ably assisted by a mission of investigation and mediation in Czechoslovakia, headed by Viscount Runciman.

In view of the increasing gravity of the crisis the Prime Minister on the 14th September decided to fly to Berchtesgaden in order to establish personal contact with the German Chancellor. This initiative was followed on the 22nd September by a further visit by the Prime Minister to Godesberg. At this stage the prospect of a peaceful settlement seemed almost to have vanished, but at the last moment the Prime Minister made a proposal to the German Chancellor for a Four-Power Conference. Signor Mussolini gave valuable support to the suggestion, and on the 29th September the German Chancellor, the French President of the Council, the Head of the Italian Government, and the Prime Minister met at Munich and came to an agreement. The settlement thus arrived at was accepted, with a dignity that has earned general admiration, by the Government and people of Czechoslovakia.

The cause of peace was powerfully aided by the timely action of the President of the United States of America. The desire of all peoples not to be drawn into war with one another is manifest and significant, and everywhere men and women share with Me, I am convinced, a feeling of deep thankfulness that the imminent peril was thus averted. I pray that, with the passing of this peril, a new era may have opened for Europe.

During this period of anxiety it became necessary to put into force certain measures, including the mobilization of the Navy, the calling out of a considerable portion of the personnel of the auxiliary Forces and the initiation of certain precautions against air raids. All these arrangements were carried out with admirable promptitude. In every department of national life men and women alike came forward to serve their country. I was proud to observe the calmness and determination displayed by all My people and I thank them for their spirit of service.

The continued strengthening of our defences has required additional taxation, which has been accepted as necessary by the country.

Defence requirements have engaged the unremitting attention of My Ministers, and are being reviewed in the light of recent experience.

I have given My assent to a Measure requiring local authorities to prepare schemes of air raid precautions for their areas. Such schemes are an essential part of the defence organization of the country."

"My relations with foreign Powers continue to be friendly, and my Government will do all in their power to promote the development of good understanding in the spirit of the joint Anglo-German declaration made at Munich on September 30 last.

The agreement negotiated last April between my Government and the Italian Government will now shortly be brought into force. I believe that this action will confirm the traditional good relations so happily and so long subsisting between our two countries, and thus further the cause of European peace.

Although the equipment and expansion of my Defence Forces are now making rapid progress, the emergency through which we have passed had shown that certain deficiencies in our military and civil defence preparations remain to be remedied.

The problems of civil defence, including that of the effective utilization of the resources of the nation for national voluntary service, will in future receive the undivided attention of a Minister, the Lord Privy Seal."

The Prime Minister, Mr. Neville Chamberlain, in the House of Commons on November 1st 1938.

In the first part of his speech the right hon. gentleman (M. Attlee) asked a number of questions and made a number of comments upon what he considered to be the consequences of the Munich agreement. There was one statement to which I must take exception. He described the Munich agreement as a great defeat for this country and France and the cause of law and order. If the right hon. gentleman really believes that I am still sorry that he should say so publicly. It is not one of the characteristics of the totalitarian States, at any rate, that they are accustomed to foul their own nests. I do strongly deprecate all the statements made by persons in responsible, or even in irresponsible, positions who take opportunities of broadcasting to the world or to other countries in particular that their own country is in a state of decadence.

Others have gone a great deal further than he has done, but the observation which he has made gave me an opportunity of expressing an opinion which, I think, is very widely held. I do not regard the Munich agreement as a defeat either for the democracies or for the cause of law and order. On the contrary, the Munich agreement was an attempt to carry out by discussion between two Powers representing democracies and two Powers representing totalitarian States an agreed solution of a problem of which the only other solution appeared to be the use of force. Instead of using force, the agreement has been carried out in an orderly manner.

It is quite true that there are many things which followed which none of us would approve of, which all of us would wish to have done differently. That is quite true, but hon. members should consider that, as the Foreign Secretary said on another occasion, we had to choose between hard alternatives; and when you find fault, as you may justly find fault, with the solution which has in fact been carried out, do not forget what the alternative was and what the effect of the alternative would have been upon Czechoslovakia itself.

After all, the Munich agreement, which was come to in the course of a comparatively short time, measured by hours, could not be expected to deal in itself with every detail of the operation that was contemplated. All that we could do at Munich was to lay down certain general outlines, and to leave to an International Commission the task of filling in the details. The right hon. gentleman criticizes the International Commission in the carrying out of that task. I say again that we may not like the solution, but I would ask the right hon. gentleman not to forget what the alternative was; and if he was not prepared to accept the alternative, which was the use of force we must recognize that we had to accept the alternative, disagreeable though it may be in many respects.

The right hon. gentleman spoke, among other things, about the boundaries which are to be laid down between the new State of Czechoslovakia and Germany. By the fourth article of the Munich agreement there was imposed on the International Commission the duty of determining the extent of the territory, outside the four zones which were to be occupied by German troops by October 7, which being preponderantly German in 1918 should be occupied by Germany by October 10. The time was short, but the International Commission decided that in order to ascertain the limits of that territory they must get as near as they could to the position in 1918. That was in accordance with the method of taking the plebiscite in the Saar district. The right hon. gentleman says that they went back much farther than 1918, they went back to 1910, and that no justification has ever been given for going back to a period so long ago as that.

I do not know that there has been any opportunity, on any previous occasion, for giving that justification, but of course the answer is very simple. There was no census in 1918, and as there were no reliable figures for that date the International Commission were obliged to go back to the last date for which there were reliable figures, and that was 1910. That was the reason why the census of 1910 was taken as a basis.

The reason was because the basis was taken as the position in 1918, the argument being—I am not saying this is my view, I am only explaining the basis on which it was taken—that the position had been deliberately changed since 1918 by the introduction of Czechs into areas which in 1918 were predominantly German, and therefore if a census had been taken later than in 1918 it would not have met that particular objection.

Once the Czechoslovak Government had accepted that decision of the International Commission, which they did on October 13, it became apparent that there was no longer any need for plebiscites, and the Germans and the Czechs agreed that the line which had been determined in accordance with that basis should be the provisional frontier, but that it should be subject to examination and modification, not only in accordance with strictly ethnographical considerations, but also taking into account economic considerations. It will be observed that in consequence of that agreement the line may be modified, not only in those areas in which under the original agreement there would have been a plebiscite, but that the whole line from one end to the other may be reconsidered.

Another point to which the right hon. gentleman addressed himself referred to the rights of optants. He said that the clause referring to optants was entirely illusory. I do not know what right he had to say that. I do not know whether he is aware of the present position. Under article 7 of the Munich agreement it provided that a German-Czech Commission were to settle the details of this right of opting. They were to determine ways of facilitating the transfer of those individuals who wished to exercise the right, and also any questions of principle which arose out of the transfer. This is a subject of considerable magnitude, because we are informed that there are something like 580,000 Czechs now in German territory and something like 250,000 Germans in Czech territory. I can only say that that is a matter which is left to this German-Czech Commission, and they have not yet, I understand, formulated any conclusion, but when they do they will bring them to the notice of the International Commission.

I am not yet in a position to add anything on the subject of guarantees to that which has already been said by the Minister for the Coordination of Defence (Sir T. Inskip). The position remains exactly the same, and it cannot be cleared up until the whole question of minorities in Czechoslovakia has been settled. The House will remember that it was stated that Germany and Italy would be ready to enter into a guarantee on the question of Czechoslovakia when the question of minorities had been settled. Our original offer was to enter into an international guarantee, but what the terms of that guarantee will be and who will be the partakers in that guarantee is not a question on which I can give the House any further information today. Before anything is settled, the terms of such a guarantee and the names of those who are taking part in it would be brought before this House.

I am sorry that Mr. Attlee thought it necessary to suggest that the activities of Dr. Funk, who is the Minister concerned with economic questions, should be concealing some political motive. It is this attitude of constant suspicion—nothing can be done by anybody but what somebody or other finds concealed in it something sinister or evil—which is very largely the cause of the want of confidence existing in Europe to-day.

What, taking an economic view, is the position of Germany in relation to the States of Central and South-Eastern Europe? Geographically, she must occupy a dominating position there. She does now. In so far as those States are agricultural in character the nature of the trade between them and Germany is complementary. They can supply Germany with raw materials and food-stuffs in return for articles of manufacture which Germany is so well fitted to supply, but I do not see any reason why we should expect that fundamental change is likely to take place in those regions.

So far as Czechoslovakia is concerned, the industries in the ceded regions were industries mainly exporting in character, and they suffered a good deal in competition from Germany. It is quite true that she has ceded also valuable supplies of raw materials, such as coal, lignite, and timber, but so long as she is able to import those raw materials there is no reason, so far as I can see, why her industrial position should be worsened. Exchanges of goods over the frontier between Germany and Czechoslovakia are likely to be mutually beneficial. I do not imagine that there will be difficulty put in her way in importing raw materials.

So far as this country is concerned we have no wish to block Germany out from those countries or to encircle her economically. It is true that we have certain trade interests there ourselves, and of course we mean to maintain those trade interests; and indeed, in that respect, we shall have the good will of the countries themselves. Although their natural market is to be found chiefly in Germany, nevertheless they can, as a rule, only obtain payment from Germany, either in the form of goods—a barter arrangement—or in the form of block marks. That does not suit them. They want free currency so that they may import other materials and things which they cannot get in Germany. Therefore, they do desire at least a certain proportion of their trade to be done with other countries, and for that reason we shall have their assistance and good will in our efforts to maintain our trade.

Do not let us suppose that there necessarily must be economic warfare between Germany and ourselves. There must be some competition. Competition is a thing that we thrived on in the past. It is not in our interest to see any part of the world remain poor. If by means of international trade between Germany and these countries the economic position of these countries is improved you may be quite certain that we shall get our share of the trade. They may not buy exactly the same things from us as they buy from Germany, but they will buy from us those articles which we are most fitted to supply. In my view, there is room both for Germany and for us in trade with those countries and neither of us ought to try to obtain an exclusive possession of their markets.

Generally on the military side we have not yet completed the consideration of the review which we have made, but there will be an opportunity in the new Session of Parliament to have a full debate on this subject. I would like, however, to make two general observations on the subject now. I want hon. members to remember that our programme of rearmament is a five-year programme, and that we are now only in the third year of that programme. Therefore, to argue that because everything has not been completed in the third year the programme had broken down is to lose sight altogether of the fact that it was never intended to be completed in three years. I doubt whether it would have been possible, if we had endeavoured to do so at the beginning of the programme, to squeeze a five-year programme into three years, but to conclude our review does bring up the special urgency of certain parts of that programme and the necessity for reinforcement of certain weak spots, which, if they were allowed to continue, might jeopardize the effectiveness of the whole system which we have built up.

Therefore we have to address ourselves to this point. The measures which it will be necessary to take will undoubtedly add to the total cost of armaments as we had hitherto contemplated. That brings me to my second observation, which concerns the use which is to be made of these armaments. I tried on October 5 to give as clear an exposition as I could of the Government's policy, but I regret to observe that since then doubts have been expressed in some quarters both at home and abroad as to whether this review, this bringing up to standard of the scale of our armaments, is consistent with the peaceful professions which we are expressing at the same time.

I do not know why any different standards should be applied to this country in that respect than to other countries. But I do repeat here categorically what I have so often said, that we have no aggressive intentions against Germany, or any other country. Our sole concern is to see that this country and her Imperial communications are safe, and that we shall not be so weak relatively to other countries that our diplomacy cannot enter upon discussions upon an equal footing.

There is nothing further from our minds than entry upon a new armaments race. In talking about the Munich results it seems to me that the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Attlee) forgot the last act at Munich, which after all is not the least important one. That declaration, which was signed by Herr Hitler and myself, and in which we recorded our belief in the desire of our two peoples never to go to war with one another again, and expressed our own intention that the method of consultation should be the method adopted to deal with other questions which might concern us, and our intention also to continue our efforts to remove every possible source of difference, seems to have dropped out of sight lately. I myself feel that in that declaration, if it is properly and suitably followed up, lies the chance of a new era of peace in Europe. When I signed that document I meant what was in the document. I am convinced that Herr Hitler meant in too when he signed it, and I am equally convinced that those views express the views of the majority of the people both in Germany and this country.

Let there be no mistake, let there be no doubts as to our policy and our intentions. It is our firm determination that there shall be no sitting still and waiting for peace to come. We must take active and positive steps towards that end. The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Attlee) asked whether we were to wait always until war threatened before we thought the time was ripe for discussion. No, Sir, that is the whole point of the policy which we are pursuing. Too often delays have taken place in the past, and we should not wait until a crisis becomes acute before we try to settle it. But we should try to consolidate the good will of the four Powers when they assembled at Munich, and we should endeavour to restore European confidence by the removal of fears and suspicions.

The ultimate aim of this Government, as I believe it must be the ultimate aim of every Government, whatever its complexion may be, is the improvement of the standard of living of the people. It is difficult to reconcile that with the continued piling up of armaments; therefore we should always have that in mind. What we are aiming at is, first, the limitation of armaments by agreement—for unilateral disarmament will help nobody—and in the end their practical abolition. That is looking very far ahead. I shall not see it, but I do not see why we should not get to the first stages of it if we pursue a consistent and persistent policy.

We shall never get far unless we can accustom ourselves to the idea that the democracies and the totalitarian States are not to be ranged against one another in two opposing blocs, but that they can, if they choose, work together, not merely for the settlement of differences after they have arisen, but also for the operation of a constructive programme—a programme which will facilitate the international exchange of goods and the regulation of international relations in various ways for the good of all. That is the policy which is sometimes called the policy of appeasement. That is the policy to which this Government intends wholeheartedly to devote itself.

Mr. Neville Chamberlain in the House of Commons on November 3rd.

Extract from his Speech moving the Ratification of the Anglo-Italian Agreement of April 16th, 1938.

— Yesterday, in speaking of the declaration signed at Munich by Herr Hitler and myself, I said that I thought that, if it were suitably followed up, it might well be found to contain the seed which would ultimately develop into a new era of confidence and peace in Europe. Somewhat the same idea was expressed in different language by the Leader of the Opposition when he asked whether we must always wait for subjects of difference between nations to give rise to threats of war before we considered them ripe for peaceful discussion and negotiation.

Since we made an agreement with Italy on April 16, I am glad to think that there are no differences between our two countries. But it is clear that if the improvement in our relations which so markedly followed upon the conclusion of that Agreement is to be maintained, the delays in putting the Agreement into force, which have already lasted for more than six months, cannot be indefinitely prolonged.

It is not necessary for me this afternoon to discuss the merits of the Agreement itself. The terms of the Agreement were debated in this House last May. On May 2 a motion, which was moved by me, of approval of the Agreement was carried by a large majority. I am well aware that the Opposition resisted the motion then, and naturally I do not expect them to have changed their views, but the question we have to consider to-day is not whether this is a good agreement or not. That has already been settled so far as this House is concerned. The question we have to consider is whether the time has now come to put it into force, and whether the preliminary condition which I laid down as essential before the Agreement could be put into force has now been fulfilled.

The House will remember very well what that condition was. It was that we should be able to consider that the Spanish question was settled, and I explained last July why we had thought it necessary to make that condition. I said then that, in our view, the justification for the formal recognition of Italian sovereignty over Ethiopia was to be found if we could feel that recognition would constitute an important advance towards the general appeasement of Europe, and it was because we felt at that time that the conflict which was going on in Spain under the then existing conditions did constitute a perpetual menace to the peace of Europe that we felt that it must be removed from that category before we could ask Parliament to agree to the Agreement being put into force.

Since that time a good many efforts have been made by various members of the Opposition to get me to say exactly what I meant by a settlement in Spain. I have always refused to give any such definition, not because I wanted to evade any proper duty which fell upon me, but because I did not feel that I could give such a definition in the absence of more knowledge than I possessed of what might be the future developments in the Spanish situation.

But perhaps hon. members may recollect that on July 26 last, in answer, I think, to an interruption by the Leader of the Opposition relating to the withdrawal of volunteers from Spain, I used these words:

"I would like to see what happens when the volunteers are withdrawn. If his Majesty's Government think that Spain has ceased to be a menace to the peace of Europe. I think we shall regard that as a settlement of the Spanish question."

Since then a great deal has happened. Already, even at that date, all the Powers represented on the Non-Intervention Committee, including Italy, of course, had accepted the British plan for the withdrawal of volunteers, and if that plan is not in operation to-day, it cannot be said that that is the fault of Italy. It cannot properly be said. Again, since then the Spanish Government have announced their intention of withdrawing the International Brigade. When I was at Munich Signor Mussolini volunteered me the information that he intended to withdraw 10,000 men, or about half the Italian infantry forces, from Spain, and since then those men have in fact been withdrawn.

I have no doubt that hon. members will represent that Italian men and pilots and aircraft and other material still remain in Spain, and so also there remain men and material of other than Italian nationality in Spain on one side or the other; but we have received from Signor Mussolini definite assurances, first of all, that the remaining Italian forces of all categories will be withdrawn when the Non-Intervention Plan comes into operation; secondly, that no further Italian troops will be sent to Spain; and thirdly—in case this idea had occurred to anybody—that the Italian Government have never for a moment entertained the idea of sending compensatory air forces to Spain in lieu the infantry forces which have now been withdrawn.

These three assurances, taken in conjunction with the actual withdrawal of this large body of men, in my judgment constitute a substantial earnest of the good intentions of the Italian Government. They form a considerable contribution to the elimination of the Spanish question as a menace to peace. But these are not the only considerations which weigh with his Majesty's Government. Some hon. members, with that eternal tendency to suspicion which I am afraid only breeds corresponding suspicion on the other side, persist in the view that Germany and Italy have a design of somehow permanently establishing themselves in Spain, and that Spain itself would presently be setting up a Fascist State.

I believe both those views to be entirely unfounded. When I was at Munich I spoke on the subject of the future of Spain with both Herr Hitler and Mussolini, and both of them assured me most definitely that they had no territorial ambitions whatever in Spain. I would remind hon. members that when, in September, Europe was apparently faced with the prospect of a new major war, General Franco made a declaration of his neutrality and stated that he would not violate the French frontier unless he was attacked from that quarter.

It seems to us that the events which took place in September put the whole Spanish conflict into a new perspective, and if the nations of Europe escaped a great catastrophe in the acute Czechoslovak crisis, surely nobody can imagine that, with that recollection fresh in their minds, they are going to knock their heads together over Spain. In my own mind I am perfectly clear that the Spanish question is no longer a menace to the peace of Europe, and consequently that there is no valid reason why we should not now take a step which obviously would contribute to general appeasement.

In the realm of international affairs one thing generally leads to another and if any justification were required for the policy of the Government in closing our differences with Italy it surely can be found in the action of Signor Mussolini when, at my request, he used his influence with Herr Hitler in order to give time for the discussion which led up to the Munich agreement. By that act the peace of Europe was saved. Does anybody suppose that my request to Signor Mussolini to intervene would have met with a response from him or indeed that I could even have made such a request if our relations with Italy had remained what they were a year ago?

There is one other point which I ought to mention, because it seems to me to weigh heavily, although I think unnecessarily, upon certain minds, and that is the propriety of the recognition of Italian sovereignty over Ethiopia. I wonder how far those who hold that view are prepared to carry their reluctance. Are they prepared to withhold recognition in perpetuity, because if they really were so I am afraid they would very speedily find themselves in complete isolation. I would like to remind them that, in the first place, the council of the League of Nations, by a large majority, last May expressed the unqualified view that it was for each nation to decide for itself whether it should or should not accord this formal recognition.

Further, I would remind the House that of all the countries in Europe there are only two—namely, ourselves and the Soviet Government of Russia—which have restricted themselves to de facto recognition. The latest country to recognize formally Italian sovereignty in Ethiopia is France, and their new Ambassador is to be accredited to the King of Italy and the Emperor of Ethiopia. We intend to follow the same course as France, and accordingly new credentials will be issued to our Ambassador (Lord Perth) on similar lines, thereby according legal recognition to Italian sovereignty. Perhaps the House would like to know that, on being informed of our intention to take this course, the French Government not only raised no objection but they stated that they welcomed generally anything that would contribute to the improvement of Anglo-Italian relations.

It is perhaps unnecessary to tell the House that, in accordance with what has now become the usual routine, the Dominions have been kept fully informed of our intentions, and I am very glad to be able to read to the House two messages which I have received from the Prime Minister of Australia and the Prime Minister of South Africa. Both messages recognise that the step which His Majesty's Government proposes to take relates not only to the relations between ourselves and Italy but must be regarded as representing a policy which I have so frequently had occasion to lay before the House.

I ask the House to accept this motion, and in doing so I am satisfied that the House will definitely be improving the prospects of peace as a whole. Let us put an end here and now to any idea that it is our desire to keep any State at arm's length, and let us remember that every advance that we may make towards removing possible causes of friction upon one subject makes it easier and very probable that we can deal more satisfactorily with those that still remain unsettled.

Mr. Neville Chamberlain at the Guildhall Banquet in London on November 9th.

"First of all I should like to get rid of the idea that at Munich there was a clash between different systems of government and that the result was a victory for one side or the other. Now of course you always get enthusiasts who are more royalist than the king, and who make claims which are in no way sponsored by their leaders. They are like the claims which are put forward in war time when, as you may read any time now in our newspapers, both sides declare that in the same action they inflicted a crushing defeat upon their adversaries. By a curious perversion sometimes we get an equally extravagant claim that it was the speaker's own side that suffered defeat and humiliation. I confess that, for my part, I do not understand a state of mind which desires to advertise the defeat of its own country. At any rate I, who happened to be there—can tell you that at Munich there was no clash—there was no question of a victory or defeat for either side. And I think if we are wise we shall find that one of the most gratifying features about Munich was that four Great Powers, owning different systems of government, were able to sit down together to agree without quarrelling upon the main outlines of a settlement of one of the most thorny and dangerous international problems of our time.

If we are able to do that, does it not encourage us to think that it must be possible for such Powers to agree on other things as well—to agree, not only on preventing disaster, but on creating happiness and prosperity for all their peoples by mutual aid? For every leader in every country, whatever may be his political creed, must surely put as the first of his aims the improvement of the lot of his fellow creatures. In such meetings personal contacts are made which may prove of the greatest value.

In the days before the date at which most of our modern history books begin it was possible for a nation to live in isolation and to develop its civilization without interference from outside. But to-day we must all of us take account of our neighbours, and unless we can find some understanding of their ways of thought we shall never make real progress or secure stability for ourselves. For my part I prefer our British political system, with the wide extent of freedom which it gives to the individual to any form of government which subjects the will of the individual completely to the authority of the State, which means, of course, to the authority of those who for the time being represent the State. But it does seem to me entirely contrary to the spirit of democracy to attempt to deny to any other nation the right to adopt any form of government they may prefer. It seems to me all the more inappropriate to do so because history shows us that forms of government do not remain unchanged. Alterations, modifications, even reversals, have taken place in every generation in some country or another, and there is no reason to suppose that even to-day any of us have reached the final and unalterable stage.

After those preliminary observations I should like to turn to the foreign policy of his Majesty's Government, and I shall make no apology for repeating things that have often been said before, because there are some people who persist in saying that they have never been told what the foreign policy of the Government is. In the first speech that I made after I became Prime Minister I summed up the aims of his Majesty's Government under four heads. The first was to maintain peace; the second, to make this country so strong that she should be treated everywhere with respect; the third was to promote the prosperity of industry, and thus provide employment for our people; and the fourth was to work steadily for the improvement of the conditions of the people. Those still remain the aims of the Government, and the policy of the Government must be adapted from time to time to existing conditions in order to achieve them. I can only deal to-night with the first two, but I may say in passing that they are essential to the others. We shall secure neither prosperity nor welfare unless we have peace and the strength to maintain it.

I want to emphasize this point. To lay down an aim is one thing; to achieve it is something quite different. If you want peace you have got to do something more than sit down and hope for it. The Americans have an expression—doubtless you are familiar with it—which, as American terms so often do, conveys its meaning without explanation. They talk of a "go-getter". Well, I want this Government to be a go-getter for peace. That does not mean that we want to go and interfere with other people's business or to undertake the role of policemen-in-ordinary to the world. But if we see peace threatened we shall use any influence that we may possess to save it, and if war breaks out we shall take any opportunity that we can to stop it. For in these days it is difficult to confine war to the source of its origin, and once it begins to spread it is harder still to control its boundaries.

I feel all the more convinced of the soundness of this policy because I believe that the influence which this country can exert for peace is more powerful than that of any other that I can think of. It arises partly from our geographical position, lying a little apart from Europe; partly from our widespread connexions through the Empire with the whole world; partly, no doubt, from the vastness of the resources at our disposal; but, above all, because there is a general recognition that, fundamentally, what we are seeking is peace, security, and justice for all under the rule of law and order, reason and good faith.

Now that the crisis is over, it is very easy to find fault with the solution, but the fact is that in the situation with which we had to deal it was not possible to present the ideal solution as the alternative to force. We were dealing with a situation which had arisen from forces which had been set in motion nearly 20 years before, and the surgeon who has to deal with long-neglected wounds or disease must cut more swiftly and more deeply than he who is dealing with the first symptoms. If the settlement at Munich imposed upon Czechoslovakia a fate which arouses our natural sympathy for a small State and for a proud and brave people, yet we cannot dismiss in silence the thought of what the alternative would have meant to the peoples not only of Czechoslovakia, but of all the nations that would have been involved. I have no shadow of doubt in my mind that what we did was right. In doing it we have earned the gratitude of the vast majority in Europe and even in the world."

Sir Samuel Hoare, Secretary of State for Home Affairs, at Clacton-on-Sea, on October 20th, 1938.

I do not hold the view that democracies cannot live side by side with dictatorships, or dictatorships with democracies. A very wise statesman, Sir Edward Grey, insisted time after time upon the need of friendly relations with Governments whose internal policies were disapproved by British public opinion. Following therefore in Sir Edward Grey's footsteps I warmly welcomed the declaration made at Munich on September 30.

I am convinced that friendly relations with England have always been a cardinal point in Herr Hitler's policy. And I am also convinced that without friendly relations between England and Germany there can be no stable peace in the world.

But I go farther, and I say that from my own personal experience I can confirm this opinion. In June, 1935, I signed the Anglo-German Naval Agreement on behalf of the British Government with Herr von Ribbentrop, the Führer's representative in London. I was greeted with a storm of criticism in the House of Commons and I was told by speaker after speaker upon the Opposition side that not only was it a crime to make any agreement with a dictator, but that it was worse than a crime—a blunder—for no dictator ever kept his word.

I am here to-night, as the man who, as Foreign Secretary, made the treaty and as the man who was afterwards First Lord of the Admiralty and who had the best means of knowing whether or not it was being carried out, to say that Herr Hitler has kept the Agreement, an Agreement that you will remember restricts the German Fleet to 35 per cent. of the British Fleet, and has kept it in the letter and in the spirit.

Here, indeed, is a concrete fact that cannot be denied. Here, indeed, is a concrete fact that entitles me to attach the greatest importance to the declaration made by Herr Hitler and Mr. Chamberlain. Here, indeed, is a concrete fact that convinces me that with patience, restraint, and a readiness to understand our respective points of view it is possible to fill up the trenches that have been dividing Europe into hostile camps and once again to create a comity of nations upon which a stable peace can be restored to suffering humanity.

Mr. Ramsbotham, Minister of Pensions, at Lancaster on October 29th, 1938.

The Minister of Pensions said the critics of the Government's foreign policy should be asked to state what different action they would have taken in the crisis.

Would they have treated Herr Hitler as bluffing, although he categorically told the Prime Minister that rather than desert the Sudeten Germans he would have risked a world war? Would they have gambled on that being only an empty threat? Then they would have been gambling with the lives of 50,000,000 people. And who was best able to judge whether Herr Hitler was bluffing: the man who was negotiating with him face to face, or the critics who were sitting in their armchairs at home—many of whom, it may be, had never carried out any negotiations more important than bargaining with the proprietor of a seaside boarding-house?

Nothing had been more contemptible than the attitude of those petty-minded persons who for years had been hurling defiance and insult from the Press and from the platform against the dictators, and in the same breath doing their utmost to prevent their own country from rearming or recruiting.

He was prepared to admit that the Government delayed rearmament up to and beyond the edge of risk; but it did not lie in the mouths of their political opponents to criticize them, for when the Government came reluctantly to the conclusion that one-sided disarmament was no longer possible, their opponents and the noisy band of half-baked theorists and intellectuals that represented them on the Opposition front bench in the House of Commons did their best to stir up public opinion and prejudice against the change of policy which events had forced on the Government. And now they were trying to pose as critics of whatever defects there might be, and there were many, in the degree of rearmament which had already been achieved. If it was a sin to have deferred rearmament, it was not for Satan to reprove.

And for what would a war have been fought? We should have been fighting to prevent some 3,500,000 Germans living on the borders between Germany and Czechoslovakia from joining their own kith and kin. But in the last Great War we had fought to prevent people of other races from being dominated and governed and, it may be, oppressed by people of a different race. It was for that reason—it was called the principle of self-determination—that we smashed the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

Unhappily at the end of the War the victorious Allies did not carry out that principle thoroughly or justly, and in order to provide what the French military command thought necessary to secure a strong frontier for the new State of Czechoslovakia against Germany, the Allies agreed, in spite of bitter protests, to place a very large number of Germans under the control of the Czechs, whom they had cordially despised and detested for generations. Thus the frontier between the two countries was drawn not by statesmen, but by soldiers—and such frontiers were never likely to be permanent. We should have entered such a conflict with divided hearts and consciences. Our men would have been asked to sacrifice their lives for a principle which none of us could defend—the antithesis of the self-determination for which we had fought 20 years ago.

Of the Government's critics the only logical ones were those who advocate the preventive war. Those critics believed in what was called power politics, a policy in pursuance of which Great Britain has always to take sides against the biggest military power in Europe and intervene to destroy it whenever the occasion seems suitable and there is a reasonable chance of victory. That policy led up to the Great War of 1914, and had it not been for the intervention of the Prime Minister would have led up to the Great War of 1938.

In any event he believed the doctrine of preventive war—the policy of fighting now in case you may have to fight later on at a greater disadvantage—to be an utterly criminal doctrine, and if that were ever to be British policy he would do his utmost to prevent anybody from supporting it.

The Government would not follow any of these dangerous policies because we were turning away from the old system of power politics. We were going to do what ought to have been done long ago; try to remove the causes of grievances and the feelings of injustice that might still remain, and substitute peaceable and friendly feelings between ourselves and the great German and Italian nations for the acrimonious bickering and friction which the Opposition desired to perpetuate.

He trusted that Britain would take the lead in the policy of reconciliation in Europe, and he felt sure that the working classes would support the Prime Minister's policy, for upon them always fell the brunt of war.

Lord Halifax, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, at Edinburg on October 24th, 1938.

There may be some who will be disposed to underrate the value of that statement (the Hitler-Chamberlain declaration), but if its spirit can be kept alive and sincerely made, the basis by both sides of mutual approach, may it not turn out to be a larger thing for the world than many doubters are to-day prepared to think? Smuts, speaking 10 days ago, said: "We hope the favourable opportunity now existing will not be allowed to pass without another resolute and determined effort to secure such a settlement. Lost opportunities have been largely responsible for the worsening of European conditions in recent years. The mistake should not be repeated."

I do not hesitate to say that if the German and the British nations could really succeed in reaching understanding it would be the strongest guarantee that could be devised against the dangers to which the world has been brought so close.

I hope indeed that the rectification of frontiers according to the racial distribution of population which is now taking place in Central and South-Eastern Europe may contribute to stability and peace. What we are now witnessing is the revision of the Treaty of Versailles, for which provision was made in the Covenant of the League, but which has never till now been made effective.

But if this country is to play its full part with others in securing peace it must be able to speak with equal weight. One-sided armament and one-sided disarmament are both impossible and give no help to peace. And therefore we must take all measures—already taken months ago by Continental countries—that are essential to our strength and safety. We have no reason to apprehend attack, but if other nations have found it wise to take such measures, it is not for them to reproach us when we follow their example. We have obligations in all parts of the world, which certainly do not diminish, and those obligations we have to meet.

It is sometimes argued by our critics that the policy of his Majesty's Government to work for peace, and the faith in the possibility of their efforts being successful, is inconsistent with the determination to build up the defensive armaments of the country. If you preach peace, it is said, and if you are prepared to rest your efforts upon the belief that others are as sincere as yourselves, what is the sense of spending all these millions in a competitive race of arms.

Such an argument rests upon a complete misconception both of Government policy and of what I believe to be the common sense of the matter. No one would, of course, pretend that any declaration between statesmen can of itself bring a remedy to all our ills. Nor can anyone say for certain—because it is given to no man to foretell the future—whether or not our hopes of peace can be fulfilled, for this depends on many things which are not within our own control. But that it is right to make the attempt, I can have no kind of doubt.

To refuse to make it is indeed in effect to accept the position that war is inevitable, and that therefore it is futile to waste your time and energy on what is foredoomed to failure. I could never take that view. It seems to me a gospel of pure fatalism, and must impel you to strengthen yourself against the certain war by defensive alliances of the old pattern, call them by what name you will. That in present circumstances must in turn lead straight to the division of Europe into antagonistic blocs, and bring more close the catastrophe against which it professes to prepare.

Rather do I hold that there is a growing sense everywhere that war, quite apart from its horror and damage, unsettles more than it settles: and that accordingly there are strong forces at work which will make any country think once and twice before resorting to it.

The world that we desire to see is a world in which all nations may exist side by side, their just rights respected by all, and differences resolved by free discussion. A world in which the men and women and children can live decent lives, no longer haunted by the dread spectre of war, that stalked the world a month ago.

Yet, if we are to succeed in bringing the world into smoother waters, we must face frankly the three possibilities that the future seems to hold. The first is war. The second is an armed peace. The third is a peace of understanding. We wish to escape the first, and we wish to achieve the third; but it may be that, just as Dante made the entry into Paradise through the war of Purgatory, so we, if we are to reach the true peace, have to pass through the stage of armed peace to get there. For let us remember peace will not come, like Christmas, just by waiting for it. Peace is not a passive thing: just as good is all the time an active struggle against wrong, so peace must be an active struggle against the things that make for war.

Our own course is clear. We must lose no opportunity of helping forward, so that they may take substantial shape, the results of the personal contacts established between Germany, Italy, France, and ourselves at Munich. In doing so we shall not abandon old friends in the search for new. But we do intend if we can to improve our own relations with all who are willing to improve their own relations with us, and if we can to work for a general understanding in which all can meet on common ground of mutual tolerance and respect.

Sir John Simon, Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the House of Commons on October 5th, 1938.

Sir John Simon said the truth of the matter was that the State of Czechoslovakia was created in its original form after the Peace Treaties in defiance of the principle of self-determination.

Yielding to strategic calculations and disregarding the Wilson principle, a decision was reached by which Europe was storing up terrible trouble for herself.

When the Peace Treaties were being drawn up and the lines of frontier were being settled very comforting assurances were given that "the Germans in this area will have in Bohemia exactly the same rights as the Czechs. We should never employ any irritating measures against the German part of the population. The régime would correspond to that of Switzerland. He continued :

“ It seems to me that it is regrettable that it was not possible to secure a peaceful adjustment of frontiers before this.

References have been very rightly made to Article XIX of the Covenant of the League of Nations, but it is right to realize how very weak and flimsy that Article really was. I think I shall carry with me the view of Mr. Eden in saying this: The framers of the Treaties of Peace were no doubt aware that some of the frontiers they had drawn might in turn need to be altered. But all they felt they could do was to include in the Covenant Article XIX.

In practice that Article has proved ineffective for any practical result, largely for two reasons. First of all every State must be prepared to let the resolution be passed; a single vote against it, even the vote of the State that is going to lose its territory, would mean that the resolution is lost. The requirement of unanimity in fact has operated to fix and crystallize frontiers which undoubtedly ought to have been readily altered.

The second difficulty is that even if the Assembly could get such a resolution carried unanimously the States concerned would still have to arrive at their own agreement as to what should be transferred and the way in which it should be transferred before revision could be carried out. Lord Lothian has strongly emphasized the point that the League of Nations is not a super State which is able to impose its authority on its members. Therefore, what is involved in the peaceful transference of territory without causing trouble is that the sovereign State should voluntarily and without pressure give up an area which it very naturally would desire to keep.

While I admit that the solution that has been obtained is open to all sorts of challenges and criticisms let us at least recognize the real character of the difficulty to be solved, and how seldom in the history of the modern world it has been solved without war. It is true that the Agreement at Munich was reached under the pressure of the alternative of instant invasion, but is that reason enough for rejecting the Agreement and preferring that Europe should be plunged into war? I do not think so.

If the question is whether we are willing to enter into friendly consultation, in conjunction with France and Italy and Germany, upon the problems of Europe, then I say most emphatically that it has in fact been a dominant aim of the policy of the Prime Minister and the Government to see whether it is possible, instead of maintaining an unbridgeable gulf for all purposes between democracies and dictatorships, in the interests of European peace for them and us to live side by side.

But if, on the other hand, the question is whether we are contemplating an exclusive Four-Power Pact—I think that that was what my right hon. friend (Mr. Eden) wanted to be reassured upon—which will attempt, in disregard of other States great and small, and without communication with them, to impose its will upon Europe, then I say on behalf of the Government with equal emphasis that that is not, and never has been, the policy of his Majesty's Government.

If outstanding differences are to be resolved it must be on the basis of the free communication with all European Powers. It is certainly important to secure the cooperation of the smaller Powers of Europe. They are always valuable allies for peace. Our object is to buttress and strengthen peace in every way we can, and it does not in the least follow, because you have close contacts with France or Germany or Italy, that this precludes close contacts with other nations too.

We may, I think, disregard those self-confident persons, if such there be, who feel sure that if they had been at Munich they would have handled the matter much better than the Prime Minister. The real test is this: We are at peace to-day. How many among us are there who, if we could, would undo what was then done—would reject the settlement to which the Prime Minister put his hand on Friday and instead—because it was the only alternative—would have flung the world into the cauldron of immediate war? Why, there are some people who are so confident that war will come in the end that they seem to prefer to have the certainty of it now. That is the creed of utter despair.

There are other people who imagine that by loudly threatening war we can escape ever having to fulfil our pledges. That indeed is a very dangerous doctrine. For my part I reject both the doctrine of the inevitability of war and the theory of the effectiveness of bluff. I call upon the House to show its confidence in the policy of the Prime Minister. He has never given up hope, and has thereby started a movement which may have an immense development, which we hope and pray may save the world for peace.

FRANCE AND THE MUNICH AGREEMENT

I.

The Munich Results in the Congress of the Radical Socialist Party at Marseilles.

Extract from the Speech by the French Premier, M. Daladier, on October 27th, 1938.

When we look at the situation in Europe and the world today, what is the fact which dominates all the others—the factor which surpasses in importance and magnitude all other factors? It is this: that peace, that seemed to be lost, has been preserved and that it is in peace that we are called upon to solve all these problems.

I need hardly remind you that, during the last few weeks, this peace has been threatened by many perils. I need not enumerate the events that led up to the European crisis which brought us to the brink of catastrophe or tell you at the cost of what efforts and sacrifices we managed to solve it.

What I would like to repeat once more with all the emphasis at my command is that, for our whole European civilization, our ideal of liberty, our country and for Czechoslovakia herself, the position arising out of the Munich agreements is preferable to that which would exist today if war had not been averted.

As I stated in the Chamber, I perfectly well understood the struggle waged in every French breast during that crisis, as I went through it myself, but today I cannot admit the right of anyone to speak of the capitulation of France. I have weighed up and am fully aware of the consequence of that agreement, but I know that we did not give way to compulsion and that if at Munich I had been presented with an ultimatum and had not been able to make my voice heard and to discuss on a footing of equality, I should have returned to Paris and called upon the nation to resist. The act accomplished at Munich was an act of reason.

Nor do I understand, or rather I understand only too well, the campaign being waged against an agreement which, when it was signed, was ardently desired in all countries by the men and women who, if recourse had been had to brute force, would themselves have paid with their blood and tears. When I try to be guided in my statements by considerations of reason and, ignoring as far as may be both applause and invective, to think only of the permanent interests of the country, I am moved to indignation when I see how certain people regard these events as a proper subject for polemics.

Am I not justified after all in saying that, when perils were accumulating and the advent of the dreaded event seemed to be a matter of hours or minutes, some who had been and have once more become the protagonists of a policy of firmness amounting to intransigence displayed a wavering purpose, not to put it more strongly. I will admit the right to criticize of those only who can remind me that, during those tragic hours, they told me to go to war rather than agree to any sort of compromise or of those who heard of my departure for Munich without a feeling of relief. What sort of hypocrisy is this which consists in striking attitudes and preaching sermons after the danger is over and in keeping silence and trembling when determination to persist to the end is required?

There is, it is true, one party which can honestly say that it has always been in favour of intransigence even at the risk of war and that it was opposed to negotiation. That party is the Communist Party, which has expressed its attitude of complete opposition by its votes in the Chamber and by its daily insults throughout the country.

The violence and intransigence of that party went far towards paralysing my action. When its newspapers and its speakers discourteously attacked Mr. Neville Chamberlain who was working for the preservation of peace in a spirit of faith which was beyond praise, do you not think that that did not weaken France's position? When they challenged the French Government every other day, was that designed to facilitate our efforts? When they thundered anathemas against Governments with whom we were engaged in most perilous negotiations, did they not by so doing run the risk of hampering those negotiations and precipitating us into war? When they say now that the partial mobilization of our forces was only a means of covering up our retreat, they are deliberately telling the most abominable lie, because, if ever the masses were hoodwinked into believing this to be true, this might make it impossible ever again to have recourse to that measure which, I repeat, largely helped to preserve peace.

We are not taken in by the indictments of the leaders of the Communist Party. While Frenchmen generally responded courageously to their country's appeal and merit the gratitude of the nation, I should like to say that the political attitude of the Heads of the Communist Party was not calculated to support the Government in its policy of firmness, but was designed to wreck that policy and the same applies to those whose deliberate attempts, during those critical weeks, to undermine the morale of the nation were smashed on the rock of the national dignity.

When one wishes the Government to save peace and honour, one does not publicly deny the possibility of its doing so. One does not say that the country is incapable of resistance when it is not true. One does not attack the persons of those responsible for national defence.

We have maintained peace and the dignity of France.

We are resolved to persevere.

Our policy will correspond with the fundamental interests of our country and will be adapted to the realities of the new situation which has arisen.

The fundamental interest of France is the maintenance of her own security. But French security does not consist exclusively in the integrity of our continental frontiers, but is dependent upon freedom of communications between the home country and the Empire.

Speaking here in Marseilles, which is not situated on the edge of France, but lies at the very heart of the French Empire and is in some sort the vital link between France and her colonies, I should like to say that France is an Empire. Beyond her continental frontiers, there lies a vast zone of security as precious to her as the home country itself, upon which her future to a large extent depends and we regard that zone as inviolable.

This does not mean to say that it constitutes the sole basis of our national future. Far from it France's sphere of influence will always extend beyond her most far-flung borders.

France will continue to make her presence felt everywhere. Everywhere she will associate herself with every effort made for justice and for peace. As I stated in the Chamber, she will endeavour to supplement old friendships with new and resuscitated friendships. She will bring undiluted good-will to bear upon the discussion of all problems. She holds the view that, in so far as each and every country wills to act with prudence and justice, peaceful settlements can be reached wherever disputes arise. As regards her relations both with Germany and with Italy, she is convinced that, so long as both sides are concerned exclusively with the defence of their national interests, agreements can be reached which will contribute in no small measure to the work of strengthening peace. The same applies to the good relations between France and the friendly nations of Eastern Europe.

French diplomacy is based in the first instance on close cooperation between France and Great Britain: cooperation freely chosen, founded on common ideals and interests and grounded in mutual respect and equality. This cooperation does not exclude any other. We are open to all possible understandings. When, in Munich, I heard the heart of the German people beat, I could not help thinking as I had thought at Verdun, in the midst of the war, that, in spite of all difficulties, there were compelling reasons for mutual esteem between the people of France and the people of Germany, which should lead to loyal collaboration.

I have always ardently hoped to see such collaboration. Whatever the differences between their political systems, the two nations who have so often been at grips with one another on the battlefield, should understand that, nowadays, war is never a solution and that it is possible to settle all problems by means of a loyal understanding between the nations.

That is the method whereby we should be able to preserve peace.

We have made sacrifices for that peace, but we do not wish it to be disfigured or represented as the first stage on the road towards renunciation. For that peace put an end to a crisis which had lasted for twenty years. It would have been easier and less costly to do this some years ago. All regrets are however superfluous, provided that the peace which has been saved represents for France at once the end of past errors and the beginning of a new epoch.

Such a decision can only be effective if it rests on the strength of the nation; if, when taken by the Government, it is ratified by the whole people and if the great hope aroused in all hearts is accompanied here and now by the determination of all to work for the common good and to respect the laws of the Republic.

Extract from the Speech by the French Foreign Minister, M. Georges Bonnet, on October 30th, 1938.

"The international crisis virtually existed when the present Government was formed. The problem of German minorities in Czechoslovakia, like so many others, was already acute. It had in fact existed ever since the Treaty of Versailles.

In 1919, during the treaty negotiations, there was a heated discussion concerning the Sudeten Germans. The Social-Democratic Chancellor of Austria, Renner, said at the time, when protesting against the provisions of the treaty: "the Czechs will never be able to absorb the German minority and the German minority will never allow itself to be absorbed by the Czech majority. A focus of civil war will be created in the centre of Europe, which will emit sparks likely to become much more dangerous for the world than was the continual ferment in the Balkans".

Subsequently, heated disputes arose on several occasions between the Sudeten Germans and the Czechs, as reported by our Minister at Prague since 1921.

A latent antagonism existed which was inevitably fanned first by the economic and military revival of Germany and then by the Anschluss.

After the Anschluss, Czechoslovakia, surrounded by enemies and cut off as she was in the heart of Europe from Russia, France and Great Britain, was between the jaws of a pair of pincers which might at any time close and crush her.

Immediately upon coming into power the Daladier Government realized that the Czechoslovak question was beginning to assume menacing proportions.

The Anschluss was achieved on March 13th, the Daladier Government was formed on April 10th and on April 24th Henlein made known at Carlsbad the eight points of his programme whereby he claimed a very large measure of autonomy for the Sudeten Germans.

Forewarned and fully realizing the ordeal with which it was faced, the French Government constantly endeavoured to settle these disputes, which no longer concerned Czechoslovakia alone, but were threatening the peace of the world.

It was at once clear to the Government that the first thing to do was to endeavour to bring Great Britain's attitude and our own into line with one another—and that both in the diplomatic field and, for the event of war, in the military field also.

Such an attempt was the more necessary that the British Ministers had frequently voiced England's disinclination to tie her hands with pacts—especially in Central Europe, where the innumerable internal quarrels and the diversity of conflicting nationalities rendered her especially unwilling to give formal undertakings.

We therefore went to London on April 28th and 29th, when M. Daladier delivered, in the presence of our English friends, a speech characterized at once by its clarity and its moving appeal. We succeeded during our conversations, by virtue of the frankness and earnestness of our representation and of the sentiments of friendship for France entertained by Mr. Neville Chamberlain and Lord Halifax, in obtaining from Great Britain an undertaking to assist France in settling a question in which she (Great Britain) was under no treaty obligation to intervene.

England's position was defined with admirable clearness on September 28th by the British Prime Minister himself.

I should like to point out that England, in evincing her solidarity with us, does not give France 'carte blanche'. She does not say in effect: "Do what you like and we will follow you blindfold". The British Government has consistently maintained that, though it has clearly defined obligations for the event of a threat to the integrity of France's frontiers and although, in such a case, it is committed to placing its forces at our disposal immediately, that does not apply to Czechoslovakia to which it is not bound by any definite engagement. It is primarily desirous of acting in a mediative capacity and can we ignore the immense step forward which such an offer of mediation implied for us? For the first time, Great Britain agreed to take an active part in the settlement of the Czechoslovak question and afforded to France the assistance needed to enable the maximum effect to be given to our treaty alliance with Czechoslovakia.

Gentlemen, we must remember the circumstances in which our treaty with Czechoslovakia was concluded on October 16th, 1925.

I was a member of the Government at the time and I still remember Aristide Briand forcefully describing the nature of the Locarno Pact which he was bringing us, and of the supplementary agreements—especially that with Czechoslovakia. Briand was speaking in the spirit with which he and all of us were inspired—that of the League of Nations and collective security.

If Czechoslovakia were the victim of aggression, all the States Members of the League, including Italy, Poland and the Little Entente, would have to rally to her assistance.

In 1938 we were faced with an entirely different situation. In the absence of collective solidarity even as between the neighbouring countries, the fate of Czechoslovakia essentially depended on the possibility of her obtaining assistance from France, who was far removed from the Czechoslovak frontiers.

France could thus do nothing effective without the support of England and that support she obtained at the Conference of April 28th, on the strictly defined and limited conditions which I have just mentioned.

M. Bonnet then recalled the crisis of May 21st, the advice given at the time to Czechoslovakia by France, Lord Runciman's mission, the Nuremberg Congress and the sanguinary incidents of September 13th and continued as follows:

"It was then that the French Government thought of an interview between the responsible heads of the Governments concerned and Mr. Chamberlain had the same idea. The next day, in full agreement with us, he went to Berchtesgaden to see the Chancellor of the Reich and his visit raised immense hopes among the nations of the world. Yet there are people with short memories who are asking: 'Why was that done?' The answer is: 'because negotiations had reached a deadlock, war was imminent and it was imperative to act without delay'. During the conversation at Berchtesgaden, the Chancellor informed Mr. Chamberlain that he was prepared to accept a peaceful settlement on the basis of the right of self-determination. Mr. Chamberlain returned to London and asked us to go and see him.

We were in London on September 18th and 19th. At the very beginning of that conference, the British Ministers informed us of the conclusions arrived at by Lord Runciman. There was, in his view, no possibility of conciliation between the Germans and the Czechs. The Sudeten Germans would have to be allowed to determine their own fate: that was the only solution 'as it was vain to hope that Sudeten Germans and Czechs could continue to collaborate in the same State.'

That is the crux of the problem. To deal with this affair of minorities, for which the Covenant of the League of Nations had provided a procedure of amicable settlement, we jointly approved on July 19th the suggestion to send a mediator and I repeat with all the emphasis at my command that all had agreed to such mediation—even those who are today criticizing the fruits of that mediation.

What else could the French Government have done? How, after having based the peace treaties on the right of self-determination of peoples and after having on so many occasions defended that right in the course of her history, could France have refused to apply the principle involved, when its free application had been recommended by the mediator?

We knew moreover that the Czechoslovak Government preferred territorial concessions to a general plebiscite.

We accordingly gave priority to that procedure, but we wished, in order to compensate Czechoslovakia for the painful sacrifice which she was called upon to make, to secure Great Britain's guarantee for her new frontiers and we had some difficulty in obtaining such a guarantee, which cost the British Ministers long and difficult discussions among themselves as to whether they could or could not commit Great Britain on that point.

The Franco-British plan was accepted by the Prague Government. Czechoslovakia herself realized that the adoption of the plan was the only means of avoiding the forceable intervention of Germany.

It was equally clear that the rejection of the plan would result in England declining to show any further interest in the Czechoslovak question. As the British Prime Minister said in the House of Commons, British public opinion would never have agreed to its Government going to war to prevent the Sudeten Germans from coming under another Government at their own desire.

Mr Chamberlain left for Godesberg on September 22nd in order to inform Herr Hitler of the Franco-British proposals, but you have not yet forgotten those days of stress and strain.

Herr Hitler stated that he desired to occupy the territories with a German minority on October 1st. Mr Chamberlain returned to London. The Czech Government rejected Herr Hitler's memorandum and ordered general mobilization. We paid another visit to London where, once more, we confirmed the complete agreement existing between our British friends and ourselves. On September 27th mobilization was decreed in Germany and the entry of German troops into Czechoslovakia was announced for Wednesday the 28th at 2 p.m.

This time war seemed inevitable, all means of preventing it having been apparently exhausted. Mr Neville Chamberlain himself, whose courage commanded the admiration of all, seemed to have lost all hope.

My friend Aimé Berthod mentioned just now the diplomatic steps which we took during the night of the 27th to the 28th in addition to completing our arrangements for the military security of the country.

Throughout the world, efforts were made to preserve peace. President Roosevelt sent two messages, for which we are profoundly grateful to him.

While our Ambassador, M. François Poncet, handed to the Chancellor the plan drafted by the French Government the previous night—the first plan which was not rejected by Germany, Mr. Chamberlain proposed a Conference of Four, for the acceptance of which Signor Mussolini successfully pleaded with the Chancellor.

The next day came the meeting at Munich.

It was only natural that, once the danger was over, everyone should have resumed his right to criticize and used it to the full.

We have heard a volley of reproaches from men who successively accepted the rearmament of Germany, the occupation of the demilitarized Rhineland zone, the fortification of that zone and the Anschluss of Austria.

Well, I will reply to those reproaches and criticisms.

It has been said that lack of firmness on the part of the French Government was responsible for the failure of the British Government to follow us blindly in this affair. You have had an opportunity, during my speech, of deciding for yourselves that that is very far from the truth. We were determined to carry out our engagements and we said when we formed our Government: "if Germany has recourse to violence in Czechoslovakia, we will not tolerate it, and our sincerity was sufficiently attested by the military measures which we took, and who will deny their scope and value? Those measures were taken at the beginning of August; by September 5th the reservists were occupying the fortified sectors. In a fortnight, 700,000 men and 25,000 officers were called to the colours: the army was more than a million strong.

Was that bluff? To say so would be to insult the French Government.

The Government appealed to the devotion of all its citizens, because it was determined to keep its word and not passively to allow any resort to force.

Our British friends have never been in any doubt as to our determination, as what we have said to them has never varied. Does anyone really believe that the Prime Minister would have gone to Berchtesgaden on the 14th and to Godesberg on the 22nd and mobilized the fleet and technical services of the Air Force, if the British Government had believed that France would stand on one side and that the conflict would be localized?

Great Britain knew that we would oppose the invasion of Czechoslovakia as resolutely as we were seeking a compromise.

Let no-one add to the accusation that France has not kept her word by saying that France allowed herself to be trapped by a German manoeuvre to intimidate her.

When one saw all the documents one after the other, when one thought of the 32 German divisions massed on the Czechoslovak frontier; when one followed in Paris and in London from day to day and hour to hour, not to say from minute to minute, the constantly increasing tension between Prague and Berlin and between the Sudeten Germans and the Czechs, one could not doubt that that with which we were faced was war! a lightning war involving the invasion of Czechoslovakia on three fronts and her destruction in a few days.

No-one can deny then that the Munich Agreement, which incorporated the Franco-British plan of London, saved peace.

Let no-one say: 'peace is the easiest thing in the world to have and the thing which can be defended with the least effort.' That is not true.

When every force is loose against peace, it is less difficult, and in appearance more noble, to allow oneself to be entangled in the fatal machinery of war. Statesmen who wish to preserve peace are called upon to make an effort which must be sustained at constant pressure, to put up a very hard fight and often to show signal courage.

But how is this peace, which we have preserved at the cost of so much effort and sacrifice, to be organized?

There are already those who mutter: 'You have only postponed the danger, which will be with you again in a few short months'.

Whether this is so or not depends on France. What should her ideal be? What ought the basis of her policy to be?

We earnestly desire that France may remain the country of liberty and tolerance, where no citizen of good-will is excluded from the national community, whatever his religion or social status."

After testifying to his loyalty to the principles of the League of Nations and discussing the crisis through which the League was passing, M. Bonnet went on to define the bases of France's foreign policy. "The corner-stone of her policy of peace", he said, "is the Franco-British entente: that is to say, friendship between France and Great Britain, of which we were acutely conscious during the crisis, when the French Government was collaborating with the British Government day by day and hour by hour..."

But apart from this traditional friendship, there is the problem of our relations with other Powers. One thing is certain: it is impossible for the nations of Europe to continue to live in the present atmosphere of uncertainty. It is impossible that we should have no other future to offer our children than a still more murderous war than the last.

That is why we hope that the Munich Agreements will lead to a better understanding and a less strained atmosphere. Especially do we desire that normal relations may be established between France and her neighbours. A month ago in the Chamber and yesterday at our Congress, M. Daladier spoke in moving terms of the relations between France and Germany. 'I was conscious of Germany's esteem for France', he said, 'immediately upon my arrival in Munich'. This esteem is founded on the fact that France is known to be prepared to combat anything which runs counter to her vital interests or to the cause of justice. We hope that loyal cooperation may be found possible between France and Germany and that the fear of a conflict, which would in a very short time destroy all the progress made at such great sacrifice both in Germany and in France, may be removed in both countries.

Normal relations have just been restored between France and Italy. This is a great source of satisfaction to us, as no-one desires more heartily than ourselves the strengthening of the bonds of traditional friendship between Italy and France.

We earnestly hope that the general European detente will have its effect on Spanish affairs. This war, during which the sons of Spain have once more shown such incomparable courage, has already lasted nearly two and a half years. For our part, we remain faithful to the policy which France has pursued for the last 30 months.

We are convinced that the settlement of the conflict which is tearing Spain to pieces will become possible when all foreign volunteers have been withdrawn and the Spaniards are left alone, face to face. Then, we are sure, mediation will be successful and peace will be restored. France, who has always entertained feelings of fraternal solidarity with the Spanish people, will neglect no effort to collaborate with the other nations in the reconstruction of that noble country.

That, in substance, must be our diplomatic policy today.

There is nothing in such a policy that cannot be entirely reconciled with France's especial friendships: viz with the U.S.S.R., Poland, Roumania, Yugoslavia and Belgium.

Thus we believe that the Munich Agreements can and should be the prelude to determined efforts to initiate a peaceful organization of Europe, but this ideal, to which we are passionately attached, can in our opinion only become a reality, in so far as steps are taken to prepare in Europe a better economic organization than that with which she is so pitifully struggling along today.

We must make no mistake however: France will only be able to make her peaceful voice heard in the concert of the nations if she has recovered her whole power and restored her full discipline.

Citizens! Ardently attached to peace as we are, we shall never admit that France should purchase it at the price of the virtual renouncement of her rights or the denial of her traditions".

From the report on French foreign policy by the Senator and former Minister Berthod to the Marseille Congress.

M. Berthod's report contains a review of the September crisis, accompanied by comments on the criticisms passed on the attitude of the French Government.

"We have been told", he said, "of the incomparable value of the Bohemian quadrilateral. 'Who owns Bohemia owns Europe' some exclaimed with Bismarck, while others employed a metaphor which had some success and regretted the destruction of the aircraftcarrier of Soviet Russia which had inserted itself like a wedge into the heart of Germany in the neighbourhood of her big cities—Dresden, Munich, Leipzig and the capital of the Reich.

This whole system has broken down; no-one will deny that. But would it not be better to ask ourselves how much of it still existed long before the Munich Agreement and would it not have been very much better to ask ourselves that question earlier?

Is it so certain that this system corresponded with the true interests of France and with what must be her task and her mission in the world today? And, now that that system no longer exists, should we try to reconstruct it on a fresh basis, as some say, or should we seek to direct the efforts of the nation into a different channel?

This Bohemian quadrilateral! For how many days would it have been able to resist, when the German armies, already in control of Austria, had begun their invasion from the South?

Is it not rather the case that the first step taken by the Czech armies would have been the, at any rate partial, evacuation of the fortifications in the Sudeten Mountains (that Czech Maginot line on which so much talk has been expended), to avoid being taken in the rear and running the risk of being surrounded?

What real assistance would our agreements, our alliances (all that complicated tissue of conventions and agreements concluded and patiently accumulated by us without sufficient care being taken to reconcile them with one another or to give them some measure of coherence) have brought us in the hour of peril? Would not our ally Poland have attacked our other ally Czechoslovakia or forceably prevented the U.S.S.R.—also allied to us—from intervening, while Yugoslavia prudently abstained from any action and Roumania, like France, racked her brains to find a way of playing the dangerous game of reconciling the claims of contradictory friendships?

The time has come for us to ask ourselves, in the case of every one of our engagements, what essential interests of the country it serves and—more important still—what possibility we have of honouring it, if the need to do so should arise. Certainly France cannot disinterest herself anywhere and certain it is that she cannot renounce any of her friendships; but a friendship is not necessarily a military alliance committing the destiny of the country over long periods without possibility of discussion, regardless of all developments in the structure of the world or changes in the balance of power.

Would it be such a bad policy to follow the British practice of strictly limiting our definite and unqualified engagements to those cases where the vital interests of our country were at stake, while not refusing to intervene elsewhere, if circumstances demanded, though at the same time reserving that right (which no nation can easily forego) of weighing up, before taking action, the importance of the interests at stake, the possibility of obtaining assistance, the position of the armies, the chances and the possible price of victory? Should we be laying ourselves open to the charge of being 'little Frenchmen' and resigning ourselves to the prospect of France 'taking a back seat' if we were to say that for us, as a Western, maritime, African and colonial nation, the development of our magnificent Empire was of more importance than the ungrateful rôle of gendarme—not to say banker—which, in the flush of victory, we imagined we were called upon to play wherever the prestige of our armies allowed us to do so?"

After expressing the opinion that France's commitments must be revised, M. Berthod developed the argument that Munich was not a solution, but a beginning:

"However that may be", he said, "it was in some sort as the hope of a new policy opening up fresh possibilities for the consolidation of peace that the country, in spite of conflicting ideologies and different political institutions, welcomed the meeting at Munich between the heads of the four great Western Powers.

This hope will not be easy of fulfilment. That is a fact which certain speeches which have been made on the other side of our frontiers will not allow us to ignore, but as long as its fulfilment does not appear impossible, we are in duty bound to work for it. Is it not the case that there can be no true peace in Europe as long as a loyal agreement has not been reached between France and Germany? And if, in making war, it is, as I have said, indispensable to come to an understanding with one's friends, is it not, when making peace, even more indispensable to come to an agreement with one's enemies?

Surely our aim should be simply to endeavour in the first place to solve the most thorny problems on our frontiers with the nations most directly concerned in the sincere hope that, once this first stage has been successfully overcome, it may be possible and easy to arrange more extensive conferences with the other Powers, great and small, and to conclude more general agreements calculated to bring a little more order into the affairs of the world now fallen into such complete chaos. Then, no doubt, it will be possible to give effect to the proposal for an international conference, which is being advocated in so many quarters.

II.

Extract from the Speech by the French Foreign Minister, M. Georges Bonnet at the American Club, in Paris on November 11th, 1938.

"As regards the Munich agreements, I quite understand that, as might have been easily foreseen, once the dangers were past the critics resumed their freedom.

In fact, the Munich agreements are in conformity with the principles expressed by the American Secretary of State, Mr. Cordell Hull in the note which he addressed to the Powers on July 16th, 1937 "recommending the settlement of the problems that arise in international relations by means of negotiations and pacific agreements".

This method was particularly necessary as the incorporation of the Sudeten Germans in Czechoslovakia had given rise to strong protests at the Peace Conference. Mr. Lansing, Secretary of State and American delegate, had stated in particular on April 1st, 1919 that the proposed delimitation of the Czechoslovak frontier "was contrary to the spirit of the League of Nations and to the principle of disarmament and was in formal opposition to the policy of the United States which desire a just peace".

I know that our action has been perfectly well understood, with you in particular, by all the men who have the burden and responsibility of government.

The American Under-Secretary of State, Mr. Sumner Welles, said on October 5th:

"But we Americans all share the feeling of universal relief that war has been averted.

Can anyone doubt that the will for peace displayed by the world in the last few days has been an active factor in the prevention of the conflict? Today, more perhaps than at any other time during the past twenty years, the nations are given an opportunity of establishing a new world order based on justice and right.

Peace is not negative. It is not simply the momentary abstention from recourse to war. Peace, in its very essence, is positive. Permanent peace can only be achieved by a return of the nations to the following precepts: respect for the pledged word, non-intervention in the internal affairs of other countries, settlement of disputes and revision of treaties, when necessary, by means of pacific negotiations in a spirit of equity rather than by recourse to force or under the menace of force, respect for the rights of other nations.

If it were now possible on such bases to find a solution for all these tragic conflicts which still envenom Europe and the Far East and thus to render less probable in future the outbreak of conflicts, the moral sufferings of an incalculable number of men and women in the last few days will not have been in vain."

Who would not applaud these beautiful and moving words? I am well aware that the American statesmen often ask us to take the step which they consider essential, namely to reach a durable agreement between the various States of Europe.

We have had occasion to state that this is also the desire of the French Government."

III.

Munich and French Foreign Policy in the Opinion of two Frenchmen.

In addition to the above statements by responsible French statesmen, we reproduce below the statements of two Frenchmen representing political and intellectual France, which appear to us to be worth reading on account of their attitude not only to the events of September but also to the German-French problem as a whole, since they deal with it quite frankly and with a clear view of realities and of the mistakes of French policy committed against Germany in past years.

Extract from an Article by the Socialist Deputy Louis L'Heveder in the "Populaire" of October 31st, 1938.

The violent tornado which has swept Europe in connection with the German-Czech conflict has revealed in the working classes and the Socialist Party such disagreement and such disturbances as to impose the task of clarification and a sincere effort of mutual understanding at the present time on all socialists who wish to see their party arrive at clear and practical rules around which it would be possible to group all the sound elements of our national activity for the greatest good of French democracy and peace.

As far as I am concerned, I will speak with complete frankness, as I have already done at Royan.

I have never advocated the so-called "revolutionary defeatism" or the "insurrectional strike in case of war".

A pacific nation may not find in other peoples a desire for agreement corresponding to its own; despite concessions, it may be brutally attacked, brutally invaded, either in its home territory or in its colonies; it may be compelled to defend itself and I have therefore always affirmed my attachment to the principle of national defence.

As a partisan of the simultaneous, progressive and general disarmament of the peoples, I consider on the other hand that it is impossible under present circumstances to recommend the unilateral disarmament of France, which might appear to certain foreign governments, not as an example, but as a temptation.

But, having admitted this, I state categorically that, in view of the terrible progress of war technique, the most legitimate war, even a war of national defence, can no longer be considered by the people who are forced to organise it as anything but a solution of despair.

On these points, I am sure, all Socialists are in agreement and it remains for them to find means of ensuring peace without endangering the integrity of the national territory and without sacrificing the liberty and political independence of their country.

For my part I consider that it is in the direction of a general agreement of all nations, whatever their internal regime, in the international organisation of the distribution of raw materials and trade, in a possible "redistribution" of colonial territories and mandated territories, that it will be possible to find the first elements of that moral disarmament of all peoples which is an essential condition of their material disarmament.

An international conference must be organised and convened as soon as possible for studying and settling all international disputes in a pacific manner.

This conference could of course consider the colonial problem as a whole, and I believe that the vast majority of Frenchmen, though they do not yet accept our ideal of the internationalisation of colonies, since the idea is not yet sufficiently ripe, would on the other hand have no objection to a return to Germany of the territories that were taken from her after the War and which were placed under our mandate.

This conference might also consider certain problems relating to national minorities which, as recent experience has shown, may create a danger of war if they are allowed to get worse without being equitably and peacefully solved in time.

In this connection, without belittling the importance of certain historic, strategic or economic considerations invoked by various nations in order to maintain national minorities under their rule, I would state that these considerations are in my view not predominant and I remain faithful to the principle "of the right of self-determination of the peoples" boldly proclaimed from the platform of the Chamber by Jean Longuet on September 18th, 1919 during the discussion on the ratification of the Treaty of Versailles.

It would be dangerous to convene a conference with the ulterior motive of sabotaging it by an unyielding attitude or by premeditated demands.

It will be clear to everyone that its success will depend to a very great extent on the relations of France and Germany, and on this point I wish to state everything I think at the risk of upsetting certain prejudices.

For years the foreign policy of France has been dominated by fear of the Germans. Our leaders have remained true to the "traditional policy" of France which consisted, not in trying to find a pacific and tolerable "modus vivendi" with prolific and active neighbours, but in endeavouring to "encircle" them by contracting military alliances with various nations against them, alliances which in modern terminology are called "pacts of mutual assistance".

Our policy thus followed the spirit of Cardinal Richelieu's policy. I have not the feeling that it has served the interests of our country or the cause of peace and, however that may be, the collapse of what imprudent strategists called the "Czechoslovak bastion" has just dealt it a terrible blow.

For these reasons I firmly believe that France must try to come to a direct understanding with the people against which she is in increasing danger of coming to war in future if, by the carelessness of our leaders, we are compelled once more to choose between a general conflagration and a precipitate withdrawal before fresh German demands.

There is no question of our country presenting itself before Germany in the guise of a mendicant. France possesses a rich historical tradition, a high culture, a power of creation and renewal great enough to apply to the great German nation on equal terms and to seek a frank agreement over the flood of misunderstandings, enmity and even hatred which has accumulated between the two peoples for centuries, and also over the ideological divergences of which I do not under-estimate the danger.

It is in this direction and, in my opinion, in this direction only, that France, Germany and European civilisation can find the path of hope and the conditions of their common salvation.

If the policy of Franco-German understanding succeeds it may ultimately create an atmosphere of international concord and detente which will in the long run render useless the pacts of mutual assistance to which our country has given its signature.

Moreover some of these pacts, even at the present time, do not give us any real security, since they are not only incapable of guaranteeing us against war but because their literal application might lead us to contemplate armed intervention for interests which are not ours and for reasons why our public opinion would not properly understand.

I consider that the first duty of the French Government after the Czechoslovak shock should have been to reconsider all these military alliances and to denounce all those which constitute more of a danger than a protection for France.

I declare equally definitely that I cannot in any case accept the idea of a so-called preventive war or a fantastic policy which would consist in hurling us into war with or without reason in order, we are told, to prevent an unavoidable war which would be waged under worse conditions for our country. There is no unavoidable war.

It is more important than ever to keep our nerve and our reason and not to assist the development of war psychosis which goes to the heads of our countrymen like the vapours of inferior alcohol.

Until our pacific efforts succeed, we must bear the very heavy sacrifices necessitated by national defence.

It is only by the unanimous determination of Republican France to declare peace to the entire world and to speak with serenity, without exaggeration and without fear to the peoples who do not yet understand it, that we can find the conditions of a sound and prolonged peace pending the final peace.

Extract from a Speech by the French Author, Jules Romains, at the Congress of the French Union of Ex-Servicemen at Toulouse, on October 30th, 1938.

The crisis of 1914 has left us with a dreadful precedent. It forced many people to the conviction that from a certain moment neither good will nor reason can prevail to prevent a conflict. The last days of September 1938 have, on the other hand, taught us that it is never too late, that an international situation is never desperate and never escapes from the control of the human will, that even a centimetre from the abyss offers sufficient room for escape and therefore that this human will which has so often shown itself determined to bring about war is also capable of preventing it.

But these September days have also brought another revelation which was not counted on to this extent and with such general application. It is a revelation which is in itself a new factor and which cannot fail to make its influence felt in all future reflections and negotiations of statesmen. I mean the attitude of public opinion in all countries at the moment of the greatest tension and the repercussions of the Munich agreement on the masses of all capitals.

This vast movement of joy was followed with bewildering rapidity by deep disappointment and a relapse to black night. This psychological revulsion of feeling occurred almost to the same extent among our British friends and merely corresponded to a feeling which was widespread even before the Munich agreement in the United States and in the various countries that were more or less in sympathy with our cause.

Though such a relapse is surprising and even disturbing from various points of view it is not unexplainable. Public opinion, after feeling almost boundless joy at the immense fact that peace was saved, that war would not break out and that the catastrophe was prevented, calculated the price that had been paid for peace, the extent of the victory which the other side had won without a struggle and the devastation which this victory had brought to the position of Europe and of France. Having once started on the downward slope of disappointment, it is difficult not to take a still darker view of matters. "This exorbitant price has not even procured us peace. On the contrary, we have furnished the enemy of tomorrow with an unbelievable increase in strength, and we have removed what might be the most serious obstacle to his nefarious designs. He will now attack us when it suits him with much greater prospects than before; and we shall no longer have the choice between a war undertaken under the worst conditions and more shameful further disasters."

Now that the waves of enthusiasm and disappointment have succeeded each other in our minds, it is time for reason alone to speak. It is not out of place to consider things as they are. It is a testimony of the respect in which I hold my exceptional audience that I make this investigation without regard for anyone.

In the first place, let us dissipate a first false idea which has recently become widespread in various quarters, especially on the left and extreme left. Were you not told that during the week which ended at Munich, we let ourselves be bluffed, that we gave away much more than was necessary, that if we had said: No! Hitler would have drawn back at the last minute, and that we should have saved peace, Czechoslovakia and our political situation in Europe? All that I know enables me to state that this is not true. Hitler would have marched.

Those who speak in this way must realise what they are asking for in retrospect and what they regret that we did not do. They regret that we have not been at war for the last thirty days. Possibly they are right from the point of view of pure historic realism. Perhaps it would have been advantageous to wage war at that moment. But then they should say so. They should tell it to the people instead of saying that our Governments, i.e. the British and the French, collapsed on account of an imaginary fear. They should say it because it is the truth. The rest is propagandist lies.

Can we affirm that Munich was a success for us? This would obviously be difficult. After reflection I admit that Munich was hard to swallow for our national pride, for our democratic idealism and for our sense of our collective interests. I would even go further and agree that, from one point of view, the matter looks like a capitulation. But what I maintain is that in September 1938 there was no other means except to show criminal indifference by playing with the lives of millions of men, and with the fate of the country and of civilisation.

The mistakes were not made in September 1938, but go much further back. It would be an unending task to enumerate them and I have no intention of doing so. But it is essential that the most important of them and those which have had the greatest influence on recent events should be present to our minds. I mention merely as a reminder the mistakes of the peace treaties. They should, however, not be overlooked. In particular it should not be forgotten that Czechoslovakia, in the form in which it was created, was one of the mistakes of these treaties, and a mistake with very little prospect of being rectified of itself. Although the Czechs had formally promised autonomy to the nationalities—which was unfortunately not imposed upon them in the treaty itself—they had no desire to grant such autonomy, as was proved by their hesitations and pretexts which still continued twenty years later in spite of the evidence of the German peril and in spite of the advice which we showered upon them. They flattered themselves that they could assimilate these nationalities. This was a chimera.

In addition, there were the mistakes of our behaviour towards Germany. I am entitled to speak of them, for I have denounced them for fifteen years. There were two policies which could be defended against vanquished Germany: one was the Machiavellian policy of cynical realism which would have consisted in keeping Germany weak and under guardianship by every possible means. There was another policy, which was in harmony with the principles and the reasons for which so many men died and in conformity with the spirit of the League of Nations of which we gladly flattered ourselves to be the champions, namely to accomplish the material and moral promises of peace; to seek sincerely reconciliation with the German people; after disarming them to disarm in our turn; to prove that we had not lied in proclaiming the era of definitive peace; to proceed to a reasonable and prudent revision of the injustices contained in the peace treaties under the aegis of the League of Nations whose authority would thus have grown unceasingly instead of having appeared too often in its best years as a legal rhetorical shield behind which we practised a shameful imperialism; to institute close economic cooperation between the peoples, victors and vanquished, on the continent and in the colonies; to prepare a free and fraternal European federation of which we should have had the merit of being the initiators.

Of these two policies—and I do not need to tell you that I would prefer the second—we followed neither. We followed incongruous and discontinuous parts of both. We were weak without being generous. More than once we gave the impression that we were lacking in sincerity. With groans we allowed concessions to be dragged from us, and this meant that they were useless and even dangerous for us because nothing was obtained in return. We favoured conditions in Germany that were bound to provoke a national movement of rising and revenge which we had not the energy to stop while we still had the power to do so. Having found it natural that Germany should adopt the regime which our behaviour towards her had rendered inevitable, we did not understand to come to an agreement with her at a time when we could do so not only on an equal footing but even with a margin of considerable superiority.

I am always struck by the silence that reigns in France regarding the note of April 17th, 1934, so famous among well-informed people, which, in the opinion of all those who are acquainted with the affairs of Europe, is one of the capital mistakes of French policy for the last twenty years. I say policy and not diplomacy. For once—and it was not the only time—diplomacy leaned to the right side. I have seen flegmatic diplomatists grind their teeth in rage at the thought of the stupidity of this note. Perhaps the silence under which it has been buried is due to the fact that a number of eminent men of different parties were considered jointly responsible for it. In short, this note was a reply to a proposal by Chancellor Hitler who had at that moment scarcely started the rearmament of Germany and who had not yet openly released himself from the clauses of the treaty. The Chancellor offered us a reciprocal limitation of armaments while leaving us a substantial margin of superiority and asking us to choose for ourselves the method of control which we wished to have applied reciprocally. It was at that time that Chancellor Hitler said to one of his intimates: "Some day I may have my statue on the bank of the Rhine with the words on the pedestal: To the founder of Franco-German friendship."

In the light of present events, I do not need to show how many fears, useless sacrifices and paralysing crises such a pact would have spared our country and Europe, or how our refusal of it without discussion placed us in a bad moral position. In April 1934 we replied that France preferred to guarantee her own security. "Very good", said Hitler, "I will also look after my own. The French have just proved that all their talk about disarmament was not meant seriously. They will see." And we have seen.

But now, gentlemen, on the morrow of Munich, what shall we do? What prospects remain for us? The problem is not difficult to state. How shall we permanently avoid a general war? How shall we prevent France from slipping to a lower rank? All the rest is secondary.

A system that we had worked on for a long time has collapsed. The Leagues of Nations practically no longer counts. We killed it ourselves at the end of 1935. Our alliance in the centre and east of Europe are disappearing into thin air. Our possible adversary is stronger than ever.

Our alliances—I do not speak of England which has been our only solid and effective ally since the war—our alliances and semi-alliances have cost us dear and brought in very little. They have cost us many milliards, many responsibilities and embarrassments and much danger. They have prevented us from proceeding to the necessary revision of the peace treaties, and they are certainly partly to blame that we have such difficulty in finding the right way to talk to Germany.

THE RECOGNITION OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE BY ENGLAND AND FRANCE ON NOVEMBER 16TH AND 19TH, 1938

After the House of Commons had authorised the British Government on November 3rd, 1938 by 345 votes to 138 to bring the Anglo-Italian Agreement of April 16th, 1938 into force (see in this connection Mr. Chamberlain's great speech of November 3rd), it was brought into force by means of a declaration signed by the Italian Foreign Minister Count Ciano and the British Ambassador Lord Perth.

"Whereas a protocol was established between the Italian Government and the Government of Great Britain and Northern Ireland on April 16th, 1938 regarding questions of interest to both countries,

Whereas the agreements and declarations annexed to this protocol were signed on that date by the Government mentioned,

Whereas this protocol provides that the agreements mentioned are to come into force on a date fixed jointly by the two Governments,

The Undersigned, authorised by their Governments to this effect, declare that the agreements and declarations contained in the protocol in question come into force today."

This declaration was preceded by the handing in of the new letters of credit of the Ambassador, Lord Perth, on which the following protocol was established:

"The Minister of Foreign Affairs, Count Galeazzo Ciano, received the British Ambassador, Lord Perth, who informed him officially that his Government had decided to recognise Italian sovereignty over Abyssinia. For this purpose he handed to him, for transmission to his August Ruler, the new letters accrediting him the Ambassador of His Majesty the King of Great Britain to His Majesty the King of Italy and Emperor of Ethiopia.

Count Galeazzo Ciano took note of the communication and requested Lord Perth to transmit to the Government of His Majesty the King of Great Britain the expression of the Fascist Government's appreciation of this step."

Exchange of Telegrams between Mussolini and Chamberlain.

"At the moment of the entry into force of the Agreement of April 16, which placed on a firm and lasting basis the relations of friendship and collaboration between our two countries, I wish to renew to you the expression of my satisfaction and of that of the Fascist Government, and to send you personally my friendly and cordial good wishes. Mussolini"

"I am deeply grateful to your Excellency for the message in which you have courteously expressed your satisfaction and that of the Italian Government at the entry into force of the Agreement of April 16.

Like you, I am convinced that with these Agreements we have once again placed the relations between our two countries on a basis which will permit them to work together in friendship for the good of all peoples.

I am grateful to your Excellency for the personal expression of good wishes which you have addressed to me, and which I cordially reciprocate. Chamberlain."

The recognition of Italian sovereignty over Abyssinia by the French Government took place on November 19th, 1938, when the newly appointed Ambassador to the Quirinal, M. François Poncet, handed to King Victor Emmanuel III the note accrediting him as French Ambassador to the King of Italy and Emperor of Ethiopia.

THE SETTLEMENT OF THE CZECHOSLOVAK-HUNGARIAN DISPUTE

The Arbitral Award of Vienna of November 2nd 1938.

The Text of the Decision.

"In pursuance of the request made by the Royal Hungarian and the Czechoslovak Governments to the German and the Royal Italian Governments to settle by arbitration the outstanding question of the areas to be ceded to Hungary, and in pursuance of the notes exchanged on the subject between the Governments concerned on October 30th 1938, the German Reich Minister of Foreign Affairs, Herr Joachim von Ribbentrop, and the Minister of Foreign Affairs of His Majesty the King of Italy and Emperor of Ethiopia, Count Galeazzo Ciano, have today met at Vienna and, after a further discussion with the Royal Hungarian Minister of Foreign Affairs, M. Koloman von Kanya, and the Czechoslovak Minister of Foreign Affairs, Dr. Franz Chvalkovsky, have given the following arbitral award in the names of their Governments:

1. The areas to be ceded by Czechoslovakia to Hungary are marked on the annexed map. The demarcation of the frontier on the spot is confided to a Hungarian-Czechoslovak Commission.

2. The evacuation of the ceded territories by Czechoslovakia and their occupation by Hungary begins on November 5th and is to be concluded by November 10th. The individual stages of the evacuation and occupation together with other details are to be fixed by a Hungarian-Czechoslovak Commission.

3. The Czechoslovak Government will take care that the ceded territories are left in an orderly condition on evacuation.

4. Individual questions arising out of the cession of territory, in particular questions relating to nationality and options, are to be settled by a Hungarian-Czechoslovak Commission.

5. Likewise, detailed provisions for the protection of persons of Magyar nationality remaining in the territory of Czechoslovakia and of persons of non-Magyar nationality remaining in the ceded territories are to be agreed upon by a Hungarian-Czechoslovak Commission. This Commission will take particular care that the Magyar national group in Pressburg is given the same position as the other national groups.

6. In so far as the cession of territories to Hungary involves disadvantages and difficulties of an economic or transport character for the territory remaining with Czechoslovakia, the Royal Hungarian Government will do everything possible, in agreement with the Czechoslovak Government, to remove such disadvantages and difficulties.

7. Should any difficulties or doubts arise in the execution of this arbitral award, the Royal Hungarian and the Czech Governments will immediately consult with each other. Should they be unable to reach an agreement on any question, such question will be submitted to the German and Royal Italian Governments for final decision.

Vienna, November 2nd 1938.

Sd. Joachim von Ribbentrop. Sd. Galeazzo Ciano.

A Protocol to the Arbitral Award.

A protocol to the arbitral award was concluded and signed not only by the arbitrators but also by the Foreign Ministers of Hungary and Czechoslovakia. It reads as follows:

"In pursuance of the request made by the Royal Hungarian and the Czechoslovak Governments to the German and the Royal Italian Governments to settle by arbitration the outstanding question of the areas to be ceded to Hungary, and in pursuance of the notes exchanged on the subject between the Governments concerned on October 30th 1938, the German Reich Minister of Foreign Affairs, Herr Joachim von Ribbentrop, and the Minister of Foreign Affairs of His Majesty the King of Italy and Emperor of Ethiopia, Count Galeazzo Ciano, have today met at the Belvedere Castle at Vienna and given the desired arbitral award in the names of their Governments.

For this purpose they have invited to Vienna the Royal Hungarian Minister of Foreign Affairs, M. Koloman von Kanya, and the Czechoslovak Minister of Foreign Affairs, Dr. Franz Chvalkovsky, in order to give them an opportunity in the first place again to explain the point of view of their Governments.

This arbitral award, together with the map mentioned in paragraph 1, has been handed to the Royal Hungarian Minister of Foreign Affairs and to the Czechoslovak Minister of Foreign Affairs. They have taken cognizance of it and have again confirmed, on behalf of their Governments, the statement which they made on October 30th 1938 that they accept the arbitral award as a final settlement and that they undertake to carry it out unconditionally and without delay.

Done in the German and Italian languages in quadruplicate.
Vienna, November 2nd 1938.

v. Ribbentrop. Count Ciano. v. Kanya. Chvalkovsky.'

The Proceedings at the Meeting.

At the beginning of the meeting the Reich Foreign Minister von Ribbentrop spoke as follows:

"I have the honour to welcome you in Vienna on behalf of the Reich Government. I greet in particular the Foreign Minister of Fascist Italy, my friend Count Ciano, together with the Foreign Ministers of the Kingdom of Hungary and of Czechoslovakia.

The Kingdom of Hungary and Czechoslovakia have appealed to the arbitration of Germany and Italy regarding the frontier delimitation between their two countries. The Government of the Reich and the Royal Italian Government have responded to this appeal. The Italian Foreign Minister and myself have met here today in order to reach this decision. I regard it as of particular symbolic importance that Italy and Germany can devote themselves to this lofty and responsible task, especially in this house of Prince Eugene of Savoy. Two hundred years ago this Prince of Italian race and German statesman and general brought freedom, peace and justice to the peoples of the South East of Europe.

It is our task today to fix the definite frontier between Hungary and Czechoslovakia on a ethnographical basis and to find a solution for the questions connected with it. The arbitral award given by us is binding and final and is recognised in advance by Hungary and Czechoslovakia as a definite settlement. The standpoint of the two Governments is already known to us in essential points from the negotiations which have been carried on. I nevertheless consider it advisable that the representatives of the two Governments should briefly summarise and explain their attitude to the question, so that all the arguments may be carefully weighed before the arbitral award is given. Before asking the representatives of the two Governments to speak, I would first call upon the Italian Foreign Minister."

Count Ciano then made the following speech:

"I have the honour to greet you most cordially on behalf of the Fascist Government. I express my sincere thanks to my friend von Ribbentrop, the Reich Minister of Foreign Affairs, for the cordial reception given me in Vienna. The Rome-Berlin axis, in acting as a court of arbitration at the request of the Hungarian and Czechoslovak Governments, has set itself the aim of making a further important contribution to the efforts already made for the peace and reconstruction of Europe.

I am sure that our efforts will be crowned with success and that the Vienna meeting will lead to a new order and a new era in Central Europe on the basis of that international justice which we have always striven for and desired."

A German-Italian Declaration.

Vienna, November 2nd. (Deutsches Nachrichtenbüro). In the Belvedere, in which the German-Italian Court of Arbitration gave its award on Wednesday, the following joint declaration was made by the German Reich Minister of Foreign Affairs, Joachim von Ribbentrop, and the Minister of Foreign Affairs of His Majesty the King of Italy and Emperor of Ethiopia, Count Galeazzo Ciano, to the representatives of the German and foreign press:

"The Rome-Berlin axis has today acted as a successful arbitrator in an international dispute of great importance and extraordinary complexity. It has thus again proved itself to be a factor of peace and order in European politics. In this South-East European area the injustice of the treaties of 1919 resulted in a permanent source of disturbance. This state of affairs has now been brought to an end by the impartial arbitral award given by the Foreign Ministers of Germany and Italy after carefully hearing the two parties and discussing the matter.

The arbitral award has arisen out of the spirit of mutual friendship between Italy and Germany and the sense of responsibility for the peace of Europe.

We hope that the relations between Hungary and Czechoslovakia will now be re-established in the spirit of peaceful and good-neighbourly cooperation, and this will be all the more possible as the new epoch in the relations between the two countries is based on the principle of complete justice."

The Concluding Speeches.

Vienna, November 2nd. (Deutsches Nachrichtenbüro). After the announcement of the arbitral award and the subsequent signature of the protocol, the Reich Foreign Minister, von Ribbentrop, stated in a concluding speech that the Italian Foreign Minister and himself, after carefully considering all the matters of importance for the questions in dispute, had fixed the frontier in such a way as, in the opinion of the arbitrators, to constitute a just settlement. He hoped that conditions in this area would develop in the sense of complete appeasement in which the two countries could live in a spirit of true friendship and good-neighbourly relations with each other.

The Italian Foreign Minister, Count Ciano, added to Herr von Ribbentrop's words his sincere thanks for the cordial reception which he had received in Vienna and expressed his satisfaction that on this occasion also the Rome-Berlin axis had again proved its value in the sense of the stabilisation and appeasement of conditions. After careful consideration the two arbitrators had found a solution, of the objectiveness and justice of which they were convinced. It was now for Hungary and Czechoslovakia to draw the practical consequences in the sense of stabilisation and cooperation in order thus to serve the peace of Europe, to which the Rome-Berlin axis had on this as on other occasions furnished a substantial contribution.

Thereupon the Reich Minister of Foreign Affairs, von Ribbentrop, closed the meeting.

The New Frontiers.

The following is the literal text of the unofficial communication relating to the drawing of the new frontiers:

The new State frontier between the Kingdom of Hungary and the Czechoslovak Republic as fixed by the arbitral award of the German and Italian Foreign Ministers given at Vienna on November 2nd is roughly as follows:

Starting from the old State frontier south of Pozsony (Pressburg), the new frontier crosses the Pozsony-Érsekújvár (Neuhäusel) railway line at Cseklész, then runs north from the railway line, and, north-west of Érsekújvár, branches off to the north-east until it reaches the railway line Léva-Zólyom (Lewenz-Altsohl) north of Verebély (Vrable). East of Léva, the new frontier crosses the Ipoly territory and runs about 30 kilometres north of the former frontier. It then turns sharply to the north above the Losonc-Rimaszombat (Lucenec-Gross-Steffelsdorf) line (which towns are thus also restored to Hungary) and then north-east to include the town of Jolsva, when it branches off to Rozsnyo (Rosenau) and closely follows the Niederzips frontier territory.

From here it turns north again, includes the town of Kassa (Kaschau) and then runs south-east for about 30 kilometres, reaching the former Hungarian frontier near the railway junction of Sátoraljaujhely. The new frontier then runs due east turning north at a point immediately above the town of Ungvár (Uzhorod), which now once more belongs to Hungary to drop sharply to the south-east and then run immediately to the north of Munkács (Munkatsch). North-east of the Roumanian frontier, it runs south-east, reaching the former State frontier at the railway station of Halmi on the Roumanian border.

Of the towns under dispute, Slovakia receives Pozsony as its capital, and also the old bishopric of Nyitra (Neutra) and Russinsko (Ruthenia) receives Nagyszöllös with the neighbouring villages. Hungary receives the towns of Érsekijvár, Léva, Losonc, Kassa, Ungvár and Munkács.

It is stated in the last paragraph of the communication that, under this frontier settlement, the whole territory settled by Hungarians returns to Hungary. Where in view of special circumstances it was impossible to draw an exact ethnographical frontier, the interests of both parties were carefully considered.

The Hungarian Foreign Minister Kolomon von Kanya on the arbitral award of Vienna.

Extract from the speech in the Hungarian Parliament on November 12th, 1938.

"The Vienna Conference met on November 2nd. The arbitral award, as we know, restored to us about 12,600 square kilometres with a population of 863,000 according to the 1910 census or, according to the 1930 census, 1,030,000.

In the light of this result, I will now endeavour to examine the extent to which it has been possible to achieve the fulfilment in practice of those principles which we adopted as our guide when these extremely difficult negotiations were set on foot.

As has been stated, the Government regarded the most rapid possible settlement of the Hungaro-Czechoslovak negotiations as its principal task.

We were able to achieve the reduction of the maximum period of three months, laid down in the Munich Supplementary Protocol for the termination of the negotiations, to about six weeks.

We held fast to the principle that we could not tolerate any such departure from the procedure adopted on the occasion of the settlement of the German and Polish minorities problems as would constitute discrimination against Hungary. We protested whenever any attempt was made to adopt any but ethnical considerations when seeking a solution of the dispute. We managed to carry our point that the settlement should be based on the 1910 Hungarian statistics. It is a matter of common knowledge that the situation obtaining in that year was adopted as a basis for the settlement of the Sudeten German question.

We have never abandoned our principle that durable peace in this part of Europe can only be assured by the uncompromising application of the principle of self-determination.

We have solved the question peaceably. The Hungarian Government drew up its demands after careful and detailed study and we should consequently have been the last to shrink from maintaining them by means of a plebiscite. We never for a moment doubted that such a plebiscite would be favourable to us and, as this method could not be employed in view of the opposition of the other side, we entrusted the solution of the dispute with the utmost confidence and assurance to the German-Italian Court of Arbitration which did in fact grant nearly 90 per cent of our demands. The proof of the justification of our demands thus furnished is all the more compelling, as the arbitrators naturally attached the greatest importance to the necessity of arriving at an impartial decision based exclusively upon principles of concrete justice. There are many, including myself, who maintain that it was necessary, in the interests of a definite settlement, to make onerous sacrifices, but we made those sacrifices in the hope that the Vienna award would herald the dawn of a happier epoch in this part of Europe and enable the nations who have for centuries been settled here to live in peace together—and withal to find ways and means of establishing close collaboration with one another.

We for our part were always most ready to do everything in our power to further this object.

We do not desire to dominate other nations, but with them to serve human progress and European peace.

There can be no doubt, as I believe, that our international position has improved as a result of our ability to procure an increase of territory by peaceful means, whereby the approved foreign policy pursued by successive Governments in the course of years was tested in the hour of trial and not found wanting, while our existing friendships remained unshaken.

During the recent months of crisis, we have had experience of the active sympathy of the 'axis Powers'—Germany and Italy—as also of our old friend Poland."

Hungary and the Rome-Berlin axis.

From a conversation between the Premier, Dr. v. Imrédy and the editor Virginio Gayda on November 17th, 1938, published in the "Voce d'Italia", the Sunday edition of the "Giornale d'Italia".

In the sphere of foreign politics at any rate, we can say that the hostility to Hungary displayed by the Little Entente has become much less intense. The dynamic power generated by the Italy of Mussolini and the Germany of Hitler has been responsible for this change. That can in any case be accounted a benefit from our point of view, but neither that circumstance nor the increase in territory can have any effect on our policy. Our policy reposes, now as before, on the Rome-Berlin axis and, if there is any change to be noted, it is that we are taking our stand more resolutely than ever on the policy of that axis. Sentimental considerations have, as a result of the events of the past few months, been reinforced by the bonds of gratitude.

Hungary was perhaps the first country to take up the struggle against Bolshevism and Hungarian policy has, under the wise régime of Nicholas v. Horthy, never once swerved a hair's breadth from that path or lent itself to any bargain or compromise with Communism. The anti-Bolshevist attitude which forms the ideological link between the two axis Powers still commands complete recognition, appreciation and approval in Hungary. A strong nationalist spirit, cultivation of the military virtues and love of race are characteristic features of Hungarian national life, all of which, with the necessary adaptations in each case, are regarded as the fundamental principle of the Fascist and National-Socialist Powers. The tenacity and sense of responsibility with which the two powerful and friendly powers tackle and solve these questions—the manner in which the problem of the territory inhabited by Hungarians but belonging to Czechoslovakia has been discussed and settled in a few days, although we had been knocking on the door in vain for 19 years without being able even to get the question placed on the Agenda of the League under Article 19 of the Covenant: all this cannot but reinforce with feelings of gratitude and admiration the bonds which hold us to these two great Powers.

PAN-AMERICAN UNION AND PAN-AMERICAN CONFERENCES

I.

Reflections on the VIIIth Pan-American Conference at Lima.

The bright little publications of the "Bulletin of the Pan-American Union", on a cursory perusal, give the impression rather of a business prospectus. There are advertisements, pictures of business firms, and on the first page of each number will be found the same text enumerating objects of an economic character which are, as it were, offered on advantageous terms. When translated into political terms, the meaning would be somewhat as follows: "Dear Sirs, we have at the present time an excellent Treaty of Friendship to offer which, in view of the strained relations between your country and the neighbouring country, is of special value to your Government as offering an excellent means of returning to normal relations. As you are aware, the X Government has already been supplied by us and has been well pleased. We enclose testimonials, etc., etc."

The Americans, with their usual moderation, will probably approve such an attitude. Economic affairs have always come first with them, and why should the political relations between States which do not carry the "ballast of a millennial past" be settled on substantially different terms from economic questions which are really of paramount importance.

But the celebrations with which the conferences of the Pan-American Union have been opened show that the moderation in views in this particular case is neither intended nor applied. It comes to grief on the fact that not only the Anglo-Saxons are concerned but also the Latin-Americans.

The best explanation of the first impression of moderation in dealing with matters must therefore be attributed simply to the fact that the original task of the Union was to settle economic questions. The idea of a "Customs Union" developed into the "Commercial Bureau of the American Republics", and was subsequently further extended, while becoming less definite, into an "International Bureau of the American Republics". It was only at the Fifth American Conference in 1923, the first to be held after the War, that the Union was represented as an association of the American States to attain cultural, intellectual and social aims, and finally it has become popular in recent times, though not without violent resistance, to place the purely political significance in the foreground and to speak of an "American League", as opposed to the "Geneva League".

We deal below in greater detail with this development. Even if it were found to be inadvisable to speak of a central trade agency, it cannot be denied that the respectable list of 67 treaties and conventions gives evidence of a "good firm". The American Journal of International Law (April 1938) gives an excellent summary which we reproduce below. It relates to collective and regional agreements concluded exclusively between American States.

* * *

When President Monroe on December 2nd, 1823 proclaimed the principle that the Latin American Republics which had just gained their freedom by a national rising against Portugal and Spain, should no longer be the subject of colonisation by European Powers and that this would be guaranteed by the United States, the foundations seemed to be laid for a mental and political development of the two Americas in complete solidarity of their interests. This spirit also prevailed at the first Pan-American Conference held at Panama in the year 1826 at the suggestion of Simon Bolivar, the great American champion of liberty. It met with no success as very few States attended it. The next few years showed that the separating factors far outweighed the common interests between the Union and the Latin American Republics. The efforts subsequently made by a number of American Presidents to follow the spirit of 1823 by promoting in particular economic and commercial relations between North and South America met with no success. For a number of years no Pan-American Conference had been convened, when in 1889 a Conference of this kind again met at Washington and substantially changed the position of the United States in the world. For they proceeded to advance from the phase of a colonising conquest of their own continent to that of an imperialistic extension of their power.

Nothing seemed more natural than to apply this extension of power in the first place to the black republics of South and North America. But this necessarily involved a fresh interpretation of the Monroe doctrine and in 1895 the formula was adopted that the sovereignty of the United States no longer extended to North America alone, but (with the exception, however, of Canada) to the entire American continent. This new doctrine was soon followed by practical politics and, with the growth of American power, the pressure of the big brother in the north was increased from year to year, while during the period of "dollar diplomacy" and the "policy of the big stick" under Presidents McKinley, Theodore Roosevelt and Taft, the relations between North and South at times went almost as far as open enmity.

All the decisions of this Conference of 1889 merely remained on paper since they were not ratified, and the only tangible result was the foundation of the Bureau of the American Republics, which was subsequently given the name Pan-American Union and was endowed by Carnegie with a magnificent palace in Washington.

The Conferences held since 1889 have avoided bringing the differences to a crisis and have, in spite of everything, kept alive the Pan-American idea.

The War naturally brought about a great change in this connection. But Wilson did not succeed in leading America away from her old policy into a new path in respect of Latin America, and his successor, Mr. Coolidge, coined the famous saying that American sovereignty existed wherever there was an American citizen. President Hoover by his good-will journey to South America was the first to prepare the ground for the new policy of good neighbourliness which Franklin D. Roosevelt took as his guiding principle.

Before the War the main task of the Pan-American Union lay in the solution of purely economic questions, to which were added in the course of time problems relating to the social and intellectual development of the American continent. The Union had, moreover, always stressed the fact that it would not place any political questions on its agenda. Though it is true that in the course of its early past the Pan-American Union attained considerable results in the adjustment of economic interests and the inter-State coordination of social and cultural institutions, it is equally true that political questions also played a part in these Conferences. For they constantly dealt with questions of international law, especially with the settlement of disputes. The apparent contradiction in the American statement that the Union held aloof from political issues is no doubt mainly due to the view generally held in America that law and politics have no connection with each other and that therefore questions of international law did not represent political activity.

Questions which in the European view are definitely political in character played a predominant part at the Pan-American Conferences after the War. This was mainly due to two general tendencies of development. The economic liberation of the South and Central American States was substantially promoted by the War and strengthened the tendencies towards independence existing in these countries in respect of the big brother in the North. The second main tendency was supplied by the establishment of the League at Geneva and its organs, the Permanent Court of International Justice and the International Labour Office. A number of South American countries acceded to the League of Nations, some giving their cooperation solely to the League but not to its organs; some took part in the work of the International Labour Office while others who were regarded as non-Members of the League nevertheless signed obligations aiming at international peace, such as the Kellogg Pact.

These two tendencies show the lack of uniformity and difficulty in the foreign policy of the American States and also the new problems which arose out of over-lapping obligations for the maintenance of purely American peace. It was unavoidable that, in the course of time, this dual membership of the Pan-American Union and of the League should make itself felt and this connection played a predominant part until the last Conference at Buenos Aires.

Of the American States it was the United States themselves who took the initiative of increased cooperation with the Latin-American States, and it may also be noted that, in particular with the entrance into office of the present American President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, a new era of Pan-Americanism was inaugurated by the President's announcement on March 4th, 1933 of the policy of "good neighbours". The United States had already removed a considerable number of barriers in order to attain this object and had thus dispelled the former justified mistrust. Shortly after he came into office, President Roosevelt showed by deeds that he did not intend to follow the policy of his predecessors in respect of American influence. The first step in this direction was the treaty with Cuba on May 29th, 1934, in which the United States agreed to the annulment of the Platt amendment and thus abandoned any interference in the internal affairs of the island republic. There was also the agreement with Haiti concluded on July 24th, 1934, under which the American training officers and the American naval forces were withdrawn from Haiti. To this category also belongs the above mentioned treaty regarding the Philippines. Mention may also be made of the treaty with Panama of March 2nd, 1936, which restored the sovereignty and independence of Panama while preserving American interests.

Lastly, by the conclusion of commercial treaties with Brazil, the Argentine and some smaller States, President Roosevelt was able to attenuate the deep-rooted suspicion of the United States which still exists in South and Central America and thus to create the economic conditions for political cooperation.

All this showed that Roosevelt seriously meant his message to Congress in January 1934, when he solemnly announced the end of "dollar diplomacy" and American interventionism.

This preparatory work, which the rest of the continent was able to regard as practical proof of an active new policy in the direction of Pan-American community, though it fell in with Roosevelt's intentions of uniting all American interests in a large-scale economic and pacific policy, nevertheless did not enlighten the participants as to the question—which was also of the greatest importance to the rest of the world—whether the American continent would in future remain aloof from non-American affairs. This question might be supplemented by a number of variations. For instance, will the League of Nations be able to count in future on the cooperation of America? Will any ultimate success be attained by certain American tendencies which regard an American League of Nations as a more effective means of securing general peace?

The isolation from other continents is really a question for America as to the maintenance of the present policy or the inauguration of a new policy in respect of importance economic and political interests. The accession to the League of Nations by most of the South American States after the War meant political support for these States as against the United States. This measure of precaution, moreover, has not lost its meaning as a result of Roosevelt's new policy. The American members of the League of Nations have, it is true, had increasing cause for feeling a grievance against the League in the course of recent years. But the withdrawal which some of them decided upon ultimately depended on the question as to what the attitude of the United States would be. In fact the cooperation of that Power in the League in the future remained entirely unsettled. Though the United States reserved freedom of action in respect of steps taken by the League, they had nevertheless in course of time become an important co-worker. The Kellogg Pact inaugurated this cooperation; the effect of American declarations on the Disarmament Conference will also be remembered; the Hoover Government moreover dealt with the Leticia dispute conjointly with the League; later the United States sent their delegates to the international Labour Conference, and lastly it is significant that President Roosevelt recommended accession to the Permanent Court of International Justice. It was therefore possible to speak of a constantly growing cooperation on the part of the United States.

Nevertheless the policy of the United States was not uniform in this connection. This is best shown by the difference in the treatment of the last two inter-American conflicts. As mentioned above, the United States cooperated with the League of Nations in the Leticia conflict between Colombia and Peru. In the Chaco conflict between Paraguay and Bolivia, however, in which the differences and conflicting interests were immeasurably greater, the United States accepted the invitation to cooperate with the Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Peru and Uruguay and worked out the protocol of June 12th, 1935 to end the war at the Peace Conference of Buenos Aires without the League of Nations.

It is only after this time, and not least as a result of this success but also of the events of the Italo-Abyssinian war, that there are signs—in particular the neutrality laws of August 23rd, 1935—of a more uniform policy of the United States representing a withdrawal from non-American affairs and a greater emphasis of American community. It may be observed in passing that this tendency was promoted by economic interests and that this policy is to be regarded not least in the light of the increasing economic participation of Japan and Germany in the South American markets.

* * *

Some details may be given of the policy and work of the Union in connection with the eighth Pan-American Conference which opens on December 9th at Lima.

The American Under-Secretary, Mr. Sumner Welles, according to a report of November 7th, 1938 from Washington, in speaking of this Conference, said that it would have an extraordinarily important character. The world situation made it more necessary than ever before to exclude any trace of misunderstanding between the American republics. The United States Government had a permanent and growing interest in the general programme of inter-American cooperation. The consultative system created at Buenos Aires must be strengthened; this was a vital point for all American nations. American freedom, independence and future welfare might depend on the maintenance of American solidarity.

The necessary steps would, he said, be taken to place the United States in a position to defend themselves at all times against any aggression and to be prepared to join with their democratic friends in the New World so that this hemisphere might be spared any menace.

The question arises whether inter-American policy at this Conference will show any great change. Will it create an American League of Nations in accordance with the proposal already made by the Dominican Government which—it is an open secret—was inspired by the United States? The putting of such questions implies standing in the midst of the political tension which at present exists between North and South America, with the exception of Canada. Little notice has been taken, and little comprehension has been shown, of the fact that certain South American States, whose League policy is almost identical with that of Chile, have not drawn the same conclusion and turned their backs on the Geneva League. The explanation is not far to seek. It is to be found in three ideas: the desire for independence, the rejection of Imperialism and the new American Monroe doctrine. Every Latin American State thinks in this connection of the great northern neighbour, the United States. This is the case even today. As a rule their adherence to the League has no other foundation than the desire to counterbalance the influence of Washington.

It would be wrong to exaggerate this difference. In many respects there have been improvements in the relations between North and South America.

On the other hand, however, there can be no question of a completed development. It may merely be pointed out that—partly as a result of the political tension in Europe—it has been shown by the speeches of North American statesmen how glad they would be if the Monroe doctrine could be revived in a somewhat modernised form. But the South American States will not give up their connection with Europe, especially in respect of their commercial relations. The reaction of the United States to the "Japanese Monroe doctrine" shows, however, to what extent the era of imperialism still persists, in which the South American States cannot have any interest.

These are in main lines the boundaries of Pan-Americanism. But within these boundaries a great field of cooperation remains open and the Pan-American Union has become in the course of time the great regulator of American affairs.

II.

Review of the Pan-American Conferences.

An excellent summary of the work of the first six Pan-American Conferences is to be found in the Inter-Parliamentary Bulletin, the organ of the Inter-Parliamentary Bureau at Geneva (Year 1928, Nos. 5 and 6, and year 1929, No. 1), which gives a brief general picture, and which we have utilised in the following statement.

The real origin of the Pan-American movement lies in the efforts made by Secretary of State James G. Blaine to unite the independent states of the American continent in a common action "for the consolidation of peace and the advancement of their prosperity". He considered that the first condition for the realisation of his plan was the creation of an American Customs Union. By a special decree of the Congress of the United States the President was empowered to call a Conference with the Republics of Mexico, of Central America, of South America, of Haiti, of the Dominican Republic and of Brazil.

Secretary Blaine in his invitation of 1881 for a conference of the American States gave "considering and discussing methods of preventing war between the nations of America," as one of the purposes for the meeting. This aim was also stressed by the United States Congress when in 1882 it requested the President to call a conference of the republics on this continent "for the purpose of discussing and recommending for adoption to their respective Governments some plan of arbitration for the settlement of disagreements and disputes that may hereafter arise between them."

The First Pan-American Conference, in which the representatives of 18 countries took part, sat at Washington from October 2nd, 1889 until April 19th, 1890. Its agenda consisted mainly of economic questions the most important of which were Point 2: "The creation of a Customs Union" and Point 7, which already contained a draft arbitration agreement. The results of the deliberations are to be found in the nineteen resolutions which later were all modified by the work of the following Conferences. The only important event was the foundation of the "International Union of American Republics" whose central office, situated at Washington, was to serve as the "Commercial Bureau of the American Republics" to receive, co-ordinate and publish all information relating to economic, commercial, juridical and Customs questions. The Bureau was placed under the direction of the Secretary of State of the United States.

The Second Pan-American Conference, which was invited by the Mexican Government, only met on October 22nd, 1901 at Mexico and sat until January 22nd, 1902. Seventeen states took part in it. The "Bureau of the American Republics" was re-organised and was placed under the direction of a Council composed of the diplomatic representatives of the American States at Washington, and of the Secretary of State of the United States. The countries which had not been present at the First International Peace Conference at The Hague signed a protocol of adherence which the United States and Mexico undertook to transmit to The Hague. The Convention relating to "changes to be made in the code of public and private international law of America" was only ratified by three states and was therefore of no importance for the future. On the other hand, three treaties dealing with inventors' patents, the extradition of criminals and the procedure for arbitration in cases of pecuniary claims, have gradually come into force as each ratification—they are not very numerous in all—took place. Another treaty for compulsory arbitration presents an interesting precedent. It was signed by nine states and is still in force between the six governments which ratified it (Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Mexico, Peru, San Salvador and Uruguay).

In accordance with a decision of the Mexico Conference, the Third Pan-American Conference was held at Rio de Janeiro where the delegates of all the American Republics, with the exception of those of Haiti and of Venezuela, held their deliberations from July 21st to August 26th, 1906. The institution, which up till then had had only an economic character, was now transformed into an "Organ for the co-operation of the American Republics" and was called in future "International Bureau of the American Republics." In fixing its programme, juridical questions were preferred to economic ones; the conventions adopted relate to problems of nationality, of pecuniary claims, of inventors' patents and of the codification of international law. For this last object an international committee of jurists, composed of delegates from all the signatory States, was formed. We shall give some details below as to its activity. The Congress also recommended to the different Governments that they should support the conclusion of a general arbitration treaty in view of the second Hague Conference.

The Fourth Pan-American Conference was called at Buenos Ayres and sat from July 12th to August 30th, 1910. Bolivia was the only country not represented, its absence being due to the arbitral decision given by the President of the Republic of Argentina in the matter of the conflict between Bolivia and Peru relating to the territory of Acre, and which was unfavourable to Bolivia. The "International Bureau" was converted into the "Pan-American Union" as it now exists. The agenda and the final Act of the Conference, which includes four conventions and twenty resolutions, raised problems of an economic, cultural, intellectual, sanitary and juridical nature.

The Fifth Pan-American Conference, which had been fixed for 1914, could not be held in that year owing to the outbreak of the European war; it only met in 1923. At this Conference, held at Santiago de Chile from March 25th to May 3rd, Bolivia, Peru and Mexico were not represented. Relations between Mexico and the United States had been broken off, on account of the Mexican Government not being recognised by Washington, and Bolivia and Peru were in conflict with Chili on the question of the provinces of Tacna and Arica. The agenda of the Conference consisted of nineteen points among which, for the first time, were questions of a political nature. These purported to promote a better understanding between the Republics of the American continent; they also raised the problem of the encroachment of non-American powers on the rights of an American nation and of the reduction and limitation of the budget of land and sea forces. This latter point only gave rise to a vague and insignificant resolution which had no consequences. The two other questions met with the resistance of the United States delegates who emphatically opposed any "continentalisation" of the Monroe doctrine, or, in other words, the formation of an American League, as proposed by Mr. Bruns, the former Uruguayan President. Nevertheless, the opposition, which consisted mainly of the States belonging to the Antilles and to Central America, led by Costa Rica, obtained some small successes with regard to the organisation of the Pan-American Union. The representation of the countries at the Conferences and within the Council was in future to be based on the rights of each country; the Council was to choose its President itself and its Vice-President. From that time onwards the Secretary of State of the United States was always nominated as President, and the Vice-President was chosen from the States members of the Union in alphabetical order. We shall see later that at Havana a fresh impulse was given to the "de-diplomatisation" of the Pan-American Union.

The programme of the Vth Conference proposed to ascertain the best method of assuring a more extensive application of the principle of the judicial or arbitral solution of inter-American disputes. The negotiations in this connection resulted in a treaty "to avoid and prevent conflicts between the American States". This so-called Gondra Treaty, concluded on May 3rd, 1923, represented a development of the idea of the Bryan Treaties which were concluded in 1913 and 1914 by the United States with numerous other Powers and also with other American republics and which contained the obligation to submit all disputes to a permanent international commission for inquiry and report and not to start mobilisation until six months after the report is transmitted to the parties. The Gondra Treaty did not however originally provide for permanent inquiry commissions but for commissions which should only be appointed for "investigation and study" at the time when the dispute arose. But in addition to these inquiry commissions, two permanent commissions in Washington and Montevideo are provided for, consisting of the three eldest members of the diplomatic corps; their function was at first restricted to receiving the application of one of the States to convene the investigation commission and to communicate it to the other party.

Among the 67 resolutions relating to cultural, economic and sanitary questions, we shall mention those which placed the efforts for codification on a new basis. The International Committee of Jurists created by the third Pan-American Conference had held its first meeting in June 1912 at Rio de Janeiro. It instituted six sub-committees for the separate study of the principal chapters of public and private international law. The work so enthusiastically begun had been interrupted by the war of 1914.

In the months of April and May 1927, the International Committee of Jurists met for the second time at Rio de Janeiro. It proceeded to the study of the draft proposals which had reached it from several quarters.

The deliberations lasted five weeks, the result being published in a bulky code of private international law containing no less than 437 articles and, 12 draft separate proposals relating to international law. The Code is divided into four books dealing with civil, commercial, and penal international law, and the law of procedure. The twelve draft proposals on public international law relate to the following subjects:

The fundamental bases of international law; States; The status of aliens; Treaties; The exchange of publications; The interchange of professors and students; Diplomatic agents; Consuls; Maritime neutrality; Right of asylum; Obligations of states in event of civil war; The pacific settlement of international conflicts.

The proposals of the committee were submitted for discussion at the Sixth Pan-American Conference.

The Sixth Pan American Conference was solemnly inaugurated in the National Theatre of Havana on January 16, 1928. Mr. Coolidge, President of the United States, had thought it necessary to be present in person, accompanied by the Secretary of State, Mr. Kellogg. Events in Nicaragua had, indeed, created a nervous tension in the relations between the Anglo-Saxon power of the North and the Spanish-American States of Central and South America, and in the second half of 1927 an adjournment of the Conference had been advocated in some quarters. The warning was however not heeded and for five weeks the representatives of the governments of the twenty-one States of the Pan American Union, all of whom were, for the first time, represented, pursued their deliberations on the smouldering volcano of North American intervention in Nicaragua, under the daily dread of a fresh eruption. This delicate question was never actually the object of an open debate, it we except one single incident, but the United States nevertheless felt themselves from the very beginning forced into what may be called a defensive position. That position was silently and successfully held, with all the diplomatic skill which characterises him, by the leader of their numerous delegation, Mr. Hughes, who at the time of the Fifth Conference had been Secretary of State. The speech of welcome read by President Coolidge to the members of the Conference was for this reason too a message of good will towards the twenty "independent and equal sister-Republics of America". The address of welcome from the Cuban President Machado was animated by the same spirit. Both heads of State indulged in a wealth of generalities on the nature of Pan Americanism; these need not be recorded here.

The work of the Conference was then distributed among eight Committees in the following manner: Organisation of the Pan American Union; International Law; Private International Law; Problems of Communications; Intellectual Co-operation; Economic Problems; Social Problems; Treaties, Conventions and Resolutions of previous Pan American Conferences.

To these Study Committees properly speaking was added a so-called "Committee of Initiative" for the preliminary consideration of new proposals. This body performed its duties with great success by setting aside all matters which could give rise to conflicting political opinions.

At the Fifth Pan American Conference the Member States of the Pan American Union had agreed in future to place their mutual relations within the organisation on the firm basis of a convention. The Council of the Pan American Union was therefore requested to prepare a draft to this effect for the next Conference, and it was the chief task of the First Committee to deliberate upon this draft. A glance through this document suffices to show that its articles are no more than a codification of the practices consecrated by previous Pan American Conferences. This undeniable deficiency is comprehensible when one reflects that the draft was prepared by the Governing Board of the Pan American Union, that is to say by the accredited diplomatic representatives of the American States, whose field of activity is strictly limited by their official position. Accordingly, at the very beginning of the sitting of the Committee the Mexican delegation proposed radical amendments: That the States members of the Pan American Union need not necessarily be represented on the Board by their diplomatic agents at Washington. That the offices of President and Vice-President of the Governing Board of the Pan American Union should be filled by representatives of the American Republics in alphabetical order. That the office of Director-General should rotate annually among the chairmen of the Pan American Committees established in the American Republics, also in alphabetical order, and, finally, that it should be clearly indicated that the Pan American Union had no political powers whatsoever. The leader of the delegation from San Salvador, Dr. Guerrero, presented the following draft preamble:

"1. The Republics of the American Continent declare that the Pan American Union is based on two inalterable principles: the recognition of the autonomy and of the mutual independence of all the States and their absolute juridical equality."

"2. Pan Americanism consists in the moral union of the American Republics, which union is based on mutual respect and on the right they have acquired to complete sovereignty."

Dr. Puyrredon, the leader of the Argentine delegation, maintained that the Pan American Union could only be based on a convention of an economic nature. He recalled the original aim of Secretary Blaine and on this ground insisted on the following addition to the proposed preamble:

"Since economic co-operation is an essential factor for the attainment of this aim, the signatory States should work for the suppression of unjust barriers and artificial and excessive protection which make the exchange of natural products difficult or which are liable to prevent a reasonable freedom of trade between the American nations, without thereby granting privileges or exceptional favours."

This proposal, which had the full support of the Argentine Government, was obviously directed against the high tariff policy of the United States which had in recent years seriously affected the sale of Argentine products. Argentine's demands found no support.

The Convention of the Pan American Union which was finally adopted consists of fourteen articles. The preamble which precedes them embodies the principles contained in Dr. Guerrero's proposal. According to it, the Pan American Union is henceforth to be considered as a moral union of the American States for the promotion of cultural, intellectual and social ends. They agree to develop the joint co-operation and solidarity proclaimed by successive Pan American Conferences by the following means:

1. Periodical Conferences to be held regularly at intervals not to exceed five years.

2. The Pan American Union, which has its seat in Washington and which is under the direction of a Governing Board composed of the representatives of the Member States who may be appointed from the diplomatic representatives of the respective countries in Washington.—This formula was a concession to the demands of the Mexican delegation, but that delegation was less successful as regards its proposal that the presidency should be renewed annually in alphabetical order. The practice followed up till then of a yearly election was maintained.

3. Any other body which may be created as a result of a special agreement between the American States.

The Governing Body appoints the Director-General who is entrusted with the administration of the Pan American Union, and an Assistant Director who holds the office of Secretary to the Governing Board.

It is an advantage to the continuity of the work that the Mexican proposal for the annual rotation of the office of Director-General was not adopted. A new feature is the provision that the Director-General shall submit to each plenary Conference a detailed report of the work accomplished since the last Conference by the Pan American Union. On the other hand another parallel which appeared in the draft proposal was not adopted. It was proposed that Member States might withdraw from the Pan American Union after a notice of two years, whereas the regulation now in force provides that a State may withdraw at any time, but must pay its quota for the period of the current fiscal year. The Governing Board is to determine each year the quota to be paid by the Member States on the basis of the latest official statistics of population. Art. 6 defines the functions of the Governing Board and of the Pan American Union and expressly stipulates that they shall not exercise functions of a political character. Thus, in contrast to the League of Nations, the technical nature of the organisation of the Pan American Union is clearly stated and emphasized. This prescription is no more than a consecration of the practice which resulted in the deliberate exclusion at all the previous Conferences of political questions. The functions which remain within the scope of the Pan American Union are therefore the following:

1. To compile and distribute information and reports concerning commercial, industrial, agricultural, social and educational development in the American Republics.

2. To compile and classify information referring to the Conventions and Treaties concluded among the American Republics and between these and other States.

3. To assist in the development of commercial, industrial, agricultural, social and cultural relations between the American Republics.

The Second Committee had the task of examining the proposals for codification of international law made at Rio. A general outline of these proposals has already been given above; the majority of them were adopted by the Conference without any notable alterations.

The convention on the Status of Aliens was, in the words of the Chilean Dr. A. Alvarez, drafted "in accordance with the needs of the American Continent; in other words it endeavours to assimilate foreigners to nationals". It gives the State the right to establish by means of laws the conditions under which foreigners may enter and reside in their territory. Foreigners are subject to the jurisdiction of the local laws. They cannot be obliged to perform military service, but they may be compelled to perform police, fire-protection, or militia duty in the case of natural catastrophes. They are liable for taxes which apply to the population generally. States must grant to foreigners all the individual guarantees and the enjoyment of the "essential" civil rights. They may for reasons of public order or safety expel aliens, whose countries are then required to receive them. Foreigners must not meddle in the political activities of the citizens of a country. When the convention was signed the United States made a reservation relating to military service of foreigners in case of war.

The Convention on Treaties aims at laying down general rules for the conclusion, coming into force and expiration of treaties between the American states. A treaty is to cease to be effective when it has become incapable of execution. A treaty may also be declared ineffective when the motives which prompted its conclusion no longer exist. If a party to a treaty who has denounced that treaty does not obtain the consent of the other parties, he can apply to an arbitral tribunal. On this point Bolivia made a reservation demanding that all treaties, even those called final, may be declared ineffective on the ground that "they, like all human agreements, are liable to error, since there exists nothing immutable or eternal", and that those treaties whose execution are "not reconcilable with the existence, independence and dignity of a State, and which are injurious to its prosperity and trade" should also fall under the heading of "incapable of execution".

"The Convention on Diplomatic Agents meets the demands and the democratic standpoint of our Continent". The preamble declares that the status of diplomats should be in conformity with commercial, political and international conditions and should correspond to the new tendencies. It emphasises the fact "that diplomatic agents do not in any case represent the person of the chief of the State, but only their government". Immunity may only be claimed in connection with the official functions of the agent, and it seems desirable that the agent himself or his country should waive his immunity where non-official matters are concerned. It is admitted, however, that modern tendencies are in conflict with the deeply rooted customs of different countries, so that the Convention can only be regarded as a temporary solution. Its details may be passed over, but it should be noted that one article expressly forbids interference with the domestic or foreign policy of the State in which such agents exercise their functions.

A similar draft relating to the duties, rights and immunities of Consuls was also given the definite form of a convention at Havana.

By the insertion in the Havana Convention of the Montevideo agreement relating to the right of asylum, that agreement became valid for all the members of the Pan American Union. States are forbidden to grant asylum to persons suspected of crime or condemned for common crime, or to deserters from the army or navy, but asylum granted to persons accused of political crimes must be respected. It can however only be granted in urgent cases and only for a space of time absolutely necessary for the person who has sought asylum to ensure in some other way his safety. These are the outstanding points of this Convention, which was not signed by the United States on the ground that they do not recognise the doctrine of the right of asylum as forming part of International Law.

The fact that the London Declaration on Maritime Law was stillborn and that the world war made the vague achievements of the Hague Conference illusory increase the interest of the Pan-American Convention on Maritime Neutrality. Its preamble lays down the principle that the States "should contribute by the offer of their good offices or their mediation to putting an end to the conflict, and that the fulfilment of this duty shall not be considered as an unfriendly act". If war cannot be avoided, then "neutrals have a common interest in seeing that their rights are observed by the belligerents". Neutrality is defined as the "juridical situation of States not taking part in hostilities." "It creates rights and imposes duties of impartiality." These are further elaborated in the Convention, which takes into account the fact that "international solidarity demands the continual observance of the freedom of commerce". The document is divided into four sections dealing with the freedom of commerce in time of war, the duties and rights of belligerents, the rights and duties of neutrals, and the fulfilment and sanction of laws of neutrality. Generally speaking, the stipulations are a re-statement of the juridical principles codified at the Hague and London on the basis of previous experience, but a few are more progressive. Submarines are subject to the general rules relating to the searching of merchant ships; if they cannot capture the ship while observing these rules, they shall not have the right to attack or destroy the ship. The provisions relating to warships remaining, arming and provisioning in neutral ports are also made applicable to armed merchantmen. The United States, and after them Cuba, adopted a reserved attitude with regard to this point. Under Art. 2 neutral States are not bound on behalf of either belligerent to prevent the export or transit of war material. The second paragraph of the same article makes the following concession to Bolivia: "Transit may be allowed where, in cases of hostilities between two American nations, one of the belligerents is an inland country possessing no other means of obtaining supplies, provided that the vital interests of the country of transit are not affected." Naturally Chili, whom this provision chiefly concerns, made a reservation. The chapter headings in which, in the case of belligerents, duties are placed before rights, whereas in the case of neutrals emphasis is first laid on the rights and then only on duties, would seem not to be accidental. It is a conscious expression of the tendency of the American Continent to regard peace as the chief consideration of their international relations, and to treat problems of war only incidentally.

The Duties and Rights of States in event of civil war form the object of another draft convention. They are to see that nothing is done on their territory to start or to foment civil war in another State. Rebel forces crossing the frontier must be disarmed and interned. So long as the rebels are not recognised as belligerents, traffic in arms and munitions of war is to be prohibited. When they have been recognised as belligerents the rules relating to neutrality become applicable. On the initiative of Argentina special provisions relating to piracy were added to the draft prepared at Rio. By the terms of those provisions the term of piracy applied by a government to rebel ships is not binding upon the other States. The Mexican delegation proposed for discussion that the constitutional government should, for reasons of public security, proceed to the closing of ports occupied by rebels. This was energetically opposed by the leaders of the Argentine and Cuban representatives who, undeterred by their situation as representatives of governments, defended revolution as a means of liberation, progress and civilisation: "Let us leave something to the revolutionaries; let us not only think of the governments. Let us leave something too for the people, since salvation for them often lies in revolution." In view of this opposition the Mexican proposal was withdrawn.

The first two drafts of the international Committee of Jurists of Rio relating to (1) the Fundamental Bases of International Law and (2) States, were referred back, after lively debates within the Committee and private attempts at agreement within a sub-committee, for further consideration by the Seventh Pan American Conference, which met in 1933 in Montevideo. Opinions were widely divided with regard to the conception of "non-intervention" arising out of the discussion of Art. 3 of the project on States. This article runs as follows: "No State may intervene in the internal affairs of another".

A majority of the Latin-American states favoured an unqualified statement condemning intervention in any form whatsoever; and in an effort to stem the tide Mr. Hughes eventually made an address that was regarded as of more than ordinary importance because of its declaration that the United States had not permanent designs on Latin-America; because it frankly attempted to place responsibility for United States interventions on the internal conditions of Latin-American countries; and "because it constitutes perhaps the only open defence made in an international conference of the intervention policy of the United States".

"We want no aggression", Mr. Hughes declared in this address. "We want no aggression against ourselves. We cherish no thought of aggression against anybody else. We desire to respect the rights of every country and to have the rights of our country equally respected. We do not wish the territory of any American Republic. We do not wish to govern any American Republic. We do not wish to intervene in the affairs of any American Republic. We simply wish peace and order and stability and recognition of honest rights properly acquired so that this hemisphere may not only be the hemisphere of peace but the hemisphere of international justice..."

This, Mr. Hughes observed, was a principle of international law, and international law "cannot be changed by the resolutions of this Conference. International law remains. The rights of nations remain, but nations have duties as well as rights."

The last codification project of the Committee of Jurists related to the Pacific Settlement of International Conflicts. It consisted of five parts providing for good offices and mediation, commissions of inquiry, conciliation, friendly composition and arbitration. The Conference had not sufficient time left at its disposal to make a thorough study of the text. All the delegations declared themselves enthusiastically in favour of the adoption of compulsory arbitration. A sub-committee called it the "keystone for the maintenance of peace on the Western Hemisphere" and adopted a resolution which, in its preamble, "condemns war as an instrument of national policy for the American Republics in their relations with one another", and by which the Republics of America adopt compulsory arbitration as a means for the peaceful settlement of their international disputes of a juridical character. It was decided that a conference on conciliation and arbitration should meet in Washington within the year to give a practical form to this principal "with a minimum number of exceptions made unavoidable by the independence and sovereignty of the States and the interests of States not parties to the convention". For this purpose the Governments were to appoint jurists as plenipotentiaries. The Convention finally to be signed was to be completed by a "an open Protocol for progressive arbitration which will permit of the maximum development of this beneficial institution".

At the Conference of American States held as a result of this resolution at Washington from December 10th, 1928 to January 5th, 1929, two further agreements were concluded on January 5th, 1929. The first was a General Inter-American Conciliation Agreement, by which the inquiry commissions mentioned in the Gondra Agreement were at the same time given the character of conciliation commissions while the permanent commissions at Washington and Montevideo were requested to investigate the dispute until the meeting of the actual inquiry and conciliation commissions.

The second was the General Inter-American Arbitration Agreement, the value of which was however weakened by numerous reservations, although it only refers legal questions to arbitration and excludes disputes relating to the exclusive competence of a State or affecting the interests or actions of a State not a party to the agreement.

In the last sitting of the Sixth Pan American Conference the Mexican delegation unexpectedly presented a resolution against aggressive warfare, which Mr. Hughes immediately warmly supported, with the result that it was applauded on every side. It declared that the American Nations must always be guided by a common endeavour for justice and the good of all, and that the most dangerous obstacle in the way of that co-operation is the use of force. There is no international conflict which could not be solved by peaceful methods if those concerned sincerely desire it: "Wars of aggression are an international crime against mankind" and therefore every aggression is declared to be unlawful and is forbidden, and the American States undertake to solve by peaceful methods every conflict arising amongst them.

Finally, mention should be made of the general principles approved at Havana with regard to International Law. These decisions will definitely determine the character of the further work of codification within the Pan American Union.

The International Committee of Jurists will henceforth consist of three permanent Committees, one in Rio de Janeiro for Public International Law, one in Montevideo for Private International Law, and one at Havana for comparative legislation and unification of legislation.

The methodical instructions given for the work of these bodies are unmistakably drawn from the experience of the Committee of Experts of the League of Nations. They are to compile lists of matters ripe for consideration, submit them to the various governments for an expression of opinion, classify the answers, again submit the question to the Governments, request the opinion of the national International Law Associations, and finally, when a preliminary draft proposal has been outlined, to send all the material collected to the Pan American Union, which will submit it to the Executive Council of the American Institute of International Law for scientific study. For commercial, financial and navigation questions the technical collaboration of the High Inter-American Commission is to be sought. As soon as the reports of these scientific institutes have been received the Governments may call a meeting of the Committee of Jurists or place the problems on the agenda of a forthcoming international conference, provided that all the documents have been submitted for examination at least a year before. The three Committees named above are to be formed by the governments from the members of their respective national societies of International Law, by which is meant the local branches of the American Institute of International Law. They are to communicate with the various governments and with the Executive Council of the Institute through the Pan American Union. At an appropriate moment a committee of jurists should be appointed to study the unification of the civil legislation of the countries of America, principally Latin-America.

It is worth noting that by these decisions the original plan for complete codification is abandoned and the earlier lack of technical and methodical preparation remedied.

The seventh Pan-American Conference, which met from December 3rd to 26th, 1933 at Montevideo and was attended by all the 21 American Republics with the exception of Costa Rica, did remarkable work.

Of the Final Act, which comprised 104 resolutions and 7 agreements, we may in the first place draw attention to those dealing with moral disarmament or the cooperation of the American republics in the intellectual sphere. In the first place there was an agreement on the teaching of history providing that in future all incorrect statements which might create aversion to other American republics should be removed from the history books. For this purpose an Inter-American Institute for history teaching is to be founded at Buenos Aires.

As regards other decisions concerning intellectual cooperation mention may be made briefly of the formation of an Inter-American Journalists Commission, the encouragement of wireless, the unification and promotion of the exchange of professors, the preparation of an agreement on Inter-American copyright, the creation of an Inter-American bibliography and the preparation of a uniform American civil code.

In the social sphere the most noteworthy resolutions related to the formation of a Pan-American labour organisation with its seat at Buenos Aires. This is to consist of the Pan-American Labour Conferences and the Pan-American Labour Office and to supplement the work of the International Labour Office at Geneva by dealing with peculiarly American problems. The creation of this organisation would probably constitute considerable competition with the Geneva Labour Office. But it will no doubt take a long time before this recommendation is put into effect. There are numerous other decisions in the sphere of social policy, and a particularly large number of economic and financial problems were dealt with at Montevideo.

Great space in the discussions was claimed by political and legal questions. The South American Anti-War Pact (Saavedra-Lamas Pact) proposed by the Argentine was much discussed. It is one of the fundamental peace treaties of the American continent and one which has not merely remained on paper but has been ratified. It was pointed out in a special resolution that some American republics had not yet acceded to the Gondra Treaty (1923), the Briand-Kellogg Pact (1928), the Inter-American Mediation Treaty (1929), the Inter-American Arbitration Treaty and the South American Anti-War Pact (1933).

An Additional Protocol of December 26th, 1933 to the Inter-American Conciliation Convention of 1929 gives to the commissions at Washington and Montevideo provided for in Article 2 of the Agreement the character of "Permanent diplomatic inquiry and conciliation commissions".

In a further decision it was emphasised that the offer of good offices or mediation by third States should never be regarded as an unfriendly act. Good offices or mediation must not however come into question if other methods of settling the dispute provided for in a special agreement between the parties are being applied.

The material on the question of the definition of the aggressor and the position of the neutral Powers in the case of a conflict was referred to the Inter-American Juridical Commission for further consideration.

A very long resolution related to the procedure for the codification of international law, for the consideration of which it was proposed to appoint an international committee of experts and national codification committees in the various American republics.

A draft Peace Code consisting of 104 articles, submitted by the Mexican delegation to the Conference, was merely transmitted to the American republics for information.

On the other hand, drafts regarding various special questions made substantial progress and the most interesting result of the Conference in this field was the Agreement regarding the Rights and Duties of States, of December 26th, 1933.

A number of important provisions, in particular regarding recognition, refusal of the right of intervention, equal status of foreigners with nationals, refusal to recognise any territorial acquisition gained by force, and the refusal of any military occupation, are laid down in this catalogue of the rights and duties of States. The path towards an agreement on the principle of the non-recognition of territorial acquisitions gained by force contained in Article 11 was opened up in particular by the declaration made on August 3rd, 1932 by the 19 American republics in respect of the Chaco conflict. The United States of America also signed the agreement on the rights and duties of States.

Article 8 states categorically: "No State has the right to interfere in the internal or external affairs of another State." The United States delegation in signing the Convention did so with a reiteration of the reservation it made at the December 22 meeting of the Committee. This reservation is contained in a declaration of Secretary Hull, which opens by stating that "the policy and attitude of the United States government toward every important phase of international relationships in this hemisphere could scarcely be made more clear and definite than they have been made by both word and action, especially since March 4". Mr. Hull then referred to the statement made by President Roosevelt which expressed the disposition of the United States government to say that "under our support of the general principle of non-intervention as has been suggested, no government need fear any intervention of the part of the United States under the Roosevelt administration". He no doubt referred merely to one kind of intervention, namely armed intervention. For in his address to the Woodrow Wilson Foundation on December 28th, 1933, a few days after the close of the Conference, he said that only if lack of order caused the other nations of the Continent to be drawn in, the matter would become one for the entire Continent in which they were all neighbours.

Then follow a number of agreements regarding nationality, the grant of political asylum, the surrender of criminals and resolutions regarding the acceleration of ratifications of the Pan-American Union and the reinforcement of its ideas.

Relations with the League of Nations were the subject of lengthy discussions behind the scenes. As Spain, Portugal and France, and the League itself, had sent observers to Montevideo, the question of the official admission of these observers was raised. On the proposal of the American Secretary of State, Mr. Hull, a sub-committee dealt with the question whether observers of organisations or non-American States could be admitted to the Pan-American Conferences, whether such observers, if admitted, could attend private meetings and in what way the cooperation of the Union with organisations or non-American States could be assured. The reply to these questions was referred to the next Pan-American Conference at Lima and the Governing Board was requested to prepare the final discussions on these questions.

III.

The Extraordinary Pan-American Peace Conference at Buenos Aires.

Shortly after the state of war between Bolivia and Paraguay came to an end in October 1935, Mr. Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, suggested to Mr. Augustin Justo, President of the Argentine, on January 30th, 1936 that he should convene an extraordinary inter-American Conference at Buenos Aires.

The Conference would determine, the note states, "how the maintenance of peace among the American republics may best be safeguarded—whether, perhaps, through the prompt ratification of all of the inter-American peace instruments already negotiated; whether through the amendment of existing peace treaties in such manner as experience has demonstrated to be most necessary; or perhaps through the creation by common accord of new instruments of peace additional to those already formulated,

These steps furthermore would advance the cause of world peace, inasmuch as the agreements which might be reached would supplement and reinforce the efforts of the League of Nations and of all other existing or future peace agencies in seeking to prevent war."

* * *

The Chaco dispute provided the opportunity for convening the eighth Pan-American Conference, which was held from December 1st to 23rd, 1936 at Buenos Aires.

President Roosevelt, in his above-mentioned note, deliberately referred to two directions in the tasks of foreign policy in the American Continent: the solution of problems connected with the internal, inter-State relations of the American Continent, and a consideration of the extent of the obligations which the American States are willing to assume in future in respect of their contribution to the maintenance and development of peace in the whole world.

The Beginning of the Conference.

The historical importance attached to the Conference in the United States could not be more aptly illustrated than by the President's South American journey. Though he had not yet recovered from the fatigue of the election campaign and in spite of the work which awaited him in Washington, he exposed himself to a long sea voyage in order at the end of November to visit the President of Brazil for one day, to speak at the opening celebrations of the Conference on December 1st, and again after a stay of only one day to start the long voyage back to the States.

The President's initiative was however cordially welcomed by all the American States. The ending of the Chaco conflict, the League crisis caused by its unfortunate sanctionist policy, the aversion to the internal European conflict and hatred and the determination not to be drawn into it, were sufficient grounds for convening the Conference before its due time.

State Secretary Hull submitted in his speech on December 5th to the Pan-American Conference at Buenos Aires a number of proposals which were "not only to make war impossible on the American continent but to constitute a peace policy to which the nations outside the American hemisphere could adhere". Some of the points of this programme, such as the ratification and extension of the existing anti-war pacts or the suggestions in respect of the exchange of goods were primarily suited to the special American conditions and requirements. Others, however, which related to the promotion of pacific sentiments and the creation of an atmosphere of confidence and justice, were of more general importance and reflected a lofty moral view of the necessities of the life of the nations. Special interest and great practical importance attached to the proposal for regulating the attitude of the American States in case of war. This opened up a problem on which the main interest of the Conference was concentrated, and its treatment at the same time offered the European observer interesting possibilities of comparison, since the very questions of the securing of peace and the prevention of war are of the utmost importance to the European continent.

A comparison of Mr. Hull's programme with the Geneva methods indeed shows to the full the difference between the American and the Geneva conception. While the theories which have grown up in the soil of Geneva aim at securing peace by the organisation of war against war, the compulsory waging of collective warfare, that is to say by the automatic extension of war, in America the basic idea is the pacific settlement of disputes. The deeply rooted aversion to the application of force in the life of the nations has long found expression in the international law of the New World in the development of the idea of arbitration and in pacts renouncing and condemning war. From these fundamental considerations—and from the experience of the War—the neutrality policy of the United States has arisen. Mr. Hull's remarks show that it is to be logically continued by the conclusion of a Pan-American Neutrality Agreement in which the entire American world would bind itself to neutrality in case of war. In practice that would have meant that, in case of conflict, the entire American continent would impose an embargo on arms and goods against the belligerents. Mr. Hull based this proposal on interesting arguments. He spoke first of giving up "possibly tempting war business" and gave it to be understood that at the present time in America the idea of gaining economic advantages from warlike conflicts is rejected as dangerous and immoral—a view by which Germany was also governed in the Italo-Abyssinian conflict. In addition Mr. Hull expressed the view that neutrality is fundamentally a positive value, particularly as a "powerful means of ending a war".

This gives express recognition to a view which in post-War Europe under the influence of the Geneva ideology has most unjustly been to a great extent forgotten. The theorists of indivisible peace have endeavoured in every way to bring international discredit upon the notion of neutrality which was inconvenient to them. In their eyes neutrality is equivalent to forgetfulness of one's duty to the community of States. One need only recall the difficulties experienced by Switzerland in order that, when entering the League, she should not entirely forfeit her traditional neutrality policy which was recognised as of value for European peace, and be at any rate released from taking part in military sanctions. The charges which were levelled at Switzerland at that time have recently been levelled against other States which, in view of the dangerous compulsion and obvious abuse of the Geneva doctrine, preferred to base their foreign policy more on the idea of neutrality and independence, in order thereby to serve not only themselves but the general peace.

In this connection, characteristic proposals are being made to reform the League by strengthening Article 16 to such an extent that no State—whether it wishes or not—can remain outside a war. For these apostles of peace—such as Mr. Litvinov—neutrality is not a valuable means of preserving peace or at any rate of localising war, but is on the contrary an obstacle to the realisation of "mutual assistance" and must be removed by means of the reform of the Covenant.

The object therefore was to go beyond the inter-American assurances of peace and to reach joint action on the part of the 21 American States in order to exercise a positive influence on the maintenance of world peace.

The President's opening speech on December 1st, was far-reaching in this respect, although his comparison of a disrupted Europe arming against itself and a united, peaceful and happy American continent must be regarded as somewhat too simple. What European statesman would not be happy if he could speak in the name of the only Great Power existing in a radius of several thousand miles and possessing undisputed predominance on that continent, or in the name of a continent which offers its population unlimited space and possibilities, on which there are not thousands of years of history and the consequent national tension and the coast of which is guaranteed by two oceans from a great part of the troubles and dangers that constantly disturb the European continent? In spite of this, the American continent has not been spared warlike complications, imperialistic aspirations and many serious social and political disturbances.

In his speech the President reminded his hearers that once an American President crossed the sea which led to the tragic error of Versailles. "It is not the aim of this Conference to conclude alliances, to distribute the spoils of war, to divide up countries or to treat human beings as if they were pawns in a game, but to continue the blessings of peace." This is on the one hand a severe judgment on the Peace of Versailles which founded the policy subject to these strictures, and on the other hand a destructive judgment of the European policy which has not only been unable to make good the damage done at Versailles, but has even increased and aggravated it. In this connection it is impossible not to think of the League of Nations, of what it was destined to become in the mind of its creator and of what the great ones who have become its master have made of it and of world peace.

* * *

When the Conference began its practical work, in addition to the North American proposals, a further number of 115 drafts were tabled, the most important of which was one by the Argentine Foreign Minister continuing the so-called Saavedra-Lamas agreement of 1933 which for the first time had introduced universal tendencies into American politics; its fundamental idea was, while adopting a joint attitude of solidarity against a peacebreaker, to preclude any direct or indirect intervention in the affairs of other States on the grounds that this constituted an unwarranted menace to peace.

The Results of the Conferences and their Significance.

What is the significance of the results of the Pan-American Conferences in the light of the above-mentioned interests between the United States and the Central and South American States on the one hand, and the policy of Pan-Americanism in respect of its future attitude towards the rest of the world and the League of Nations on the other hand? To reply to this question, account must be taken primarily of the following agreements out of the total number of 63 conventions, resolutions and recommendations.

The first Agreement for Maintenance and Preservation of Peace does not contain everything desired by those who advocated it, in the first place the United States. At least two unofficial drafts clearly called for a Permanent Consultative Committee consisting of the 21 Foreign Ministers, for which provisions were to be laid down regarding procedure, the execution of its decisions, etc. Such a Permanent Consultative Committee would have been the counterpart of the Geneva League Council—and for that reason it did not come into existence. Some of the Latin American States have from the outset rejected the idea of constituting a body that would compete with Geneva. The only result therefore was the quite general establishment of a consultation to discuss possible cooperation in the case of action to preserve peace on the American continent. Instead of special mechanism to attain this object, the fulfilment of the engagements assumed in the various treaties is demanded in accordance with the "rules of international morality".

The organisation of inter-American peace is also promoted by two other Conventions. The first is the Agreement for the Prevention of Controversies, by means of which bilateral permanent mixed commissions are appointed consisting of specially qualified representatives of the signatories. These commissions must examine the causes of possible conflicts and submit proposals in order to reach a peaceful settlement.

The Agreement on Good Offices and Mediation represents a new procedure, in which a prominent American citizen is requested to offer his good offices or mediation in a dispute which cannot be settled through the usual diplomatic channel. This citizen is selected from a list of persons of which each Government appoints two of its nationals who are prominent on account of their upright character and juridical qualifications.

The so-called Neutrality Agreement, which primarily contains a summary of the above-mentioned five treaties, also did not come up to the hopes of the United States. For President Roosevelt, in order to realise his Pan-American peace and neutrality policy, was anxious to include the entire continent in the legislation aimed at by the United States themselves, which, in opposition to the events of the Great War and the previous conceptions of neutrality and freedom of the seas, automatically provides for the renunciation and prohibition of the supply of munitions and the grant of credits to the two or more belligerents.

Instead of such an undertaking of neutrality with all its decisive results, by which the Members of the League among the American States would naturally have come into sharp conflict with their duties under the League Covenant, merely an optional procedure was adopted which was further restricted by the fact that it was made dependent on the internal legislation of the individual States. The reservations made by some States in respect of this agreement show particularly clearly the limits within which a future general American neutrality policy will be bounded.

The question naturally arises immediately whether it has really been possible to bring the obligations under Articles 11 and 16 of the League Covenant, which in case of an international war forbid any declaration of neutrality, into harmony with the position created by the Neutrality Agreement. The reply is obviously in the negative, since the neutrality provided for in the above cases and in accordance with Article 7 is legally ineffective for the American Members of the League.

The most important agreement for inter-American relations is undoubtedly the so-called Non-Intervention Agreement, which has no reservations and is worded simply and clearly; it raises the Monroe doctrine from its onesidedness in the former policy of the United States to a multilateral obligation for all States. It implies the renunciation by the United States of the claim to a special position—almost that of a protective Power—as contained in the previous interpretation of the Monroe doctrine and the recognition of the complete equality of rights of the other States of the Continent.

This creates one of the most essential foundations for the further development of Pan-Americanism, the tendency of which—according to the reservation of the Colombian delegation—even amounts to placing the intervention of one State in the affairs of another on a level with an aggression and its collective defence.

The same applies to the Declaration of Principles of Inter-American solidarity, which reads:

The Governments of the American Republics, having considered:

That they have a common likeness in their democratic form of government and their common ideals of peace and justice, manifested in the several Treaties and Conventions which they have signed for the purpose of constituting a purely American system tending towards the preservation of peace, the proscription of war, the harmonious development of their commerce and of their cultural aspirations in the various fields of political, economic, social, scientific and artistic activities;

That the existence of continental interests obliges them to maintain solidarity of principles as the basis of the life of the relations of each to every other American nation;

That Pan Americanism, as a principle of American International Law, by which is understood a moral union of all of the American Republics in defence of their common interests based upon the most perfect equality and reciprocal respect for their rights of autonomy, independence and free development, requires the proclamation of principles of American International Law; and

That it is necessary to consecrate the principle of American solidarity in all non-continental conflicts, especially since those limited to the American Continent should find a peaceful solution by the means established by the Treaties and Conventions now in force or in the instruments hereafter to be executed,

The Inter-American Conference for the Maintenance of Peace

DECLARES:

1. That the American Nations, true to their republican institutions, proclaim their absolute juridical liberty, their unqualified respect for their respective sovereignties and the existence of a common democracy throughout America;

2. That every act susceptible of disturbing the peace of America affects each and every one of them, and justifies the initiation of the procedure of consultation provided for in the Convention for the Maintenance, Preservation and Reestablishment of Peace, signed at this Conference; and

3. That the following principles are accepted by the American community of Nations:

(a) Proscription of territorial conquest and that, in consequence no acquisition made through violence shall be recognised;

(b) Intervention by one State in the internal or external affairs of another State is condemned;

(c) Forcible collection of pecuniary debts is illegal; and

(d) Any difference or dispute between the American nations, whatever its nature or origin, shall be settled by the methods of conciliation, or unrestricted arbitration, or through operation of international justice.

Lastly, in the field of commercial policy, the two following resolutions may be mentioned :

That the Governments of the American Republics reaffirm the statement enunciated by the Seventh International Conference of American States that "the principle of equality of treatment stands and must continue to stand as the basis of all acceptable commercial policy";

That each Government declare its determination to bend every effort, having in mind the different national economies, towards the objective of enforcing in all the phases of its general commercial policy the peaceful and equitable principle of equality of treatment, and recommends that the Governments of all countries adopt this principle in their commercial policies, and in accordance therewith suppress as soon as possible all discriminatory practices including those arising in connection with import license systems, exchange control, and bilateral clearing and compensation agreements.

1. That the American States abstain, so far as possible, from raising or augmenting tariff barriers and every other kind of restrictions which directly or indirectly hinder international trade and resulting payments;

2. That immediately, and to the extent that the several national economies permit, a policy of abolishing and gradually reducing the said excessive or unreasonable prohibitions and restrictions upon international commerce be undertaken and carried forward by each of the said States, through the conclusion or revision of bilateral economic or commercial Agreements and Treaties and through unilateral action by each country;

3. That these recommendations become effective as early as possible in order that the Eighth Inter-American Conference to be held soon in Lima, and the Economic Financial Conference, which is to be held in Santiago, Chile, may mark a definite step towards a system of greater freedom in international commerce; and

4. To invite all Governments which do not participate in this Conference to follow the policy proposed in the present recommendation.

* * *

The most essential aspect of the results of the Buenos Aires Conference lies not so much in the decisions and agreements as in the spirit in which they were reached, the further removal of mistrust and the promotion of good will on all sides. The United States were wise enough not to reduce this factor by showing disappointment at the lack of achievement. The further Conferences of the future will therefore obtain new impulses from this "Extraordinary Conference" and the American regional tendencies will no doubt gain ground if Europe and the League of Nations continue to show internal dissension and disagreement.

Though some American States no longer spoke of the "American League of Nations", it is worth remembering that President Roosevelt at a press reception of journalists, in reply to a question on this subject, unequivocally rejected the idea of the entry of the United States into the League. The Americans therefore refrained from voting on the recommendation that the American Members of the League, who are signatories of the Paris Agreement, the Saavedra-Lamas Agreement and other agreements which may be reached in future, should request the American non-member States who are parties of the above agreements to cooperate with the League of Nations in co-ordinating these various agreements with the League Covenant and in measures to prevent war and to settle international conflicts by pacific means.

While it is expressly stated in the Neutrality Agreement that nothing in the Buenos Aires agreements may affect the rights and duties of the States, the problem of Pan-

America and the League of Nations has not been solved and will again come up for discussion at the Lima Conference together with the Permanent Consultative Committee.

Conclusions.

It will be seen from the above that a Continent has achieved considerable work in the course of years. But this does not involve the right—which has been so often claimed—to assume the tone of a moralist in speaking to Europe. Not only are many things infinitely easier for the New World than for the Old. The latter can even assert without boasting that the New World can still learn much from it. Moreover, as we mentioned above, there are still a number of difficult questions to be cleared up between the north and south of the American continent—questions that can be comprised in the words: Pan-Americanism, imperialism and the Monroe doctrine. A glance at the American press and periodicals shows only too clearly that, in spite of all the efforts of the United States, these questions occupy the central position not only for the North Americans but also for the South Americans and that, especially before and after the Pan-American Conferences, they dominate the field of discussion and relate not merely to definitions but to actual facts.

What is Pan-Americanism?

An interesting definition has been given in the number of April 1938 of the American Journal of International Law by Joseph B. Lockey, Professor of History at the Californian University at Los Angeles. "Pan-Americanism: One author calls it an advocacy, another an idea, another a sentiment and still others an inspiration, a tendency or a doctrine. Obviously it does not fall indifferently into all these categories. If it is a sentiment merely, it is less than a doctrine; if it is a doctrine it is more than a tendency and to call it a tendency is not the same as to say it is an inspiration or an idea. Moreover none of these clarifications when considered separately seems to fit the case."

In the American review "World Affairs" of January 1934, J. Fred Rippey, in order to throw light on the conception of the Monroe Doctrine, wrote as follows: "The fundamental motive is the desire to safeguard our security. In its original form the Monroe Doctrine contained merely an statement of the types of European activity in the New World that were considered dangerous to the peace and safety of the United States, in other words menacing to its security. These types of activity as originally envisaged were three in number: 1. the establishment of new colonies in America; 2. the setting-up of European protectorates in the New World, and 3. interference of any sort in the internal politics of American States. From time to time, as new types of European activity in America have been conceived as threats to our security, the Monroe Doctrine has been expended to embrace them also. And after Japan became one of the Great Powers the doctrine was applied to Japan as well as to Europe.

"The new types of activity which were considered dangerous to our security were as follows: 1. the transfer of territory in America from one European Power to another; 2. the transfer of territory even voluntarily from an American State to an European or Asiatic State; 3. the transfer of naval bases in America, and 4. the employment of force by Non-American Powers in the collection of damages or contracts."

The North Americans have also to defend themselves against the charge of imperialistic intentions. This is done in detail in the above mentioned article by Professor Lockey.

As regards the annexation of Louisiana and Florida, Professor Lockey wrote that as regards the expulsion of the population the country was only thinly populated and already inhabited in part by Americans; moreover they had a common boundary with the United States with which they were more closely connected than imperialistic provinces with the sovereign power. In the case of Texas and California, the population was mainly American. The Senate did not give its approval of the Dominican attempt. The Spanish possessions in the Far East and in the New World fell to the American forces without resistance and without difficulty. Cuba, in spite of limitations, had retained her place in the family of nations. As regards the Philippines, the sovereignty of the United States would disappear in 1944. In the case of Puerto Rico Professor Lockey admits the appearance of imperialism on a small scale. He observes in this connection that one swallow does not make a summer and a small island does not make an Empire. This is, he says, a small territory with a population of one and a half millions. Alaska and the Hawaiian Islands cannot be counted. The interventions in Havana, Cuba and Nicaragua cannot, he says, be regarded as imperialism but as an armed conflict.

Lockey observes that the repeated interference had inspired doubt and fear in other American States and he adds: "If interference in the international affairs of our neighbours is not yet entirely at an end, it is undoubtedly in the process of coming to an end."

There are a considerable number of cases of which Lockey tries to give an explanation. In some cases he maintains it was not imperialism but intervention, in others it was not interference but the maintenance of interests, and when it is admitted that in one or two cases the action has the essential features of imperialism, he says the object is too small to cause any excitement. Still, for those who were the sufferers the memory remains, together with a feeling of mistrust and caution.

Lockey also goes into the charge of economic imperialism. He refers in the first place to the milliards of dollars invested in the Latin American countries in the form of loans, to the oil interests in Mexico, the copper industries in Chile and Peru, the sugar interests in Cuba, the banana industry in Central America, and the innumerable American banks and industries in the Latin American countries.

"Despite this formidable array the asserters of economic imperialism do not contend that the whole Hispanic area is the economic province of the United States. To contend that the United States is free from imperialism is not to contend that it is free from the evils often associated with imperialism. The evils exist without imperialism and doubtless imperialism can exist with few of these evils."

Can the South American States really agree so entirely that a period must come for them when they must share a hermetically closed life solely with the big brother in the North? This necessarily raises the further question as to when the United States recently reverted to a hundred per cent Pan-Americanism. Reference may be made to two facts which speak volumes. The economic crisis in the United States and the development in the Far East have compelled the great neighbour in the North to refrain from the traditional exercise of pressure on Latin American States. How long that will be the case is the big question which the southern "sister republics" are asking themselves.

* * *

There are many signs that the Pan-American world is still far from having realised "eternal peace". The Americans should not adopt the naive method of asserting that this American peace is threatened from outside. With such arguments the fruitful cooperation of the American countries within the Pan-American Union may be destroyed by this policy, especially if it were to be the cause of turning the Pan-American Union into an armour-plated Monroe Doctrine.

IV.

DOCUMENTS CONCERNING THE DECISIONS AT BUENOS AIRES.

Convention for the maintenance, preservation and reestablishment of peace.

The Governments represented at the Inter-American Conference for the Maintenance of Peace,

CONSIDERING:

That according to the statement of Franklin D. Roosevelt, the President of the United States, to whose lofty ideals the meeting of this Conference is due, the measures to be adopted by it "would advance the cause of world peace, inasmuch as the agreements which might be reached would supplement and reinforce the efforts of the League of Nations and of all other existing or future peace agencies in seeking to prevent war";

That every war or threat of war affects directly or indirectly all civilized peoples and endangers the great principles of liberty and justice which constitute the American ideal and the standard of American international policy;

That the Treaty of Paris of 1928 (Kellogg-Briand Pact) has been accepted by almost all the civilized states, whether or not members of other peace organizations, and that the Treaty of Non-Aggression and Conciliation of 1933 (Saavedra-Lamas Pact signed at Rio de Janeiro) has the approval of the twenty-one American Republics represented in this Conference,

Have resolved to give contractual form to these purposes by concluding the present Convention, to which end they have appointed the Plenipotentiaries hereafter mentioned...

Who, after having deposited their full powers, found to be in good and due form, have agreed as follows:

Article I. — In the event that the peace of the American Republics is menaced, and in order to coordinate efforts to prevent war, any of the Governments of the American Republics signatory to the Treaty of Paris of 1928 or to the Treaty of Non-Aggression and Conciliation of 1933, or to both, whether or not a member of other peace organizations, shall consult with the other Governments of the American Republics, which, in such event, shall consult together for the purpose of finding and adopting methods of peaceful co-operation.

Article II. — In the event of war, or a virtual state of war between American States, the Governments of the American Republics represented at this Conference shall undertake without delay the necessary mutual consultations, in order to exchange views and to seek, within the obligations resulting from the pacts above mentioned and from the standards of international morality a method of peaceful collaboration; and, in the event of an international war outside America which might menace the peace of the American Republics, such consultation shall also take place to determine the proper time and manner in which the signatory states, if they so desire, may eventually cooperate in some action tending to preserve the peace of the American Continent.

Article III. — It is agreed that any question regarding the interpretation of the present Convention, which it has not been possible to settle through diplomatic channels, shall be submitted to the procedure of conciliation provided by existing agreements, or to arbitration or to judicial settlement.

Article IV. — The present Convention shall be ratified by the High Contracting Parties in conformity with their respective constitutional procedures. The original convention shall be deposited in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Argentine Republic which shall communicate the ratifications to the other signatories. The Convention shall come into effect between the High Contracting Parties in the order in which they have deposited their ratifications.

Article V. — The present Convention shall remain in effect indefinitely but may be denounced by means of one years' notice, after the expiration of which period the Convention shall cease in its effects as regards the party which denounces it but shall remain in effect for the remaining signatory States. Denunciations shall be addressed to the Government of the Argentine Republic, which shall transmit them to the other contracting States.

In witness whereof, the above mentioned Plenipotentiaries sign the present Convention in English, Spanish, Portuguese and French and hereunto affix their respective seals, at the City of Buenos Aires, Capital of the Argentine Republic, on the twenty-third day of the month of December, nineteen hundred and thirty-six.

Reservation of Paraguay.

"With the express and definite reservation in respect to its peculiar international position as regards the League of Nations."

Additional protocol relative to non-intervention.

The Governments represented at the Inter-American Conference for the Maintenance of Peace,

Desiring to assure benefits of peace in their mutual relations and in their relations with all the nations of the earth, and to abolish the practice of intervention; and

Taking into account that the Convention on Rights and Duties of States, signed at the Seventh International Conference of American States, December 26, 1933, solemnly affirmed the fundamental principle that "no State has the right to intervene in the internal or external affairs of another",

Have resolved to reaffirm this principle through the negotiation of the following Additional Protocol, and to that end they have appointed the Plenipotentiaries hereafter mentioned...

Who, after having deposited their full powers, found to be in good and due form, have agreed as follows:

Article I. — The High Contracting Parties declare inadmissible the intervention of any one of them, directly or indirectly, and for whatever reason, in the internal or external affairs of any other of the Parties.

The violation of the provisions of this Article shall give rise to mutual consultation, with the object of exchanging views and seeking methods of peaceful adjustment.

Article II. — It is agreed that every question concerning the interpretation of the present Additional Protocol, which it has not been possible to settle through diplomatic channels, shall be submitted to the procedure of conciliation provided for in the agreements in force, or to arbitration, or to judicial settlement.

Article III. — The present Additional Protocol shall be ratified by the High Contracting Parties in conformity with their respective constitutional procedures. The original instrument and the instruments of ratification shall be deposited in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Argentine Republic which shall communicate the ratifications to the other signatories. The Additional Protocol shall come into effect between the High Contracting Parties in the order in which they shall have deposited their ratifications.

Article IV. — The present Additional Protocol shall remain in effect indefinitely but may be denounced by means of one year's notice after the expiration of which period the Protocol shall cease in its effects as regards the party which denounces it but shall remain in effect for the remaining Signatory States. Denunciations shall be addressed to the Government of the Argentine Republic which shall notify them to the other Contracting States.

In witness whereof, the above mentioned Plenipotentiaries sign the present Additional Protocol in English, Spanish, Portuguese and French and hereunto affix their respective seals, at the City of Buenos Aires, Capital of the Argentine Republic, on the twenty-third day of the month of December, nineteen hundred and thirty-six.

Convention to coordinate, extend and assure the fulfilment of the existing treaties between the American States.

The Governments represented at the Inter-American Conference for the Maintenance of Peace,

Animated by a desire to promote the maintenance of general peace in their mutual relations;

Appreciating the advantages derived and to be derived from the various agreements already entered into condemning war and providing methods for the pacific settlement of international disputes;

Recognizing the need for placing the greatest restrictions upon resort to war; and

Believing that for this purpose it is desirable to conclude a new convention to coordinate, extend and assure the fulfilment of existing agreements, have appointed plenipotentiaries as follows:

Who, after having deposited their full powers, found to be in good and due form, have agreed upon the following provisions:

Article I. — Taking into consideration that, by the Treaty to Avoid and Prevent Conflicts between the American States, signed at Santiago, May 3, 1923, (known as the Gondra Treaty) the High Contracting agree that all controversies which it has been impossible to settle through diplomatic channels or to submit to arbitration in accordance with existing treaties shall be submitted for investigation and report to a Commission of Inquiry;

That by the Treaty for the Renunciation of War, signed at Paris on August 28, 1928 (known as the Kellogg-Briand Pact, or Pact of Paris) the High Contracting Parties solemnly declare in the names of their respective peoples that they condemn recourse to war for the solution of international controversies and renounce it as an instrument of national policy in their relations with one another;

That by the General Convention of Inter-American Conciliation, signed at Washington, January 5, 1929, the High Contracting Parties agree to submit to the procedure of conciliation all controversies between them, which it may not have been possible to settle through diplomatic channels, and to establish a "Commission of Conciliation" to carry out the obligations assumed in the Convention;

That by the General Treaty of Inter-American Arbitration, signed at Washington, January 5, 1929, the High Contracting Parties bind themselves to submit to arbitration, subject to certain exceptions, all differences between them of an international character, which it has not been possible to adjust by diplomacy and which are juridical in their nature by reason of being susceptible of decision by the application of the principles of law, and moreover, to create a procedure of arbitration to be followed; and

That by the Treaty of Non-Aggression and Conciliation, signed at Rio de Janeiro October 10, 1933 (known as the Saavedra Lamas Treaty), the High Contracting Parties solemnly declare that they condemn wars of aggression in their mutual relations or in those with other states and that the settlement of disputes or controversies between them shall be effected only by pacific means which have the sanction of international law, and also declare that as between them territorial questions must not be settled by violence, and that they will not recognise any territorial arrangement not obtained by pacific means, nor the validity of the occupation or acquisition of territories brought about by force of arms, and, moreover, in a case of non-compliance with these obligations, the contracting states undertake to adopt, in their character as neutrals, a common and solidary attitude and to exercise the political, juridical or economic means authorized by international law, and to bring the influence of public opinion to bear, without, however, resorting to intervention, either diplomatic or armed, subject nevertheless to the attitude that may be incumbent upon them by virtue of their collective treaties; and, furthermore, undertake to create a procedure of conciliation;

The High Contracting Parties reaffirm the obligations entered into to settle, by pacific means, controversies of an international character that may arise between them.

Article II. — The High Contracting Parties, convinced of the necessity for the co-operation and consultation provided for in the Convention for the Maintenance, Preservation and Reestablishment of Peace signed by them on this same day, agree that in all matters which affect peace on the Continent, such consultation and co-operation shall have as their object to assist, through the tender of friendly good offices and of mediation, the fulfilment by the American Republics of existing obligations for pacific settlement, and to take counsel together, with full recognition of their juridical equality, as sovereign and independent states, and of their general right to individual liberty of action, when an emergency arises which affects their common interest in the maintenance of peace.

Article III. — In case of threat of war, the High Contracting Parties shall apply the provisions contained in Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention for the Maintenance, Preservation and Reestablishment of Peace, above referred to, it being understood that, while such consultation is in progress and for a period of not more than six months, the parties in dispute will not have recourse to hostilities or take any military action whatever.

Article IV. — The High Contracting Parties further agree that in the event of a dispute between two or more of them, they will seek to settle it in a spirit of mutual regard for their respective rights, having recourse for this purpose to direct diplomatic negotiation or to the alternative procedures of mediation, commissions of inquiry, commissions of conciliation, tribunals of arbitration, and courts of justice, as provided in the treaties to which they may be parties; and they also agree that, should it be impossible to settle the dispute by diplomatic negotiation and should the States in dispute have recourse to the other procedures provided in the present Article, they will report this fact and the progress of the negotiations to the other signatory States. These provisions do not affect controversies already submitted to a diplomatic or juridical procedure by virtue of special agreements.

Article V. — The High Contracting Parties agree that, in the event that the methods provided by the present Convention or by agreements previously concluded should fail to bring about a pacific settlement of differences that may arise between any two or more of them, and hostilities should break out between two or more of them, they shall be governed by the following stipulations:

(a) They shall, in accordance with the terms of the Treaty of Non-Aggression and Conciliation (Saavedra Lamas Treaty), adopt in their character as neutrals a common and solidary attitude; and shall consult immediately with one another, and take cognizance of the outbreak of hostilities in order to determine either jointly or individually, whether such hostilities shall be regarded as constituting a state of war so as to call into effect the provisions of the present Convention.

(b) It is understood that, in regard to the question whether hostilities actually in progress constitute a state of war, each of the High Contracting Parties shall reach a prompt decision. In any event, should hostilities be actually in progress between two or more Contracting Parties, or between two or more signatory States not at the time parties to this Convention by reason of failure to ratify it, each Contracting Party shall take notice of the situation and shall adopt such an attitude as would be consistent with other multi-lateral treaties to which it is a party or in accordance with its municipal legislation. Such action shall not be deemed an unfriendly act on the part of any state affected thereby.

Article VI. — Without prejudice to the universal principles of neutrality provided for in the case of an international war outside of America and without affecting the duties contracted by those American States members of the League of Nations, the High Contracting Parties reaffirm their loyalty to the principles enunciated in the five agreements referred to in Article I, and they agree that in the case of an outbreak of hostilities or threat of an outbreak of hostilities between two or more of them, they shall, through consultation, immediately endeavour to adopt in their character as neutrals a common and solidary attitude, in order to discourage or prevent the spread or prolongation of hostilities.

With this object, and having in mind the diversity of cases and circumstances, they may consider the imposition of prohibitions or restrictions on the sale or shipment of arms, munitions and implements of war, loans or other financial help to the states in conflict, in accordance with the municipal legislation of the High Contracting Parties, and without detriment to their obligations derived from other treaties to which they are or may become parties.

Article VII. — Nothing contained in the present Convention shall be understood as affecting the rights and duties of the High Contracting Parties which are at the same time members of the League of Nations.

Article VIII. — The present Convention shall be ratified by the High Contracting Parties in accordance with their constitutional procedures. The original convention and the instruments of ratification shall be deposited with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Argentine Republic, which shall communicate the ratifications to the other Signatory States. It shall come into effect when ratifications have been deposited by not less than eleven Signatory States.

The Convention shall remain in force indefinitely; but it may be denounced by any of the High Contracting Parties, such denunciation to be effective one year after the date upon which such notification has been given. Notices of denunciation shall be communicated to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Argentine Republic which shall transmit copies thereof to the other Signatory States. Denunciation shall not be regarded as valid if the Party making such denunciation shall be actually in a state of war, or shall be engaged in hostilities without fulfilling the provisions established by this Convention.

In witness whereof, the Plenipotentiaries above mentioned have signed this Treaty in English, Spanish, Portuguese and French, and have affixed thereto their respective seals, in the City of Buenos Aires, Capital of the Argentine Republic, this twenty-third day of December, of the year 1936.

RESERVATIONS

Reservation of the Argentine Delegation.

In no case, under Article VI, can foodstuffs or raw materials destined for the civil populations of belligerent countries be considered as contraband of war, nor shall there exist any duty to prohibit credits for the acquisition of said foodstuffs or raw materials which have the destination indicated.

With reference to the embargo on arms, each Nation may reserve freedom of action in the face of a war of aggression.

Reservation of the Delegation of Paraguay.

(Same Text)

Reservation of the Delegation of El Salvador.

With reservation with respect to the idea of continental solidarity when confronted by foreign aggression.

Reservation of the Delegation of Colombia.

In signing this Convention, the Delegation of Colombia understands that the phrase "in their character as neutrals", which appears in Articles V and VI, implies a new concept of international law which allows a distinction to be drawn between the aggressor and the attacked, and to treat them differently. At the same time, the Delegation of Colombia considers it necessary, in order to assure the full and effective application of this Pact, to set down in writing the following definition of the aggressor:

That State shall be considered as an aggressor which becomes responsible for one or several of the following acts:

a) That its armed forces, to whatever branch they may belong, illegally cross the land, sea or air frontiers of other States. When the violation of the territory of a State has been effected by irresponsible bands organized within or outside of its territory and which have received direct or indirect help from another State, such violation shall be considered equivalent, for the purposes of the present Article, to that effected by the regular forces of the State responsible for the aggression;

b) That it has intervened in a unilateral or illegal way in the internal or external affairs of another State;

c) That it has refused to fulfil a legally given arbitral decision or sentence of international justice.

No consideration of any kind, whether political, military, economic or of any other kind, may serve as an excuse or justification for the aggression here anticipated.

The Unequivocal and Crushing Election Victory of Memel Germanism and its Significance

The march towards freedom has begun. Right must remain right, even in the case of Germans. These were the slogans to be found on the banners stretched across the streets in the course of the election campaign.

These two sentences expressed the feeling with which the Memellanders went to the polling booths on December 11th. German and free. Under this slogan they gained the victory with 25 seats for the Memel Unity Party, the Cultural Union, against 4 seats for the Lithuanian parties.

Much has been said and written about the significance of these elections in foreign countries. But in order to understand it correctly, a glance must be cast at the history of Memel since the War. This is done below to some extent by means of documents.

We may call to mind briefly that the Memel territory, consisting of three Prussian districts with a population of about 150,000, was separated from Germany by the dictated Peace of Versailles and placed at the disposal of the Allied and Associated Powers. It was administered by France on their behalf. In January 1923, when the Ruhr struggle began, Lithuanian soldiers dressed in civilian clothes entered and occupied the Memel territory. After prolonged negotiations the sovereignty of Lithuania over the territory was acknowledged. But it was promised a far-reaching autonomy in a Statute guaranteed by the Allies, together with a legislative assembly, the Landtag, and an executive government. In this way the Memel Germans were to be guaranteed the possibility of freely establishing and developing their inner life.

But the Memel German people never attained the freedom guaranteed by this Statute. From the very first day Lithuania did everything she could to lithuanianise the territory as rapidly and thoroughly as possible. While the civilian Lithuanian Governor of Memel refused to the constitutional representatives of Memel autonomy any serious application of the statutory rights, the military commander suppressed the last remains of free Memel life when, on December 17th, 1926, martial law was proclaimed; this was due to purely internal Lithuanian circumstances arising out of the Kovno party struggle and in no way connected with Memel and was to remain for twelve years as an unparalleled monstrosity in the history of European States. Volumes could be filled by a detailed description of the Lithuanian rule of violence. That rule, and with it the distress and suffering of the Memel Germans, reached its culminating point in the year 1934. At that time it was considered in Kovno that the time had come to put an end to the hated autonomy and all the forcible means at the disposal of the State were used against the Memel Germans. The parties were dissolved, all political activity was rendered impossible, the Landtag was crippled and at the beginning of 1934 nearly 150 leading Memellanders were prosecuted and one year later four of them were sentenced to death, two to penal servitude for life and the remainder to a total of 470 years penal servitude. For years the condemned persons remained in prison, while the other Memel Germans remained under martial law which was only annulled in the night from October 31st to November 1st, 1938 and the freedom of the press, of meetings and of conscience guaranteed in the Statute was thus restored.

In spite of the indignation which this period of moral and physical suffering was bound to arouse among them, the Memellanders pursued their path with complete discipline, and maintained and defended their Germanism in the firm belief and unshakable hope that the hour of delivery would once strike for them. For fifteen long years they fought for the respect for their autonomous rights with the legal means at their disposal. The Geneva League had guaranteed the Memel Statute as it had guaranteed so many other minority agreements. But the representatives of the Memel Germans handed in to the signatory powers of the Statute one memorandum after another giving irrefutable proof of oppression in violation of the treaty. These did not receive serious investigation any more than the complaints of the Sudeten Germans. Germany was powerless and these complaints could be lightly dismissed. The geographical and historical ignorance of the statesmen, which was responsible for so many foolish paragraphs of the Paris dictated peace treaties, also stood at the cradle of the Lithuanian State. For a long time they did not know what to do with the Memel territory. There was some talk in Geneva at a later date of the "German minority in Lithuania" when this territory was mentioned, though the Lithuanians did not obtain more than five seats in the Memel Landtag at the elections in 1925, 1927, 1930 and 1935, while the number of the German seats fluctuated between 23 and 27. And this in spite of all possible election and other manoeuvres on the part of Kovno with a view to reducing the number of German voters by artificial means and raising the number of Lithuanian voters.

After the very first election the Lithuanian Prime Minister Voldemaras expressed his disappointment in the following words: "This election is the first clear sign that the territory is directed against Lithuania and wishes to return to Germany."

Unfortunately this observation led to no result and it was necessary for the position created at Versailles to collapse before any change took place in the attitude of Kovno towards the Memel problem.

It found its first external expression in the cancellation of martial law. In the old German city of Memel, Borussia again stands on her high pedestal and at her side the busts of the men of Prussia's great historical era have again been set up which the Lithuanians in their lust for destruction had torn down in the hope that they might thereby eradicate for ever a portion of German and Prussian history. The names of the streets can again be read in German and in the railway station the word "Memel" has replaced the word "Klaipeda" which had surprised and puzzled many a foreign traveller. This change was also noticeable in the conduct of the election which on this occasion was carried out with less friction and in a more objective manner than in 1935 when many attempts were made to influence and hinder it.

It has finally been realised that for fifteen years a policy was practised in the Memel territory which was in harmony neither with the necessities of wise statesmanship nor with the provisions of the Memel Statute. Finally also all faith and hope was abandoned of continuing the struggle for the maintenance or incorporation of the Memel Germans in the maze of legal sophistry regarding the interpretation of the Statute in common with brutal methods of assimilation or extermination.

It was thus proved at the last election and in that which immediately preceded it that the Lithuanian coating which the Kovno authorities and their representatives in the city and territory of Memel had endeavoured to give before the eyes of the world was only a thin veneer. The Memel Germans during these years tended more and more to become a compact unit with an open and firm acceptance of national socialist ideas.

On this occasion the Memel Germans went to the polls in a compact body. The elections were however merely a formality, for the decisions had long been taken at heart. It was no longer a question of a mere parliamentary election, but of a plebiscite on the question: German or Lithuanian.

This question has been answered unequivocally in the German sense, and it will now depend solely on the Lithuanian authorities whether they will draw the conclusions demanded by the change in the political situation in Central Europe and the fundamental formation of German-Lithuanian relations.

The national freedom and independence of the Lithuanian people have never been called into question by the Germans, for National Socialism respects foreign nationalities. The vital national and economic interests have in themselves nothing to do with the Memel question. But in so far as they can be supplemented and supported by Germany, no effort will be spared within the framework of good and friendly relations. The leader of the Memel Germans, Dr. Neumann, spoke in a conciliatory tone to the Lithuanians, so that the problem can be dealt with and solved in accordance with its real importance, without passion or unjustified desires.

On the other hand, no one can blame the Memel Germans if they entertain doubts as to the seriousness, sincerity and durability of the good will, expressed in recent statements by members of the Government in Kovno, finally to bow to facts and to settle the dispute. During the years of suffering confidence has disappeared. It has been proved too often by bitter experience that what was given yesterday can be again taken away tomorrow under worse conditions as soon as circumstances appear to be favourable in the view of the Government at Kovno. In any case a clean sweep must be made, for the Memel Germans can no longer be satisfied with half measures, and what is to be done must be done quickly. The political consequences of this election go far beyond those of former elections. The international constellation has changed and the entire perverted political structure of the Memel territory has lasted long enough to prove its absurdity. Experience of the Memel Statute has merely shown that it does not form a suitable basis for the fulfilment of the national desires of the population and is not in a position to create permanent and smooth relations between the Reich and Lithuania. The compulsory situation created by the coup d'état of 1923 led to a curious and complicated state of affairs the elastic and vague provisions of which completely obliterated the boundaries between autonomy and sovereignty and raised difficulties for Lithuania not only in respect of internal affairs but also in the field of foreign policy. The two neighbouring States, Estonia and Latvia, when concluding the Baltic Pact with Lithuania on September 12th, 1934, excluded the assistance provided for in "specific cases" which primarily include the Memel problem.

From this point of view it is surprising that certain western Powers suddenly remember their role as guarantors, which they had assumed in the Memel Statute but which they had forgotten during the period when the Memel Germans suffered the greatest distress. It is indeed remarkable that they express the hope that Berlin will respect the Memel Statute, after they have paid little or no attention to the violations of the Statute by Kovno for over ten years, not to speak of the rape of this territory which they illegally tolerated. The international treaty law of the victorious Powers came to naught in the same manner as the principle of the inviolability of treaties. Their role as guarantors is therefore ill suited to them at present and it would be desirable, in the light of recent experience, that they should leave the solution of the problem to direct negotiations between those most nearly concerned, instead of trying to reduce the natural claims of Germanism in a network of retarding and procrastinating negotiations.

After all it is for the Germans to decide about Germans. The refuse still left by the Treaty of Versailles must be cleared away. Past experience teaches us with certainty that no war will break out on account of this Treaty. War could only break out so long as Germany had nothing more to say in European affairs. Germany will take part in particular in decisions regarding German affairs and will no longer tolerate dictation.

The attitude of the Lithuanian Government in the face of this fresh expression of the desires of the Memel territory will be of supreme importance for the future development. The Lithuanian Government must in the first place understand that the mistakes committed by Lithuania in the past cannot fail to have consequences. Apart from the denial of certain guarantees, the Lithuanian Government by means of its system undoubtedly contributed decisively towards accelerating the development which has now taken place. On the other hand the entire German nation has at heart no hostile feelings towards the Lithuanian nation and will show complete comprehension for its future prosperity. To that extent the political expression of opinion of the Memellanders may now also lay the foundation for a fruitful and better development of the relations between the two peoples and put an end to old differences.

But the time is short and the authorities in Kovno will do well to clear up the position before the meeting of the newly this grave charge. Presumably neither Czechoslovakia nor Lithuania would have used such methods if they had not been under the protection of those who by these means carried on their traditional policy of hegemony. In view of this incontestable fact it makes a ridiculous impression that precisely Germany should be charged with carrying on a policy of hegemony, although the foreign policy of the Third Reich has clearly proved in practice that the territorial demands have only referred to purely German territories.

There is also a Memel lie and in addition a moral Lithuanian guilt, and these must be borne in mind at the moment when a elected Landtag, which is to open forty days after the elections, that is to say at the latest by the end of January.

* * *

We have pointed out above that the action on the conclusion of peace was dictated by anything but democratic principles or respect for the right of self-determination by the former Allies. It cannot be too often stressed, in view of the active anti-German propaganda which is still being carried on, that in the case of Memel also a tissue of lies was woven around the facts, in the same way as forged documents were concocted regarding the war guilt lie, the hundred thousand Frenchmen in the Saar and the Germans who emigrated to Bohemia. These lies created the grotesque position that German territories which had for centuries been the bearers of culture among other nations on the borders of the Reich were oppressed by the latter by the worst methods once they had obtained sovereignty. Like Czechoslovakia, Lithuania cannot be absolved from decisive change is taking place for Lithuania and the Memel people. This is not due to any feeling of revenge but to the fact that the public opinion of the world has been and is being poisoned against everything German.

We have selected as the first of the documents on this subject the speech by the leader of the Memel Germans, Dr. Neumann, in the evening of December 10th. This speech, together with the further documents, clearly shows to what extent the violation of the Memel territory and its German population was carried before the eyes of the international guarantors and with their tacit consent.

The Leader of the Memel Germans on the Elections of December 11th.

Dr. Neumann referred in the first place to the programme which he had published in 1933 as the leader of the then "Socialist People's Community of Memel". "At that time" he said, "the party was forbidden because our growing influence announced the sole claim to leadership in the Memel territory and thus threatened to destroy all the dreams of the chauvinistic Great Lithuanian circles. At that time they stated quite openly that the moment had come to crush autonomy. For this purpose a scandalous action was staged. The external removal of autonomy did not succeed, but the internal undermining of autonomy was carried on with all the means at the disposal of the State. Martial law, special laws, State protection police, bribery to enormous amounts, a system of regulations intended to place free will in a position of complete dependence, the suppression of our cultural life—all these things were intended to destroy our national feeling. As the Lithuanian representative once openly stated at the Hague, autonomy was to be converted into a transitional provision for the definite incorporation of the Memel territory into the Lithuanian State."

Dr. Neumann continued: "We respect every national culture. But our struggle is aimed at the clique which has brought all the harm to our home country. Our home country must again be free. That is our right, it is doubly so because it is confirmed in the Convention and in the Statutes. We must find the way. Everywhere careful detailed work was carried out and our claims became louder and stronger. The year 1938 laid its spell upon us, and unmistakable demonstrations and demands were made in the Landtag. The external union was then made in the cultural union. The direction assumed by the political will was expressed in the establishment of the Memel German list. The union is free from party politics, but is to be regarded as political in so far as it is a representative picture of Memel Germanism and determines its action in a National Socialist spirit."

After describing the Sports Union as the keeper of order in the Memel territory, Dr. Neumann continued: "The year 1938 is coming to a close. It has brought the disappearance of frontiers erected by the Treaty of Versailles and has thus eliminated sources of permanent unrest for European peace. The leaders of the great nations of Europe have helped right to conquer and the clouds of war which had gathered over Europe to be dispelled. The year 1938 now puts to us the question: Who are you? (Enthusiastic shouts: "Germans".) At the elections on December 11th you have an opportunity of declaring to what culture and to what nation you will belong. You know my programme. I only promise you one thing: work is being done; in return I only ask of you one thing: have confidence in me and be united among yourselves. You will give me your vote, but at the same time you will give a sacred promise that you will follow me, that you will pay attention to no provocation and that you will continue in discipline and strict order to tread the long path of twenty years ago which we have followed with superhuman patience. For our part we will show the world that it is possible to help right to conquer."

Dr. Neumann then turned to the "immigrated Lithuanian comrades" who earned their bread and had established their homes here. "Your leaders", he said, "whisper in your ears the most terrifying things and make you the maddest promises, but not one of them will or can take care of you. You are marching in four parties. You can do what you will, all you will have in the end will be a few votes and a sorry bargaining. 116 representatives are clamouring for your confidence, and none of them will give even a trace of security. Social welfare has been created by us, the entire social progress is ours, and we give you the assurance that the worker has also a right to bread. Consider yourselves, you immigrant workers, where has the labour policy of your representatives led you? You were not certain for a minute whether it was your leaders' pleasure to keep you here or to give you notice again. You were only national political figures for them, nothing more, whether you belonged to Lithuanian unions or not. But for me, you are not figures, numbers or cattle, but men for whom I have to take action, for I have been through your prison as a National Socialist. I also respect your national feeling and demand from you the measure of respect that is our due. It is only on the basis of mutual respect that it is possible to reach a favourable development of all our mutual relations and normal mutual understanding. This applies both to our relations here in the territory and also to the relations of Memel with Lithuania. It would be foolish to belittle the Lithuanian cultural state; where centuries of development are lacking, this cannot be compensated in twenty years. However that may be the farmyard in Great Lithuania, however poor it may be, is the subject of unreserved respect. It has withstood the attack of the Slavonic spirit and, with German help, has saved Lithuanian culture from serfdom. To those who pretend to bring culture from outside I would say very frankly: take good care of this farmyard. This is the tragedy of our fate: an industrial territory that belonged to a highly developed industrial State was to be incorporated into a newly formed State which had its origin in unimaginable simplicity and obvious backwardness. That was bound to lead to conflicts unless consideration was given to the higher development of the territory. So long as there was a certain boom in the prices of agricultural products exported to Germany, the unnatural connection of these two territories was tolerable. But when prices began to fall, especially at the beginning of the autarchic economy, a disaster was inevitable. We were formerly prepared also to approach the altars of liberty of the reborn Lithuanian people, but only as free men. Instead of respect being shown for our desire for an understanding, we were treated with opprobrium. They alone bear the responsibility that we have turned away and are now fighting for our freedom and rights. We are still Lithuanian citizens according to the letter, but inwardly there is no further connection with Lithuania.

The Memel territory is a German cultural land and we are its children. Sieg Heil!"

HISTORICAL EVENTS FROM 1919 TO 1935

With a frankness which can cause no offence to the Lithuanians—since the German and Lithuanian cultural elements are as different as black and white—Dr. Neumann in this speech has explained the profound and only true reason why the Memellanders cannot be "assimilated" by the Lithuanians. If a comparison is made, the reason is found to lie in the social and cultural position. But such a comparison was already made by an international commission in 1923. A perusal of the report of this commission proves that certain States were not acting in ignorance when, especially since 1926, they caused the Memel population to tread the path of suffering under martial law which is comparable with the position of the Sudeten Germans that was fortunately again brought before the eyes of the world in the Runciman report.

The Entente replied to the German covering note of June 16th, 1919 in the following terms:

"The Allied and Associated Powers deny that the transfer of Memel is incompatible with the principle of nationality. The area in question has always been Lithuanian. The majority of the population are Lithuanian by origin and language."

This was a brutal violation of the right of self-determination of the nations. It passed over in silence the contents of the German covering note which was worded as follows :

"Article 99 demands the surrender of a strip of territory in the north of the province of East Prussia comprising the districts of Memel, Heydekrug and parts of the districts of Tilsit and Ragnit. The inhabitants of this territory, including those whose mother tongue is Lithuanian, have never desired to be separated from Germany. They have at all times proved to be a true component part of the German community of peoples. As regards the linguistic conditions in those districts, according to the census of 1910 only the district of Heydekrug of which

The German Government must therefore reject the surrender of this territory."

In order to prove the enormous injustice of the transfer of the Memel Territory which took place as a result of false information, we only need consider the view of the Entente Powers four years later, as expressed in the Report by the Extraordinary Commission of the Conference of Ambassadors of March 6th, 1923, the Commission which had to collect the basic facts for fixing the Memel Statute and which consisted of MM. Clinchant, Fry and Baron Aloisi. This report states inter alia :

Copperplate Engraving of the German City of Memel in the Year 1684

55 % of the population speak Lithuanian, shows a small non-German speaking majority. In the district of Memel only 44 %, in the district of Tilsit 23 % and in the district of Ragnit even only 12 % of the population have Lithuanian as their mother tongue. The entire territory moreover is predominantly German according to the number of the population. There are about 68,000 Germans as against only about 54,000 Lithuanian-speaking inhabitants. In particular Memel is a purely German city ; it was founded in the year 1252 by Germans and has never throughout its history belonged to Poland or to Lithuania ; just as in the south the East Prussian frontier has remained unchanged since the year 1422. It should be pointed out that even the inhabitants who have Lithuanian as their mother tongue almost all speak German perfectly and even use this language among themselves. Their is no movement for connection with the Lithuanian population of the former Russian Empire apart from a small group which carries no weight, especially as the Lithuanian population living in the former Russian Empire is Catholic while that of the German territory is Protestant.

Extract of the Report to the Conference of Ambassadors by the Extraordinary Commission at Memel

The Extraordinary Commission sent to Memel by the Conference of Ambassadors does not propose, in this report, to dwell upon the laborious negotiations which have been carried on with the rebel leaders in order to enable the Principal Allied Powers to decide freely on the future of the Territory. The difficulties of the Commission's work and the results achieved have been made sufficiently clear in the telegrams sent by it to the Conference. It will merely endeavour to bring out, with the aid of enquiries prosecuted on the spot, the truth regarding certain extremely involved questions in connection with Memel which have been deliberately obscured or distorted by Lithuanian diplomacy and propaganda, and it will submit to the Conference of Ambassadors, together with a number of impartial documents, certain ideas which may perhaps be of assistance in the negotiations on the status of Memel.

In order fully to understand the views and the aspirations of the people of Memel, we must glance briefly at the history of the Territory.

Memel is the oldest German town in East Prussia and has never belonged to Lithuania. In the thirteenth century a number of Knights of the Brotherhood of the Sword, a branch of the Teutonic Order, came from Riga and established a colony and a fortress on the site of the town. At that time the population of the northern part of the Territory was Latvian, and that of the southern part Lithuanian. Lithuanians, Latvians and Old Prussians are racially allied, all belonging to the Baltic family. It need hardly be observed that this race has no connection with the Slav. The population of the Territory has been very largely teutonised, and that of the town is almost exclusively German. This is perfectly natural, for the German frontier has not shifted for five hundred years.

This fact is of great importance; it involves consequences which were brought to the notice of the Commission. The latter was anxious, however, to investigate them in person and therefore travelled by road as far as the Lithuanian frontier.

The eastern frontier of the Memel Territory, which coincides with the former Russo-German frontier, marks an abrupt and sudden change from one civilisation to another, with at least a century in between them. It is the true frontier between west and east, between Europe and Asia. On this side education has been so general that there are no illiterates, even among the peasants, many of whom speak both Lithuanian and German. The country is covered with a network of well-kept roads leading to villages of comfortable, well-built houses. The land is cultivated by modern methods. The small-holding system has been developed side by side with the system of large farms.

On the other side of the frontier, the country-people live in the direst poverty. Only those who have been in the Russian army have even the rudiments of education. Roads are almost unknown. The peasants know nothing about clearing and manuring the land and let it lie fallow for two years before resuming cultivation. Their wooden huts are small and dirty. Agrarian reform has resulted in general disorganisation, and if it is carried to a conclusion, it will ruin the large properties of Lithuania, which are already in considerable danger. Only on these properties is farming at all organised at the present time. There are other difficulties. The population of Great Lithuania is Catholic, whereas that of the Territory is Protestant. The Lithuanian language has developed differently on the two sides of the frontier.

Many Lithuanians who belong to Memel fear the consequences of annexation to Great Lithuania without secure guarantee of autonomy. They know that annexation will mean military service, heavy taxation, an increase of 400 % in the cost of living (partially due to the imposition of extremely high Customs dues), the disorganisation of economic life, and that system of bribery and concessions which is common to all countries formerly included in Russia.

Though all the prominent Germans which the Commission has met were in favour of a popular vote on the question of the independence of the Territory, no prominent Lithuanian member of the Taryba wished for the plebiscite. This fact is a more convincing proof than any statistics that the majority of the population is not Lithuanian.

These are the suggestions which the Commission wishes to lay before the Conference of Ambassadors. The Commission is aware that under the present circumstances it will be extremely difficult to induce the Lithuanians to accept them. The latter will not welcome Allied intervention in their relations with the Territory, for their ultimate object is annexation pure and simple. The Commission has been in contact with the Lithuanians long enough to know that negotiation with them is exceedingly difficult. They are impervious to reason and recognise no argument but force. Obstinate and defiant, they pursue their immediate aims with an eagerness which makes them blind to their true interests.

For these reasons, the Commission thinks it desirable to call the attention of the Conference of Ambassadors to the necessity of placing the organic Statute of Memel under the supervision of the League of Nations.

Paris, March 6th, 1923. (Signed) Clinchant, Aloisi, Fry.

Nothing need be added to this report. The Entente countries were however aware of this racial position prior to the investigation of this Extraordinary Commission. As far back as the Paris Conference of November 3rd/4th, 1922, M. Laroche, the French chairman of the commission which subsequently made preparations for transferring the sovereignty of the Memel Territory to Lithuania, said to the Memel delegation: "We know that you all wish to return but we shall be able to prevent it."

Was it surprising that, in view of such unsurpassed cynicism, the Lithuanians should take up the slogan of a French representative in order to put an end to any further attempts at discussion by means of an action closely resembling a comedy?

On January 10th, 1923, the day when the French troops occupied the Ruhr, the Lithuanian Government clothed its troops in civilian clothes and set up an insurgent government under the demagogic slogan: "Down with French foreign sovereignty".

At the present time the question is permissible as to how far the then Head Commissioner of the Memel territory, M. Tetisné, the representative of the Allied Powers, was deceived when he issued the following proclamation after the Lithuanian incursion:

Inhabitants of the Memel Territory!

In the name of the Allied Powers, I again raise the most solemn protest against the sanguinary "coup de main" which has been carried out against the Memel Territory.

I declare expressly that the Allied Powers intend to continue to exercise their authority over the Territory.

Memel, January 16th, 1923.

The Head Commissioner

Representative of the Allied Powers
Petisné.

Whether he was deceived or in secret connivance, it remains a fact that the lawbreaker was presented with the sovereignty over the Memel territory.

Counting on human forgetfulness, Lithuanian propaganda endeavoured to represent the "coup de main" carried out at that time by the Lithuanian Government as a myth. One has not to rely on German sources in order to ascertain the truth regarding the events of January 10th, 1923. It is sufficient for this purpose to turn to League Document C. 664, M. 295, 1923, VII, in which the following facts are established by the Commission of the Conference of Ambassadors.

"Notwithstanding the denials of the members of the Lithuanian Government and its representative at Memel, there can be no doubt that the rising of January 10th was conceived, prepared and carried into effect by the Kovno Government. It may be well to call attention to the dates. On January 3rd, M. Zilius, Lithuanian Representative at Memel, left for Kovno accompanied by M. Simonaitis, afterwards head of the Rebel Government. During the conversations which took place on January 4th, the attack upon the Territory was decided upon. Orders were immediately given by the Lithuanian Ministry of War, and officers and men of the regular army, wearing civilian clothes instead of uniform, embarked on January 6th by order of the military authorities for an unknown destination. The leader of the rebel army, who signed the proclamations posted up in the "Territory" under the name of Boudrys is, in reality, Colonel Polowski. The Commission described him by his real name and rank, and be made no protest. It should be added that the "volunteers" are supplied with arms, ammunition and rations by the Kovno Government. Much of the money for the enterprise comes from Lithuanians in America.

The date on which the rising was decided upon is also worthy of note. It was January 4th. News of the first results of the Paris Conference regarding Reparations had then reached Kovno.

From the outset, the Lithuanians employed comparatively large military forces. It is estimated that from two to three thousand of the regular army crossed the frontier of the Territory. The Kovno Government thought it necessary to make this display of military forces against a single company of French Chasseurs because it was aware that its "volunteers" would not be supported by the majority of the population in the territory—would, indeed, find support only from some of the Lithuanians in Memel. These were the "Taryba", who, according to statements made to the Commission by M. Yankus, Chairman of the Committee of Public Safety, and virtual head of the Taryba, did not exceed eight to ten thousand in number before the events of January 10th."

The indisputable truth about Memel was however published to the world by the result of the first elections to the Memel Diet on the basis of the Memel Statute. At these elections, which took place under Lithuanian rule on October 19th, 1925, the German parties (comprising Germans and Lithuanians) obtained about 58,000 out of 62,000 votes. The German parties obtained 27 out of 29 seats. In the previous year at the elections for the municipality of Memel, the German parties obtained 13,300 votes (40 deputies) out of 14,000 votes. At that time, M. Voldemaras, subsequently Prime Minister, wrote: The elections are the first clear indication that the territory is directed against Lithuania and desires to return to Germany." The subsequent elections, in spite of the oppression of the German element, in spite of Lithuanian immigration and of the martial law declared in the territory, gave proof of the overwhelming desire of the Memellanders for the maintenance of their German nationalism. Thus, the second elections to the Memel Diet, held on August 30th, 1927, resulted in 47,000 votes out of 54,700 in favour of the German parties, and 25 seats out of 29. The subsequent elections brought no change in the majority, and it was only in 1932 that the Lithuanian parties returned 5 deputies.

German rights in the Memel Territory and their violent distortion were also described in an article, published by Anton Smetona, President of Lithuania, in the "Lietuvis" No. 49 of December 11th, 1925:

"In the small Memel Territory, Great Lithuania has hitherto achieved no success whatever... It is obvious that, after Memel was assigned to Lithuania, our Government did not succeed in taking the will of the majority in Memel into account. We had frequent occasion to observe that the policy of our Government was unsuitable...

It is not we of the opposition, but our ruling parties, that rejoiced at obtaining an "acceptable" Statute from the Conference of Ambassadors. We were at that time against the Constitution because it was dictated by foreign States. But once it has been signed by the Government, it must be fulfilled; if we do not fulfil it, the case of Memel will be referred to the League of Nations, and our ruling parties will then give way in every respect and pay for their faults with interest at the cost of Lithuania. In the eyes of the world we shall be again compromised. Why should that be necessary? If we make ourselves ridiculous at Kovno, that is as it were our own affair. We can assume that the foreigners do not notice it. Memel is a little window through which we can look out at the world, but through which also the world can look in and see our good and unfortunately also our bad qualities. We must therefore be careful of every step and see that it does not lead us astray and is in conformity with the Statute.

But we are compromised the most among the Memellanders; we must remember that the territory is not Dannewitsch, Schaulen or any other part of Lithuania, but Memel, which belonged to Germany for 700 years, and that the bonds of the past bind it to Germany. The connection with Lithuania is a thing of the present in which we live. It is for us to influence the case in our favour. Everyone is well aware how strong are the tendencies which lead to Germany. Moreover it is no secret that we have received the territory by the grace of the Treaty of Versailles and the Conference of Ambassadors. This fact does not strengthen, but weakens, our position in Memel. The grace of treaties is unstable; it does not involve rights, for the grace of politics depends upon its humour, and if there is any change in this respect the matter might turn out differently from our expectations.

Consequently, the Lithuanian Government, in order to strengthen the bonds between Memel and the rest of Lithuania, should endeavour to gain the confidence of the Diet. Whatever the political views of the Diet, the main point is that it should show loyalty to the State. We know that this opinion of ours will displease one group or another of our authorities. But all people who are faithful to the State will doubtless agree with us...

... The territory could only be separated from Germany and assigned to Lithuania by force of arms. If that is so, the right of the sovereignty of Lithuania over the Memel Territory ultimately depends on Germany. The policy of Lithuania towards Germany must therefore be a policy of mutual understanding.

Our Government's policy has not hitherto taken these real facts into account."

Nevertheless, after the "coup de main" Lithuania had to accept the Memel Statute of May 8th, 1924 prepared by the Conference of Ambassadors. Since that time it has never paid any attention to this Statute.

Of the 15 Directorates which the Memel Territory has had since 1923, there have only been 2 which have possessed the confidence of the Chamber of Representatives in accordance with Article 17 of the Statute, and there has not been a single Chamber of Representatives which has lived through the statutory legislative period of three years. According to Article 12 of the Statute, the Governor, in agreement with the Directorate, has the right to dissolve the Chamber of Representatives. For the purpose of such dissolution, therefore, the Governor instituted special Directorates of the small Lithuanian minority which were docile to him, until the judgment of the Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague of August 11th, 1932 put a stop to this practice. It decided that the Chamber of Representatives could only be dissolved by a Directorate which already had the confidence of the Chamber of Representatives.

The Governor then adopted another practice. Contrary to the provisions of the Statute, he closed the sessions of the Chamber of Representatives without the consent of a constitutional Directorate. Even during the session it was made impossible for the Memel Chamber of Representatives to exercise its constitutional activity in accordance with the provisions of the Statute. The legislative work was constantly prevented by the fact that the Governor vetoed almost all laws passed by the Chamber of Representatives. According to Article 16 of the Statute the Governor's right to veto the laws of the Chamber of Representatives is limited to three cases, namely if the laws exceed the autonomous competence, or infringe the Lithuanian constitution or international treaties. The Governor has not kept to this provision and has quite arbitrarily vetoed most of the laws. It has happened that, after the reasons for the veto have been removed, various laws have been vetoed for the second or third time for constantly fresh reasons. This has been the case, for instance, with the Memel revalorisation law.

The autonomous rights of the Memel inhabitants were very greatly restricted by the introduction of the state of siege in the Memel Territory in 1926. This took place without the Memel Territory having given any grounds for such action. The state of siege in the Memel Territory was introduced not on account of any danger to the Senate, but for the purpose of excluding the civil autonomous authorities. The state of siege was also practised in an entirely onesided manner; while the Lithuanian parties and organisations and the Lithuanian press had complete liberty, everything was prohibited to the German Memel organisations. The political parties of the Memel inhabitants were not allowed to hold meetings and the cultural organisations could only do so after their agenda had been approved by the war commandant. All meetings were moreover supervised by the representatives of the war commandant. The press was under the strictest censorship and could only publish the news provided by the Lithuanian Telegraph Agency. The reports of the meetings of the Memel Chamber of Representatives, the speeches of the deputies, and even the publication of the agenda of the Memel Chamber of Representatives, and the publication of articles of the autonomy Statute, were suppressed by the seizure of the Memel German newspapers. There was nothing left of the freedom of meetings, societies, press, conscience and speech guaranteed to all citizens of the Memel Territory by Article 33 of the Statute.

Reference may also be made to the limitation of the Memel judicial autonomy, the removal of educational autonomy, and the serious disputes which arose out of the provisions of Article 35 of the Statute, and also to the violation of the guaranteed equality of treatment of the two languages. According to Article 35, the Lithuanian Government is obliged to assign a certain proportion of the receipts from customs, excise and monopoly taxes to the Memel Territory for the maintenance of the autonomous departments, since all revenue-earning departments such as the railways, customs and posts are within the competence of the Lithuanian Government, while all spending departments are within the competence of the autonomy. The dispute regarding this proportion has lasted for years and has only been settled temporarily by the mediation of an expert of the League of Nations.

When the new Landtag Elections of September 29th, 1935 were impending, the Lithuanian Government made preparations for them in a manner which obviously aimed at preventing free polling. On the one hand it arranged an artificial mass immigration into the Memel territory and on the other hand deprived Memellanders of Lithuanian citizenship. A change was made in the election law which represented a real curiosity and in practice amounted to a sabotage of the election.

According to this law every voter had, not one vote, but as many votes as there are deputies to be elected to the Chamber, in this case 29. On the day of the election, in the polling booth, the voter was handed a block consisting of as many ballot papers as there were candidates of all parties. The voter must select 29 ballot papers from them. Several hundred candidates had put up for the impending election. Consequently the voter must select the ballot papers of the candidates for whom he wished to vote. This naturally took considerable time. As there were about 1000 voters for each voting district in the Memel territory and each voter required at least five minutes to record his vote, the election would take 5000 minutes, which was equivalent to 83 hours or 7 days of 12 working hours. Under the law, however, voting could only take place on one day; consequently the Lithuanian Election Commission had ordered that each polling booth should have so many tables that there should be one table for every hundred voters. In some districts there were about 2000 voters. In these cases, therefore, there would be at least 20 tables for the voters and a few tables for the district polling commissions. Rooms of this size were not to be found everywhere in Memel. It had also been provided that the ballot papers were not to be counted by the district polling commissions immediately after the election, but by the Election Commission in Memel. Hitherto there had been 211 voting districts in the Memel territory, and they required from two to three hours to count the ballot papers. On the basis of only one and a half hours and 200 voting districts, this represented 300 hours' work carried out by the district polling commissions. This time was required for counting the votes when only one ballot paper was handed in by each voter. On this occasion each voter handed in 29 ballot papers, so that the time required should be 29 times as long. If we assume that only ten times as much time was required, the Election Commission would have to count for $300 \times 10 = 3000$ hours, or 300 days of 10 working hours.

The Führer and Reich Chancellor protested against these attempts in his speech of May 21st, 1935 as follows:

"Germany has nothing to gain from any European war. What we want is freedom and independence. Such being our aims, we were ready to conclude pacts of non-aggression with all our neighbours. If we make an exception to this attitude in the case of Lithuania, that is not because we want a war with Lithuania, but because we cannot enter into Agreements with a country which ignores the most elementary laws of human co-operation. It is pity enough that, owing to the scattered distribution of the European peoples, cases are frequent where it is difficult in practice to draw boundaries in accordance with the limits of nationalities. It is pity enough that certain treaties purposely left nationalities out of account. But at least it is not necessary that human beings, who have already had the misfortune to be torn from the people with which they are kin, should on top of that be tortured and ill-treated. I read some weeks ago in a great international newspaper a remark to the effect that Germany was big enough to waive her interests in the Memel territory. The noble philanthropist who made that remark forgot one thing: and that was the circumstance that 140,000 human beings have after all rights of their own, and that the point is not whether Germany wants them or not, but whether they themselves want to be Germans or not. They are Germans. They were torn from the Reich by an act of aggression committed in peacetime and sanctioned after the event; and, because they now cling in spite of all to their German racial character, they are persecuted, tortured and ill-treated in the most barbarous manner. What would be said in England or France if such a melancholy fate were to befall nationals of either of these nations? If a feeling of kinship with their own race on the part of men who have been separated from that race against all right and nature is to be treated as a crime, that means the denial to human beings of a right which is conceded to every animal—the right, namely, to feel attachment to its old master and to the old life lived together in common. Of this right 140,000 Germans in Lithuania are deprived. It is under these circumstances out of the question for us, so long as the responsible guarantors of the Memel Statute are themselves unable to bring Lithuania back to some regard for the most elementary of human rights, to enter into any Agreement with that country."

In spite of everything, this election of September 29th, 1935 again resulted in an overwhelming victory of the Memel Germans. But unfortunately this fact brought no change in the position of the Memel Germans until the elections of 1938.
